CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

TO THE ORCHIS PYRAMIDALIS.

From the Ruins of Thurnham Castle, Kent.

BY DOUGLAS ALLPORT.

A flow'r is not a flow'r alone,
A thousand sanctities invest it ;
And as they form a radiant zone,
Around its simple beauty thrown,
Their magic tints become its own,
As if their spirit had possessed it.

The sprightly morning's 'breezy call,'
And cool grey light around it streaming ;
The holy calm of even-fall,
The majesty of night, and all
The glories of its starry pall
Above it eloquently beaming.

'The precious things of heav'n—the dew'
That on the turf beneath it trembled ;
The distant landscape's tender blue,
The twilight of the woods that threw
Their solemn shadows where it grew,
Are at its potent call assembled.

And while that simple plant, for me
Brings all these varied charms together,
I hear the murmurs of the bee,
The splendour of the skies I see,
And breathe those airs that wander free
O'er banks of thyme and blooming heather.

Thus, when within my sunless room,
Heart-sick and mocked by mammon's leaven,
The pyramids of purple bloom,
Blush through its loneliness and gloom,
The spirit bursts its living tomb,
And basks beneath the open heaven.

There, as on some green knoll recumbent,
The summer landscape round me glowing,
While gentle ardours fill the mind,
I leave the 'unquiet world behind
And hear a voice in every wind
Around my fervid temples blowing.

The self-same voice how calm and still !
That rends the rock, and wakes in thunder,
Proclaiming from the tinkling rill,
The vocal copse, and breezy hill,
As meekly as the dews distil
Its ceaseless ministries of wonder.

'Th' Eternal Power and Godhead' then,
Is seen and loved in all around us ;
Seen in the deep and dewy glen,
And loved to agonizing, when
We know ourselves to be but men,
And feel this tabernacle bound us.

Thus through this wood-side plant, the mind
Sweeps the vast range of things created,
And longs, and pants, and fails to find,
In earth, air, ocean, sky combined,
Those joys unfading and refined,
By which its famine may be sated.

Its very carvings wean it hence,
It anchors where its rest remaineth ;
And who has pow'r to drive it thence?
Its helper is Omnipotence,
The rock of ages its defence,
And sinlessness the prize it gaineth.

WEEKLYANA.

THE Nepal Durbar has made over the truant Raja of Sikkim to the British at Darjeeling. No orders have yet been issued by the Government of India about his disposal.

SOUTHERN Hindudom has been "exercised" by the sudden shutting up for two whole days and nights of the famous temple on the Upper Tirupati Hill. This was an unprecedented irregularity—the result of the factious war which had been going on for some time between rival parties contending for mastery. The orthodox of Madras naturally regard it as a serious calamity, while the more pessimistic think the Iron Age near its completion. The end cannot be far off—the end of the world. These rival parties have been very indiscreet in pushing their quarrel to this extreme. We believe they went beyond their right. Certainly, in shutting the temple up at their sweet will they showed scant respect for the holy shrine and its god. They should have been the last to present to the entire Hindu world such an example of trifling with one of the principal objects of veneration and worship.

THE Mysore Government has, we find, decided to sell, for the benefit of their respective funds, the useless jewellery, valued at Rs. 95,555 in the various temples of the state. In this decision, the Mysore Durbar is more European than Hindu. What, again, are useless jewellery of a God or a temple? We are afraid the Government of Mysore is sailing perilously near the rock of sacrilege.

SHRI Harkisan Das Narottamdas has offered to contribute liberally towards the erection of a grand Lunatic Asylum, to be called after the name of a dear relation of his. The building will be soon begun.

at a site already selected by Government at Tanna. The existing building will be sold and the proceeds go towards the cost of the new edifice. The entire cost, according to the Western papers, will be about nine lacs. Dams or Rupees, we wonder. Lunacy seems at once popular and fashionable on that side. Duckland in general must be gone far in the head to require a habitation of nine lacs for the interesting imbeciles.

MR. P. Sreenivasu Charlu, B.A. of the Madras University, has published a prose translation or adaptation in Telugu of the Midsummer Nights' Dream under the name of Khecharollasani. It is considered a very creditable piece of maiden work. He is the son of our great patriot, Anand Charlu. We congratulate Charlu the Elder on the possession of such a son, and pray for God's blessings on the boy for the sake of the sire, and of his own promise.

Epigraphia Indica—the journal of Indian Epigraphy started by the Supreme Government in direct competition with the Indian Antiquary—is to be amalgamated with the latter, and the two journals will shortly appear under one cover. Dr. Hultzsch, the well-known Indian Epigraphist, will edit the new special epigraphical portion of the Indian Antiquary.

Epigraphy, we may explain to unscientific readers, is the science of inscription.

THE Examiners for the next B. L. Examination are Messrs. A. F. M. Abdur Rahman and W. A. Bonnaud, barristers-at-law, and Baboos Karuna Sindhu Mookerjee and Jagesh Chunder Dey, pleaders of the High Court.

FROM a paragraph which is going the round of the British press, we learn that Almanacks were first published in England in the fourteenth century, and one of the earliest known is "John Somer's calendar," written in Oxford, and published in 1380. A duty was imposed on them in 1710, and repealed only in 1834.

IN the Stationery Trades Journal for April 30, a curious extract of a specimen of advertisement appears, which we transcribe below:—

"A Japanese Bookseller's advertisement.—The Japanese have unique ways of doing things. Here, for example, is the advertisement of a Tokio bookseller: 'The advantages of our establishment: 1. Price cheap as a lottery; 2. Books elegant as a singing girl; 3. Print clear as crystal; 4. Paper tough as elephant's hide; 5. Customers treated as politely as by the rival steamship companies; 6. Articles as plentiful as in a library; 7. Goods despatched as expeditiously as a cannon-ball; 8. Parcels done up with as much care as that bestowed on her husband by a loving wife; 9. All defects such as dissipation and idleness, will be cured in young people paying us frequent visits, and they will become solid men; 10. The other advantages we offer are too many for language to express.'

There is a distinct American flavour in the foregoing which is most curious. Extremes meet. Geographically the extreme West and the extreme East meet in the Pacific Ocean, and it is interesting to find the same kind of humour flourish on both shores of it. We have now little doubt that Japan has her Sam Slicks and Artemus Wards.

IN the Printers' Register for May 6, 1892, appears the following statistics regarding newspapers all over the world:—

"By the latest computation the aggregate of newspapers published in all countries is estimated at 41,000, of which number about 24,000 appear in Europe. Germany heads the European list with 5,000, then comes France with 4,100, England with 4,000, Austria-Hungary with 3,500, Italy with 1,400, Spain with 850, Russia with 800, Switzerland with 450, Belgium and Holland with 300 each, and the rest are published in Portugal, the Scandinavian and the Balkan countries. The United States has 13,900 newspapers. Canada has 700, and Australia also has 700. The people of the United States, therefore, read and support about as many newspapers as England, France, Germany, and Russia combined."

HERE is a cure for beri-beri. The Indische Mercur writes:—

"Up till now we have had no sure remedy for the beri-beri miasma; but it seems now to have been found in the Vitis nili. The cure of sick persons in the same locality where they had been infected and who did not suffer a relapse, seems to be certain proof. Dr. Antonio Jacinto of Parahybado-Sul, who had a case of beri-beri under treatment, being at this time, tried bathing the patient in an infusion of Vitis nili, following the custom of the natives in the interior, who use this remedy for similar complaints. To the physician's surprise, after applying two baths every day, the swelling quite disappeared after four days.

Different forms of the beri-beri were treated in like fashion and with the same success, the sickness being cured within a few days, without any relapse occurring. For convenience sake, Dr. Jacinto has made a tincture and an extract of Vitis nili. He uses the first internally, and the latter in the form of an ointment which he rubs into the affected parts. The result is the same. For over a year past now Dr. Jacinto and Dr. Thingo Costa have used the remedy in their practice, without losing a single patient."

MIR Shujat Ali is a Southern Mussulman whose name has been frequently before the public. He entered the unconvicted service on a small pay in the Godavari District in 1876, and soon brought himself to the fore, and in December 1881 got himself nominated a probationer in the Statutory Civil Service. He has since served in several districts, through all the grades of Assistant, Head Assistant, Sub-Collector, &c., and now suddenly confronts the world as Deputy Commissioner of Bangalore. This means that he has transferred his services to the Mysore Government. Perhaps the chief feather in his cap is his wife. He searched long and went far for a partner in life and married a Northern Mahomedan lady of education who has abandoned the seclusion of the sex in Mahomedan society.

IN a suit before the Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Hill, the officiating Advocate-General, Mr. Woodroffe, contended that a settlement by a Mahomedan in the way of wakf on his children, &c., and, after their extinction, to the poor, was not valid. Khur Bahadur Serajul Islam, on the other hand, maintained that, whatever the arguments of the Advocate-General, the Mahomedan law favored such disposal of property. Owing to conflicting authorities quoted on either side, the matter has been referred to a Full Bench.

NATIONS have their skeletons in the cupboard, no less than families or individuals. One such has just been unearthed at Nogent-sur-Marne by a Paris shop-keeper who lives there, in the course of clearing out a well which, having been abandoned for twenty years, had become full of sand. Removing the sand he came upon a flight of steps hewn roughly in the chalk. Pursuing the clue he found the steps to lead into a gallery three feet wide and six feet high. Digging on to the other end he was met by the apparition of a man in the uniform of a National Guard of 1870, with his back against the wall. The gallery led into an underground room, while a lieutenant of the old National Guard was sitting at a table with a bottle and two wine-glasses before him. No other furniture is mentioned, but several rifles were stacked in a corner. The officer was apparently dozing, his arms folded, and head nodding. Several more or less plausible conjectures have been made to account for the phenomenon, but the theory generally accepted is that these buried men had taken refuge from the Germans in the gallery, the sides of which fell in probably by accident. The good people of Nogent insist that the unspeakable Germans knew of the hiding-place and filled up the pit out of spite towards the French in order to bury the two fugitives alive.

THE other day, at the St. Vincent's Home, in Ekbalpore Road, Calcutta, a little before 9 O'clock in the evening, one of the nuns going into the Dormitory found under a bed a native with a heap of bed linen, blankets, &c., which he was bundling up to carry away. She quietly went to inform the Lady Superintendent and soon both came to the Dormitory and shot the man within it by closing the doors from outside. One of the nuns had to stand with her back against a door to prevent the man's escape. After two or three unsuccessful attempts, he pushed the door open. The nun's charge was equal to the situation. She boldly seized him. A desperate struggle ensued. By that time, however, the whole convent was up, and the womankind gave a good account of the intruder. Every pretty little right hand and some left hands too possibly, had a shy at Abdul otherwise Mahomed, who did not find them soft. The ruling passion of the European races, war, is strong even in the convent. The good girls dedicated to the service of God are as plucky as the sturdiest of their secular brethren.

WE read in the English papers:—

"A woman named Jane Rowe, residing at Marazion, in Cornwall, has for several years suffered from violent pains in the stomach, for which she has been continually under medical treatment. Some weeks ago, after taking some medicine, she had a severe attack of vomiting, in the course of which she threw up a living lizard from four to five inches in length. Dr. J. Mudge, who had been the woman's medical attendant, has preserved the lizard, which he believes must have been in her stomach for many years. Since the reptile was ejected Mrs. Rowe has been almost entirely free from pain."

NOTES & LEADERETTES

with OUR OWN NEWS.

PARLIAMENT will probably be dissolved in the last week of this month.

THE Princess Marie, daughter of the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh, is betrothed to the Crown Prince Ferdinand of Roumania, and heir to the throne of Bulgaria.

GERMANY has taken up the Slavery question in East Africa in right earnest. A German judge there has sentenced seventeen Arabs to death for holding a slave market at Lindi.

SIR Francis Jeune succeeds the late Sir Charles Parker Butt as President of the English Court of Probate and Divorce.

FROM next January, the rate for steamers passing through the Suez Canal will be reduced by half a franc per ton, with the prospect of an increase if the dividend fell to ninety.

THREE warehouses in Dundee have been burnt down, destroying eight hundred tons of flax and two hundred tons of jute. The loss is calculated at £40,000.

THE rumour about Lord Baring probably succeeding Lord Lansdowne is contradicted. There is no knowing yet who will be the next Viceroy of India. Lord Baring, if he be, will not be new to India. He had been twice to India, first as Private Secretary to Lord Northbrook and then as Finance Minister and confidant of Lord Ripon, whom he left at a critical moment.

MR. Gladstone has accepted in its entirety the Newcastle Radical programme. The Irish question, he thinks, is every man's question, because it blocks the way to all reforms.

THE Exchange is the most absorbing question of the hour. It presses harder and harder every day. The Times suggests the payment of half the salaries of civilians and officers at a fixed rate of twenty pence per rupee.

THEY have started at Simla a society—named the New Indian Currency Association—of Europeans and natives, officials and non-officials, to represent "to Her Majesty's Government, and the House of Commons the intolerable condition of the Indian Currency, and the peremptory necessity of such reforms in it as will secure either stability in the present standard of value, by international agreement, or failing such agreement the substitution thereof of a more stable standard, so as to prevent, for the future, the depreciations and fluctuations from which all classes in India have been suffering with increasing intensity for many years." With the rupee down below 1s. 3½d., and the depreciation continuing, a common danger has for once brought together all races and interests to combine to meet it. The meeting was presided over by Major-General Walker, Director-General of Ordnance, Sir Alexander Miller being one of the speakers. The presence of the Law Member may be taken as a guarantee that the officials are free to join the association, and to make the joint representation, though we shall not be surprised if some musty old circular is discovered forbidding such a league and, indeed, any sort of combination.

MUNICIPAL meetings are becoming interesting. Last Thursday there was some refreshing free-lancing between the old veteran of municipal fame, Babu Kalinath Mitter, and the young aspirant to municipal honors, Mr. Abdur Rahman. By arrangement, Mr. Abdur Rahman led the fight for the Suburbanists. He moved

"That inasmuch as the statement of the account between the Town and the Suburbs for the years 1889-90 and 1890-91, does not show that a sum of not less than three lacs of rupees required of Section 37 of Act II. B. C. of 1888, Clause 7, to be devoted to the improvement of the area newly added to Calcutta, has been so devoted, it is absolutely necessary that the Commissioners should in future exclusively devote a sum not less than three lacs of rupees towards works of improvement of the Suburban area, as provided by the law."

Another well-known veteran of Suburban municipal fame, Babu Preonath Mullick, in a neat little speech, seconded the Resolution. Mr. Abdur Rahman, in a stirring speech, ascribed the unsatisfactory condition of the Suburbs to "the illegitimate diversion of the Suburban funds towards purposes not at all sanctioned by the law." Although the law, according to him, fixed a sum not less than 3 lacs, to be devoted to the improvement of the Suburban area every year, yet in 1890-91, only the sum of Rs. 49,000 was spent towards it and the rest appropriated to other purposes. "Improvement" meant sanitary and structural improvements. "Don't rob Peter to pay Paul," said he. The effect may be serious when called upon to account by the higher authority. "We don't want to fight," added Mr. Rahman, "but remember if we do, we have got the right, got the law and got the men too." The Suburbanists might invoke the help of the great oracle at the Shirubbery, if necessary. All this was too much for the old veteran Kalinath of municipal fame. He burst into a rage and fell foul upon the young aspirant to municipal honors. He entirely forgot himself. Babu Kalinath remarked that the Resolution of Mr. Abdur Rahman was meaningless; that he (Mr. Rahman) wanted to obtain "notoriety by the speech of his," that Mr. Rahman had merely read in some book "Rob Peter to pay Paul." Were the Corporation thieves or robbers? If not why then the word "rob," of all the words in the world, used by Mr. Abdur Rahman? Mr. Rahman's "legal opinion may be valuable elsewhere" and for the matter of that "he may on a future day be an ornament of the Bench of the High Court," but Mr. Abdur Rahman's reasonings were no reasoning at all.

If for Mr. Abdur Rahman to be a young man was an atrocious crime, he should have, in the words of Pitt, neither attempted to palliate nor denied it. He, indeed, took it easy being cool as a cucumber, and in reply administered a fairly mild dose of castigation to his assailant, which must have gone to the very core of his old heart. The ascription of ignorance and superciliousness only elicited from Mr. Abdur Rahman the gentlemanly retort that it was not necessary for him to reply to the observations of Babu Kalinath as he had, on the advice of friends who fell in with his views, withdrawn his Resolution. But one observation of that gentleman he could not fail to notice and that was as to the charge of "notoriety." He had always great respect for Babu Kalinath and always gave him credit for good taste, but he must now alter his opinion. "They say," said Mr. Rahman, "we live to learn, but I trust for the sake of Babu Kalinath Mitter, that he would live long to learn better." The amendment of Pandit Prannath to take the opinion of the officiating Advocate-General as to the meaning of the word "improvement" was carried.

THE attempt to revive the Market Committee of the Calcutta Corporation having failed, an effort was made to reconstitute the Squares Committee. That too, we are glad to find, had no better fate. Khan Bahadar Ahmed, on notice, having moved for its re-formation, Babu Norendranath Sen shouted out that the Squares Committee was worse than the Market Committee. Mr. Abdur Rahman opposed the motion. He said that for nearly six years when he was, on a previous occasion, on the corporation, he was a member of the Wellesley Square Committee. In that period there were only two or three meetings. But there was certainly one advantage of such committees if any member cared to avail himself of the same. Shortly after he was a member of the Wellesley Square Committee, he discovered on his table some extra flowers every morning. On inquiry he was told that a certain mallee left them. Next time when the mallee brought his customary present, he was brought up and, on being questioned, said that he was in charge of the Wellesley Square and that he brought the flowers to seek Mr. Rahman's favor for an increase of pay. The mallee was told that he should discontinue his practice in the future. The man replied that he did not think there was any harm in Mr. Rahman's having some extra flowers on his table, the "Boro Commission" having only recently given him an extra hand, he begged the "Choto Commission" to give him a little additional pay for his extra work in the Square. Mr. Abdur Rahman thought that there was no necessity for such committee. The meeting agreeing with Mr. Rahman, the Khan Bahadur's motion was lost.

A PAINFUL case in which the accused named Kashi Paharia has been sentenced to death by the officiating Sessions Judge of Rajshai, is very much exercising the public mind there. There is a growing feeling of dissatisfaction in regard to the severity of the sentence. The accused was charged with the murder of one Rahmutallah, who was alleged to have had illicit connection with the wife of the prisoner. The only important evidence that seems to have been adduced by the prosecution to fix the guilt on the accused, is that of his wife and it is of a discrepant nature, she having retracted before the Sessions Court her previous statement to the committing magistrate, in which she is said to have charged her father and brother along with the accused with the murder of the deceased Rahmutallah. The prisoner who was undefended is reported to have said that he has been the victim of a foul conspiracy. The real murderers were his father-in-law and his son, who, in order to escape punishment themselves, conspired with the wife to fasten the crime on the husband. The circumstances which culminated in the murder of the deceased by his father-in-law and his son may be briefly stated, as alleged by the accused.

The accused, a poor cultivator, having occasion for a long absence from home, left his wife under the protection of her father and her brother. On his return he had reason to suspect her fidelity and on inquiry found that, during his absence, the father-in-law and his son had sold the honour of his wife to the deceased—they having allowed him to have illicit intercourse with her, on the payment of a certain sum of money to them by the deceased. When the accused came to know this, he insisted on the removal of his wife to a separate house. They at first refused to submit to his proposal but subsequently gave in. The deceased who was thus prevented from continuing his adulterous connection with the wife of the accused, now that she was no longer under her father's roof, demanded back the money with which her father had been bribed into terms. They refused compliance and, on the deceased still persisting in his demand, the only way to evade payment and suppress scandalous revelations was to despatch him straight, and so the deceased was done to death. This probably happened at night and in the father-in-law's house, and as the accused was living separately with his wife he knew nothing of the occurrence till the next morning, when the dead body of the deceased was seen lying on the roadside and the village people and the police came down upon him, the latter, it is said, trying to extort a confession from him by subjecting him to torture. His wife who was all along in league with her father and brother, perhaps under some pressure, declared at first that the murder was committed by her husband, father and brother. She subsequently retracted her statement in the Sessions Court, charging the accused alone with the murder. The accused has appealed to the High Court against the sentence of the Sessions Judge.

WE are glad to learn from Rajshai that since the destruction of the dreadful man-eater which of late caused such a panic among the Baulia people, the attacks of wild beasts resulting in loss of human life have almost ceased.

"HAPPY Diva!" exclaims the M. P., Allahabad, in a transport of joy, and proceeds:—

"When Madame Diaz, the wife of the Mexican President, heard the other day of the death of Patti's pet dog Ricci, she sent the diva another, with instructions that it should be presented to Patti concealed in a basket of roses. The instructions were carried out to the letter during the performance of Donizetti's opera at the New Metropolitan Opera House. The basket in which the dog was hidden was a triumph of floral art. Patti, attracted by the beauty of its design and the gorgeous bloom of its roses, chose this particular tribute from many to carry off the stage in her own fair hands.

As Patti lifted the basket to kiss the flowers the little beast gave a feeble cry. The diva started, peered curiously into the mass of bloom, gave a purely feminine scream of delight, and running down to the footlights, whispered gleefully to the audience, 'I declare if it isn't a lovely little dog.' The house went mad. Men jumped upon the chairs and yelled 'Bravo, Patti.' Women waved their fans and handkerchiefs and cried hysterically. Patti tried to get the dog out, but he was fastened in with ribbons. Finally she handed the dog and basket to an attendant, and, tripping back to the footlights, sang 'Home, Sweet Home,' as only she can sing it."

On incomprehensible Mesdames and Mademoiselles! and your unhappy male kind who are compelled to encourage you in these weak frivolities! * * *

So long as there are orators like Mr. Maclean and writers like Colonel Malleson and, we may add, newspapers like the Bengal Times, the people of India need not be in doubt as to what opinion of them is harboured by their British fellow-subjects. There is one consolation, however. Their sanity will scarcely be questioned by the most prejudiced.

OUR HYDERABAD COLUMN.

(From Hyderabad.)

SOMETIME ago a telegram appeared in the Indian Daily News to the effect that Nawab Vicar-ul-Omra, during his incumbency as Officiating Minister, had ordered the confiscation of Nawab Sir Khurshed Jah's jagirs, but that Nawab Fakar-ul-Mulk, the Minister of Justice, interceded in the matter and prevented the order being carried out. The telegram elicited a column of remarks from the Editor of the I. D. N. These remarks, though made in sober seriousness, caused much amusement here. The Editor commenced with contradicting certain other items of Hyderabad news which he had previously published with his own comments. Coming upon the subject of the telegram mentioned above he, first of all, confounded the relationship which the three chief Nobles, Nawabs Sir Khurshed Jah, Sir Asman Jah, and Vicar-ul-Omra bear to one another. Under the impression that Sir Asman Jah and Sir Khurshed Jah were brothers, he argued, with every show of reason, that the Officiating Minister could not have ventured to take upon himself to confiscate the jagirs of the Minister's brother "without the knowledge and consent of the Minister himself." He strongly condemned the conduct of Nawab Vicar-ul-Omra and chimed with his correspondent in praising the "good sense" of Nawab Fakar-ul-Mulk, the Minister of Justice, and added—"There seems to be some hope for the state so long as such a man has any authority." He then commented upon another instance of Nawab Vicar-ul-Omra's alleged high-handed proceedings and, referring to the rumoured change of Ministry, he viewed with nervous fear the prospect of that nobleman's succeeding Sir Asman Jah and wound up with these words:—"If Mr. Plowden can see his way to spy out a fairly honest and capable man, such a man should have the support of the Residency. The Minister of Justice seems to be as hopeful a man for the higher post as any of the prospective candidates."

The last sentence is seemingly very flattering to the Minister of Justice, but don't you think, Sir, your veteran contemporary has, wittingly or unwittingly, placed that nobleman in the same category with the so-called "despot" Vicar-ul-Omra? For, upon the Editor's own showing, is not Nawab Vicar-ul-Omra one of the prospective candidates for the higher post? Khair. In a subsequent issue (perhaps in the very next), the Editor rectified the mistake he had committed as to the relationship between Sir Asman Jah and Sir Khurshed Jah—that they are cousins, and not brothers as previously stated by him. (Perhaps the word Jah—the highest title here which both the cousins bear—was the stumbling-block!) I do not remember—and I cannot lay my hands on that issue of the paper—if the fact of Nawab Vicar-ul-Omra being the younger brother of Sir Khurshed Jah was mentioned. But the statement as regards the alleged order for the confiscation of Sir Khurshed Jah's jagirs by Nawab Vicar-ul-Omra remained unaltered, and though some weeks have passed since, the subject has not been touched again. Now, I have the best authority for saying that the statement was entirely without any foundation. It was an absurd statement, and though its absurdity apparently struck the Editor of the I. D. N. at the outset, still he allowed himself to be gulled. The Minister does not possess the power to meddle with the jagirs of Sir Khurshed Jah and neither the Minister nor his "officiator," singly or jointly, would ever think of attempting such a mad course as they have been charged with. Nawab Thaig Jung Shums-ul-Omra Sir Khurshed Jah is the Amir-i-Kabir of Hyderabad, and is beyond the reach of the authority of the Prime Minister and all the other Ministers put together.

The funniest part of the story is the alleged interference of the Minister of Justice which is said to have prevented the "monstrous order" being carried out, and the veteran Editor of the Indian Daily News, acknowledging the "good sense" of the Minister of Justice in this alleged interference, has recommended him to the higher post. I do not question, and I do not suppose anybody in Hyderabad would ever question, the natural good sense and intelligence of Nawab Fakar-ul-Mulk, but considering that the alleged interference is pure moonshine, don't you think the basis of your contemporary's recommendation is altogether shadowy? But enough.

THE Nizam is still at Hanam Kunda, shikaring. According to original arrangement he was to have gone to Pakhal by this time, but he has changed his mind and intends returning soon. He is expected back by the end of the week. He has bagged four tigers in his present excursion. The following story illustrating the Nizam's power of enduring the fatigues of Shikar in this roasting weather I have heard related with pride and joy by one high in office:—

During his recent visit to Mankota, the Nizam had had frequent shikar excursions. One day the sun was exceptionally hot, the thermometer rising to 110° at noon, in the open air. Without paying the least heed to the scorching heat, the Nizam pursued his game with the greatest vigour and zeal. The attendants were afraid least the fatigue of the chase under the blazing mid-day sun should prove too much for His Highness to bear, but none had the courage to advise rest or retreat. At this time one of the followers ran up to his royal master with an umbrella in hand and begged leave to hold it over his head. The Nizam acknowledged the offered service with a gracious smile, but declined the comfort, saying—"I am not made of wax—there is no fear of my melting in the sun."

In that hottest of the hot days of April, the Nizam was out in the hunting field for full five hours at a stretch, and enjoyed the sport immensely.

NAWAB Sir Khurshed Jah returned from Poona, accompanied by his son Nawab Zafar Jung Bahadur. The Premier Noble was absent from Hyderabad for nearly a month and a half.

MR. FARIDDOONJI JAMSHEDJI, Private Secretary to the Minister, has been appointed Press Commissioner of Hyderabad. There was no Press Commissioner in Hyderabad when Hyderabad was flooded with newspapers, but now that there is no newspaper published in these Dominions the Nizam's Government has thought proper to give us a Press Commissioner! This is a fine illustration of Moghlahi wisdom. Mr. Faridoonji is said to be the correspondent of some of the leading papers which enjoy the special patronage of the Nizam's Government.

THERE was a scare of a revolt in Manipur. It proved no more than a cry of—the wail!

IN Calcutta, the cry for some weeks has been the snake! the snake! And no idle cry either. A quite new kind of water snakes has been found in the river which the Superintendent of the Indian Museum—the highest authority in this country—pronounces to be as surely, if not as quickly, destructive as the Cobra. Accordingly, the number of bathers in the Ganges has fallen off for fear of being bitten to death. To make the anxiety universal, even the municipal hydrants have begun to throw out smaller and thinner reptilian specimens. Luckily, these have been declared by Professor Wood-Mason, the Superintendent of the Indian Museum, to be non-poisonous and indeed nothing but earth-worms. That is poor consolation, and no wonder that it does not satisfy the residents. Whatever the cause of the new phenomenon in our filtered pipe water, the reservoirs need cleansing, and oftener than now. Mr. Lee, the Chairman, lost no time in inquiring into the matter, and is able today to issue the following report received from the Health Officer of the Corporation:—

"As far as I have been able to ascertain, the earth-worms in the filtered water are found only in those pipes in direct or indirect connection with the Wellington Square Pumping Station. The worms are not poisonous and are perfectly harmless, but as they are likely to die in the pipes, the tendency will be for them to contaminate the water to a slight extent.

At present I am inclined to think that their presence may be accounted for by the condition of the Wellington Square reservoir which I examined this morning. The surface openings into the reservoir are so situated as to render it quite possible for earth and worms to fall in, and especially so after a shower of rain.

These openings should be immediately raised and efficiently guarded against any possibility of this kind, and the reservoir should be immediately cleansed. The cleansing will put the inhabitants to some inconvenience for a few days in their supply of water, but this is unavoidable. It may, however, be avoided in future by closing the openings, which at present exist between the two chambers of the reservoir, and supplying each chamber with an inlet and outlet pipe. The chambers could then be cleansed one after the other without disturbing the general distribution of the water.

I have been unable as yet to ascertain definitely where the snake-worms found in the unfiltered water come from. They are, however, quite harmless, are confined to the unfiltered water, and are totally unlike the large sea-water snakes, a few of which have been recently found in the river, and which are poisonous.

A good deal of pipe-laying is I understand going on at present. Great care should be taken, especially during showers of rain, to prevent earth and muddy water getting into these pipes, and from thence into the mains, which, of course, is another source by which earth and snake-worms, the latter of which are a species of earth-worm, can effect an entrance into the water-pipes."

The presence of earth-worms in house pipes may be accounted for differently from Dr. Simpson. They need not always come from the reservoirs. They are given free access from the streets direct. If old house connections were examined, we are sure many connecting pipes would be found rotten to the last degree and perforated. Besides overhauling the zoology of the reservoirs, there ought to be a general inspection of the piping and a minute examination of the connections with houses throughout the town.

Our surmise receives confirmation from the cursory examination, after the issue of the Health Officer's report, of the Wellington Square reservoir by Mr. Dickson, in charge of the water works, and his staff, who found nothing but silt in it.

Dr. Simpson advises boiling of the filtered water before drinking it. Evidently, age is telling on our water-works. Our vaunted pipe water is reduced to water that needs the precaution of boiling after filtration. In this grilling weather, boiled water will be a luxury indeed!

DR. SHEPPARD has been disabused of his notion of Russian territory in Calcutta. He admitted to the Magistrate that he was a British subject but in Russian service and also admitted his offence. Mr. Pearson sentenced him to six months' rigorous imprisonment and, to enable him to appeal if so advised, added an extra 24 hours to the half year.

REIS & RAYYET.

Saturday, June 4, 1892.

THE ORIGIN OF THE CADASTRAL SURVEY IN BENGAL.

THE Native press in one voice has found fault with Sir Charles Elliott for introducing the survey and record of rights in Mozufferpore and North Behar. In this His Honour has been more sinned against than sinning. Having enquired into the history of the measure and ascertained the true facts from authentic sources, we feel it our duty to exonerate Sir Charles and clear him from an unmerited obloquy. The proposition for minute survey with a view to the creation of a record of rights of agricultural land in the Bengal Provinces, is not the caprice of a new Governor ambitious of reputation. Nor it springs suddenly in all its fulness from any individual brain. It had a more prosaic genesis. Like many another measure of civilized administration, it arose in the ordinary way, so obscurely as to be unnoticed, maturing with years, and aggrandising under discussion by different official hands, until it came ready to the hand of the statesman destined to give it effect. That statesman is Sir Charles Elliott. The matter indeed was ready cut and dry long before he came to office or was even thought of as a possible Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal. The question of survey and record of rights has been under consideration since the administration of the late Sir George Campbell. For the edification of the public in general, and in bare justice to Sir Charles Elliott, we give below extracts from the minutes of the successive Lieutenant-Governors on the subject.

To begin with Sir George Campbell. That Lieutenant-Governor wrote: "We shall probably have the whole question in our hands if we make an attempt to settle any considerable part of it and we shall hardly be able to stop till we have made a settlement of Bengal, adjusted and recorded all rights and all incidents of tenure, and created a machinery for perpetuating and maintaining the records of rights." That remarkable administrator had no opportunity to carry out all his plans. He was not allowed breathing time, any more than he allowed the world any. On a difference of opinion with the Supreme Government on Famine policy—in which he was in the right, though—he was elbowed out by the reigning Jove, Lord Northbrook. His successor is nothing if not jaunty. Sir Richard Temple described the condition of the agricultural industry in Behar as "in a lower condition than that of any other peasantry with equal advantages which he had seen in India." In his opinion, "the great desideratum of that district is an easy mode of proving occupancy rights."

Before his time was up, Sir Richard leaped from the masnad of Bengal to the gadi of Bombay. His successor, Sir Ashley Eden, too held that the rayyets in Behar are "poor, helpless, and discontented men, bound down to a state of extreme depression, tenants of the richest province in Bengal yet the poorest and most wretched class that we find in the country."

Later on, in 1883, Sir Rivers Thompson fully explained his views on the subject of survey and record of rights on the proposition to introduce the Bengal Tenancy Bill quoting the opinion of Sir John Shore, in which he recommended such a scheme in 1789, as also the Report of Sir Henry Ricketts on the Settlement of Cuttack, in which, so far back as 1861, that great revenue authority proved that, after settlement of that district, the deteriorated and embarrassed condition of the people had changed for the better and the province had flourished, that the inhabitants had become peaceful and well disposed and there had been no agitation. Sir Rivers Thompson concluded by saying that the preparation of a record of rights would be a long process and probably expensive, "but the duration and the cost will be nothing compared with the manifold blessings such a measure would confer on this province. It will be a permanent possession restoring peace and preserving peace."

After professedly minute and exhaustive enquiries among all classes of people, the Government of Bengal, in 1883, reported that the provisions regarding the settlement of rents and records of rights had met with but few and unimportant objections at the hands of representative associations in Bengal, while most officials had approved them. Finally, in 1885, when the Tenancy Bill was under discussion in the Imperial Legislative Council, Sir Stuart Bayley gave it as his opinion that the preparation of a record of rights would, if wisely and discreetly carried out, prove the saving of the rayyet, while the President of the Council said that there was almost complete unanimity of opinion in the Council as to the utility of such a procedure.

After that, it is vain, and unjust to denounce in especial Sir Charles Elliott. In treating him as the author of the scheme and responsible for the mischief which threatens the landed classes—zemindars and rayyets alike—of the Province, our writers and orators are engaged in rather an absurd war against a wind mill. The fact is, they are not well "posted" on their subject. Indeed, from the above statement, it is clear that those who are most interested in the question of survey and record of rights, are not at all acquainted with its history. While they have been dreaming in a false security, the Government of Bengal has gradually obtained the sanction of the Secretary of State for India to prepare a record of rights, district by district, throughout Bengal, Behar and Orissa. The Bengal Zemindars, with all their associations, have had no idea of the Laocoon coils silently winding round them. Even now they are scarcely aware how seriously they have been compromised. They ought to lose no time in ascertaining how they have been represented to Government by district officers. We know as a matter of fact that some of the big Behar Zemindars have been reported to bear the most odious character, as pests of society.

It is true that the question of survey has been brought into particular prominence in the administration of the present Lieutenant-Governor. He has made it a special subject of study and has pressed it upon the attention of his subordinates. But that is no reason for making him responsible for the introduction of it. He is only giving reality and shape to the speculations of almost a whole generation of Bengal officials. After all, it was an evil day for the landed classes of the Lower Provinces when he came to rule here. A splendid business man, imbued with all the prejudices of a North-Western Provinces Civilian, he could scarcely resist the opportunity of extending, so far as possible, to a Province in which the Government demand on the land is fixed for ever, some at least of the blessings of a microscopic settlement which has created the Dead Level of society in Upper India, causing estrangement between the cultivator and the middleman—the masses and their natural leaders—with results which were so painfully illustrated in 1857.

THE BANIAN'S ACCOUNTABILITY CASE.

AFTER a hearing of eleven days, the suit of Jardine, Skinner & Co. against their banians, Shamlal Pal and Khetter Mohun Dutt, has temporarily closed. About two lacs of rupees were found short in the cash balance of the firm. Criminal prosecutions for large defalcations having of late been virtually prohibited, the firm called upon their banians to make good the deficit. After long and fruitless negotiations, the present suit was filed. Shamlal made no defence but claimed, a claim allowed by the Court, to stand or fall by the result of the suit against Khetter Mohun. The latter contended that, under the terms of his banianship agreement, he was not liable for the account sued upon, and that if the accounts were falsified, it was due to the European assistants of the firm who "have for many years been in the habit of overdrawning and that they made or caused false entries to be made for the purpose of concealing such overdrafts." Mr. Justice Trevelyan was naturally annoyed at such an allegation, amounting in effect to a charge of forgery against respectable men. With the courtesy and devotion to duty of an English barrister, unswayed by notions of prepossession or bias of personal friendship, Mr. Justice Trevelyan, in his defence, answered that he would prove the allegation, and in part Mr. Justice Trevelyan finds the statement of the overdrawing true, but does not think the defendant's defence is the case. He had a shrewd suspicion that the defendant's cue was to utilise the private money transactions of the European assistants as a pretence to dissuade the firm from pursuing their suit and finally to commend lawyers and judges as to the true findings of the case. The Court has made a decree for an account. An account is to be taken of all sums received by the defendants or their servants on behalf of the plaintiffs from May 1 to November 15, 1890. In taking the accounts plaintiffs will have three weeks from filing of decree to object and defendants will be allowed six weeks. The costs, on scale No. 2, will be borne by the defendants up to and including the decree.

Mr. Justice Trevelyan's judgment is a lucid and vigorous one. This is the view he takes of the over-drafts and the liability of the banians. —
 "At my suggestion all the then European assistants of the firm have been called, and have been called with the view of contradicting this charge as far as possible. I think that where reputations are at stake in this manner a judge should express his opinion on the matter, and I intend to do so. This is the way in which it has been reduced into the

David Hare's idea of education was most liberal. Although partial to English education for native Indian youth, he considered the knowledge of the vernacular indispensable and established many primary schools for teaching in Bengali and supported many others. Even his English schools were Anglo-vernacular, teaching both English and Bengali. And if his pupils gave greater attention to the former than the latter, that was not his fault so much as their misfortune. There was very little education worth having in the vernacular. The liberal sciences of those days was in Sanskrit and Persian and Arabic. The education in the common tongue, consisting of little beyond arithmetic and ordinary letter-writing and a hundred or so of maxims of prudence rather than morality, was soon learnt. The Bengali was not without a respectable body of literature in poetry—to this day those earlier efforts of the Muse in Bengal have not been excelled and they will probably never be superseded—but indigenous education did not recognize Bengali literature as an instrument of culture. It did not recognize the need of culture at all. Hence English was naturally suggested to this friend of the people as the ready means of national awakening. For he regarded education but a means—not an end by itself. He had long been convinced of the potentiality of the Indian mind, and he was fired with the philanthropic desire of making it potent. He desired to raise the people among whom he had worked so long for a living. He desired to see them an educated, respectable, well-governed and happy people. And, according to his lights, he neglected none of the means towards the end. At a time when in England itself the masses were struggling for the emancipation of the negro, for popular education, and for similar other things which have long ceased to be matters of controversy, he bravely pleaded for justice to the natives of this distant Dependency of Great Britain. Thus he supported their aspiration to sit as jurors. As an educationist, he carefully respected the feelings and prejudices of the people for fear of causing a revulsion against English education, but he was nonetheless an uncompromising enemy to Suttee and Slavery and such other barbarous practices then in vogue and protected by law. His last endeavour in life was to free some victims of the then new Coolie Emigration Slavery. Treating the natives with perfect equality and with a genuine kindness that was romantic, he advocated their political rights as subjects of an enlightened Power. A man of the most liberal views, he was a staunch friend of the Press in India then struggling for freedom and of all liberal institutions.

He watched with fatherly interest the lisping of the Indian Muse in English and the first efforts of the Hindus in public speaking and public writing, recognising them as the fruits of his untiring educational activity—his Hindu College and his feeder schools.

He appreciated the value of public discussion, and while he supported the newspapers published by his countrymen in Bengal, he encouraged his native friends in utilising the same agency, in adopting printing and having newspapers of their own.

It will not, therefore, be amiss if we devote this Hare memorial meeting to the History of the Press in India and specially among the Indians.

The Press is a great institution of which all civilized nations are proud. And well may they be so proud, considering that it is, in our times, at once the condition sine qua non and the measure of civilization. So partial are we to it that we hardly esteem that people strictly civilized—as anything more than half civilized at best—which does not enjoy its benefits. If it is possible for us to conceive a civilized community without a mile of railroad, it is impossible to think of a civilized community without their newspapers. It is difficult to exaggerate the importance of this agency for the conservation and promotion of civilization. Accordingly, the character and position of the Press is a tolerably safe criterion of the social and political advancement of a people.

It is probably the greatest institution of modern civilization. Superior to Representative Government whose guarantee it is—its guide, philosopher, and friend.

Whatever its relative status in normal states or thoroughly self-governed communities, certainly in India, without a national Government, the Press is not only the prime but also the sole institution.

The importance of the history of such an institution goes without saying.

Before inquiring into its history, let us make sure of its nature.

What, then, is the Press?

Speaking roundly, the Press is an organization for acquiring and disseminating information.

Analysing the matter, we find that the Press consists of two different and dissimilar parts—first, a mechanism, and, secondly, a method of circulation.

The epoch of the sword has not expired. It will probably endure. Its exclusive empire has long since been over. No longer sole king, it has been forced to divide dominion with Reason. A change, decidedly for the better, has come over the spirit of man's dream. Nor dream only. Over all his actions is visible a gentler influence than heretofore—justice and mercy have come home to his business and bosom. Truth and right have made themselves heard where the strong arm alone had prevailed. The Devil is retreating—not fast, we fear, but for certain, let us hope—before God or, if you will, Humanity. The conscience which, if at all, had been confined to personal concerns has insinuated itself into public. Politics is turning into practical Ethics. Once—not so very long since—the world bowed its neck, almost uncomplainingly, to Force—brute valor and strength. Now another king has come in Israel—not yet to supersede but at least to hold concurrent sway with the old hoary-headed sinner of a Despot. The Pen now divides empire with Force.

This great revolution has, no doubt, been slowly effected by means of numerous agencies at work, through a long course of ages. Chief among those agencies by far must be confessed to be a mechanical invention, and the uses to which by the genius of man it has been put. For the Pen has existed, in one form or another, from a long time—from the dawn of Civilization. It was not until it found an efficient ally and liberal patron in the Printing Press that the Pen became conscious of its full capacity. It was not till the inscribings of the Pen could be multiplied with ease at command and brought to the door of thousands—of the entire reading class—that the Pen became a power.

So far as thought rules the world, in these times, it does so with humbler assistance. Wise and righteous men and brave spirits have been in all ages among communities with any pretensions to culture and refinement. But their influence was small because local and private. Their example was confined to their neighbourhood. Their counsels reached only their immediate listeners. In consequence of the Press and other auxiliaries, it is different now. These have created a new entity—the Public. There was scarcely any such thing before. Accustomed to our benefits we are rather prone to complain than to be thankful for our superiority to our predecessors. Here is a possession which the most glorious of them—whether of Italy or Greece, Egypt or Assyria, Persia or India, China or Peru—could scarcely boast.

These auxiliaries have virtually multiplied sages and heroes, Pandits and patriots, philosophers and philanthropists ad infinitum, while their words and examples are not only carried to the ends of the earth, but are preserved for the edification and inspiration of mankind to the latest generation.

In tracing the origin of the Press it is often forgotten that printing is merely accidental to it—an auxiliary, of great importance no doubt, but still an auxiliary—not a principal. Journalism may exist without printing, as without steam agency. No doubt printing is an immense convenience, and steam aggrandises it farther, but neither the one nor the other is a necessary element. The beginnings of journalism were in manuscript. Originally the want of printing was not felt. Printing is not required until after other improvements in society take place. Its effect is to multiply copies, and not until the diffusion of education and the establishment of the public post is multiplication called for. Steam printing or any particular rapidity of printing is wanted only after education becomes a common thing and in countries supplied with railways and having commerce with other and distant nations.

The present extraordinary development of the Press is apt to confound us as to its origin and early history. We are unable to free ourselves from the notion that what is so great must have been great from the outset. We hover round the considerable—beat about the bush in the neighbourhood of the grand—in the hope of coming upon the birth of the monster. All this is very silly, though very natural. The great Ganges issues from the insignificant Cow's Mouth. And if you persist in your intrepid search beyond, you probably come upon some insignificant rills. What was journalism in its origin but a regular system of communication of news by means of written signs? For we must dismiss from our minds the journals as we see them. Journalism as an agency for supplying opinions is a very modern innovation—a recent improvement. Newspapers originally were very humble things, and small, and they supplied news pure and simple and not too much of even that. Nor was this news by any means so artistically presented as now-a-days. The conductors were content to be simply understood in essentials. Such journalism, you will see, may be independent of not printing only but writing itself. Accordingly, I am disposed to trace its origin to the ancient system in Europe and Western Asia and to the ancient system of India. It would take me far to notice the system in other parts of the world. Suffice it for my purpose to say that the ancient Hindu rulers maintained a regular Intelligence Department with agents at home and abroad.

Here is an instance of the forward modern spirit which, certainly bespeaks want of reverence for our ancient institutions, usages and customs. It moreover shows that the democratic spirit, which levels all distinctions, which wishes to tread under its foot everything, is rampant even in the most backward district—the land of uneducated and notorious for the stupidity of its cultivating class. The other day, a local pleader gave a feast on the occasion of the marriage of his son. He invited the members of his own community. He is a Hindu of the Kayastha caste. Here the question of precedence arose. An enlightened Kayastha wanted to kick out the Brahmans—in a metaphorical sense. He and his fellow brethren would not partake of the feast if the members of the sacerdotal order were allowed the precedence. The host was in a fix. The Brahmans felt insulted and were indignant at this unheard of pretension of the issue of Brahma's feet. But if they insisted on their rights they were made the laughing stock for being orthodox by the modern Kayastha. Their case was hopeless: they were in a minority. But all's well that ends well: the tribes came to terms, the Kayastha agreed to dine without thus violating the social order. It was no dinner but a sort of repast; fruits, sweets, flour, fish, &c. Fancy, where the Kayastha had been if he mooted such an idea some 50 years ago, not to say if this had taken place in a Hindu kingdom!

Rice is becoming dearer every week and the outlook is a gloomy one.

DEBATE ON THE INDIAN COUNCILS BILL.

Mr. S. Smith said that from the speech to which they had listened that night from the hon. baronet the member for Evesham and from the hon. member who had just sat down, it was difficult to realize that they were both speaking of the India of the present day, so widely did they differ in their accounts of that country. He, however, was inclined to agree in the main rather with the hon. member who had just sat down than with an official optimist like the hon. baronet. (Hear, hear.) It was painful for an assembly like the House of Commons to listen to the statements of the hon. member who had just sat down and he could only hope that they were somewhat exaggerated as he was inclined to believe them to be (Hear, hear.) He thought, however, that that hon. member's statements approached the real state of things more nearly than did those of the hon. baronet. His belief was that the people of India were suffering from extreme poverty and great privation, and that some system of representative government was urgently required for that country. (Hear, hear.) There was little doubt that it was the intention of this nation to act fairly to the Indian native, but government by a bureaucracy could never succeed. The Governor-General of India could never come into contact with the suffering classes. No doubt there had been a period in the history of India when it would have been impossible to govern it on any other system than that which was now in force, but he believed that the time had come when it was essential that the country should have representative institutions, and that the people should be allowed to participate in their own government. (Hear, hear.) All friends of India might heartily agree with the theories of government put forward by the hon. member for Evesham, but the difficulty was to get them put into practice. Lord Ripon honestly attempted to give India a valuable instalment of self-government, but he had to pay the penalty of being detested by the official class, and it might be doubted whether any successor would dare to expose himself to the same class feeling. Travelling through the country soon after Lord Ripon had left, he was struck with the fact that the affections of the people went out to him as they had never done to any one before (hear, hear); but there was scarcely a European who did not speak of Lord Ripon with the utmost bitterness. It was true, as the right hon. member for Mid Lothian had said, the language of the Bill was ambiguous, and perhaps the principle of election might be found in it, but, still, if the administration of it were left to the hon. member for Oldham, he would probably discover that it was not so simple as it seemed. The Bill did mark a certain advance, but it was not a great one, and it contained valuable concessions. The hon. member for Oldham and to put questions would, however, be a great deal more so far as it was exercised by elected members, because those who were nominated by the Government could do anything that might be inconvenient to the Government. Therefore, unless there were engrafted upon the Bill genuine representation, whereby independent criticism and judgment might be obtained, the Bill would fail to satisfy Indian expectations. (Hear, hear.) He agreed with what had been said by the hon. member for Manchester of the value of the Indian National Congress as the mouth-piece of Indian feeling, and if the hon. member for Evesham could go back to the country after his 12 years' absence, he would form a different judgment from that he had just expressed. A friend of his own was elected to that council by a large village, and the election was formally made at a large meeting held in the market-place. It was as near an approach as possible to election by manhood suffrage. The delegates to the Congress were freely chosen by large masses of the population, and there was not at present any more reliable way for getting at the opinions of the people. It was almost impossible to get any representative body which should be a mirror of the shades of caste, religion, and race in India; but the Congress approached more nearly to such a body than any institution which had existed in India for a hundred years. He had read the proceedings with much care and he had been astonished at the moderation, wisdom, and statesmanlike ability with which the views of the members were expressed. There was no Parliament in Europe in which the debates were conducted more ably than were those of the Indian National Congress. It was an outgrowth of our own teaching, and we ought to be proud of it. The population of India, Hindoo and Mahomedan, was essentially Conservative and further removed from anarchy than that of any other country in the world; and we could treat them with kindness and confidence and extend to them power and responsibility with more security than almost any other Power in the same state of civilization. India was full of deep grievances and we ought to let them have an outlet instead of sitting on the safety valve and risking an explosion. The land was exhausted by a wretched system of agriculture, resulting largely from our own laws, and the peasantry as a body were loaded with debt. All these things ought to be faced and honestly dealt with in place of being hidden and veiled in optimistic statements. It was said it was difficult to devise an electoral system for India, and he admitted we could not have a symmetrical or complete system; but the hon. member for Evesham sketched the rudiments of a representative system whereby a certain number of members could be elected through the municipalities of large cities. The country was not ripe for universal suffrage and any system of election must be based upon existing agencies. Therefore we could not do better than adopt Lord Dufferin's scheme. In speaking of it the Under-Secretary omitted to cite the portion referring to elective councils. When a Viceroy so essentially Conservative recommended the elective system, surely Parliament might be willing to adopt it. An enormous responsibility rested upon the people of this country, it was too great a responsibility for us, involving as it did the direction of the affairs of one-fifth of the human race. The Government of India was a despotism, but it was a better despotism than that of Russia. It was high time that our own institutions should be engrafted on India. The present form of government could not last; it would have to be changed sooner or later. If the change were made now, when there was no war or threatened invasion by Russia, it would be accepted as a boon; otherwise some greater change might be wrung from us in a time of great peril.

Mr. O. V. Morgan approved of the Bill, as he considered it was a step in advance. In dealing with a country like India it was necessary to be extremely cautious. The power of asking questions would be of immense benefit to the Government of India, because it would enable the Government to answer false charges which were being constantly made in some of the newspapers, and so the people of India would get to know the truth. He would have been glad if some change had been proposed in the India Council in London for it was extremely antiquated; and the members were also extremely antiquated most of them, although men of very considerable eminence, having long since returned from India. There was no representative of Indian opinion and no representative of commerce connected with India on that Council, and that was perhaps one reason why the Government of India was so long in constructing railways in India. He found considerable difference of opinion in India on the subject now before the House. The Hindoos were in favour of an educational franchise. The Mahomedans, who were one-third of the whole population, were not in favour of the representative form of government at all. The Parsees were pretty equally divided, and it would be difficult to say whether there was a majority of representative government or not. He had had an interesting conversation with a man in Bombay who might perhaps be considered as the only representative of the working classes in the whole of India. This man said that he hated the Indian Congress, that it was a Brahminical movement, or, at all events, that it was supported by the Bengalee Baboos, who were as bad as the Brahmans and the greatest enemies of the working classes. The hon. member for Flint had spoken of the suffering and distress in India, but last year the agricultural population in India had done extremely well. Great good would accrue to India if the English people in India would admit into their society the highly educated and English-speaking Indians, who at present were treated by them with the most absolute contempt.

Mr. Curzon thought that the House would agree that the time had now arrived when the debate might come to an end. There had been a number of interesting and valuable speeches by hon. members who were qualified by experience or by residence in India to deal with the question before the House. He was glad to observe that in all the speeches the importance of the Bill had been recognized, and that there had been no attempt on either side of the House to underrate it. The hon. member for Oldham went so far as to say that it was the most important Bill which had been introduced since the constitution of India had been changed. In the various speeches delivered in the House no criticism, certainly no hostile criticism, had been directed against the specific changes introduced by the Bill. The concession of the power of financial criticism and of the right of interpellation, and, perhaps, the addition to the members of the Supreme and Provincial Councils, had all met with the approbation of the House. (Hear, hear.) He did not think he had heard a single remark to the contrary. He was, therefore, relieved from the necessity of making another speech on the general provisions of the Bill, and it would only be his duty to make a few observations in reply to particular remarks or inquiries that had fallen in the course of the debate. It was not necessary to follow with any minuteness the member for North Manchester, who moved the amendment, but he was bound to notice one statement of his---that the nomination to the various Councils was at the present moment a fraud. There were two members of that House who had filled the position of Governors in India, and he was certain they would bear him out in saying that it was the object of every Governor to persuade and induce representatives of these advanced political opinions to join the Councils. ("Hear, hear" from Sir R. Temple.) That was the case under the hon. baronet and under the Postmaster-General. He would ask the hon. member whether he had ever heard the names of Peeri Mukuji or Kustadas Pal? (Hear, hear.) These were the names of the very strongest representatives of opinion in India. The addition contemplated to the Council was very modest, perhaps unduly modest, but it was true that Lord Dufferin, when first he made a proposal in connexion with the Legislative Councils, did not propose any addition. He did not think that an addition was required. It was extremely difficult to get men in India with the necessary qualifications as to time and ability. He doubted very much whether the hon. member had at all a clear idea of what the business of the Supreme Legislative Council in India was. It was very different from the system in that House. It only legislated when legislation was necessary. (Hear, hear.) What was the process of legislation in the Council of the Viceroy? Why, before a measure was introduced, if it referred to any particular province, it was circulated through that Presidency or province and inquiries of the most minute and searching character were made from eminent persons. The Bill was then introduced and read a second time and passed to a select committee of experts who were responsible for the legislation in its final form. Then only did it come before the Council. If the hon. member did not accept his statement he should read him the opinion of Lord Northbrook, who said:--

"The National Congress and others have recommended a much larger extension of the numbers of the Legislative Councils. I believe myself that the Bill goes far enough in that direction. I believe there would be great difficulty in making any much larger increase in the number of the Legislative Council of the Viceroy; and a substantial increase has been made in the Local Councils. Therefore I think the Bill provides fully for all present needs in respect of the increase of numbers."

He did not think that he need pursue the subject further. He came to the wise and able---if he might say so---speech with which the hon. member for Mid Lothian had favoured the House (Cheers.) The great object of that speech was to eliminate the element of controversy from the debate and diffuse a spirit of harmony over these proceedings. The right hon. gentleman complained at the outset that the language of the Bill was ambiguous, but the ambiguity did not lead the right hon. gentleman to take a hostile view of the Bill. He entirely endorsed that view of the right hon. gentleman when he said that the initiative must be left in the hands of the Government of India. On this point he preferred the sentiments of the member for Mid Lothian to those of the member for Elgin. (Hear, hear.) The hon. member asked whether the words of the clause were to be taken as mere complimentary words, and he said he was prepared to stake his political reputation that the clause would be a dead-letter. Then the political reputation of the hon. member stood in great peril. (Laughter.) He thought it was a very important contribution to the debate that the right hon. member for Mid Lothian, speaking with a full knowledge of the enormous responsibility of the Indian Government, had laid it down that the question of the degree and of the manner in which this principle was carried out were matters, not for the consideration of that House, but primarily for the consideration of the Government of India. ("No, no.") He hoped he did not misrepresent the views of the right hon. gentleman. (Mr. Gladstone nodded.) He could only say in conclusion that he accepted the statement of the right hon. gentleman as to the objects with which the Bill was introduced. They were undoubtedly to enlist in the service of the Government of India what the right hon. gentleman described as the upright sentiment and intelligent opinion of the various sections of native population, and if that Bill passed that evening without going to a division he was certain that it would be attended with very beneficial results. (Cheers.)

Mr. Picton said they were in a somewhat peculiar position. The hon. member when he arose to move the second reading of the Bill said in the course of his speech that he did not exclude the possibility of the introduction of the principle of election. The hon. member for Manchester afterwards rose and moved his amendment, to the effect, that unless this Bill recognised the principle of election it would not be satisfactory. The right hon. gentleman the member for Mid Lothian afterwards spoke, and said, in words of gravity and wisdom, which were recognised as much on that side of the House as on the other, that there was not much difference of opinion between them, but the Under-Secretary of State for India, in the speech which he had just delivered, had not, in terms, said that it was intended that the elective principle must be introduced, or that this Bill did in fact mean that. It was not suggested on the Opposition side of the House that India was ripe for such a scheme of home rule as they desired for Ireland, but they wished for such a mild and tentative electoral scheme as was suited to the present requirements and capabilities of their great Eastern dependency, and which might hereafter be further expanded and developed into a more extended scheme of electoral government. The members of various Governments, Liberal and Conservative alike, had spoken disparagingly of the natives of India. An ex-member of a former Liberal Government had once said to him, in reference to a proposed candidate for election to an English constituency, "Don't have that nigger." These words only anticipated the remarks of a member of the present Government about a certain "black man." The members of all Governments seemed, therefore, in this respect to be tarred with the same brush. All they now asked was that, little by little, by means of very limited franchise, a few of the most educated of the natives of India should be allowed to elect a few members to the Council and they were content that the scheme should, at the present time, be confined to the most modest introduction of the elective principle.

Mr. Schwann asked the Under-Secretary for India whether or not he would distinctly state that it was intended by sub-section 4 of Clause 1, to apply the electoral principle in India. If this was the case, then he should withdraw his amendment.

Mr. Curzon said that, in answer to the question, he did not know that he really could add anything to what he had already stated to the House. The initiative was left to the Viceroy of India, and it was a difficult question for the Government or for the House to transfer that initiative to itself.

Dr. Tanner expressed his adhesion to the view enunciated by the hon. member for Mid Lothian that this section of the Bill was both ambiguous and misleading. This legislation was really the placing of additional power and opportunities for securing further emoluments in the hands of the bureaucracy of India, with the result that this meagre instalment of so-called representation would be minimised to the utmost. It was therefore scarcely worth having, and he hoped that his hon. friend would go to a division. The hon. member for Evesham said "Do not give the Hindoos political power." But the hon. baronet, like all others who had held such positions of trust in India, always stood by their order and by the bureaucracy. The hon. baronet spoke of the mute masses of the people of India; but had they not got good reason to be mute, subject as they were to periodical starvation?

Mr. S. Hoare denied the assertion that India was growing poorer every day. So far from that being the case all the information he had been able to obtain during a recent visit to that country showed that India was growing richer and its trade expanding daily. The railways had been increasing at the rate of 1,000 miles a year. Only 12 months ago it was his good lot to receive the Viceroy in the middle of the Central Provinces of India probably not visited by hon. gentlemen who had addressed the House, and to open a line of railway of some 850 miles. A great portion of that railway was through uninhabited jungle, through a country in which it might be said there was no wealth whatever, and yet during the present six months that railway had earned a profit sufficient to pay guaranteed interest on seven millions of money. And when they heard Manchester manufacturers complaining of manufactories that had been built and were now being built in India, surely that too was adding to the wealth of the country. The vast discovery of gold in India was another feature in the evidence. He stood but a year ago in a place where a few years since there was not a sign of coal, and saw ten coal pits at work. He granted that the financial position was difficult owing to the depreciation in silver; but that was not due to any fault in English rule. With reference to the question of an electoral system he had had the opportunity of hearing the views of those great and experienced officials to whom the Empire was so deeply indebted for the part they had played in the Government of India, and they stated that there would be great difficulty in carrying out any electoral system perhaps for many years to come. When it did come they should all welcome the time when they could place some further power in the hands of our fellow-subjects in India. But for the moment they should not do so, though the reason was not because they thought India was not progressing, for he could affirm it was progressing in every department so far as material wealth was concerned.

Mr. Schwann asked leave to withdraw his amendment.

The amendment was, by leave, withdrawn, and the Bill was then read a second time.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

THE LOSS OF THE 'PRESIDENT,'

1841.

BY THE REVEREND R. S. HAWKER.

Speak ! for thou hast a voice, perpetual Sea !
Lift up thy surges with some signal word,—
Shew where the pilgrims of the waters be
For whom a nation's thrilling heart is stirr'd.

They went down to thy waves in joyous pride,
They trod with steadfast feet thy billowy way,
The eyes of wondering men beheld them glide
Swift in the arrowy distance—where are they ?

Didst thou arise upon that mighty frame ?
Mad that the strength of man with thee should strive,
And proud thy rival element to tame,
Didst swallow them in conscious depths alive !

Or, shorn and powerless, hast thou bade them lie
Their stately ship, a carcase of the foam ?
Where still they watch the ocean and the sky,
And fondly dream that they have yet a home !

If thou hast drawn them, mighty tide, declare
To some far-off immeasurable plain,
Mid all things wild and wonderful, and where
The magnet woos her iron mate in vain !

Doth hope still soothe their souls, or gladness thrill ?
Is peace amid those wanderers of the foam ?
Say ! is the old affection yearning still
With all the blessed memories of home ?

Or is it over ? life, and breath, and thought,
The living feature and the breathing form ?
Is the strong man become a thing of nought,
And the rich blood of rank no longer warm ?

Thou answerest not ! thou stern and haughty sea !
There is no sound in earth, or wave, or air,
Roll on ye tears ! oh, what shall comfort be,
To hearts that pant for hope but breathe despair !

Nay mourner ! there is sunlight on the deep,
A gentle rainbow in the darkling cloud,
A voice, more mighty than the floods, shall sweep
The shore of tempests when the storm is loud !

What though they woke the whirlwinds of the West,
Or roused the tempest from its Eastern lair,
Or clave the cloud with thunder in its breast,
Lord of the awful waters ! thou wert there.

All merciful ! the day, the doom, were thine ;
Thou didst embrace them on the seething sea ;
Thy love too deep—thy mercy too divine—
To quench them in an hour unmeet for thee !

If winds were mighty, thou wert in the gale.—
If their feet failed them, in thy midst they trod !
Storms could not urge the bark, nor guide the sail,
Nor force the quivering helm, away from God !

SIR RHUBARB PILL HND HIS PATIENT.

The Patient is stretched in a terrible plight,
All wasted to skin and to bone ;
'Go call in the Doctor, Sir Rhubarb call in,
Or the last spark of life will be gone.'
The Doctor is come, and his darling fee
In his breaches pocket is cramm'd ;
For unless that was safe, as he candidly said,
The Patient might die and be d—d !
But now, then, to hear what Sir Rhubarb prescribes ;
The Patient sinking apace—
Is it potion, or lotion ? or—Oh, Doctor dear,
Pray what do you think of the case ?
The Doctor looked wise—that's to say, he tried hard
To look like a person of sense,—
Then, breaking the silence, he solemnly said,
'I'll look in—in five months or so hence.'
'But, Doctor, Poor John will be buried by then.'
'Well, let him ; pray, what's that to me ?'
And the Quack chinked the blunt as he candidly said
'I've got what I wanted—the fee.'

A. B. R.

WEEKLYANA.

LADY Eveline Fitzmaurice, the eldest daughter of Lord Lansdowne, is engaged to marry Mr. Victor Cavendish, son of Lord Edward Cavendish and heir-presumptive to the Dukedom of Devonshire.

MR. C. F. Worsley has not survived his appointment as Commissioner of the Patna Division. Since taking charge, he had been ailing—and died on Tuesday last. Mr. J. A. Hopkins, Magistrate and Collector, Patna, takes temporary charge of the Division, while Mr. H. Le Mesurier, Joint-Magistrate, becomes full Magistrate and Collector of the district.

THE Chief Secretary's time being up in the local Legislative Council, Mr. H. J. S. Cotton, has been given another term.

WE find the following paragraph in the Ceylon Independent of the 24th May last :—

"A novel expression of loyalty.—Mr. Roche Victoria, who is the contractor for the clearing of the new Post Office site opposite Queen's House, has for the past few days been blasting several large rocks.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given, any other being unnecessary and likely to cause confusion.

Yesterday, however, the gentleman, to show his loyalty to Her Majesty the Queen, and determined not to be behind hand in expressing it, took the opportunity of blasting in twenty-one places, thus giving a royal salute!"

Mr. Roche Victoria is a native Christian convert of the Madras Presidency, and a merchant by profession. He has adopted the above name and is a man of great enterprise, but he robes himself as a Madras—in dhottee, coat, turban, and Madras shoes. His name is in the Government House lists of Madras and Ceylon, and he holds a respectable position in society.

SIR Sarbanand has further developed his Gazette. Since Monday, the 6th of June 1892, the Hindoo Patriot, recently converted into a daily, is appearing as a broad-sheet. The journal's divorce from its old traditions is complete. The last link that connected it with the late Kristodas Pal and his patron the late Sir Ashley Eden, the second heading of the journal, has been done away with. We wonder if Baboo Nilmony Dey has acquiesced in the suppression of his deceased father-in-law's memory. All glory to Sir Sarbanand who had chalked out a new path for the once famous journal, for giving it a new shape.

WE confess to have had a sneaking fondness for the Hindoo Patriot. The grounds, public and private, for our partiality are obvious. It was the first worthy national journal whose greatness has not yet been exceeded. That glory was achieved by a brother Brahman whose lieutenant we were privileged to have been. It may, therefore, be readily understood with what feelings we have marked its gradual decadence. And now at length it is a question of life and death. We have of late watched in painful suspense the desperate shifts of the dear old thing to recover ground. And now it confronts the world in all the glory of a double broadsheet, it will, doubtless, receive congratulations from all sides, except from us. Here too we have both personal and public reasons for not doing like the rest of our contemporaries. The broadsheet is, of course, the proper size for a daily, the Allahabad examples notwithstanding, and we ourselves suggested it. But, in the peculiar circumstances of the paper, this departure is a doubtful improvement. At any rate, now that the proper form is assumed, we feel as if all was over with the Hindoo Patriot. Not only that in this bloated development we, for the first time, morally realize that the weekly has turned to a daily. But in the final abandonment of the old familiar face—the well known historic heading—we morally feel that the old concern has been buried in the new size and the unaccustomed opening label. All the past associations of forty years are now formally suppressed. In point of fact, a new journal has begun on June 6, 1892—albeit under an old name in part.

In its new enterprise, the Hindoo Patriot has come upon the cause of the transfer of Sir Dennis Fitzpatrick, now Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab, from the Chief Commission of Assam to the Hyderabad Residency. It is that he "could not comply with the requisition" "to submit his views" for a detailed report on the working of Act I of 1882.—Vide Hindoo Patriot, June 9.

THE $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Loans—namely, the $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Loan of 1878 and the transfer Loan of 1879, the $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. portion including the $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Loan of 1880 mature on the 15th September 1893, and are dischargeable at par on that date, provided three months' notice of repayment shall have been given—by the 15th June 1893. The Government, however, are willing to transfer these holdings into the ordinary 4 per cent Loans on the following terms:—

(1) Rs. 100 of 4 per cent. Promissory Notes or Stock Certificates will be delivered for every Rs. 100 of $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Securities received; and any interest (not already paid) on the $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Securities up to the 29th June 1892 inclusive will be paid in cash.

(2) The Promissory Notes or Stock Certificates delivered will be of the Loan of 1854-55, and interest will run upon them from the 30th June 1892.

(3) The Securities tendered for transfer should be receipted in the following form—Received in lieu of this note a note of the same value of the 4 per cent. Loan of 1854-55, bearing interest from 30th June 1892.

Securities, other than Loan Certificates with coupons payable to bearer attached, tendered for transfer in India, should be presented on or before the 15th July 1892 at the Public Debt Office, Calcutta, or at a Presidency Bank or any of their Branches, or at any Government Treasury in India. Loan Certificates, with coupons payable to bearer attached, tendered for conversion in India, must be presented at the Public Debt Office, Calcutta, together with the coupons with which they were issued, if any such remain which have not become due. When the Securities are presented at the Public Debt Office, Calcutta, that office will, as soon as possible after receipt of the Securities, issue the 4 per cent. Promissory Notes, and also pay the interest. In other cases the Bank or Treasury receiving the Securities tendered will forward them to the Public Debt Office, Calcutta, which will, as soon as possible after receipt, furnish the Bank or Treasury concerned with the 4 per cent. Promissory Notes to be issued in exchange, and with a payment order for the interest. The 4 per cent. Promissory Note will then be delivered, and the interest paid by the Bank or Treasury concerned.

No application will be entertained after the 15th July 1892.

SUPERSTITION is as prevalent in the West as in the East or indeed in any other part of the globe. The very forms of it are often alike in all parts. The Berlin Correspondent of the London Daily News sends in an official report of a struggle with the Devil in Bavaria, drawn up by a Catholic clergyman, which reads like a story of an Indian exorcism. The object of diabolical possession was a juvenile reprobate:—

"The poor boy would not pray or go to church, had fits of temper, paid no respect to sacred things, and, among other misdeeds, ill-treated his parents. The latter sought the advice of doctors, and, when they could do nothing, Father Aurelian, the priest of the village, pronounced the benediction over the boy, but without any good effect. Then the boy was sent to a convent, but no reformation followed. When the Bishop of Augsburg a year ago visited the place, the father, as a last resource, brought the boy to him, hoping he might cure him. The Bishop approached the boy with great dignity and consciousness of power, and exclaimed, 'Thou canst not deceive me, Unclean Spirit!' But the boy remained as obstinate as ever; and now the conclusion was come to that he was possessed of a devil, and the operation of driving it out was determined upon. It lasted two days, and was, of course, not without great pain to the boy. The official report says about the result of the operation: 'After applying the same means as in the morning, I exhorted the devil to confess the whole truth, whether he would leave the boy. After long exorcism he at last, with groans, and sighs, said in a humble tone, "Yes." On receiving this answer I became more emboldened, and adjured him by God, by the Holy Virgin, and the Holy Archangel Michael, to declare whether he would go at once. "Yes" was the answer. I adjured him a third time to tell the whole truth, whether he would really go. He again answered with a decisive "Yes." When the devil the first time consented to leave the boy I exhorted him not to enter into any of the persons present, nor into any other being who might wish to have him, but to go to that spot which God had appointed. After a pause, I asked, "Hast thou left the boy?" "Yes" was the reply. "Thy companions also?" "Yes." "The third time I conjure thee to declare the whole truth. Hast thou and thy companions left the boy?" "Yes." "Where art thou now?" "In hell." "Thy companions also?" "Yes." "In the name of the most Holy Trinity I adjure thee for the third time to give some sign thereof." "Yes, we are in hell," came back the answer in fearful tones. This last answer really seemed to come from hell. At first the devil had answered in an impudent and spiteful tone, but the last answer was quite melancholy. Now the boy began to weep. It was the sign that the evil spirit had really left him, for only at the moment when he declared for the third time that he was in hell did the spirit go. Until then he had lied unto me, for he is the Father of Lies. I now made the boy make the sign of the cross, contemplate the crucifix, repeat the holy names of Jesus and Mary, as well as that of the Archangel Michael. He did so, weeping bitterly. I handed him the pieces of the Cross and sacred relics to kiss. He kissed them with many tears. He then said the Lord's Prayer and the Ave Maria, sobbing loudly. This ended the exorcism, and a thanksgiving mass was then held. Father Aurelian also explains why the devil took possession of the boy. The father, a Catholic, had married a Protestant, and was married in a Protestant church, and the children had been brought up in the Protestant faith. The father has now, says the report, 'made good his fault.' The marriage ceremony has been celebrated again according to the Roman Catholic rite, the children have been rebaptised, and it is even hoped that the mother will go over to the Catholic Church."

That may be considered a triumph for the Church, but that kind of thing is common in all backward communities. In Bengal the same miracle is performed by very inferior agency—low illiterate men.

MR. Hume thus explains to the various Secretaries of the Congress Standing Committees the omission of the Introduction to the last Congress Report:—

"I prepared one as usual, which was approved by the Chairman of the Reception Committee, and also by Messrs. W. C. Bonnerjee and Manmohan Ghose who have most carefully considered it. But Pandit Madan Mohan Moulaviya, in a most earnest letter, apparently on behalf of the Allahabad Committee, condemned it as seditious, as calculated to harm the cause irreparably, as certain to frighten most of our party, and so on.

Now, though we do not agree in all this, we feel that we could not publish this article, here, in the Report, in the face of such a protest from the Committee where the next Congress is to be held, and I personally, compelled as I am to leave the country, do not choose to leave behind a cause of quarrel. It is impossible to modify this review. Every word and every section has been so carefully considered that it constitutes a single piece. It would be useless cutting out this or that; the only thing to be done is to re-write it entirely, which, of course, is impossible, even if we thought this desirable, which we do not. Therefore, we have decided to issue the report in India without any introductory article, but to print this letter in the English edition, and separately as a pamphlet in England. I will of course see that copies of this letter reach all of you.

There is this much to be said in favour of the Allahabad Committee's position. Mr. Manmohan Ghose informs me that in the Bangabasi case Sir Comer Petheram (though he toned down in the printed report) did lay down broadly that anything tending to bring the Government into discredit was seditious. This is directly opposed to the best English authorities: it is a monstrous doctrine, which, if I have been correctly informed, I shall endeavour to bring before the bar of English public opinion. But if this be the Chief Justice of Calcutta's law, then the whole review, showing how cruelly the Revenue and the Forest systems work, and insisting on all the shortcomings of the existing administration, is seditious, and it is best not to publish it here, where in cases like that against the Bangabasi, the juries are packed, and it is hopeless to expect justice.

I hope you will explain privately to Congressmen in your circle the reason why the Indian Report will appear this year without the customary introductory article."

It seems impossible for Mr. Hume to speak with accuracy, to say nothing of temper or fairness towards views and men that stand in the way of his peculiar objects. His whole criticism of the Bangabasi case is that of an irresponsible agitator, and indeed his language has a wild intensity that reminds one more of the great Dan's declamations against Saxon tyranny than the businesslike sobriety of the no less earnest honest "Joe" in his most indignant moods. It is beside the question to say that Sir Comer Petheram's dictum is directly opposed to the best English authorities, considering that Sir Comer had to expound the Indian not the English law. The criticism is unworthy of a retired member of the Indian Civil Service. To characterise the statement that "anything tending to bring the Government" established by law—that is, the British Power, not any particular administration or administrators—"into discredit is seditious," is a "monstrous doctrine," is mere rant. "Monstrous" it certainly is not, though severe and even maybe, wrong. If it be monstrous, then most civilized countries, we fear, labour under a monstrous law of treason. Still, after all, that is a matter of opinion, and men may hold extreme views and give them passionate expression without serious moral reproach. Not so are matters of fact, and every man is responsible for his testimony. How, then, comes Mr. Hume to say that the jury in the Bangabasi case was packed? That assertion is simply not true. Nor is it honourable. It is seditious, too, we are afraid. To say that juries are packed in the High Court, and to adduce the Bangabasi trial as a case in which the jury was packed, is not only a calumny, but, in the face of the conflicting verdicts of the Jury, also an impudent calumny, having one possible object—that of destroying the faith of the people in the justice of Her Majesty's highest Court and thereby bringing the British Government into discredit. In fire, after the event of the trial, Mr. Hume's charge is, to use his own word, monstrous.

OUR OWN NEWS.

THE Russian persecution of foreigners is not confined to the Jews. The Germans have now come in for their turn. It is reported at Berlin that German teachers in Russia who have failed to learn the Russian language are being expelled like the Jews. Little or no time is allowed to make the necessary arrangements. The head of a private school has been sent away because, although a Russian citizen, he had hung up portraits of the last three German Emperors in his house.

This news by the mail is followed this week by Reuter's telegrams reporting the cordial reception at Kiel of the Czar by the Emperor William, the exchange of cordial toasts after dinner, and the appointment of the Czar as an Admiral of the German Navy.

AT the dinner, the Czar declared that he would never support France in raising the Alsace-Lorraine question. The French, on the other hand, regard the sudden appearance of Grand Duke Constantine at Nancy as a political event of the highest importance and a counterpoise to the Czar's visit to the German Emperor. They made a great Russophile demonstration at the opening of the gymnastic fetes at Nancy, to which students of every University not being Germans were invited. President Carnot was present and had a most cordial interview with the Grand Duke, who was an unexpected visitor.

NEWS comes from New York of a colossal disaster in the oil region of Pennsylvania. Reuter reports that a cloud burst and partly swamped two towns. The lightning set fire to the oil refineries and six of them were ablaze. The flood swept away the oil tanks at Titusville. The ignited oil spread everywhere, the river carrying the blazing debris a distance of eighteen miles to Oil City, which was soon on fire. The number of fatalities at Oil City is two hundred and at Titusville one hundred and fifty.

PARLIAMENT will be asked for a loan of £6,00,000 for the Mauritius Government to meet the distress caused there by the late hurricane. We hope the Government and people of India will not stand aloof on such an occasion.

LUCK is Luck and no mistake—Luck all over:—we mean the Lance Corporal of the 3rd Foot Guards in the Prussian Army. He has simply shot himself into immortality.

But yesterday Luck was a poor unknown private. Now, though a private still, he is no longer obscure. No German so great.

THE Oriental Bank has gone into liquidation for the second time. On Wednesday, the New Corporation suspended payment. It was in the air beforehand that the Bank was shaky. So the failure was not an absolute surprise. Those who came to know of it drew out their moneys. It is stated that the failure is due to depreciation in silver, the withdrawal of the capital in the East and the bad condition of trade in China, Japan and Australasia, and the cyclone at Mauritius causing a loss of a crore of rupees. The total liability, as telegraphed by Reuter, is five and-a-half millions sterling.

SIMULTANEOUSLY with the suspension of payment in the Oriental, we read that Messrs. King, Hamilton & Co. offer to make advances, against balances in that Bank, to Officers and Civilians upon their opening current accounts with them.

THE same day that the Bank failed, danger signals were hoisted pre-saging a cyclone. The offices were early closed and barred and the assistants allowed to go home to prepare to meet the storm. Luckily, it was not felt in Calcutta. The weather, however, continues cloudy.

A CORRESPONDENT in the guise of "Great Danger Signal No. 4," protests, in the Englishman, against this cry of wolf of the Meteorological Reporter of the Government of Bengal. He says:—

"I have been a number of years in India and my nerves are probably not what they once were. Anyhow, when I was told yesterday that the great danger signal No. 4 (signifying 'the approach of a cyclonic storm of great intensity and magnitude to the mouth of the Hooghly, and which will probably advance to Calcutta,' laid down in the Port Rules) had been hoisted, I for a moment was seriously alarmed.

It flashed across me, however, that in May last two 'cyclonic storms' were prophesied, in June 'a whirl,' in July 'a depression,' in August a 'cyclonic storm close to the Sunderbunds,' in September 'a cyclone,' in November 'a cyclonic storm close to Saugor,' and subsequently 'severe cyclone with hurricane winds.' And remembering how little came of it all, I recovered my equanimity, which was not afterwards upset when I heard that steamers had been ordered into the docks, and that even the ladies' golf tent was struck.

It is absolutely certain that if the Meteorological Reporter to the Government of Bengal goes on crying 'Wolf' long enough, he will some day prove a true prophet. Meantime it would be well if he made more sure of his ground before giving orders to hoist."

The latest report is that

"the expected cyclone has travelled westwards and has broken on the Orissa coast somewhere near Balasore. It is believed to be a very severe one, and grave apprehensions are felt as to the safety of vessels which may have been caught in it. The British India steamer Dunera and the China Steamer are both over-due and anxiety is felt in some quarters on their account. It is extremely probable that the steamers are waiting outside, being unwilling to attempt coming in, in the face of the storm signals. No news has reached town as to the safety of the Lightships, though telegrams have been sent to Chandbally and other places making enquiries. The Government Steamer Guide left port yesterday for the Sandheads and the Resolute will follow this morning."

THE flight of bravery of our go-ahead Hindu friends of Bombay, moderate as in all conscience it was, has after all recoiled upon them. So long ago as October 1890, at a Christian Mission house at Poona, some forty-two native gentlemen met to exchange their views on matters of social reform. After the business of the day, they refreshed themselves with tea and biscuits. This led to an Orthodox agitation and the social ostracism of the so-called reformers. The Forty-two found their situation unbearable, and gradually almost all of them have expiated their sin by pryaschitta and regained their caste. The last to submit to the enforced purification were, mirabile dictu, the Hon'ble Mr. M. G. Ranade, Rao Bahadur Chintaman Narayan Bhat and Mr. Govind Wasudev Kanitkar, the first-named being the Doyen of the Liberal Party in the West, the last two, graduates and subordinate judges. Orthodox Poona may well be proud of this achievement, while those of the progressive party are naturally bitter on the three gentlemen for their unaccountable weakness and inconsistency. We only hope the three sheep who have, by such painful sacrifice and shameful degradation, got back to the Orthodox fold, will not be orthodox with a vengeance. Two of our Europe-returned Baboos in this city, since their re-admission after the pleasant experience of the purifying dung, are out-Hinduing the sober Hindu. They are specially unforgiving towards those of their Hindu brethren who, without partaking of the doubtful delicacy, presume to reason their countrymen, by enlightened, yet thoroughly legitimate, interpretation of their peculiar laws, into the path of practical reform.

THE whole affair on the Bombay side is most disheartening, and a humiliation to Young India and specially to those of us who prate of progress and of our intellectual, moral and social advancement and, on the strength thereof, aspire to political privileges of difficult attainment and still more difficult retention. We have neither wisdom nor backbone, and our foremost leaders are no better than the rest of us.

There is just one glimmering ray of hope, amid the prevailing pitch darkness of despair. It is some consolation that two at least of the Forty-two generally miserable poltroons and recreants have not partaken of the humble pie. They have not yet, we should say. For, after the great Mahadeva Govind Ranade's defection, we dare not make sure of lesser heroes. At any rate, all honour to Professors Gokhale and Kelkar of the Fergusson College for not having yet succumbed to the pressure.

MR. Lee, the Chairman of the Calcutta Corporation, goes on two months and twenty days' leave from the 6th July next. The same Gazette that grants the leave to Mr. Lee, appoints Mr. J. G. Ritchie, Magistrate and Collector, third grade, officiating as Deputy Commissioner, Darjeeling, "to act as Chairman of the Commissioners of Calcutta, during the absence on leave, of Mr. H. Lee, or until further orders." We are not sure that the appointment of Mr. Ritchie is according to law. The law says, "In any case in which leave of absence shall be granted to the Chairman, the Local Government shall appoint one of the Commissioners to act as Chairman in his place, or shall make such other arrangements for carrying on the duties of the office as to it shall seem proper." So the officiating Chairman must be one of the Commissioners before he could be their head. Sir Charles Elliott had better be careful in a matter of the kind. Instead of relying on the genius of brilliant young Secretaries, the Government should take counsel with their lawyers.

At the election of the General Committee of the Calcutta Corporation, Baboo Joy Gobind Law was put into it by the casting vote of the Chairman. Objection being taken that Mr. Lee had no vote in the matter, the Advocate-General was asked about it. Mr. Woodroffe is of opinion that the Chairman cannot possibly have the casting vote. He further lays down that "Had this case been sent to me before instead of on the 1st June, a bye-election for the tie might have been held, but section 63 now prevents this being done, and Baboo Joy-gobind Law cannot act as a member of the General Committee for this year." It is suggested that the vacancy in the General Committee cannot be filled till the next election. The latest day for the election of the General Committee is fixed by law on the 1st June, and there is apparently no provision for filling up ad interim vacancies. That points to a defect in the law which is not easy to contemplate. For one thing, the General Committee, in the absence of a duly elected member, remains an unformed body whose acts cannot, necessarily, be binding.

THE case of Kashi Paharia, lying under sentence of death at Rajshahi, came on for hearing yesterday morning, before Messrs. Justices O'Kinealy and Amir Ali. Mr. Abdur Rahman, Barrister, on behalf of the accused argued the case at great length. Their lordships delivered the following judgment:—

"In this case Kasi Paharia has been convicted of murder and sentenced to death for causing the death of one Rahamutullah. The assessors considered that he should be acquitted. We agree in the view taken by the Sessions Judge to a great extent. The statement of the prisoner to the Magistrate which he never repudiated shows that the deceased visited his house that night and was found dead early next morning in the neighbourhood and covered with blood. This with the evidence of his wife and mother leaves no doubt of the truth of the case, but at the same time there can be no doubt that some of the evidence cannot be relied on, and some of it we do not believe to be true. We therefore set aside the sentence of death and direct that the prisoner be transported for life."

Thus the life of Kashi Paharia is saved. It is a relief, as the case is certainly not without difficulty.

THE suit, valued at Rs. 1,00,000, for damages instituted by Kadumbini Gangooly against Mahes Chunder Pal, proprietor of the Banganibasi, and the editor, the publisher and the printer, came up for hearing yesterday before Mr. Justice Trevelyan. The defendant Pal admitted liability and submitted himself to the judgment of the court. Mr. Justice Trevelyan took time to assess the damages. We quote the report of the proceedings from the Englishman which alone of the morning papers publishes them:—

"Mr. Bonnerjee, Mr. Garth, and Mr. Chuckerbutty, instructed by Babu Bhobun Mohun Dass, appeared for the plaintiff. Mr. Hill and Mr. Palit, instructed by the Hon'ble G. C. Chunder, for Mahes Chunder Paul, the proprietor of the Banganibasi. The other defendants were not represented at the hearing, but the editor had put in a written statement, in which he said that he was not the editor at the time when the alleged libel was published, and knew nothing about it.

Mr. Hill, for the proprietor of the Banganibasi, as Mr. Bonnerjee was about to open his case.—If my friend will allow me to interrupt him, I think I can save him from having to read the libel or go into the matters with which it deals. My client deeply regrets the publication of the libel which appeared in his paper without his knowledge. My client informed the plaintiff's attorney some time ago that, so far as he was concerned, proof of publication would not be required and no technical difficulties would be raised. My client makes no attempt to justify the libel. It is a very gross one and cannot be defended. It arose out of disputes over the Age of Consent Bill, in which the plaintiff's husband took the newer view of the question, and the defendant's paper took the older one. My client has published an apology in his own paper, and has sent a copy of it to the plaintiff's husband to be published in his paper. He has already been prosecuted in the Police Court, and been sentenced to six months' imprisonment by Mr. Handley. He is quite ready to do anything in his power to repair the wrong he unwittingly committed, and leaves the question of damages in your Lordship's hands.

Trevelyan, J.—Do you press for damages, Mr. Bonnerjee?

Mr. Bonnerjee.—Yes, my Lord. My client does not wish to make money out of this affair, but the libel is a very foul one, and besides she and her husband have been put to heavy expense in connection with the matter, which, they think, should be made good to them by the defendant. The costs of the prosecution in the Police Court were very heavy. I am quite willing to let the case be withdrawn as against the publisher and printer.

Trevelyan, J.—The paper is published in Bengali, I suppose. What sort of a circulation has it got?

Mr. Bonnerjee.—Yes. It is a Bengali weekly paper. I have never heard of the paper before and do not know what its circulation is. The other side authorise me to say that they offered us Rs. 2,500 damages.

Trevelyan, J.—It is a gross libel, but the defendant has got six months for it, and he has given you an apology, expressed his readiness to do all he can to atone for his wrongdoings.

Mr. Bonnerjee.—My idea is that Rs. 5,000 would not be too large a sum. My learned friend and I are both prepared to leave the question of damages in your Lordship's hand. I would ask that the defendant's apology be published in the Dainik and the Banganibasi.

Mr. Hill.—We are ready to do that or anything else we can to repair the wrong we have committed.

Trevelyan, J.—This suit is withdrawn as against all except the first defendant. I fully appreciate the very proper course adopted by the first defendant's learned counsel, which is what one would expect from that counsel. It is not easy to arrive at the proper damages to be given in this case, but I will consider the matter and come to some conclusion as to the damages that should be awarded. Of course in assessing the damages I shall take the first defendant's conduct here into account."

THE High Court—Messrs. Justices O'Kinealy and Amir Ali—have laid down that in summary trials the magistrates must give reasons for their findings and not content themselves with simply recording the orders. The Joint Magistrate of Sealdah summarily convicted Preonath Chuckerbutty, a Municipal Commissioner of Baranagar, of criminal trespass into the house of one Ganendranath Gangooly and fined him Rs. 50. A rule was obtained from the High Court against the magistrate to shew cause why the conviction and sentence should not be set aside. At the hearing of the rule and after hearing Mr. Monmohun Ghose for the accused and the pleader for the Crown, the Judges made the following orders:—

"Mr. Justice O'Kinealy:—In this case, a rule was issued, calling upon the Crown to show cause why the finding and sentence passed by the Joint-Magistrate of Sealdah in a summary trial should not be set aside. Today the Crown has shown cause, and we think we are bound to make the rule absolute. No doubt in a summary trial all the safeguards required in other cases are not available. The law, however, compels a Magistrate hearing a case in a summary manner to do certain things, and these things it is incumbent upon us to enforce; because if trials of the nature of the present one, were allowed to prevail in Bengal, this Court, as a court of Revision, would have no power over judicial officers. The law says that the plea of the accused, and his examination, if any, should be recorded, and in addition to that, when there is a finding and conviction, there must be a brief statement of the reason for it. So far as we can see in the present case, the Magistrate has given no reasons, but he had dealt with the case as if he were a jury. He has given us his findings, but no reasons for them. The rule, therefore, must be made absolute, and the conviction must be set aside, and with the consent of the Crown and the accused, the case will be transferred to the Magistrate of Alipore for trial in a regular way.

Mr. Justice Amir Ali.—For myself I wish to add that in these cases tried summarily, it is always advisable for the Magistrate to give short abstracts of the evidence in order to enable this Court to have possession of the facts upon which the judgment is founded."

It seldom falls to our lot to be in agreement with the Indian Mirror, but there is much in the following little leadrette of our contemporary which has our hearty approval:—

"The Education Commission, appointed by the Resolution of the Government of India, dated the 3rd February, 1882, seems to have been a 'splendid shani,' a 'splendid do-nothing.' It distinctly laid down that Native gentlemen of approved qualifications be eligible for the post of Inspector of Schools, and that they be employed in that capacity more commonly than has hitherto been the case. And yet in filling the post, vacated by an Indian Inspector of Schools, Sir Charles Elliott has, without rhyme or reason, overlooked the claims of an Indian educationist of long and varied experience, and of undoubted ability. This educationist is no other than Babu Bani Madhub De, Assistant Inspector of Schools, Burdwan Division, whose appointment to Government Service dates from 1866, and who has, since that year, obtained the reputation of a most able and efficient officer. As a scholar, he eminently distinguished himself in the Presidency College with his college-mate, the Hon'ble Babu Rash Behari Ghosh—the talented Vakil of the High Court, and member of the Viceroy's Legislative Council. Uniting in himself considerable intellectual powers and great depth of character, he won golden opinions from some of the best members of the Civil Service with whom he came in contact. Mr. Heeley, for instance, offered him at one time a Deputy Magistracy, but he elected to stick to the educational line. There is another distinguished Civilian, Mr. Buckland, now in the Bengal Secretariat, who can well testify to his 'approved qualifications.' And we feel sure that Mr. Hill has been appointed over his head without Mr. Buckland's knowledge. As Assistant Inspector of Schools, he invariably does all the brain-work in the Inspector's Office, the annual reports, which are all written by him, bearing marks of exceptional powers of work. Did Mr. William Digby then go beyond the mark in his speech in the Union Chapel, Islington, regarding the 'administrative suppression' of the Indians?"

As usual with our contemporary, with the best intentions in the world, the Mirror spoils the cause he espouses. We are afraid Baboo Bani Madhub De's claims are scarcely likely to be advanced under this administration by the mention of the name of one at least of the officers who are mentioned as having appreciated his merits. Poor Mr. Buckland himself is virtually as completely "suppressed" as any poor Indians.

THE Secretariat price for the liberty of the press is, alas! but a mess of pottage. Here is an instance of the advantage, in the way of priority of official news, which a native contemporary enjoys from its new connection with Government.

The new broad-sheet gives prominence to the information, unavailable to other newspapers, that "the Lieutenant-Governor has directed that the accounts of the District Road Committees in Bengal, for the last quarter of 1891-92, are to be published in the Gazette." The publication of the accounts is a matter of course, as of law. It is assuring to know that Sir Charles Elliott does not mean to override the law in the present case. If it were left to him, Sir Charles would order its discontinuance as a measure of economy, if for no other reason.

As an indication of its present policy, we find the Patriot recommending in successive issues a certain article advertised in it.

A CORRESPONDENT, signing himself "One interested," asks:—

"Will you or any of your numerous readers kindly quote the date of any circular with regard to the title to which the wives of Rai Bahadurs are entitled? One Rai Bahadur has adopted the title of Rani for his wife and the Local Government has apparently recognised the title, while others not so forward are left in the lurch."

We hope some one will respond to this appeal. We withhold our own say for the present.

REIS & RAYYET.

Saturday, June 11, 1892.

THE INSPECTION SCARE.

THE Bengal Administration in all its branches is undergoing inspection, minute and thorough. The present Lieutenant-Governor lays the greatest stress on this duty, and he has found his own lieutenants all loyal to the core. Whatever their secret feelings, his chief subordinates are carrying his behests out to the letter and the bitter end. Thus, the rage for inspection has been communicated to the whole province, and officers from the members of the Board of Revenue down to Sub-Inspectors of schools are out, in season and out of season, on inspection. There is no hope of staying the favorite old tat of the Belvedere stables whipped into galloping pace. The ruler of the day is inexorably inflexible and determined. Yet, he may possibly be induced to avoid unnecessary harshness. Surely, it is no part of his policy to cause pain by insult to respectable men. It is highly desirable that Sir Charles Elliott, who has initiated these disturbing and objectionable measures, should insist upon his inspecting officers behaving with at least common politeness towards the subordinate officers whose offices are inspected, and showing some reasonable patience in conducting the inspection. These inferior servants of the state deserve every sympathy. After having been all through their career left pretty much to their own devices, they are being put on a difficult trial. What wonder, if on a sudden call they are apt to lose their heads? Now these officers are coming more in contact with high officials and their superiors than was the case in former times, it is but fair that they are treated without gruffness or brusquerie, not to say rudeness, and judged with some charity. A man must have the qualities of temper, patience, tact, and consideration, otherwise he cannot be a successful inspecting officer.

For some time we have been hearing complaints regarding one of the inspecting officers in the Registration department. This officer has now made himself a sort of bugbear to the poor Sub-Registrars throughout the country. His name is enough to make them shudder, and his presence has the effect of a stupefying drug on them. His rudeness and harsh treatment of the Sub-Registrars is very improper, and his want of patience is much to be deplored. He has peculiar notions of his high dignity. His assumptions of self importance are not only novel, but also rather superhuman. The innocent bleating of a goat or the cawing of a crow in the neighbourhood of an office, disturbs the equanimity of his mind and makes him suddenly lose his temper, and for this great offence the poor Sub-Registrar is held responsible and not unoften suffers. For the slightest want of readiness in answering questions or understanding them, the amla are abused in the presence of their immediate superior officer, and threats are not also wanting when the Huzoor of Inspection wants to vindicate his authority.

The Sub-Registrars, among whom are representatives of the most respectable classes of men—Zemindars, Honorary Magistrates, scions of good families, retired native officers of high rank, even men who held higher appointments than the Inspectors and were of superior standing in the Provincial service—are not unfrequently addressed as tum or tumi by the officer in question. This is a direct insult for which there can be no excuse, for no one has a right to address a respectable man in that way, not to speak of gazetted officers.

The hours of inspection are sometimes chosen with exemplary care and nice consideration, and are most auspicious and comfortable. A Sub-Registrar is surprised at midnight in his house by the Inspector Sahab and, after a great deal of altercation and confusion when the door is opened and the Inspector Sahab rushes in, the whole village gets alarmed of something unusual in the registry cutchery. With half opened eyes and a dim light the Sub-Registrar receives the Inspector and is obliged to show him his books, while his amla are fast asleep in their respective dwellings. The Inspector finishes his inspection as quickly and as disgustingly as is to be expected at the hour and under the circumstances, laying all the blame of his shortcomings on the Registrar. That poor officer is condemned for his want of tact in keeping the office ready for inspection, and thereby causing so much delay in the inspection that there was the fear of the Sahab's missing the up-passenger train. Sometime in the early morning, while the Sub-Registrar is preparing to go and meet burdened nature's pressing command, he is attacked. He is blamed for being indecently dressed, though he is only in munshi. He is detained till 9 or 10 A. M. in the office to show the work, although all this time silently maintaining a desperate fight with nature in the hope of saving his bread. If subdued by the power of nature he slips out of the office and betakes himself to his zenana for that purpose, he is sometimes pursued up to the boundary of the sacred apartments, from where he is called out by the energetic superior, causing great consternation and commotion among the female members of his house, nay, among the whole village. Cases of this kind have occurred in Bengal and Behar, and some district officers are aware of it. We should like to see some such cases placed before Mr. Justice Trevelyan in the High Court for an expression of his lordship's opinion on the rights of an inspecting officer.

If the Subordinate officers are to be treated in this fashion, how can the inspection be properly gone through and, above all, how can respectable persons hold such appointments? It is very difficult to satisfy an officer of this type. We are really sorry to be assured that many officers are put to trouble for no fault on their part but only for the quick temper of their superior.

We are glad, however, to learn that the matter has already attracted the notice of Mr. Holmwood, the head of the department, who is so justly respected by all his subordinates. We would ask the Inspector-General to look into the matter more closely and at once, and remove the cause of complaints which are the table talk of officers in almost every district. If they be not checked now, we are afraid some day some officer of the department may be involved in some unpleasant proceedings, and then it will be too late to complain.

At any rate, Bengal is not now what it was some years ago, and if the cause of complaint is not removed, it will be our painful duty to give out names and cite all the unfortunate cases with all their unpleasant and damaging details.

THE LEADING JOURNAL IN DISTRESS.

THE Pioneer is going the way of all journals that sell their liberty for a mess of pottage. The rôle of writers who depend for news on the favour, and for views on the inspiration, of officials, is scarcely an elevating one. The habit of clinging to the lower end of the hospitable boards of the higher officers in the state to catch the gospel of affairs, and of looking up to the drawers of pay by thousands as if they were great men, must, we are afraid, have a depressing effect on manhood. Accordingly, we see that our Allahabad contemporary has descended to chronicle small beer and report the tittle tattle of the dinner-tables of big wigs. The following morceau, which appeared in a late issue, is certainly worthy of being embodied in Jeames' Diary, but, has a strange look in the columns of a leading journal:—

"A not not unworthy of the great Onoocul Chunder Mookerjee was recently made. The case was under discussion of a distinguished English official, who received in the last Birthday Gazette an honour which had already been conferred upon several of his juniors. 'This,' said a Bengali gentleman, 'is lateral multiplication not visible elevation'—a comment which, when it came to his ears, tickled no one more than the recipient of the honour."

If that is journalism by gentlemen for gentlemen, we pity the pass to which Anglo-Indian society has come. The foregoing paragraph is not only in wretched taste, but also a series of blunders from beginning to end. Poor Onoocul Chunder Mookerjee! And has it come to this? A wellborn Hindu, descended from a great Rishi and belonging to one of the best Calcutta families, himself an able advocate and since a respected Judge of the High Court, every inch a gentleman in his presence, manners and conduct, an ornament of society, who lived according to his position and means, who, rising superior to the prejudices of his tribe, mixed on terms of cordial social intercourse with the best parts of Anglo-Indian and Indian society, entertaining his European friends at his table and entertained by them, what a fate is his! To be the butt of post mortem ridicule, for no sin of his own but the folly of a wretched connexion! And finally to be a name to conjure with for Anglo-Indian writers in stress for a passable joke—an unfailing source of wit for barren penmen! But even in this, the writer in the Allahabad paper has failed in his aim—which is, or ought to be, not the deceased Judge but his deceased biographer. Surely, the editor or sub-editor of the Pioneer ought to have known that the whipping boy of Anglo-Indian hilarity is not the great Onoocul Chunder Mookerjee but the stupid fellow who has given him an unenviable immortality by a nonsensical book purporting to be a Life of the Judge. The Pioneer

Nor is that the only blunder and offence of the writer. The whole paragraph is a miss and a mess. To retail anecdotes of contemporary dinner tables, is not a very noble occupation. But the retailer ought at least to be accurate. That, the writer is not. Proceeding as he began, he has done his Bengali gentleman a grave injustice. It is difficult for the Pioneer to do a Bengali justice, though it shows a great advance in its recognition of the possibility of Bengali gentleness. Perhaps, it was in the same desperation for a joke in which the writer invoked the memory of the "great Onoocul Chunder Mookerjee" that he puts absurd language into the mouth of his poor Bengali gentleman. That unfortunate man did not say "lateral multiplication," as the unhappily noted biographer of Onoocul Chunder Mookerjee might have said. His words were "literal multiplication," which were certainly not Mrs. Malapropian nor at all absurd in the connection. He is something superior to the notorious biographer, and perhaps to many a contributor to leading Anglo-Indian journals. His not is not unworthy of the pages of the Pioneer itself. But, of course, any trick is good enough for pointing the finger of scorn at the race of Baboos who do not fall down at the feet of every passing white man. The Pioneer is wrong in every particular. The case under discussion was not of a distinguished English official, who received in the last Birthday Gazette an honour which had already been conferred upon several of his juniors. It was the case of a distinguished Anglo-Indian official who had received an additional honour which made no difference in his name or title in common parlance. There was no question at all of the tardy bestowal of an honour which had already been conferred upon many juniors—there was no thought of a comparison, either with juniors or seniors. Thus said the sententious Bengali, with a terseness which many Anglo-Indian scribes might envy, whatever they might say in public,—“It is but a literal multiplication”—that is, a mere addition to the letters after the recipient's name—“without visible elevation.” The paragraph is characteristically concluded: “A comment which, when it came to his ears, tickled no one more than the recipient of the honour.” That is a true de la Plushian touch. It exhibits the writer as contemplating, with rapt reverence, from a sufficient distance, the greatness of the drawer of the big pay and the master of the grand equipage and of the most gorgeously liveried flunkies, the most tinkling fools, the meekest scribes and the smartest puffers. He cannot conceive of his hero taking notice of anything, everything brought to his notice. So he hears nothing of his own instance, sounds come to his ears, brought by paid or officious instruments.

Of course, the idea of a Baboo confronting the great man—presumably of Upper India—is simply inconceivable on the Pioneer establishment. The British Power in India could not stand under such an omen. At any rate, it is admitted that the Baboo comment came to the great Briton's ears, and it tickled the ears' owner. But for the honour of the Baboo tribe, we protest against our contemporary's gratuitous suggestion—as if

The tickl'd ears no heart-felt raptures raise ;

Nae unison hae they with our Great Briton's praise :

—as if, in fact, the compliment fell flat on its object or was laughed at as an absurdity, as a piece of Baboo ingenuity—as, in a word, Onoocul Chunder's Life. So far from it, we are assured that the recipient of the honour regarded the comment on his title as a fine compliment and admired its literary excellence. Is it possible to compress more inaccuracy and blundering in a short paragraph than the Pioneer does in its few lines ?

A SKETCH OF

THE HISTORY OF THE PRESS IN INDIA.

By Babu Sambhu C. Mookerjee.

The Hindus have never received justice to their capacity for government. Their present political degradation is in the way of their ancestors' fame. The Present is naturally taken to be the reflection of the Past. Nor have they any history of their own to rebuke such contempt. It requires a violent effort to recognize the possibility of the remote forefathers of those who have, all through the entire historic period, been under one subjection or another, having been so very different, not to say illustrious.

Accordingly, it has been the fashion to regard the ancient Hindu Codes as Codes of Law only. In point of fact, like all Hindu writings, they are mixed in character and subject. Thus, like all or most such writings, the most famous Codes commence with Cosmogony, the evolution of the universe, the creation of man and the peopling of the world, and the four-fold division of the human race. Not the least interesting or important part of their works, is that which relates to Politics. European scholars have not generally cared to notice this part, while, even in India practising lawyers ignore it as not required for their profession.

Yet, there is no full understanding of the Hindu race and its place in human evolution without inquiring into the political precepts of these old Rishis. Nor are those precepts without their bearing on the government of the Hindu population at this day.

These legists and the political chapters of the Mahabharat together with the works of Kamandaki and others on Polity and suggestions scattered in different books, between them unfold a system of government and teach maxims of policy which will compare favourably with the speculations of any other ancient nation, however advanced.

Manu's system, indeed, for elaboration will challenge any existing one. He allots to the king a consultative Privy Council of seven or eight sworn members—an efficient body of active councillors daily called on to advise and not gentlemen content to receive the compliment of “the Right Hon'ble” before their names—under an efficient President. Then there is a small Executive Cabinet of ministers in charge of different departments, of which those of Home and Foreign Affairs are particularly mentioned, under a Premier, unless the king chooses to be his own Prime Minister. The whole is worthy of a DeLohme, if not a Bagehot.

Manu gives the Foreign Minister a prominence which no writer of our day could exceed, and which Lord Salisbury would appreciate. Great care is required in the selection of the Ministers, and, above all, of the Foreign Minister. He must, to begin with, be a man of noble birth—a kullin in fact—honourable and pure. He should be handsome and brave, energetic and steady, of distinguished ability, apt in business, of infinite shrewdness, of a fine memory, versed in varied learning, particularly strong in geography and history, one who has travelled much and seen the world, experienced in affairs and well tried. Nothing could be better than such a selection if such a man could be found, and happy is the land where such men, to any extent, may be found, and found willing to serve their king and country.

The Foreign Minister should not only be a man distinguished for the accuracy and extent of his knowledge of different, specially neighbouring, countries, but he must improve and keep up his information. Not only the Minister but the king too who conducts his own affairs, is to be thoroughly acquainted with the powers and resources of other states. Nor is that an easy task. The sage goes into elaborate details as to the subjects on which information is particularly needed, insisting on seventy-two heads of minute inquiry, ending with the statistics of the territories of foreign states, their wealth and treasures, their forces and their forts, and the characters and antecedents of all their Ministers. It is all very well to make this appalling demand, but how is it to be met? How is all the voluminous information, on every variety of difficult heads, to be collected and kept up?

Making allowances for the peculiarities of old Sanskrit and indeed generally all ancient compositions and, in especial, the exigencies of a metrical treatise on Polity and Jurisprudence, no candid man can help being impressed with admiration of the plan propounded and the maxims of statesmanship taught by Manu. Thorough and precise as the scheme of government of the old Legist is, there is a workmanlike homeliness about its provisions which precludes the suspicion of the Rishi having indulged himself in an imaginative ideal. Here is no Republic of Plato or Eutopia of More or New Atlantis of Bacon. Here the normal abnormal characteristics of ancient Hindu literature are wholly absent. There is no wildness such as marks even Hindu science. All is sober earnest. All is practical.

Accordingly, the Rishi does not omit to provide for the means whereby the numerous statistics and all the minute information on so many different heads are to be obtained, and not only obtained for once but to be kept up—statistics and information which are a necessary condition of successful statesmanship and administration in peace and war. Then, as now, such statistics and information could only be obtained by means of a special establishment. Manu has such an agency in view where he speaks of envoys, intelligencers, messengers, emissaries or spies. These, the first in particular, generally appertain to foreign countries. At home the duty devolved upon the civil officers. Hindu Government at the time of Manu seems to have been an administration of record and statistics, carried on by a hierarchy of paid officials—bespeaking, certainly, a high degree of civilization in the community. The system however was not overdone. The unit of administrative charge was the magistrate of the sub-district, who was to send all noteworthy information to the Magistrate of the District. That officer was to transmit his reports to the Superintendent of the Division (consisting of 20 Sub-districts) and the Divisional Superintendent to the Lieutenant-Governor of the Sub-Province. The Lieutenant-Governor was to report to the Governor of the Province. Finally, the information of the whole kingdom from the smallest sub-districts was to reach the Home Minister immediately through the Provincial Governors. Besides this established chain of intelligence, was another separate establishment for gathering information and for that only—an establishment of emissaries and spies. A large body of such intelligencers formed a necessary part of the public service. It was not enough to have superintendents or governors over every township and every hundred and every riding and every county and every province, but a vast number of on-lookers and reporters, known and secret, were distributed throughout the length and breadth of the land, to keep the administration straight, and to report laches and bring information of matters of more or less importance. Besides the emissaries from the fountain-head of power, the provincial, divisional and district authorities themselves employed similar intelligencers of their own, to keep them informed of the occurrences within their jurisdictions, and the doings of their subordinates, as well as the occurrences and views at the head-quarters of the powers above them unto those at the very capital and the palace itself. There were universal distrust and anxiety. Hence the number and importance of this Intelligence service.

So much for the internal administration. The demand for correct and adequate information is no less urgent in administering the external relations of the state. The international policy of a sovereign, whether it is to be a policy of war or of peace, of rupture or alliance, depends chiefly on accuracy of knowledge of the resources of other powers, of the views and principles and even the health and temper of different sovereigns and ministers, of the condition and temper of the peoples, of the intrigues at other courts, of the intrigues in the seraglio, as well as the ambition of heirs and the jealousies of rival statesmen and factions. Hence the Intelligence Department of the Foreign Office was equally strong. The Intelligence Service consisted of em- ployés, both avowed and unavowed. To the category of the avowed belong the ambassadors and envoys accredited to foreign states and the members of their missions. Of course as modern ambassadors in other parts of the world do, these ancient Hindu ambassadors depended upon secret emissaries in their pay for procuring information to send home as well as to enable them to act with effect in the interest of their own sovereign. The kings themselves employed such emissaries of their own in foreign countries, unknown to their own ambassadors. As upon other officers in that régime of universal distrust or stern prudence, there were secret watchers over the Ambassadors themselves—to note their proceedings, and conduct and bearing, for their masters' eye. And truth to tell, the profession of diplomacy is so demoralising that in those days kings acted from an instinct of self-preservation in employing independent sources of information regarding the doings of their accredited agents abroad. Besides those engaged in quietly spying over ambassadors, there were other secret agents to convey general information from abroad. Public reporters were checked by private, but as the secret emissaries themselves might deceive, there were several men, unknown to one another, employed in the same duty. Altogether the acquisition and checking of information was a great point in Hindu statesmanship. The King is to consult his Council on the despatch of Ambassadors and Intelligencers alike. Spies are of five sorts, which, according to the great Bengali commentator, are, namely, wily and agile youngsters, religious men who have broken their vows, poor cultivators, failed merchants, and men pretending to go through difficult and protracted penances. Every evening at sunset, after the evening prayers, the king is instructed to take his seat in a room in his inner apartments to listen to the reports of the Intelligence department.

And here is another proof that Manu was not Eutopiasing—not drawing upon his imagination for a picture of an ideal state, but laying down rules for guidance—in the fact that the rules are still followed. To this day, government by espionage is the characteristic of Indian states under native sway. To this day, intelligencers, open and secret, are, more or less, employed in them. To this day, the reigning Prince at sundown, after evening prayers, daily listens to the confidential reports brought from every direction.

I will not enter into the question when the Hindus first learnt the art of writing—that foundation of all progress. It has been debated with equal ability and learning between some of the greatest men. Max Müller, in his History of Ancient Sanskrit Literature, simply evinced genius by a suggestion which virtually amounts to a discovery. Goldstücker, in his memorable introduction to his facsimile édition de luxe of the grand manuscript at the India House of the Manava Kalpa Sutra, contradicted him. On the whole, and on some grounds of my own, I incline to Müller. As to Manu, the Code passed through so many different editions with more or less variations during different ages, that the question whether writing was in vogue at the time of the Rishi author, is immaterial and has no practical bearing. Whether the contemporaries of the Rishi could write or not, the Code has been law in Hindu states through long periods accustomed to reading and writing. At one place the Code seems to speak of verbal reports of informants. Be that as it may, since the press or journalism does not necessarily require writing any more than printing, I regard the emissaries and intelligencers of the ancient Hindu sovereigns the earliest journalists—the humble precursors of modern journalism—the rude forefathers of the colossus of the Press of our day.

THE DECADENCE OF LONDON SOCIETY.

The May number of the North American Review (Brentano's, Agar Street, Strand) contains a striking paper on "London Society" by Lady Jeune. This most competent authority writes forcibly and pessimistically on the subject. Society, she thinks, has become demoralised in the last few years. It has become too large, too noisy, too luxurious, too vulgar :—

"London has become the centre of the civilised world, and every one gravitates there; and as it is the fashion to know every one and go everywhere, the struggle to accomplish this feat inevitably expands society. People have not the leisure to see their friends in a quiet simple way as formerly, where real intellectual pleasure was always to be found in a certain number of small coteries which existed. Life is too full and too busy, and any one with any pretence to social smartness finds his engagement so numerous that his only way of seeing acquaintances is by inviting them to the house, where, packed together in a hot room much too small for half their number, a surging crowd of people comprised of the most opposite elements rub against each other, and try to find enjoyment in the fact that they are in a room with a large number of people more or less interesting and distinguished, none of whom they know by sight, and in whose existence they never interested themselves till it became the fashion to invite the lions and make them roar."

THE RUSH FOR PLEASURE.

The search for material pleasure, for show and ostentation, has corrupted society. We are under the rule of the rich; and refinement, simplicity, elegance, are disappearing:—

"Luxury, ease, comfort, are the watchwords of a large part of society in London, and they are undermining our society as surely and as certainly as they did that of ancient Rome. We have grown very rich, and we have a large leisured class whose only aim and occupation is amusement; and where such exists it must demoralise and relax all social restraints. Men and women who only live for pleasure, and who have no sense of the obligations of life and its duties, are becoming the parents of the young England around us, and to a serious degree the example of their lives is being impressed on the boys and girls who are their children, and who ought to carry on the traditions of which we in all time have been so proud."

SOCIETY SCANDALS.

The effect is worse for the girls than the boys. The latter are still exposed to the rough-and-tumble of English public schools, to the severe competition of public life and professions; and so they can resist, to some extent, the enervating influences of our drawing-rooms. But society in its tone and composition is created by women, and as women are virtuous or the reverse so is their entourage:—

"It would be idle to deny that recent scandals in London society which have been the talk of the world, and the existence of which surprised and shocked the moral sense of England, are only the outcome and logical result of the easy-going manner in which women of the highest rank and culture have allowed the old-fashioned rules and restraints which governed society to be relaxed. The decay of these restraints has been in many ways almost imperceptible; but the spirit of freedom and liberalism in every matter of life, whether social, political, or religious, has impregnated every condition of life and has gradually swept away the reserve and illusions of our forefathers."

THE EMANCIPATED MAIDEN.

All this tells badly on the unmarried maidens, who are as different from their grandmothers as light from darkness:—

"The young lady of to-day reads the newspapers, what books she chooses, and discusses with equal frankness the last scandal and the latest French mode; she rides in the park unattended by a groom, but always with a cavalier; she drives unattended in hansoms; she dances with partners who do not care to be presented to her mother, and she leaves her chaperon, not to dance, with the real enjoyment of girlhood, but to retire to some leafy corner of the ball-room where she can, to use the modern phrase, 'sit out,' instead of dancing. She spends her own money and dresses as she likes, and more often than not spends more than she can afford. Her stay in London is one round of pleasure from morning to night, varied during the autumn and winter by country visits which are only a repetition of London on a small scale."

THE CANKER OF LUXURY.

It is the growth and supremacy of wealth, to which we come back as the worst outcome, if not the source, of the mischief. Money rules in society; without it you cannot be "smart." The plutocrats have dethroned the aristocrats:—

"To their houses flock princes and princesses and the acknowledged leaders of what was once, and that not long ago, the most exclusive society in Europe. The atmosphere heavy with the perfume of flowers; the spoils of the Riviera; the bewitching sounds of the voice of the last fashionable prima donna, brought there at a fabulous price; the delicacies of the supper-room, and the banquet with its priceless wines—are the temptations which the crowd of magnificently dressed and beautiful women and blase men cannot resist, and such is the nightly spectacle offered to any observer of what we term the 'smart set' of London society."

Nor does Lady Jeune see much sign of improvement, though she admits that the mass of English people are still sound. But as for "society," it is quite likely to go from bad to worse:—

"The 'smart set' will follow its natural inclination, which has for its object the gratification of every pleasure and whim which are the fashions of the moment. The other, with certain ideals of duty, will, as now, endeavour to realise the responsibilities these impose, and, being composed of the strength and backbone of the country, will always be the power to adjust the baneful influence of its competitor. Fortunately for England, the mass—and the most important mass—of opinion will be on the side of the latter; but, unfortunately, owing to the glamour shed over the former by the rank and position of its leaders, it will always be the smarter, and therefore the fashionable, set."—The Overland Mail, May, 20, 1892.

"THE WORLD'S DESIRE."—THE NUDE IN ART.

At Bow-street Police-court on April 27, Mr. Vaughan was called upon to decide a case in which, on the information of Mr. Edward James Cox, Oxford-terrace, Islington, Mr. Rudolph Blind, artist, exhibitor, and proprietor of a painting entitled "The World's Desire," was called upon to show cause why the picture should not be held to be obscene and indecent and ordered to be seized and destroyed. The case was before Mr. Vaughan in a preliminary stage three weeks ago and adjourned till April 27, when great interest was manifested in the proceedings. Mr. Blind voluntarily produced the picture—a very large canvas containing a study of the nude, with cupids around and a crowd of allegorical figures below—and it was placed in the court room for examination by the magistrate and reference by the several witnesses.

Mr. Keith Frith, instructed by Mr. Beale, appeared in support of the information; and Mr. Rose-Innes, instructed by Mr. Hugh Innes, defended. A large number of artists and critics, several of whom were called as witnesses for the defence, occupied seats in the court.

Mr. Keith Frith, in opening the case, said the question was whether Mr. Blind, in painting an undoubtedly beautiful picture, had produced one which was obscene within the meaning of the 20th and 21st Victoria, cap. 83, section 1. Mr. Blind admitted that he was the artist, and that it was on exhibition at 391, Strand. Posters calling attention to it used the quotation "naked and not ashamed," and handbills which were distributed spoke of it as an unusually large and important picture, representing the adoration of the ideal female nude, and pronounced by all who had visited the gallery to be "a triumph of poetic inspiration and glowing colour." He did not think this was an exaggerated view, but the picture was not less but rather more obscene by reason of that, because it became more attractive and alluring to the youth of both sexes. He admitted that there had been a desire on the part of Mr. Rudolph Blind to meet the prosecution in the most frank and honourable way.

Mr. E. J. Cox was then called for the prosecution, and stated that, passing along the Strand, he had been induced to pay for admission to see the picture "The World's Desire." In consequence of what he noticed in regard to the picture he thought it to be his duty to take criminal proceedings.

Cross-examined by Mr. Rose-Innes, witness said he had never been out of England, and had no special knowledge of art. He hardly knew whether he had been to the Royal Academy, but had been to the National Gallery, where he had not seen anything to shock his sense of the moral. He was merely tempted by curiosity and the accident of being in the Strand to see "The World's Desire." It was the words on the placard, "Naked and not ashamed," that really tempted him. He saw no boys or girls at the exhibition, but he asked the attendant whether he allowed young people and females to see the painting, and the reply was "Oh, yes; why not?" Witness said he should not like his daughter to see it. The conclusion he came to was that the picture was indecent and obscene.

Mr. John Campbell de Morgan, engineer, Claverton-street corroborated. He said that he had acted as journalist in various parts of the world. He saw the painting, and afterwards put himself in communication with the prosecutor in consequence.

By the Bench: I saw that it was a highly suggestive picture to young minds.

Cross-examined: To a person of mature years and who understood art it was not perhaps suggestive.

Mr. Alfred Drew, 17, Ilbert-street, said he had taken photographs of the painting in March, 1891.

Mr. Rose-Innes said he should object at the proper time to the production of the photograph. The picture was there to speak for itself.

This closed the case for the prosecution.

Mr. Rose-Innes, while deeming it part of his duty to object to the framing of the information as not in accordance with the statute on which the prosecution was founded, said that his client, who was an artist and worthy of the encomiums passed upon him, did not want the case decided on that ground alone.

The Magistrate: Does the defendant propose to continue the exhibition?

Mr. Rose-Innes: Oh: certainly. We do not wish it to go forth to the world that we are unwilling to fight the case on its merits. Continuing, he said he proposed to call Royal Academicians, journalists, and critics skilled in art, who would say that in no sense could the painting be said to be an indecent picture, and the only evidence against the view he should bring out was that of Mr. Cox, whose sense of propriety was shocked, and an engineer, who confessed that the picture would not prudently affect the minds of people of mature years.

At this stage the painting was uncovered for inspection by Mr. Vaughan. The first witness called for the defence was Mr. Frederick Goodall, R. A., who said he had been acquainted with art all his life, and was familiar with pictures, not only in this country but in European galleries. He had visited nearly all the galleries abroad. Having had an opportunity of examining the picture of Mr. Rudolph Blind he was called for the special purpose of saying whether he felt that it was indecent, or in any other way offensive. He did not think it was any more than he should think so of many pictures in the National Gallery. It was meant, he supposed, to be a copy of the human figure.

The Magistrate: Supposing, instead of exhibiting a copy of the human form, you exhibited the woman herself, would you consider that indecent?

Witness: Of course, it makes a difference when you exhibit actual living flesh.

Can you point out to me any difference in the effect that would be produced in the minds of people in seeing this picture as compared with the sight of a naked human being?—I should say that the difference is this: In nature you never find a perfectly formed figure. You have to take many figures in order to produce a perfect form. That is one argument I should use. This picture is supposed to represent an ideal figure. I should look at all the finest works of the old masters as idealized figures, which you rarely find in nature. If you have a photograph from the nude the proportions are always wrong.

Here in this case a person goes and sees this picture by itself. He contemplates only one picture; does not that make a difference?—I think the mind is concentrated on a beautiful work of art.

Is this picture suggestive to a prurient imagination?—There are certain minds that would find offence in the most beautiful works of Greek sculpture and others would be offended by a portion of the human figure being shown.

Do you not make a difference between a picture that is coloured and a sculpture that is not coloured?—Perhaps so, but I am not thinking of this picture on its artistic merits—merely whether I consider it decent or indecent. It is a strange and original treatment of the subject.

Cross-examined: I am not a member of the Hanging Committee of the Academy this year.

Have you ever seen a painting of the nude with the shading of the figure as it is in this picture at the Royal Academy?—On one occasion I have.

Would you approve of this at the Royal Academy?—No, but you are asking me unfairly. It is very likely that the picture would have to pass the opinion of twelve artists, who would think it—

Mr. Rose-Innes: Indecent?

Witness (emphatically): No; they might think it was not up to the mark in standard of excellence, but nothing more.

But it is a beautifully painted picture, is it not?—I am not asked here to answer that.

With one exception, have you ever seen any picture of the nude on the walls of the Royal Academy?—Oh! yes. This year you will find a perfectly nude figure—two or three perfectly nude figures—and I have had them there myself. For some years I have been a painter of the nude. I mention Gerôme, who exhibited a picture as naked as that (pointing to the painting) on the walls of the Academy.

Mr. H. Stacey Marks, R. A., said he was also a member of the Royal Water Colour Society. He had had an opportunity of critically examining this picture, and as an artist of many years standing he had formed an opinion of it.

Speaking from an artistic point of view, do you consider it indecent?—I can't conceive of anybody looking at it in that light at all. Certainly not.

And I presume you speak from many years' experience of the artistic profession?—Yes, I have been more than forty years at it.

The picture behind you represents an allegorical subject?—Yes.

The Magistrate: What is the subject?

Mr. Rose-Innes: The subject of the painting is that of the ideal woman, unveiled by Love, and yet unconscious of her away, receiving the adoration of worshippers. (Examination continued.) As an artist can you say that there is anything of a suggestive or improper character in this picture?—Certainly not.

Cross-examined: Drapery is sometimes used in a study of the nude, but it is also usual to have no drapery whatever.

Have you ever seen a picture exhibited at the Royal Academy with the same characteristics of shadow as this?—Yes, I have. It is the same picture as that referred to by Mr. Goodall. It was hung on the line in the lecture-room, in, I believe, the year 1872. Since then there have been several nude figures.

The Magistrate: Is this picture calculated to refine or rather to corrupt the minds of people?—I cannot say that it is calculated to corrupt.

Would it refine?—I have very little faith in the refinement of the masses; but I can see no more harm in that picture than in the Venus de Medici or Gibson's tinted Venus.

The Magistrate: You are speaking of sculpture?

Witness: Or of Rubens's "Judgment of Paris."

Mr. Louis Falero, next called, said he was an artist and painter of the nude, who had exhibited at the Royal Academy, the Salvo at Paris, and other places. He had inspected and examined this picture called "The World's Desire," and would describe the subject matter as an ideal one. The picture was, in his opinion, painted in accordance with the conditions of the representation of the nude, and he did not find sufficient realism in the representation of the flesh to make it obscene. Witness was known as a painter of the nude, and had exhibited a great number of pictures of the nude.

How would you distinguish between that picture and one that was distinctly obscene?—In one that is obscene we have most wretched reality. We must do something more than represent flesh in a conventional manner, and must especially make the subject realistic. This picture is not realistic. This woman has never existed, in my mind. This does not represent any thing of the real actual life. What I would consider obscene and indecent is a naked woman which represents an undressed woman, and there can be made a distinction between a nude figure and an undressed figure. They are two very different things. This (the painting) is the artistic nude. I am Spanish, and in Madrid we have a number of the most beautiful works of Titian and Rubens in the nude.

Cross-examined: As a matter of fact, have you ever seen in a gallery in Europe any picture where the shading of the figure was so marked as that?—I beg your pardon; yes, In the Universal Exhibition of Paris in 1889.

In this country have you?—No; in this country there is still much to be learned. (Laughter.) But in the Universal Exhibition at Paris, where all nations were represented by their greatest masters, in the Belgian section, the directors of the National Gallery, Brussels, and President of the Academy of Brussels sent a study of a woman just coming out of the sea from bathing. The figure was painted absolutely as we paint our studies in our studios—that is to say, absolutely true. I have had lately, at the Institute of Oil Colours, a siren lying on the rocks, absolutely as nude as that (pointing to the painting), and the same picture I am sending to other exhibitions.

Mr. David Christie Murray, novelist and dramatist, said he had had an opportunity of examining this picture and was familiar with the painter's art.

Do you see anything improper about that picture?—I see a wilderness of dirt in the minds of the people who think it improper, but not a sign of the improper in the picture itself. Only a prurient mind could see anything obscene in it.

Mr. John McWhirter, A.R.A., said he had studied from the nude as a student, though now a landscape painter. Having seen the painting he would not describe it as an obscene picture.

Mr. Ford Madox Brown said he had studied art for nearly sixty years, and was a figure painter—that was to say he had studied from the nude. He had seen the picture "The World's Desire."

Would you describe it as a work of art?—I think so if I know the use of the English words.

And as an ideal picture?—Yes; I think so.

I presume you would not describe it as obscene?—No. I certainly should not.

By the Bench: The nude in art is not indecent?—It is the intention of the painter which decides it.

But how is the intention of the painter to operate on the minds of those who see the picture?—I cannot answer that, but I can understand that if the intention is indecent, then the picture is indecent. All that I know is that mere nudity is not indecent.

The Magistrate: The artist might not intend to be indecent, but the impression on the minds of others might be one of indecency?—I can't help that. If nudity is indecent, we should have to destroy two-thirds of the Greek statues in Europe and the greatest treasures of the world. (Applause, suppressed.)

Miss Lockhart Wilson, art critic; Mr. Malcolm C. Salaman, art critic; and Mr. Williamson, journalist, were also called for the defence.

Mr. Vaughan, in deciding the case, said: This summons was the result of an individual passing along the Strand, and seeing this picture exhibited; and, certainly, when I came to see it for the first time to-day, I was very much inclined to the opinion that, having regard to the purity of the morals of the young, it is a picture that ought not to be exhibited. That opinion, of course, is only an individual opinion, and it is one which is very liable to be counteracted and overborne by evidence, and evidence of the character which has been brought before me to-day. I certainly was of opinion that a picture of this description exhibited by itself did not bear the same relation to pictures of the same class exhibited among others in a public gallery. But the evidence that has been brought before me undoubtedly shows that in the estimation and judgment of men of great distinction in the arts this picture is not one that is exposed to the criticism that has been passed upon it. I certainly must say this, that whatever my own judgment may be, I am satisfied that if this case went before a jury with the wealth of evidence that has been tendered to-day, no jury would convict the defendant of exhibiting a picture obscene and indecent. That being so, it would be highly improper of me to dispose of this case, except in one manner, and that of dismissing the summons.

The decision of the Bench was received with applause.

Holloway's Ointment and Pills.—For bad legs, bad breasts, scorbutic and scrofulous sores this is a genuine specific. The grateful and earnest gratitude of thousands who have experienced its unrivalled power over these complaints, and who have been raised from prostrate helplessness and a condition loathsome to themselves and others, renders it quite unnecessary to enlarge in this place upon its extraordinary virtues. The parts affected should be bathed with lukewarm water, and when the pores are thereby opened the Ointment should be well rubbed in, at least twice a day. It is always advisable to take Holloway's pills in these disorders, as this much assists the Ointment's action. The pills check the fever, purify the blood, and eject all morbid matter engendered by these diseases.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

THE RETURNED WANDERER.

Are these the hills I trod of yore ?
Is this my own blue Tweed ?
You trees did I erewhile explore,
To take the brown hawk's breed ?
Can this green nook be that whereon
I sported when a boy,
And dreamt, as youth may dream alone,
That life was one long joy ?
Absent long, long I now have been
From this my native soil,
And much of danger have I seen,
And much have borne of toil ;
For school-boy games of mimic war,
That pleased when life was new,
The stern reality afar
Hath met and chill'd my view,
How alter'd all these scenes of youth
To my old fancy seem !
To view this spot is as, in truth,
To waken from a dream.
The change is not what man could bring—Few landmarks are removed,—
But yet, how different from the thing
That I so long have loved !
Of late I thought the day too brief,
To climb the Venlaw hill,
And pluck wild berries when the leaf
Had felt the Autumn's chill.
Hard-won my prize appear'd to be,
With that high peak my goal ;
Seen now, old Venlaw seems to me
A burrow for a mole !
Well love I still my native Tweed,
The theme and haunt of song,
And through full many a lovely mead,
I know she winds along ;
But I have view'd since my young years,
Broad prairies, giant streams,
And ah, how petty now appears
This river of my dreams !
Through the broad forests of the West
My foot hath found a path,
Where the huge pine uplifts a crest
That mocks the tempest's wrath.
And now, as Tweed hath dwindled down
To rank among the rills,
So shrunken seem those firs which crown
My own old olive hills.
A mighty change there seems ; but not
In nature may it be ;

Unalter'd is this well-loved spot—

The change is all in me,
And oft 'tis thus when man implies
Some turn for ill or good ;
The change lies still but in the eyes,
With which the chance is view'd.

Edinburgh, Sept. 1841.

T. S.

WEEKLYANA.

HER Majesty has approved of the appointment of Sir Dennis Fitzpatrick as Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab and its Dependencies.

THE Bengal Government very properly thus notice the death of Mr. C. F. Worsley :—

"The 7th June 1892.—For a second time within little more than a month, and for a third time within little more than a year, the Lieutenant-Governor has to deplore the death of one of the most experienced and valued officers of the Government. Mr. Charles Fortescue Worsley, who died at Bankipore on the 7th June 1892, of remittent fever, entered the Indian Civil Service in 1861, and for 25 years his name is associated with useful and indefatigable district work in the Province of Bihar. For nine years he was Magistrate and Collector of Muzaffarpur. As additional Commissioner at Patna, and as Commissioner of Orissa and Dacca, he enhanced the high reputation he had already won. A fortnight only has elapsed since he was appointed to be Commissioner of the Patna Division. His death is a heavy loss to the Administration, and will be grievously felt by his many friends, as well as by the people of the country, to whom he had endeared himself by his kindness and sympathy.

H. J. S. COTTON,
Offg. Chief Secy. to the Govt. of Bengal."

THE Lieutenant-Governor starts on his next short tour on the 30th June. Leaving Darjeeling on that day, Sir Charles Elliott arrives at Calcutta the next day, Friday, the 1st July at 10-40 hours (railway time) and leaves it on Sunday following at 22 hours. After visiting Raniganj, Bankura, Adra, Purulia, Chakardharpur, Chaibassa, Baidyanath, Madhupur, and Jamtara, he will be back to Calcutta on Thursday the 14th July arriving at Howrah at 5 45.

The departure from Darjeeling and departure from and arrival at Calcutta on the 1st, 3rd and 14th July will be private.

The Lieutenant-Governor will be accompanied throughout by Captain Currie, Private Secretary, and from Purulia to the end of the tour by the Secretary to Government, Revenue Department.

At Raniganj, the Governor will be met by the Commissioner of Burdwan and the Collector of Bankura ; by the Deputy Commissioner of Manbhum at the border of his district, by the Deputy Commissioner of Singhbhum at Chakardharpur ; and by the Deputy Commissioner of the Sonthal Parganas at Baidyanath.

THE confiscated estate of Porahat, hitherto under the administration of the Deputy Commissioner of the Singhbhum District, has, under orders of the Governor-General in Council, been transferred to the Lieutenant-Governorship of Bengal.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given, any other being unnecessary and likely to cause confusion.

MR. C. E. Buckland has chosen temporarily, for two months and eighteen days, commencing from 7th July, to keep himself away from the Secretariat. The Under-Secretary, Mr. W. Maude, will, in the interim, act the Secretary to the Bengal Government in the General, Revenue and Statistical Departments.

WHEN Mr. C. C. Stevens goes on leave, Mr. W. Kemble will act for him as Member of the Board of Revenue, and Mr. J. A. Hopkins, now acting temporarily as Commissioner of Patna, will be the Opium Agent, Behar.

MR. C. W. Bolton, Secretary to the Board of Revenue, goes on three months' leave from the 28th June, being relieved by Mr. J. A. Bourdillon, Mr. A. Earle acting for Mr. Bourdillon as Magistrate and Collector of Saran.

NAWAB Syud Ameer Hossein will be on leave during July. Khan Bahadur Abdul Jubbar, from the 24 Perganas, as on former occasions, will officiate as the second Stipendiary Magistrate of Calcutta.

MR. J. C. Veasey, Officiating Commissioner and Superintendent of the Tributary Mahals, Orissa, has obtained furlough for one year from the 17th July next.

PART IX of the Bengal Municipal Act (III of 1884) relating to the Construction and Cleansing of Latrines, has been sanctioned for certain wards of the Krishnaghur Municipality. Santipore equally needs this sanitary improvement. It is not enough, though, that the measure be introduced. An attempt ought to be made to have neat (not unsightly) and sanitary structures for the necessary purpose. It is time also that trenching grounds should be improved.

IN the defamation case against the Banganibasi, Mr. Justice Trevelyan has assessed the damages at Rs. 3,000. The claim was for one lac, the defendant Mahes Chunder Pal had offered Rs. 2,500 and the Counsel for the plaintiff Kadumbini had suggested Rs. 5,000. The order of the Court runs thus:—

"This was a suit for damages for a libel of a very gross character against a lady of some distinction in this city. The suit was withdrawn against every body on a complete and proper apology appearing. The defendant seems to have made an apology at an earlier date also. I am now asked to assess the damages, but I have had a good deal of difficulty about it. I am not, I think, doing wrong if I am guided by the many cases of this nature which have been tried in this Court for some time past. In the case of Piggott vs. Hastie the libel there was of the same description. The libel in that case was continued though here an apology has been made. In that matter Garth, C. J., and Wilson, J., who heard the case in appeal, gave Rs. 3,000 as damages. I have looked into this case, and I shall not go far wrong if I assess the damages at Rs. 3,000 with costs on scale No 2. The decree will recite the undertaking of counsel to publish the apology in the Banganibasi and in the Dumuk."

In the case referred to in the order, Mr. Justice Norris in the lower Court had fixed the damages at one anna, and the defendant had not been in jail for the same offence.

THERE was a prosecution for personation at the last Municipal Elections. The Deputy Magistrate Khan Bahadur Abdul Jubbar of Alipore who tried the case has recorded the following order:—

"This is a prosecution under Rule 20 A of the rules passed by the Government of Bengal under Section 19, Act II, (B.C) of 1888. It appears that on the 15th March last there was an election of Commissioners for the town of Calcutta, and Mr. Lloyd presided as polling officer of Ward No. 21. There were five candidates for this ward; and when voter No. 185 came before the polling officer to give his vote for one of the candidates, Sheik Bechoo, Mr. Collins, and another candidate objected to the voter on the ground that the man who appeared to vote was not the registered voter under the number quoted above, viz., Meer Hossein. Mr. Lloyd noted on the back of the voting form the objection as well as the identification of the voter by Sheik Bechoo and Baboo Preonath Mullick, and allowed the voting. On the 6th day, after the vote had been recorded, that is to say on the 21st March, the Chairman made an enquiry into the objection, and passed an order for the prosecution of the accused Nubby. The charge against him is that he signed and gave to the polling officer the name of the registered voter No. 185. The question is whether the accused appeared at the polling station and gave his name as Meer Hossein. The defence is that Meer Hossein himself was present at the polling station, and gave his vote for Sheik Bechoo. The evidence on this point is conflicting. On one side it is said that the accused personated Meer Hossein, while on the other the witnesses stated that Meer Hossein himself and not the accused was the actual voter on the occasion. I have carefully considered the evidence adduced both on behalf of the prosecution and for the defence, and must confess that my task was somewhat difficult. On one side there was Mr. Collins' assertion that the accused had appeared before the polling officer and given his name as Meer Hossein; while on the other hand Baboo Preonath Mullick flatly denied that the accused had voted, and both the gentlemen are deserving of credence. I had not the same difficulty in sifting the testimony of the other witnesses in the case, whether for the prosecution or for the defence; but it is not easy to say that either Mr. Collins has given false evidence or that Baboo Preonath Mullick has wilfully misrepresented a fact. Taking, however, the circumstances of the case into consideration, I come to the conclusion that in this case the testimony of Mr. Collins is deserving of more weight. There is no reason whatever that he should perjure himself to get into trouble a poor man like the accused, nor is it possible that he should join in a conspiracy to injure Sheik Bechoo or Baboo Preonath Mullick. If the prosecution had been the result of any such conspiracy, it would have been unlikely that a man, who is said to be related to Meer Hossein, who was the last person to help the prosecution, would be the one to be made the cat's paw. The offence was punishable with fine only, and they would, if their object was simply to injure others and not the accused, have charged a man who would assist the prosecution by a defence that would implicate them. Baboo Preonath Mullick was not personally interested in the election of the candidates for Ward No. 21, and my impression is that he was induced to believe that the party who voted in the place of Meer Hossein was Meer Hossein himself. If actually Meer Hossein and not the accused had voted, the former would have most naturally been present at the investigation undertaken by the Chairman only six days after the election. It seems to me that Meer Hossein's advisers kept him out of the way in order to make the identification of the accused most difficult at a distant time. The summons had been taken out on the 5th March, but the accused did not surrender before the 30th May. If the accused had been innocent of the charge, his brother Meer Hossein would send notice to him of the summons, and at once try to get him back from his country. Why should full ten weeks be allowed to elapse between the institution of the suit and the accused's surrender. The object of his friends was to make his identification more difficult by lapse of time. The sentence of the Court is that the accused be fined Rs. 50, or in default one month's simple imprisonment."

An application was made for processes against Baboo Preonath Mullick and Sheik Bechoo for abetment which the Deputy Sahib refused.

THE Lieutenant-Governor is unable to accede to the application of the Calcutta Charities for relief from municipal taxation. Mr. Risley, Secretary to the Bengal Government, writes, under date Darjeeling the 6th June, to the Secretary to the District Charitable Society:—

"Sir, I am directed to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, No. 311, dated 22nd May, 1891, forwarding a memorial, dated 28th April, 1891, from the Managers of certain Charitable Institutions in Calcutta, in which they ask that the Calcutta Municipal Consolidation Act (II, of 1888) be amended so as to relieve such Institutions, wholly or partially, from the rates which they now pay under the Act.

2. In reply, I am directed to say that Sir Charles Elliott, who has consulted the Chairman of the Calcutta Corporation in the matter, sympathizes with the object of the memorialists, but regrets that the law, as it now stands, offers no means of complying with their request. It is not open to the Commissioners to take action under section 122 in the manner suggested in the memorial, nor do the other sections of the Act quoted by you appear to be applicable. As regards the proposal to amend the law so as to exempt public charities from the payment of rates, I am directed to say that the Lieutenant-Governor is unwilling to adopt such a course for the sake of a single provision, and would prefer to postpone the consideration of this proposal until a more general revision of the Act becomes necessary."

WE take the following from the Effective Advertiser:—

"The late James T. Fields possessed a remarkable memory. Several years ago a gentleman, thinking to puzzle him at a dinner party, informed the guests prior to Mr. Fields' arrival that he had himself written some poetry, and intended to submit it to Mr. Fields as Southey's, and inquire in which of his poems the lines occurred. At the proper moment, therefore, after the guests were seated, he began—'Friend Fields, I have been a good deal exercised of late trying to find in Southey's poems his well-known lines running thus—can you tell us about what time he wrote them?' 'I do not remember to have met with them before,' replied Mr. Fields, 'and there are only two periods in Southey's life when such lines could possibly have been written by him.' When were those?' gleefully asked the questioner. 'Somewhere,' said Mr. Fields, 'about that early period of his existence when he was having the measles and cutting his first teeth; or near the close of his life, when his brain had softened and he had fallen into idiocy. The versification belongs to the measles period, but the expression evidently betrays the idiotic one.'"

MR. Sala lately wrote:—

"There ought to be a weekly paper called the Ignoramus—or perhaps the Dunce would be as appropriate a title—and for a consideration I would very willingly edit it. One half of the periodical should be devoted to frank confession of entire ignorance on all kinds of subjects from all kinds of people. In the remaining section, outside correspondents who were not ignoramuses might crack the nuts propounded by the dunces in the preceding number of the paper. For example, I read in the London Gazette that the Queen has been graciously pleased to appoint Tamiz-ud-din Ahmed to be Her Majesty's Consul at Hodeida and Camazan. I own, without the slightest shame, that I have not the remotest idea as to where Hodeida and Camazan may be. Again, the other day, in the Commons, Sir John Gorst, in answer to Mr. Lawrence, said that an arrangement had been made with the Jebus to abstain from levying tolls on travellers in consideration of a yearly present of £500; but that the Jebus had broken their agreement, and that an officer sent to remonstrate with them had not been allowed to proceed to Jebu Ode. Who are the Jebus; and where is Jebu Ode? I don't know, and I dare say that many of my readers are in the same predicament with myself; but somebody must know, and were there such a journal as the Ignoramus, that somebody would come forward and enlighten our darkened minds."

The long established weekly named Notes and Queries, in part and incidentally, fulfils the functions of the journal facetiously proposed by Mr. Sala. In general, however, Notes and Queries has other and more important objects in view. With respect to Mr. Sala's proposition, seriously speaking it may be doubted whether people would be willing to confess their ignorance like him. Had men been ready to do so, there would not have been so much ignorance, even in the absence of confession in the Press. That ignorance is vast and terrible, so little is accurately known in the commonest matters by even the best informed! The blundering of our public teachers, whether in Parliament or in the Press, is frightful. Some thirty years ago, the Saturday Review made habitual sport of the lapses in this respect of the Times, and latterly the pretension of the Daily Telegraph was exposed in the same style of felicitous fun. In Indian affairs, the Spectator sometimes set leading English politicians and publicists right! Just now the office of corrector seems to have devolved upon the Overland Mail, which is performing its part most satisfactorily.

NOTES & LEADERETTES

with OUR OWN NEWS.

EAST Africa is being improved—of its aborigines. It is reported that the German Commander in the Kilimanjaro District has ordered the British missionaries to leave Moshi territory, as he intends to exterminate the tribe there. A very Christian resolve certainly! The threat of extermination has, however, drawn a protest from Mr. Gerald Portal on behalf of the British Government.

THE Sanitary Conference at Venice has decided, that all vessels passing the Suez Canal are to be subjected to medical inspection. Infected vessels having no doctor on board or disinfecter will be stopped at Moses' Spring and the patients landed and housed in a special hospital. Other infected vessels must undergo quarantine from five to seven days.

ALL the European Powers except Russia have accepted America's invitation to the Monetary Conference.

THE Austrian Reichsrath or rather its Committee has accepted the gold standard clause in the Currency Bill.

NEGOTIATIONS for a reconciliation between the Emperor William and Prince Bismarck have not proved successful. The ex-Chancellor was to have started yesterday for Vienna to attend his son Herbert's marriage. A triumphal progress is being organized for Prince Bismarck all along the route from Berlin to Vienna.

THEY are preparing for the General elections in England, though the date is not yet announced. The Parnellites have issued a manifesto in which they declare war to the knife with the MacCarthyites with whom they had sought peace but who had declined the advance. Mr. Balfour has given the programme of his party—reform in registration, revision of ground rents, the freest municipal government for London, Future legislation, according to him, will turn mainly on social questions. He is prepared to give Scotland the control of private bills necessary for the reform of the poor law system, and to extend land-ownership.

OWING to opposition on both sides of the House of Commons, the Indian Officers' Bill has been withdrawn.

THE New Oriental Bank has gone into liquidation with Mr. Welton as provisional liquidator. It is hoped that the Bank would be able to pay a dividend of fifteen shillings. At the previous suspension, they paid 20 shillings, in instalments.

THE Gackwar of Baroda has arrived in London.

LORD Roberts has no nonsense about him. And he has generally the courage of his convictions. Such a man ought to be above the vulgar pertinacity and persistence in error of what in India we may call Bazaar heroes. We are, therefore, glad to notice that the great Captain—one of the greatest of contemporary warriors—has just exhibited a rare openness of mind, in regard to one of his recommendations to the Home Authorities. In order to guard against frauds in enlistment, Lord Roberts lately proposed that every officer and man should, on entering the army, be tattooed. The Commander-in-Chief subsequently modified his opinion and thought that vaccination with lymph with some colouring matter would serve the same purpose. It is time, we should think, that tattooing should be abolished as barbarous. The second suggestion admits the undesirability of the first, but, we are afraid, does not improve the situation. The introduction of a colouring matter into the human system is assuredly not the same as its deposit in a non-human body. To say the least, it is unnatural. Who knows that in many cases it may not lead to unhappy physiological effects? To prevent a human fraud, there can be no justification for spoiling God's work and plan. Above all, why should men be marked like beasts that perish? It is against the dignity of man. We, for our part, protest against our rulers and defenders being tattooed like savages.

It seems difficult for the race of the Picts to forswear tattooing themselves. Many Britons, Southerners as well as Northerners, voluntarily mark themselves for the beauty or the fun of the thing. Our Royal Family are unfortunately partial to the practice. Let not our Commander-in-Chief cause a Revival of the old barbarism!

THE Bengal Government has recorded a resolution on the final report of the survey and settlement of the Dubalhati Estate in the district of Rajshahi. The survey by plane table was commenced in March 1888 and concluded in March 1890. The settlement proceedings lasted from November 1889 to August 1891. The new rent-rolls were finally published in 1890-91, taking effect from April 1892. The survey embraced 8 estates comprising 211 villages. The area surveyed and settled was 37,758 acres contained in 195 villages, and an area of 2,493 acres cadastrally surveyed at the request of the Raja, but found not to belong to him; a further area of 1,543 acres was demarcated, but subsequently excluded from survey on the joint application of the Raja and his tenants as they had made up their differences.

The cost of the survey and settlement is given at Rs. 37,449-3-4 or 13 annas 8 pie per acre for 37,758 acres surveyed and settled. It is explained that the cost of survey alone is less than 4 annas per acre, the excess being "due to extreme confusion into which rights and accounts had fallen, and the large number of disputes which had to be settled." The settlement officer decided 4,448 disputes in 3 years. The satisfaction to Government is that "Had these disputes been separately filed in a Munsif's Court, they would have taken longer, and have cost the litigants a larger sum."

Of the Rs. 37,449-3-4, the cost incurred, Rs. 18,921-12-8 is payable by the Raja and Rs. 13,501-12-8 by the rayyets and tenure-holders. The result of the settlement, says the Resolution, is an increase of rent from Rs. 68,127-14 to Rs. 86,295-1-2½ or 26·8 per cent. The resolution continues, "Thus a single year's increase in the rental, Rs. 18,167, has almost recouped to the estate the whole cost it has incurred in the settlement operations." Nor is that all. "This increase is entirely due to more accurate measurement, there having been no increase in the rates. The average rent per acre is now Rs. 3-6-8, which is lower than the average rate found to exist in Muzaffarpur, Rs. 3-12. The Raj and the rayyets have therefore every reason to be satisfied." At the same time, however, "the Collector is requested to watch carefully the progress of affairs, and to take such measures as may occur to him to prevent any wrong-doing on the part of the Raj which may lead to new difficulties."

The origin of the survey is thus given in the Resolution :—

"The necessity for undertaking these operations arose from protracted disputes between the late Raja of Dubalhati and his tenants, which were likely to culminate in serious disturbances. They were in conflict on almost every question affecting the relation of landlord and tenant, and their respective rights in the land. They could not agree as to the rates of rent, or the standard of measurement, or the extent of occupancy rights. The rayyets were aggrieved by the levy of illegal cesses, and by the interference of the Raja with their marriage and social arrangements: the zamindari accounts were in a condition of chaos, and, in the uncertainty which existed as to legal rights, both sides were prepared to appeal to force. Fortunately, wiser counsels prevailed, and it was determined to resort to the provisions of the Tenancy Act. The preparation of an accurate record was, however, under these conditions, a work of extreme difficulty. In many cases a rayyet was entered as paying rent for land which he did not hold, while he was holding land for which he paid no rent. There was no record in the Raja's office of mutations of holdings or sub-divisions of tenures, and, as a consequence, in many villages, the names of rayyets and the amount of their rents did not correspond with the entries in the khataus. The rents shown in some of the road cess returns of 1872 of which copies were in existence were much less than those shown in the returns of 1880. The rayyets relied upon the former, and the zamindar upon the latter. As a consequence, it was necessary to ascertain not only the existing rents, but by whom they were to be paid; and even after the rates had been determined by compromise, it was still a difficult task to prepare the jamabandi."

Who, after all this, can question the merits of the survey? Its beauties are obvious—its blessings are manifold. Not only are the disputes between the landlord and the tenants ended, but it has added more than 26 per cent. to the rental of the estate. Here is an opportunity for those dullards, the Behar landlords, if they will only see it.

OUR old acquaintance H. A. D. has—come to the front again. We refer, of course, to the irrepressible oracle of universal law of the Bengal Civil Service who is now Magistrate of Mymensing. We all know that when Greek meet Greek then comes the tug of war. Such was the case in the circumstances under notice. Such a meeting of Greeks took place early in the year with the natural result—an encounter between a brace of Phillips, or, strictly speaking, a Phillips and a Phillip. Mr. H. A. D. Phillips has scarcely the reputation of being sober as a judge or judicial officer, and he has stumbled from the bench—on a Philip drunk of the Bengali species.

IN the course of his official tour in January last, Mr. Phillips one day sent on his servants, a cook and a clerk, and baggage before him to wait at a certain village, where he would come the following morning. While the men were at halt at the village market-place, a neighbouring petty landlord (Talukdar) who was one of the owners of the bazaar, by name Sarat Chunder Roy, in a jolly state came on a lark on the scene, and went in a mild Bengali way running amok. He began with asking the carter, probably with the offensive assumption of a rural magnate and, being apparently answered with the insolence of a little man carrying magisterial chattels and bearing the reflex importance of the head of the District, struck the man. He was reminded of the Power which the carter represented, but the Babu was in his imperial mood and answered the information with abusing the carter's employer— even the great magistrate Saheb Bahadoor himself. And then he proceeded to show his temper upon others, assaulting people at random. Mr. Phillips coming next day heard all this, with due exaggerations it may be presumed, and to crown the trial of his temper, found one of his boxes missing. He immediately opened a judicial inquiry, taking the depositions of his carter, his cook and his clerk. None of them, however, alleged any theft. Nevertheless, he issued a warrant for arresting the rowdy Talukdar and another for searching his house for the missing box. No longer jolly, our Talukdar was non est. Other evidence showed that the box in question had apparently dropped on the way before the cart reached the village of halt, four miles from it, and had been picked up by the local Chowkidar who gave information of it. Mr. Phillips having already issued his search warrant against the Taluqdar for the same box, now ordered the poor Chowkidar to be sent up as a thief. He freely used both barrels of his magisterial gun. His search warrant against the ill-fated Sarat Chunder Roy was executed two days after the recovery of the missing property. All the rigours of British Indian law were employed against the poor terrified man who hid himself for fear of meeting the British lion. He was denounced by proclamation and all his effects were attached. At length, however, a change came over the spirit of the Magistrate's dream. He saw the impropriety of being judge in his own cause, but without realising his proper course he made the case over to his Assistant, ignoring the jurisdiction of the officer in charge of the subdivision wherein the occurrence took place, and actually went the length of instructing his Assistant in his duty with respect to the case. The Assistant Magistrate said that the whole was a mere drunken freak without any trace of worse criminality, and let Sarat Chunder Roy off with a fine, but doubtless in deference to the honour and zid of his superior officer, assessed the fine at the enormous sum of Rs. 120.

A MORNING contemporary has, we see, been duped into publishing, under pretence of a news-letter, an impudent and stupid puff of a noted Brahmo Zemindar who, we should suspect, is not above the petty vanities of the secular world. The disguise adopted by the writer, to blind the public to his object and the real character of his communication, is flimsy to the last degree. After a slight allusion to the weather and a bare mention of the visit of an official of no great consequence, this not over scrupulous Special unblushingly plunges in medias res into a lamentation at the absence of his patron's name in the Birthday Honours List. Then, the mouth speaking out of the fulness of the heart, burdened with obligations in the past or looking out for favours in the future, he proceeds to recount the claims of his neglected hero. Talk of digression? Why this is the height of irrelevancy! For there is no excuse for a Khoolna "Our Own Correspondent" inflicting on the public a whole "news-letter" to the glorification of Raja Mohima Ranjan Roy, of Kakina, in the Rungpur District. Not even the pretence, we believe, of the possession of a single interest of any kind, in Khoolna or of a single acre on the banks of the Roopnaram by this Northern Zemindar. Of course, it goes without saying that the stinking grease of flattery is laid on with no sparing hand. Any self-respecting gentleman who might chance to be made the victim of such belauding, would, at the outset, cry Bas! For the operation is commenced with a shower of epithets. This esteemed nobleman, we are told,—no—we beg "Our Own Correspondent's" pardon—"this deservedly esteemed nobleman has never lost sight of the Gallic maxim,—'noblesse of bligé.'"

SUCH is the risk of venturing on foreign tongues in writing for the Press in India. Devils are devils all over the world, but the imps of the printing Pandemonium in this country, with their little English and absolutely no French and no Latin, prove, in spite of the best intentions, a trifle more diabolical than their brethren in other lands. We wonder what our friend Mahima will make of the Gallic maxim—"noblesse of bligé." We don't know whether the old reading of it would be thoroughly understood at the Kakina Durbar, with its expert Doctors and the most learned Doctor of all, the Dewan Govind Mohun Roy. Nor is a deficiency in French scholarship a reproach to any native Court. We fear this Correspondent's flight a mistake, with the attending risk of the object of all this scholarly attention suspecting a covert satire, if not a horrible abuse, in an unknown tongue.

A CLEARER and graver mistake is the writer's going into details. So long as he kept to vague generalities he was safe, but in an evil hour he descended to particulars. In proof of the greatness of his hero he mentions that he last year gave certain donations to the Calcutta Charities. He talks as if the metropolis must still be ringing with the noise of those benefactions. We hear no noise and remember no benefactions. And none of our friends can tell us of any. Altogether, the writer succeeds in making as poor a case as ever was made in such a case. We dare say, friend Mahima gives away some of his money in charity and to public works, like many another Zemindar. The Collector would scarcely allow him peace if he did not spend part of his wealth usefully. Yes, the Collector! If he wants more titles, let him apply to the Collector, and tell us what he says. We will then help him to the best of our advice. This sort of puffing in the papers makes a fool of a respectable man, and a notorious ass of a fool.

THE higher judicial appointments, under the Government of India, are understood to be, in some sense, in the gift of the Honorable the Law Member of Council. The Resolution of the Government of India on the Public Service Commission, also gives Sir Alexander Miller an additional patronage. It is, therefore, natural that men who are in the running for higher judicial appointments should endeavour to keep well with such a high functionary. To be regarded by him as sensible at least in any matter, whether law or lunacy, is one point gained. If you have not the pretensions of a lawyer—either of the sound or of the unsound kind—you may still be a legislator or a political factor or any thing else, to entitle you to smuggle yourself into his good graces. A delightful road to higher judicial appointments!

The speech of the Hon'ble J. L. Mackay at the inauguration of the Indian Currency Association, Simla, which the Englishman has had the enterprise to have telegraphed entire, is an important manifesto. Mr. Mackay is known for a man of ability. He rose with the occasion and spoke well, and with the authority and weight that belongs to a successful and leading merchant, having taken the precaution of previously tendering his resignation as President of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce. One part of Mr. Mackay's utterance, whatever may be thought of it in England, cannot fail to excite derision in India, specially at Calcutta. Speaking of the support which the scheme of the Indian Currency Association was likely to receive, Mr. Mackay said that he had "telegrams and letters volunteering support." He could not, however, "refrain from mentioning that the Central National Mahomedan Association, through Nawab Syed Ameer Hossain and * * * are those who warmly approve of the movement." Now, in the name of goodness, what has the Central National Mahomedan Association or any other Mahomedan society to do with the business? Finance is not the Mahomedan's strong point. During all the six hundred years of Mahomedan rule in India, the Chancellors of the Exchequer were invariably Hindus. Such is the rule to this day in the Native States. In private life, the Mahomedan noble or merchant depends upon his Hindu Dewan. And Currency is one of the most abstruse subjects in Finance. Is there any Mahomedan who understands it? Does the President or the Vice-President or the Secretary, or any other officer of this, that, or any other Mahomedan Association understand its alphabet? On public grounds, we condemn the practice of public bodies, or such of those which are called so either by courtesy or reputation, trafficking in this way for purposes about which there can be no mistake. What conceivable interest the Central National Mahomedan Association has to support a scheme by which "the present silver currency shall have a gold standard of value, so that when we meet our old friend the rupee, be it in China, America, England or India, we know exactly what it is worth in gold," we hopelessly fail to understand. This time the Central National Mahomedan Association, ostensibly representing the sixty millions of Indian Mussulmans, has dropped its sixty tails and the princely head too. But its Secretary, the new Nawab, could not help all the same, "volunteering" support. To be sure, the temptation was too great for him to lose this opportunity. We object to the British public and Parliament being told that the movement of the Indian Currency Association has the sympathy and support of the sixty millions or even sixty of Indian Mussulmans. Whoever may be benefited by this new movement, it is by no means calculated to promote the interests the Indian Mussulmans are supposed to have in the European, American or Australian market.

HAVING apparently exhausted itself in a long course of exaggeration, in the constant publication of sensational accounts of oppressions, official or other, the Indian Mirror has taken to absolute manufacture of grievances. Witness the following in its issue of the 11th instant:—

"The New Star says:—'In broad day light, at 1 P.M., yesterday, the 5th instant, Babu Nanda Lal Sen, a Clerk of the Bank of Bengal, while on his way to Thunthunia, was confronted, just where Sunker Ghose's Lane meets Cornwallis Street, by four or five budmashes, who demanded the surrender of his purse, when one of them at the same time inflicted an effective blow on his face which stunned and felled him on the ground. Whereupon they rifled his person; and although a small crowd had gathered together, in the meanwhile, they effected their escape without any opposition whatever. Babu Nanda Lal soon however recovered the power of senses, stood up, and observed the miscreants escaping. He says he will be able to recognise, at least one of the budmashes, if he could be produced before him. Another day light robbery took place on the same spot a few months ago in which Babu Gopi Nath Sen, a respectable employé of the office of the Clerk of the Crown was the victim. He too had been taken by surprise by a severe blow inflicted on his face, and his person was rifled. And it is scarcely now four months since a terrible assault was committed almost on the same spot by a gunda upon the person of a young man who had been remonstrating with a Police Constable as the latter had been dragging away an innocent man on the false plea of drunkenness. These instances of lawlessness, to which we would draw the attention of Mr Lambert, go to show that the Calcutta Police is not worth the enormous expenditure of six and a half lacs of Rupees spent annually for its maintenance."

The above has a questionable, almost apocryphal, look. "The New Star says." But what, and where, is the New Star? From the text professedly quoted, it would seem to be a Calcutta publication, but it is unknown to fame, unless among that particular part of the community which knows the Royal Society of India, and is edified by Dey literature and is charmed by the eloquence of Fakir Rajendra Nath Dutt. We never saw the "star," nor heard of it. Inquiry, however, has discovered it shedding its feeble light from the house of our old friend Baboo Umesh Chunder Mitter, in Shamponker. But the New Star knows nothing of the matter. The paragraph attributed by the Indian Mirror to the New Star did not appear in any of the few issues it has published to this day. Nor does the New Star know anything of the matters related in the paragraph.

If "The New Star" is a misprint of the Mirror's, the source of the paragraph has not yet been ascertained.

Supposing the news dropped from the sky—from a veritable New Star, or old, in the firmament—inquiry was directed to the scene of the occurrence related. For, the account is circumstantial and the circumstances are serious. One of the principal public thoroughfares of the metropolis, in a quiet neighbourhood, is represented as given up to highwaymen and ruffians. The inhabitants of the quarter are not, however, aware of any such change having overtaken their neighbourhood. It is as peaceful as ever. No attacks and no robberies have been known there. Finally, to probe the matter through, Nanda Lal Sen himself was found and he had not encountered any highwaymen or budmashes or roughs of any kind. His worst experience in that quarter was that one day as he was going with his son to buy his boy a pair of slippers, he saw a jolly neighbour in the street terrifying the poor Bengali passers-by pretending to be more drunk than he was. Being in a hurry and having his boy with him, he, Sen, tried to avoid him, and was buttonholed, but he easily extricated himself from the man's grip. That was all. There was no blow in the face or any other part, and no stunning nor prostration, any more than robbing or demand of purse. There was not more than one man who made himself rather disagreeable. The idea of robbery is absurd. The man is a well-known neighbour and, beyond taking a drop too much, is thoroughly respectable. Nobody in the neighbourhood would think of complaining against him to the Police.

Such is the premise on which the sage conclusion is drawn that the Police is no good. And such is the pass to which the Press has come!

THE TANTALUS IN THE BRITISH SERVICE:

OR

THE MYSTERIES OF NATIVE EMPLOYMENT.

MR. Curzon's recent speech in Parliament regarding the employment of natives in the higher appointments hitherto held by the covenanted civilians, has once more revived the hopes of the members of the provincial service. But it is difficult to say now how far these hopes are well founded and reasonable, and, indeed, we are not sure whether one particle of these will be realised by the present generation of the unfortunate service. The ablest of the officers grovelling in the subordinate ranks have been repeatedly tantalised. Several times since Lord Lytton's creation of the Statutory Civil Service, have they been led to form legitimate expectations of an immediate betterment of their positions and prospects, but all such expectations—the most modest of them—have vanished like vapours, and they have been bitterly disappointed. Not unpleasantly to them, occasionally, have their names appeared in the newspapers as the would-be candidates for high appointments or the favoured nominees on whom they would be conferred, but even this sort of business-like preliminary has served no purpose, except to ensure their being ridiculed and worried. Men who were fully qualified for such promotions as reward for good work, and who naturally cherished such hopes, have retired from the service with shattered health and broken hearts, and the few that are still left among the seniors have lost nearly all energy and ambition, and are only counting the days of their retirement. To three or four have sops of sorts been given, and they cannot but be thankfully satisfied on the maxim of "something is better than nothing."

The principle on which the Statutory Service was created and the qualifications which were prescribed and required for it, was never acted upon nor observed, and the deplorable inconsistency which marked the action of Government in this matter is marvellous. It is needless to dwell upon this point in detail, as they have more than once in so many words officially confessed their failure of judgment and forethought in this business, which was described as the failure of that service. Their selection of the first batch showed clearly what they were about, as one of their nominees could not pass the prescribed examination and was thrown out, and the other passed the examination after much difficulty in five years and was allowed so many chances in order to avoid another scandal. At the Public Service Commission the Statutory Service was in one voice condemned, and Government were obliged to admit that there were men in the Subordinate Executive Service who as good and capable officers were superior to many statutory men, and many who were equal to them in talent and ability. They could not deny this fact, because this result was obtained by the examination of the actual work of the men belonging to both the services, employed side by side under European officers of distinction and experience whose verdict could not be questioned. Although in name the Statutory Service is now dead and gone, among its present members also, only those few men seem to have made some mark who were at one time Deputy Magistrates, who entered it by different doors adopted at different times for its entrance. Among the rest there are men whose abilities and talents have been declared in many instances inferior to those of good Sub-Deputies.

It was said that Government wanted the double qualification of talent and family prestige. These were both available in the Subordinate Executive Service at that time with the addition of tried merit, ripe experience, and proved ability, but not a single appointment was given to the Mahomedan members of that service. Among them were men like Abdool Luteef Bahadar, Nagab Amir, Khan Bahadur Abdul Jabbar. After these, there were such smart and approved officers as Moulvi Syed Mahamad and Moulvi Abu Khair Mahamad Abdus Subhan and others, more or less qualified. Later on, also the same injustice was repeated with more severity and the Mahomedan members of the same service were openly insulted and indirectly discouraged, on the same wrong and unsustainable plea of individual talent and family prestige. Men were indeed later on nominated (no Mahomedan having become successful in competition for the special years) from that community. Their two prominent qualifications were perhaps that they were Barristers-at-law (having had the good fortune of going to England,) and had probably held officiating appointments as Munsifs. Except these two, the general public were not aware of any other qualifications of this class of men who were forced into the Statutory Service. These were mere haphazard selections, and the appointments, if we are not incorrectly informed, came upon the recipients themselves as a surprise. We avoid personalities, but if we ask the Government about the family prestige of some of them and their attainments as scholars, they must blush, and we have authority to say that their abilities and work cannot be compared even to those of an average Deputy Magistrate of their standing. These are plain truths and therefore must be unpalatable to many, but we cannot help stating them in the interests of justice and fairplay. There are men in the Subordinate Executive and Judicial Services who could successfully fill the posts of ministers in most dangerous and troublesome native states, who could prove able and efficient Divisional Commissioners under the Nizam, who could supply the best Mahomedan Chief Justice under the Hyderabad Government, who could make successful and popular stipendiary Presidency Magistrates in British India, and Calcutta Collectors. Notwithstanding all these proofs of merit and ability, they are not trusted by their Government, who prefer to place boys, hardly out of their teens, who may well sit at their feet and learn their work for years, over the heads of these distinguished seniors, and thus discourage, not to say insult, a set of most faithful and valuable officers.

Now that the subject has again come to the fore, we confess that we are not without our fear that, when the hour comes for the distribution of good things, the old fancy of Government for patronising such boy and briefless Barristers who are comparatively better known in the country by themselves than by their fathers and grandfathers, on the false plea of aristocratic connection, family prestige and personal talent, may not revive, and the members of the Provincial Service may not again be deprived of their just right. It is very easy for Government, if inclined to injustice of this sort, to find dozens of pleas, and there are people who would readily supply them with plausible weapons to crush the doomed service.

For this very service there are many more openings in the Panjab and the North-Western Provinces. Above all, the members of it, under those British Administrations, have a vast field for their talents in the Native States to which their services are largely lent on liberal scales of pay. In those Native Governments many of the ablest administrators, ministers, and diplomatists, who left in their old service in British India, would surely have died as obscure deputies, tahsildars, and munsifs, and no one would have ever heard of them. These opportunities are very few and far between for the members of the Provincial service in Bengal. Sir Stuart Bayley, while Resident at Hyderabad, took over some of them there, and they rose very high in the service of the Nizam. The distinguished Belgrami brothers whose names have been heard even in Europe, in fact belong to a Bengal Subordinate Executive Service family. It is perhaps not generally known that the accomplished and respected father of the two gentlemen was a distinguished member of that service, who after retiring from Government service was employed under the Nizam in some good post and died at Hyderabad.

If with all these disadvantages, their claims are superseded and their merits ignored when the time for their promotion to the Imperial service comes, the members of the uncovenanted service are truly to be pitied. It is said that the S. E. S. is nowadays particularly in the bad books of our present Lieutenant-Governor, and therefore much apprehension is felt regarding the distribution of the prizes by him to the deserving members of that body. The Judicial Service has not that difficulty, because the Government are bound to act on the recommendation of the High Court. We hope the interests of the S. E. S. will not suffer in the hands of Sir Charles Elliott and that when the time comes he will do justice to the claims of the deserving—of men of good families and high personal qualifications who have done good service. We are disposed to regard the alarm as groundless.

A SKETCH OF THE HISTORY OF THE PRESS IN INDIA.

By DR. SAMBHU C. MOOKERJEE.

European literature—chiefly English literature—is no less unjust to the Mussulmans than to the Hindus—perhaps more. Their invasions of India have been regarded as the raids of mere barbarians without law and amenable to no superior influences, who devastated wherever they went, or who, at best, went with the sword in one hand and the Koran in the other, massacring all who did not accept their professed faith, and establishing with their religion their own political, administrative, and social institutions wherever they established themselves. That is an improbable, not to say impossible history, and it is not true history. War is a bloody and barbarous business in all climes and ages and among all races, specially where its severity is aggravated and embittered by ethnic and, above all, religious antagonism, and the raids of conquering hordes are the worst form of the calamity of war of which any people may be the victim. Inasmuch as the earlier incursions of India by the Mahomedans were of this character—mere plundering expeditions rather than wars of conquest—they were pure disasters to this country. But so soon as these strangers aimed at holding their conquests and governing them, above all, when they aimed at establishing themselves in propria persona in them, their policy changed—their treatment of the natives became different—their very wars ceased to be vindictive and rigorous or unnecessarily bloody—gratuitously savage. There was no more massacring or ravaging, except on extreme provocation, beyond the requirements of military or political chastisement or the customs of warfare of the times. I feel it due to put in this word in favour of the ancestors and pioneers in this country of those—our Muslim brethren—with whom for seven hundred years we Hindus have formed one people—feel it the more because I grieve to see that our Hindu writers, even the best of them, educated under British auspices, blindly accepting the cue of European misrepresentation, regard the Mahomedan Conquest as a pure disaster to India and the Mahomedan rule as, with slight occasional exceptions, one continued abomination and misery to the children of the soil.

So far from this or that, the Mahomedan attacks gave the Indians a fine opportunity for showing their mettle, but alas! the imminent danger of wholesale subjection and perchance slavery failed to weld the millions, divided into numerous kingdoms and principalities and numberless tribes into a common nationality. When, therefore, a long period of constant failure in the field and its concomitants and consequences culminated in the long threatened subjection, the event was hailed as a relief. And no doubt, for one thing, it was better to exchange a lot of imbecile princes unable to protect their own, even though those princes were of our own flesh and blood, for the strong, though possibly harsh, sway of a single Power, however foreign. But the slavery, which, in those times and under such circumstances of ethnic and religious difference between conquerors and conquered, was, with good reason, anticipated as a necessary complement of subjection, was spared. It was spared in pure kindness. Say, if you will, that it was in wisdom spared. No matter. It is the same thing, to all intents and purposes. It comes to this, that the Mussulmans were not Goths and Vandals, any more than flights of locusts; they meant settled government; and they gave the best pledge of their honourable intentions by making the conquered land their home. Their adoption of India as their home was a fact of the utmost significance. It was a godsend to a helpless people. It necessarily altered the character of the relations of the strangers with them, tending as it did to convert a foreign occupation into a national government. Thus the Mahomedan conquest became a positive good to India—an instrument in the Divine Plan for the progress and advancement of the people.

So far from abusing their irresistible power and taking undue advantage of the people's helplessness, the Mahomedans gave the country the best administration according to their lights. In conquering and subduing the country they only carried out the Hindu doctrine of the duty of kings, while they treated the conquered country with a consideration which no Hindu Prince could well have exceeded, specially in his dealings with aliens in race and religion. Indeed, they unconsciously followed the recommendations of Manu. In this they made sacrifices which the great lawgiver never contemplated in the case of his Hindu conqueror. Against their very grain they left the Hindus in the enjoyment generally of their idols and their peculiar institutions and usages.

The Mussulmans not only did not disturb the Hindus in their own hereditary ways, however wrong or absurd, or even mischievous these appeared to them, but they went the length of adopting them, in many instances. The Mahomedans were admittedly a ruder people from a bleak and rather barren country, who came to live as rulers among a more polished race in a fertile and rich land, and they were not obstinate and foolish enough to scorn the advantages that lay before them. They made the most of them in every respect. The conquerors stooped to learn from the conquered. Except religion, in most particulars in which the Mahomedans in India enjoy a superiority to the races of men, in India or elsewhere, that superiority is of Indian origin. They are simply the pupils of the Hindus, whom they have distanced. The Mahomedan dress is the ancient Hindu dress. Mahomedan cookery is ancient Hindu cuisine. Mahomedan music is ancient Hindu music. Mahomedan etiquette is old Hindu manners. So the Mahomedans preserved as far as they could the administrative and revenue systems they found in vogue. If they were compelled by their faith to establish the judicial system of their Koran and Hadis, they practically left the Hindu landlords an important local jurisdiction, and generally they left the Hindus very much to their ways among themselves.

They adopted the Indian system of governing with the assistance of emissaries and news-agents. As in other things, in adopting they improved. It is reasonable to suppose that as the Hindus learnt to write, they employed the new accomplishment for the improvement of their favorite system of procuring regularly minute and accurate information bearing upon war and peace, as an aid to government. There are, however, not many distinct traces of such employment. The reason of this may be the lamentable neglect of historical composition and of historical records by the Hindus. Be that what it may, the fact is as I have stated it. Very different was the case with their conquerors. The Mahomedans, whatever their other deficiencies may have been, were blessed with an undeniable disposition to historical pursuits and they brought with them to India their historical instinct and passion. Whatever the rudeness of their Chiefs and Princes in their original homes, they were since their conversion to Islam Ahl-e-kitab—the people of a book—a book neither thoroughly understood nor at all sufficient as a guide to all the manifold concerns of life without interpretation and expansion by learned men. Besides, however illiterate the races and tribes who, whether in Western or in High Asia, embraced Islam, may have been in what among the Arabs is called the Age of Darkness, they were from the first—from prehistoric times—addicted to song—to poetry and music. Here, therefore, was a double motive for the Mahomedan partiality or kindness to their cultivators. Even in the absence of personal cultivation, there was a genuine partiality to literature in general, not merely theological literature. Nor were the Mahomedan conquerors and rulers of India themselves invariably illiterate. Several of them were tolerably accomplished scholars, while others employed learned men to such purpose as to make the question of their personal attainments quite immaterial. One of the earlier Emperors of Delhi, who was almost a Durwesh on the throne, actually lived by the sale of Korans copied by his own illustrious hands. The so-called Mogul Dynasty specially affected culture. The first conqueror of India belonging to that Dynasty has left the most imperishable and the best monument of his greatness in his Institutes. So the founder of the Dynasty has contributed to letters his Memoirs, while at least another sovereign of the line has left a most valuable Autobiography.

Under such princes and in such favorable times, naturally the old Hindu state devise of a regular intelligence department was improved and strengthened. The lines of improvement may be easily determined. In an age in which writing had become a common enough accomplishment, writing would naturally be largely availed of to obviate the waste and inconveniences and, above all, to rectify the uncertainties and remove the misunderstandings of oral reports and to reap the advantage of a system of record. Nor are we left all to speculation in this period of our enquiry. For information from abroad—from countries beyond the empire and specially beyond the geographical limits of India—the Mussulman rulers still depended upon oral testimony, the reports of missions when they returned or of members of permanent or protracted missions sent home on purpose, like the despatch-bearing couriers of European princes, or from the mouths of travellers, fakirs, merchants and pilgrims such as were employed by their Hindu predecessors. At home they had the benefit of news of record. This change from oral deliverance to written report was itself no small reform, but it also necessarily led to a vast improvement. In the first place, it necessitated the entertainment of a better class of emissaries—a superior agency. It also improved the character of the intelligence, obviating disappointment and misunderstanding. It is easy to make a vague or wild oral statement, but writing itself is a considerable check upon looseness. It for the first time introduced a distinct sense of responsibility. In fine, although the Hindus originated the method, it was during the era of their successors that it could be improved and consolidated into a truly workmanlike organization and a most efficient aid to statesmanship. It was during the Mogul Period in especial that it took shape as a Press, in the sense of the present day—as a reorganizable journalism before the use of printing.

Here, then, we discover the modern institution in embryo. If the Press, as we now understand the term, was unknown in the East before European intercourse, not so was the regular circulation, however limited by the circumstances of the times, of news by means of manuscript. Here was an agency employed by the kings to learn the true condition of the country, the secret history of transactions in different parts of the empire, the intrigues of viceregal and subordinate Courts, which could not be gathered from the public despatches. The Intelligence Department of the Hindus had been gradually improved with the progress of society, until in the hands of later Indo-Mahomedan statesmanship it developed, at least in part, into a Newspaper Service distributed throughout the Provinces of the Empire. This appears to have been an agency more efficient and far more important for purposes of government than even humdrum contemporary chroniclers generally seem to have suspected. Many intrigues were prevented, many dangers nipt in the bud, by the reports of these news-letters, many circumstances in the administration of distant satrapies known which would not otherwise be known. There are traces that able rulers made a good use of this source of information. The persons of the editors were specially protected by the sovereign, so that their independence might be better secured. The Governors held them in dread, and no doubt conciliated them by favors and courtesy. Some of the writers, possibly, exacted blackmail on the strength of their power to injure. That, however, is a liability of all journalism, not that of our day excepted, as indeed of all power. Nor must it be forgotten that the official journalism of Moslem India was kept pure by checks to which our present Press is not amenable. This rude "Press," such as it was, imposed an irregular discipline upon the authorities which virtually functioned as a kind of "constitutional" check on maladministration as well as on the personal ambition of subordinate courts.

I have said that the news-carriers—the emissaries and spies—of the Hindu period, in course of time, turned into the news-writers of the Mahomedan régime, but in part. I mean that the old service of intelligencers were not, as they could not be, abolished. Their numbers might be limited but they could not be entirely done away with. For valuable as the newspapers were and much as they doubtless were in their infancy, with the glamour of freshness and novelty, appreciated, they did not supersede the special personal agency. The newspapers could not possibly do what that agency could. "In the first place, that principle of distrust—which I would rather call inexorable prudence—which prevails throughout Eastern governments, and which was the patron of the innovation of newspapers, itself required the retention of the old agency, if only to check the new journalism. Besides, some kinds of information are not well communicable through the newspapers. Some news is spoiled and lost as soon as the public journalist babbles it. News of a confidential character, news of operations in the field and of movements of enemies, could only be procured by means of emissaries and spies. Accordingly we find that service in full swing to the last days of the Mogul Empire into the thick of the British Period. Bengal certainly had its Establishment not only under Nawab Serajud Dowla but also during the reigns of Nawabs Mir Mahammad Jafer Khan and Mir Mahammad Kasem. The spies formed a part of the machinery of state—an essential and important part.

Don't be alarmed, gentlemen, at the sound of "spy!" What's in a name? Rather is it a case of Give a dog a bad name and hang him. Call your informant a "spy" and he is lost for ever! Call him a "Special Correspondent" and he is a gentleman of the Press—a worthy representative of Letters, fit to be the companion of princes, statesmen and generals!

The word spy is in bad odour with Englishmen, from their ears being filled with the abuses of espionage in the absolutist monarchies of the Continent. But the system need not be a horrible or a terrible one. It is, I am afraid, practised, more or less, throughout the world. It is necessary.

BOMBAY MILL-OWNERS' ASSOCIATION.

The annual general meeting of the members of the above Association was held on Tuesday (May 31,) afternoon at the rooms of the Bombay Chamber of Commerce, Mr. G. Cotton presiding.

The following are extracts from the report of the Association for the period from 1st January to 31st December, 1891 :—

Although the year under review has not been remarkable for the number of topics discussed, it has nevertheless been to some extent an eventful one in the history of the trade as the subjects dealt with have been of leading importance. An amended Factory Act for India has been passed into law which it is to be hoped, in the interests of employers and employed alike, will prove the termination of legislative interference with the manufacturing industries of the country for many years to come; and second only in importance a new Boiler Inspection Act for the Presidency of Bombay has been adopted by the local legislature. An event of equal significance, although widely different in character, has been the adoption and successful maintenance during the last three-and-a-half months of the year of the Short Time Movement rendered necessary by the depressed state of the yarn markets in China, and had the Association never accomplished any other work the results of its action in connection with these two legislative measures and the unanimity with which it originated, controlled, and maintained for the entire period agreed upon, a short Time Movement of exceptional magnitude would in the opinion of your committee have amply justified its existence.

Curtailment of production naturally means reduction of profits, and as a general rule the results of working during 1891 have been much less favourable than in 1890. Still it is gratifying to find—and it speaks volumes for the stability and soundness of the industry—that it should pass the test of a very trying period without disaster. So far from anything of that kind having resulted nearly all the mills have shown profits of a more or less satisfactory character and only in a few exceptional cases where special reasons have existed have actual losses been declared.

A further encouraging feature is the fact disclosed by figures that notwithstanding all drawbacks our exports of yarn to the further East continue to increase, the total showing a gain on the previous year of about 3½ per cent., and this too in the face of a further serious falling off in the shipments to Japan where local yarns have largely superseded Bombay spinnings.

The shipments of piece-goods from the United Kingdom during 1891 still show well above the average of the past ten years, but yarns for the first time since 1886 are below the average. The falling off, however, is almost entirely to Japan where the demand for English yarns has no doubt had the same adverse influence to contend with as Bombay productions, and the cause of the diminution therefore is not the result of the favourite Lancashire that Indian yarns favoured by the decline in the value of silver are superseding English. On the contrary both are suffering from the same cause—increased home production—and Bombay has suffered most, the decrease being 10,713,200 lbs. as compared with only 8,274,000 lbs. from Lancashire.

The tone of the industry has not been such as to encourage the erection of new mills, and for the year ending 30th June, 1891, the returns made up by the Association give a decrease of three mills in Bombay owing to the destruction of two by fire and the abandonment of one which was under re-construction. Since that return was made up two up-country mills have been destroyed by fire, but are being re-erected. There has, however, been a considerable increase in the number of spindles of the existing mills, 13,463 spindles having been added up to 30th June in Bombay and 77,498 for all India. The increased manufacturing power represented by these is considerably in excess of the mere numerical increase in the existing number of spindles, as the producing power of the newer machinery is considerably in excess of the old. Thus, notwithstanding dull markets the quantity of cotton consumed in Bombay has increased by 126,328 bales and in all India by 170,444 bales. The addition of weaving power is but slight, only 562 looms having been erected in Bombay and 1,119 in all India during the year ending 30th June, 1891.

FACTORY LEGISLATION FOR INDIA.

The subject of primary importance to the trade during the year under review has again been the question of factory legislation for India; but with the passing of the amended Indian Factories Act, which comes into force from 1st January, 1892, it is to be hoped that the question has at last reached a settlement which is not likely to be disturbed for some years to come. The alterations which have been effected by the new law are mainly the raising of the minimum and maximum limits of age for children from seven to nine years for short-timers, and from twelve to fourteen years for full-time workers; the restriction of the number of hours in which women may be employed during the day, to eleven hours; and the enforcement of the day's holiday during the week on Sundays in event of no other holiday intervening. These alterations do not go beyond the views which the members of this Association have always favoured, and there has therefore been no necessity for assuming an antagonistic position with regard to the discussion on the Bill. In some places the restriction in the working hours of women will, no doubt, tend to disorganize the industry for a time, but this will eventually regulate itself, and the same may be said with reference to the limitation of age for children.

BOILER INSPECTION BILL.

With the view of remedying certain defects shown by the practical working of the Bombay Boiler Inspection Act of 1887, the Government of Bombay introduced a Bill, No. 1 of 1891, to amend the law for the inspection and management of boilers in the Presidency of Bombay. As originally introduced it was proposed to retain the permissive power given in the old Act to authorize by notification the inspection also of prime-movers, and as this was a point which had invariably been combated by the Association it was decided to memorialise Government against the retention of this power. Your committee also took objection to the manner in which the Bill laid down that an Engineer should at all times be in direct and immediate supervision of the boilers while under steam, showing that the interpretation placed upon this had already given rise to certain inconvenience, and the committee pointed out that it would be ample for all purposes Government might have in view if the supervision defined under the Act was that usually required of an Engineer in the usual careful discharge of his duties. The Bill having been referred to a select committee, a number of the points raised by the Association were thereat conceded, and the principle of abolishing the inspection of prime-movers was distinctly affirmed by the committee. At the same time, however, by a majority, the committee appended a clause to the proposed Bill to enable inspectors to have the opportunity of examining prime-movers and giving owners any advice which might be suggested by such examination. This permissive power your committee decided was likely to give rise to a most objectionable principle inasmuch as it practically constituted an Inspector of Boilers a Consulting Engineer for all engines. They accordingly addressed Government before the second reading of the Bill, asking that in event of it being ultimately decided that it was necessary to retain the power to inspect prime-movers, it should be provided for in the Act under the same terms and conditions as laid down in the Act of 1887. This suggestion was ultimately accepted, and your committee feel convinced that Government will never, so far as Bombay itself is concerned, have occasion to utilize this power.

ALLEGED FRAUDS IN THE COTTON TRADE AND THE DETERIORATION OF THE STAPLE.

The Association having been favoured with a copy of Mr. H. E. M. James' papers on the subject of frauds in the cotton trade and the deterioration of the staple, more especially in the Broach District, the subject received the most careful consideration of your committee. After a prolonged discussion in which the various points raised by Mr. James were most carefully debated, it was resolved to address Government in the terms of a resolution passed by the Bombay Cotton Trade Association, namely:—"That this Association approves most heartily of Mr. James' proposals, requesting Government to organise the distribution of good local seed in large quantities at cost price, or even gratis, in order to induce the rayyet to procure his seed from the Government depots only, but the Association cannot accept Mr. James' views with regard to legislation in any form, not considering the same desirable in principle nor conducive to the purpose intended."

SHORT-TIME MOVEMENT.

The exceptionally depressed condition of the market for yarn in China led to several representations being made to your committee in favour of the adoption of short time with the view of reducing stocks of yarn. Your committee having considered the matter came to the conclusion that it would be desirable to ascertain, by circular, the views of the members of the Association on the subject. They accordingly invited an expression of opinion, and ascertaining that the owners or agents of 59 out of 66 mills in the town and island of Bombay were in favour of the proposed movement the following resolution was passed at a meeting held on 12th September, 1891:—"The committee of the Millowners' Association beg to inform members and other millowners that the short-time circular has been signed by the owners or agents of 59 out of the 66 mills in Bombay. Of those who have not signed, 2 mills are stopped, 2 are owned by a firm who have referred the question to their senior partner who is in Europe, and the remaining 3 will most probably sign during the coming week. Under these circumstances the committee resolve that short-time should commence from 15th instant and continue until December 31st."

STOCKS OF COTTON IN BOMBAY.

At a meeting of the committee of the Association held on the 13th June it was resolved that, in the interests of the trade, an endeavour should be made to ascertain, if possible, the stocks of cotton held by the mills in Bombay on 30th June, 1891. The Secretary accordingly addressed the agents and owners of all the mills in the island, asking them to be good enough to send him a return of the stocks which they held on that date, and with the one exception of Messrs. E. D. Sassoon and Co., the request was unanimously and courteously acceded to. The ascertained stocks, with the exception of the quantity held by the firm already mentioned, amounted to 106,700½ candies, and the information without doubt proved most valuable to the trade, enabling agents and owners to estimate with comparative accuracy the prospects of supply and demand for the remainder of the season. It also afforded a valuable check on the statistics of the trade.

MERCHANDISE MARKS ACT.

As mentioned in the report of the previous year, your then committee addressed Government with respect to the rules under the Merchandise Marks Act, regarding the average count of yarn and the manner in which the trade description thereof had to be complied with. As laid down in the rules, the average count of the whole of the yarn in a bundle, bale, or consignment must be neither greater nor less than the described count, or, in other words, it must be exactly the described count. This, your committee pointed out was practically an impossibility, as no spinner could produce yarn throughout of the absolute count which it purported to be, and they therefore suggested to Government that the words "greater or" should be deleted, leaving the law to be that the average of the yarn should not be less than the described count, which would, in their opinion, be a sufficient protection to buyers. In reply to this representation the Government of India declined to make any alteration; but so far as your committee are aware the manner in which the Act is administered has prevented any hardship arising from this requirement.

COTTON MILLS IN JAPAN.

In accordance with a resolution passed by the committee of the Association the Secretary took steps to ascertain the position and development of cotton spinning in Japan. On the 30th June, 1891, there were in all 36 mills containing 377,970 spindles, employing 17,248 hands and consuming 6,156,300 pounds of cotton.

REGISTRATION OF TRADE MARKS.

Under the scheme organized by the Association in 1886, a large number of new tickets and trade marks have been registered in the books of the Association during the past year. In a few cases new tickets have been objected to when circulated for the inspection of members as being colourable imitations of tickets already in use and the property of members of the Association. These objections have been promptly met and complied with, and the system of registration has thus proved of the greatest benefit to all interested in the industry, obviating any necessity for an appeal to the law in connection with trade marks, which, at one time, was a fertile source of dispute and litigation. The register of tickets and marks is carefully maintained at the office of the Association where it is always open to the inspection of members—a privilege which it is satisfactory to know is extensively availed of.

The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the report, said he would first explain why it was that the report was so late. It was because the committee was anxious to embody in it the rules which they wished to frame for the general guidance of the mill-hands under the new Factory Act. Those rules took up a considerable amount of time, and had to be carefully thought out and approved by legal advisers. They had been generally adopted by all factories, many objectionable clauses, especially the one of two days' wages fine for any mill-hand absenting himself without leave, being deleted from them. So far as possible, they had made the new rules fair to the employers and the employed. Fortunately the report did not call for very many remarks. They had had a peaceful time lately, which, he trusted, would not be disturbed. As the report pointed out, they had not had the best of trade during the last eighteen months, but he was glad to say that things seemed to be on the mend. China still continued to take an increased quantity of Bombay production every year, and it appeared to him that just now demand was very nearly overtaking production, if it had not already done so. There was no doubt they had helped themselves considerably by three and a half months' short time, and he felt sure that the members of the Association would agree with him that, if for nothing else, the strength which the Association had shown by combining together without exception for the common welfare of all showed how justifiable the existence of the Association was. He thought they might congratulate themselves on the fact that they had shown, whenever anything was against them, that they had strength within themselves to combine so as to overcome difficulties. He repeated that he considered they would see their trade improve very considerably. They would see Japan again taking their yarns. They were asking for their yarns very much less than before, and every year enabled them to work more economically. Even Japan was now taking their yarn. He did not think it possible for Japan mills to compete with them much longer. They had been brought into existence under protection, and he did not think that even with the assistance of that protection they would be able to continue to earn a sufficiently remunerative return. It was impossible for them to import cotton from India, and then compete with them. Bombay was again sending cloth to China, and he could only hope that the same causes which had induced the Chinese to increase the consumption of Bombay yarn might also induce them to increase the consumption of their cloth. There was no doubt they could produce cloth cheaply, and so long as they could do that, they had nothing to fear about their future. They had had now some five months' experience of the new Factory Act, and he thought they would agree with him in saying that it had put them to a minimum of inconvenience. He was sure that they all felt the advantage of having one day's rest in a week which had long been advocated by the Association. Regarding women, the Association had all along considered that eleven hours per day was as much as any woman could work, and although there might be complaints from the mofussil, even there 11 hours were as much as a woman should work. If they in Bombay thought eleven hours sufficient, surely in the hotter climate of the mofussil it became more necessary that the hours should be restricted. They had every reason to hope that there would be no further legislation in that direction. (Hear, hear.) Referring to the rules under the Factory and the Boiler Inspection Act, the chairman said that as one who had opportunities of conferring with Mr. Campbell, the Collector of Bombay, he did not think he should let that opportunity pass without saying how deeply the Association was indebted to Mr. Campbell for the courtesy and consideration he had shown to their representations. With regard to the boiler rules he asked the deputation of the Association to meet him, and as they were able to point out that they only wanted reasonable concessions, Mr. Campbell readily and willingly consented to them. This might be said about the Factory Act. Mr. Marshall, their Secretary, placed himself in communication with Mr. Campbell, and the result was that everything necessary was done. It was satisfactory to feel that all times, when dealing with Government, their representations received that consideration which they expected and which enabled them to put themselves right, and obtain concessions and give Government information which enabled them to comply with the law without placing unnecessary restriction on the trade. The new Boiler Inspection Act was a great improvement on the old one, and he was glad that the clauses to which they so strongly objected were removed. There was only one thing to which he specially called the attention of the Association, namely, they had no correct statistics of the stocks of yarn and cotton. Cotton statistics were got once a year, but he considered they should have them every month. He was sure if they could obtain the figures and know exactly what stocks were in Bombay the same as they knew what was held in China, each of them would be better able to judge of the future market. Of course there was one great objection; members might object to their neighbours knowing what yarn they held, but the figures might be obtained and given in such a way that no one would know whose stock they represented. Steps were being taken to bring about the desired information, and he trusted that members would help the committee to obtain. He then congratulated the Association upon the fact of their having an exceedingly good Fire Brigade that could not be surpassed or equalled in any place in India and many places out of it. The Municipal Corporation deserved their best thanks for giving them such an efficient Fire Brigade. A resolution would be placed before them, the object of which was to still further increase the usefulness of the Association, and to make the fees or the subscription from outsiders equitable. It would besides encourage all steam users to join them and contribute towards their funds, and generally to share the benefits which the Association received and to combine with them in fighting against a common grievance. (Applause.)

Mr. Dinshaw E. Wacha, in seconding the proposition, said that the chairman, who had gone over the whole ground covered by the report with his accustomed ability, was right in saying that the year had been one of peace, and he (Mr. Wacha) hoped that its successor would also be of plenty. (Hear, hear.) There had been a little depression of late, but there was a combination of circumstances which led them to hope that cheerfulness and prosperity were not far remote. It appeared from the statistics given in the report that China was consuming the cloth manufactured by Bombay mills in larger quantities, and the increase promised to go up by leaps and bounds. (Hear, hear.) Whatever the Lancashire mill-owners might say or do, the geographical position of Bombay made it a strong and a healthy rival and competitor in the matter of piece-goods in Chinese markets. The silver question had nothing whatever to do with the exports. Whether the price of silver went down to 1 shilling or rose to 2 shillings, their exports would go on increasing, because there were certain conditions of the local trade which would fetch better rates of yarn and cloth than Lancashire would ever expect to obtain. As regarded the factory legislation, the Association should congratulate themselves upon the very able and constitutional manner in which their cause was put before the Government, and which eventually resulted in a good and workable Factory Act. The question of adult, female, and children labour might now be considered to have been finally settled, and he hoped that there would be no more "cries" heard from Lancashire for the purpose of hampering their trade. That the Indian mill-hands should under the new Act work for shorter hours could not but be productive of the greatest good to them. According to eminent physiologists if the mill-hands worked for shorter hours they would be better able to preserve their health and be in a position to work better and in more efficient manner than they otherwise would. In this respect, he (Mr. Wacha) could not forget the very valuable and enduring services rendered to them by Mr. Nugent. The very admirable manner in which he had placed the whole condition of the Bombay mill industry before the Government of India was beyond praise. Although Mr. Nugent had left India, he could not help observing that special thanks were due to that officer for his most able and correct representation of the mill industry of this city. (Hear, hear.) Again as far as the Factory and the Boiler Acts were concerned, the Government of Bombay was entirely with the Association, inasmuch as they took their stand on a broad and sympathetic basis that the manufacturing trade of Bombay should not be hampered or restricted by vexatious clauses, though he came to forget the needless clause regarding the examination of engineers. (Hear, hear.) The harmonious working and the reconciling of conflicting interests by the Government of Bombay deserved the best thanks of the Association. (Applause.) The Association had now reached its age of adolescence, and during its comparatively brief existence had been able to accomplish great good in the interest of the rising mill industry of Bombay, and it was hoped that as time went on it would take deeper and firmer root, financially and otherwise, and become a strong body capable of furthering the interest of the vast and growing industry which had brought prosperity to this city. (Hear, hear, and applause.)

Holloway's Pills and Ointment.—Dyspepsia, Jaundice.—These complaints are the results of a disordered liver, which secretes bile in quality or quantity incapable of digesting food. Digestion requires a free flow of healthy bile, to insure which Holloway's Pills and Ointment have long been famous, for eclipsing every other medicine. Food, irregularity of living, climates, and other causes are constantly throwing the liver into disorder, but that important organ can, under all circumstances, soon be regulated and healthily adjusted by Holloway's Pills and Ointment, which act directly upon its vital secretion. The Ointment rubbed on the skin penetrates immediately to the liver, whose blood and nerves it rectifies. One trial is all that is needed; a cure will soon follow.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

LINES ON A STATUE OF HIS DEAD CHILD.

BY RICHARD LANE, ESQ.

I saw thee in thy beauty ! bright phantom of the past,
I saw thee for a moment—'t was the first time and the last ;
And, though years since have glided by of mingled bliss and care,
I never have forgotten thee, thou fairest of the fair !

I saw thee in thy beauty ! Thou wast graceful as the fawn,
When, in wantonness of glee, it sports along the lawn ;
I saw thee seek the mirror—and when it met thy sight,
The very air was musical with thy burst of wild delight.

I saw thee in thy beauty ! with thy sister at thy side—
She a lily of the valley, thou a rose in all its pride—
I looked upon thy mother—there was triumph in her eyes ;
And I trembled for her happiness, for grief had made me wise.

I saw thee in thy beauty ! with one hand among her curls—
The other with no gentle grasp had seized a string of pearls ;
She felt the pretty trespass, and she chid thee, though she smiled ;
And I knew not which was loveliest, the mother or the child.

I saw thee in thy beauty ! and a tear came to mine eye,
As I pressed thy rosy cheek to mine, and thought even thou couldst die :
My home was like a summer bower, by thy joyous presence made,
But I only saw the sunshine, and felt alone the shade.

I see thee in thy beauty ! for there thou seem'st to lie,
In slumber resting peacefully ! but, oh, the change of eye—
That still serenity of brow—those lips that breathe no more—
Proclaim thee but a mockery of what thou wast before.

I see thee in thy beauty ! with thy waving hair at rest,
And thy busy little fingers folded lightly on thy breast ;
But thy merry dance is o'er, and thy little race is run,
And the mirror that reflected two, can now give back but one.

I see thee in thy beauty ! with thy mother by thy side—
But her loveliness is faded, and quelled her glance of pride,
The smile is absent from her lips, and absent are the pearls,
And a cap almost of widowhood conceals her envied curls.

I see thee in thy beauty ! as I saw thee on that day—
But the mirth that gladdened then my home, fled with thy life away :
I see thee lying motionless upon the accustomed floor,
But my heart hath blinded both my eyes, and I can see no more.

A DAY IN JUNE.*

AND what is so rare as a day in June?

Then, if ever, come perfect days ;

The heaven tries the earth if it be in tune,

* Not in Bengal.—ED. & R.

And over it softly her warm ear lays ;
Whether we look, or whether we listen,
We hear life murmur, or see it glisten ;
Every clod feels a stir of might,
An instinct within it that reaches and towers,
And, grasping blindly above it for light,
Climbs to a soul in grass and flowers ;
The flush of life may well be seen
Thrilling back over hills and valleys ;
The cowslip startles in meadows green,
The buttercup catches the sun in its chalice,
And there's never a leaf or a blade too mean
To be some happy creature's palace ;
The little bird sits at his door in the sun,
As if like a blossom among the leaves,
And lets his illuminated being o'errun
With the deluge of summer it receives ;
His mate feels the eggs beneath her wings,
And the heart in her dumb breast flutters and sings ;
He sings to the wide world, and she to her nest—
In the nice ear of nature which song is the best.

Now is the high tide of the year,
And whatever of life hath ebbed away
Comes flooding back, with a ripply cheer,
Into every bare inlet and creek and bay ;
Now the heart is so full that a drop overfills it,
We are happy now because God so wills it ;
No matter how barren the past may have been,
'T is enough for us now that the leaves are green,
We sit in the warm shade and feel right well
How the sap creeps up and the blossoms swell ;
We may shut our eyes, but we cannot help knowing
That skies are clear and grass is growing ;
The breeze comes whispering in our ear,
That dandelions are blossoming near,
That maize has sprouted, that streams are flowing,
That the river is bluer than the sky,
That the robin is plastering his house hard by ;
And if the breeze kept the good news back,
For other couriers we should not lack !
We could guess it by yon heifer's lowing—
And hark ! how clear bold chanticleer,
Warmed with the new wine of the year,
Tells all in his lusty crowing !

Joy comes, grief goes, we know not how ;
Everything is happy now,
Everything is upward striving ;
'T is as easy now for the heart to be true
As the grass to be green, or the skies to be blue—
'T is the natural way of living.

WEEKLYANA.

HER Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople reports the Mecca and Medina roads unsafe. Pilgrims, beware!

AT the request of the members, Mr. J. L. Mackay has resumed the Presidentship of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce, which he had resigned to accept the Chairmanship of the Indian Currency Association without compromising the members of the Chamber who hold a different view on the Currency question. Mr. Mackay will now guide the deliberations of both the bodies.

THE vacancy in the Local Legislative Council caused by the resignation of Sir Alfred Croft, consequent on his retirement from India on furlough, has been filled by the appointment of Mr. J. Lambert, Commissioner of the Calcutta Police. This post is rising in importance. This is the first instance of a pure Commissioner of Police having been accepted as a law-maker. The Bengal Government justifies the appointment on the fact that there is the Fire Brigade Bill in Council in which Mr. Lambert cannot fail to be useful.

PASSENGERS by the mail arriving at Bombay on the 5th, had a terribly hot descent in the Red Sea. At 10 P. M. in the cabins on the four days, namely, two days before and two days after the steamer's arrival at Aden, the thermometer was 95°. Baron de Horn who had been up and down the Sea no less than fifty-three times, declared that this was the hottest journey he had ever made.

THE Black Town Presidency Magistrate of Madras sentenced a census peon to one month's rigorous imprisonment for using a Service post card valued at quarter anna. If the punishment has any meaning, it is a warning to the officers of Government from the highest to the lowest not to use for private purposes Government property of whatever value. The peon was evidently charged with theft of Government property and sentenced under the Penal Code. But what officer of Government, to whom it is open, does not post his private letters under Service stamps or official frank?

THE Hitabadi changes hands, at least in the business management. Baboo Nobin Chand Boral, the managing director, retires from it. The paper too changes color. It no longer blushes—but blanches. Nor are its manners of the best. It is free, we suppose, to indulge in gross vilification. The tendency has recently been marked.

IN August 1890, the People's Friend of Madras appealed to the generosity of its subscribers for Rs. 1,000 for renewal of types, requesting them "to send immediately a donation of not less than one Rupee each without fail." The donations, up to 13th June, 1892, amount to only Rs. 127-11. On the 15th June, again, we find the paper addressing its readers thus:—

"From the acknowledgments published in our columns for some weeks past, our readers must have perceived that the remittances received recently have been very few in number and ridiculously low in amount. We beg therefore to ask the judicious reader how at this rate we could manage to issue the 'People's Friend' regularly, as we are obliged to borrow for current expenses almost every day. We trust that this hint will suffice and that subscribers who are in arrears will at once remit in full what they owe to the paper."

Indian subscribers need constantly to be reminded of their dues. We constantly prate of our advancement in all directions, but we have yet to learn to pay for our books and newspapers. Government is not particularly anxious for native journals, the Europeans care more for Anglo-Indian than purely native undertakings, and the natives themselves won't pay. How then can native authors or journalists live—to talk not of thriving? There are journals and journals, but the same fate overtakes them all.

HERE is a cutting from the Effective Advertiser:—

"Discovery is a readable book on matters chiefly scientific. The editor wrote in a recent number: 'We have now an issue of about 10,000 weekly, without counting our Australian edition. If every subscriber obtained two other subscribers each year we should have over a million subscribers in seven years' time. This would enable us to still further improve the character of the paper.' What do you think? Discovery will make the discovery that these figures will remain figures of speech only. What a glowing prospectus that Brother Editor could write for a great public company!"

Just so. It was at this rate that the Bangabasi got, within the very first year of its existence, about 25,000 subscribers. Again, during its prosecution by the Government, some of the friends of that journal calculated upon raising a lac of Rupees by imposing a trifle on each patriotic citizen of Calcutta, those, that is, who had swelled the mob on the maidan on the occasion of the irresponsible protest against the Age of Consent Bill. Nowhere, however, was this extravagance of arithmetical addition perpetrated more coolly and with a fuller certainty of immediate accomplishment than on the occasion of the talk of raising a National Fund in India for the purposes of political agitation, both here and in England. The population of India was ascertained to a 4, from the census report, and Europeans and Eurasians and half the followers of Islam being excluded from the figure, the Fund was estimated at an enormous amount, on the supposition of remaining individuals contributing at the rate of only a pice each. The prospect was simply glorious. Some of the National Fundists actually began their collections. Soon, however, was their arithmetic dissipated by the little item that had been overlooked, the item, namely, of expenses of the collectors! So much for the practical wisdom of those who clamour for India being placed under their piloting for the years to come.

IN Spain, they have taken to manufacture of cripples for the delectation of France. They are chiefly from Talossa and its neighbourhood. In France, they are known as culs-de-jatte. These objects of pity, by rolling themselves about on boards cause amusement, and earn for themselves and their exhibitors their means of livelihood. They are recruited from the weakly offsprings of the peasants who are induced to part with them for considerations of gain. As born they are a burden to them, but when transformed into the objects of exhibition they must prove a source of gain to them and to their "farmers." The process of disfigurement is simple. The legs of the child are so tightly compressed that the circulation of the blood in them is stopped. Little by little the legs wither away, and the cul-de-jatte is made.

THE New York Recorder relates an amusing trial in the courts of Rome, where an Italian Duchess explains the birth of a male child as due to astral conception. The Duke had been absent from home for two years in America, whence he lately returned, just in time to see the Duchess give birth to a male child, whose paternity he is, not unaccountably, reluctant to admit. The Duchess, however, is equal to the situation. A follower of Mme. Blavatsky, she is trying to fasten the responsibility of her interesting situation not upon the frail tenants of this giddy world, but upon the heavenly bodies. No one was more surprised than she (she seems to say) at a certain physiological development of her person before confinement. Before the commencement of that development she remembered how she had been the victim of melancholy and restlessness. Be that as it may have been, the brave lady repudiates all notion of sin. She is chaste as the virgin snow. As for that brat she has introduced, that is nothing. Great minds are not terrified by little things of that kind. So far as there might be anything amiss, she knows nothing. It is the doing of the Planets. Those exalted persons have of late taken to mashing. The Duchess will perform a miracle if she can convince the law Courts by mystic reference to astral bodies and spiritual unions. It is indeed a "phenomenon," as she calls it, to her theosophic brethren but prosaic matter of fact to her husband as well as her judges.

LIEUTENANT-COLONEL M. C. Brackenbury, R. E., has been confirmed as Manager, Oudh and Rohilkhand Railway.

MR. C. C. Stevens ceases to be a Government representative on the Municipal Board. He does not leave it, though. He will now represent the Port Commission in place of the late Sir Henry Harrison, Dr. J. O'Brien coming in in Mr. Stevens' place as a Government nominee.

OUR MEDICAL COLUMN.

THE Black Noble Palm of Africa is extolled as a sure remedy not only for snake bite but also for hydrophobia. It is the discovery of a German Physician named Engles, who emigrated to Africa in 1874. Extracts from this tree have been furnished to Pasteur and Koch and, after receiving their opinions, the detailed method of preparing the remedy will be published.

THE Homœopathic Recorder speaks highly of the phytolacca berries as a sure anti-fat. Equal berries to their weight in alcohol or the berry juice with sufficient alcohol to prevent fermentation is the best form of preparation.

THE simplest method to remove foreign bodies from the throat is to blow forcibly into the ear, when they will be expelled from the trachea by the excitement of a powerful reflex action. The treatment, though an old one, is generally forgotten when it is most needed.

THE best depilatories are the sulphide of sodium and the sulphide of barium, each used as a paste. The sulphide of sodium with one to eight parts of water acts well, but as it deteriorates very rapidly it may produce ulcer on the applied part. Fifty parts of sulphide of barium with each of twenty-five parts of starch and oxide of zinc with water forming a paste, is a safer form. After ten minutes, if scraped off, it will leave a smooth surface.

WE read in a European medical journal that mustard powder retaining its full power of counter-irritation may yet be purged of its blistering properties, by mixing it with the white of an egg to form a plaster for application. An external stimulant and irritant, with all the advantages but without the drawbacks of mustard, ought to be highly acceptable by the old school physicians. Yet for our part, we have some doubt in the matter. In fact, we hardly understand it. It seems to involve a contradiction in terms. If a true counter-irritant is required in a particular case, what is the good of a mild application that will not cause a blister! An external counter-irritant, in the very nature of the thing, means a blistering plaster. To tone it down to a harmless thing—to disarm it of its property of disturbing the skin—is to rob it of its therapeutic virtue—its efficacy as a medicinal agent.

EVACUATION of the bowels upwards is a most unfortunate phenomenon which Nature, in kindness for our kind, does but rarely permit. It takes place usually in obstruction of the bowels—far from a common complaint. Regular defecation from the mouth for a long period is not an impossibility, however. Such a case was recently reported by M. Desnos to the Société Médicale des Hôpitaux, Paris, in connection with a young man of nineteen with hysteric symptoms.

A PARISIAN woman was prosecuted for committing nuisance in a public street. Fortunately for her, she found a magistrate with a heart, as with a soul above legal routine, who bravely discharged her on the ground that the law of health cannot be superseded by statutory enactment.

DR. Gritian of Lyons, in his recent lectures, suggests an easy cure of sterility for women. The remedy indeed is as queer as it is novel, but it has produced brilliant results, not only promoting conception of a single child but sometimes of twins. The wife is to sing at the top of her voice during the actus conjugus. This really beats the medication of the court physicians of Mahomedan Princes for pleasantness. The idea of a lady pining for a son getting rid of her barrenness by singing at the proper time, is charming, if somewhat ludicrous. After this, it is a pity to start doubts about the feasibility of the method. We are assured by a medical friend that the direction is quite capable of being followed. He speaks from professional experience, not from books. The eminent professor of Lyons hit upon his discovery from the intimate connection existing between the uterus and the larynx.

A NEW antipyretic is again in the field. It is called phenocol hydrochloride, and is closely related to phenacetin. Like its predecessors, the new drug is sure more to kill, or, at any rate, to aggravate the disease, than to give relief.

THE hypodermic injection of nitrate of strychnine is now the favorite remedy for dipsomania. Drs. Portuloff and Jorgalski have cured many cases with it and subsequently Dr. Portagalow of Samara also expresses himself in its favour. The method for using it as follows: take strychnine nitrate one grain and add distilled water half a fluid ounce. Daily one to two hypodermic injections, with at first eight minims of the medicine and later on with 4 minims and ten to sixteen injections will be sufficient for a complete cure. It not only cures but produces a positive hatred for alcohol.

AT Tuxpam, on the Gulf of Mexico, there are men who are safe from the bite of snakes for their previous inoculation with the poison of these animals. Before the inoculation they take the bulb of a native plant called "mano del sapo" (toad's hand), then the inoculation is made with the venom tooth of one of the most poisonous snakes. Dr. Jacolot has published his experience of them in the Archives of Naval Medicine.

NOTES & LEADERETTES

with
OUR OWN NEWS.

THE long talked of general elections are at hand. Parliament will be dissolved on Tuesday, the 28th. The papers by this week's mail thus speak of the election prospects:

"A very sanguine view, says the Standard, is taken by the Liberal Unionist supporters of Government in the House as to the probable results of the approaching elections. This estimate of the situation is based on reports received from the constituencies during the last few days. Speaking generally, a most hopeful feeling prevails both in the Conservative and Unionist ranks upon the subject. The World says 'The Liberal whips have recently come in for a large amount of money, and will certainly have more to spend for election purposes than any other party. No one knows where the money comes from, but numbers of people are wanting Peerages. Irish wire-pullers are very badly off.' The World wickedly suggests that some money for the Gladstonian electioneering fund may have come from Russia. Undoubtedly both Russia and France are anxious for Mr. Gladstone's success."

Doubtless the British World knows its own. English patriots and ministers have before now been in Continental pay.

The elections will probably begin on the 4th of August, or as soon as the writs are out, the borough elections being fixed for the 4th proximo.

Mr. Gladstone has issued his Midlothian manifesto. It makes no definite proposals, and of course lays much stress on the necessity for Home Rule in Ireland, as that would leave the English Parliament free to better attend to the wants of Great Britain. Mr. Gladstone is sure that Ulster will soon return to a feeling of brotherhood. He advocates local option, the principle of one man one vote, and a reduction in the hours of labour.

The G. O. M. opens his campaign with an Edinburgh meeting on the 30th.

LORD Rosebery, speaking at Whitechapel, pointed out that the Liberals had made it a rule as far as possible to refrain from opposing Lord Salisbury's foreign policy, but he thought that Mr. Gladstone went a little too far in commending it. His Lordship said that if our foreign relations were as good as was asserted, including those with France, wherein some doubt appears to exist, the Liberals, if returned to power, would doubtless continue Lord Salisbury's foreign policy as far as they at present know it.

THE Ulster Convention met at Belfast on the 17th, twelve thousand delegates being present. The Duke of Abercorn presided. The audience rose and cheered the Chairman when he said that all had unanimously determined to fight for home and liberty. Resolutions were adopted repudiating the authority of any Parliament in Dublin.

The Opposition has replied to the Convention denying that Ulster is entirely Unionist, and that any danger exists of civil war.

At a Conformists' gathering at Clapham, on the 18th, Mr. Gladstone charged the Government with raising religious issues. He asserted that the Ulster Protestants were not solidly opposed to Home Rule and that it would not lead to an established Catholic Church in Ireland. And why not? What would there be to prevent it? The influence of the priests he attributed, with more justice, to the people's lack of legitimate freedom.

THE Presidential elections are proceeding in America. President Cleveland has been nominated by the Democratic Convention as the candidate on the first ballot, having secured 616 votes. Ex-Governor Hill came next with a total of 112 votes. The Democratic platform promises to repeal the McKinley law and demands the revision of the tariffs in the direction of free raw materials, a reduced duty on manufactured goods, and concludes with endorsing Home Rule for Ireland.

Prince Bismarck arrived at Munich on the 24th, at two in the morning. Notwithstanding the early hour, an ovation from thousands awaited him in the streets.

RAVACHOL has been found guilty of numerous murders and sentenced to death. Another of his tribe, Deeming, has already been hanged.

THE creditors of the New Oriental Bank have confirmed a resolution for voluntary winding up of the corporation.

AS usual, the Under-Secretary of State for India presented the Indian Budget, on the 20th, in the House of Commons, on the eve of dissolution, to empty benches. There were only six members present. He referred to the silver question without committing himself to any particular view. At the same time, he thought the fall in the rupee was a claim on Government for strict economy in every direction. The high price of the Indian securities, he cited as the best proof of the stability of the Government. It was not impossible, according to him, to reduce the duty on salt at some future time.

In Committee Sir Roper Lethbridge elicited from Mr. Curzon the reply, that it was impossible to make the exchange on pensions two shillings per rupee and to reduce the term of service to twenty-five years. Putting all Europeans in the service on the most favored furlough and pensions scale would, if the counsels of the Select Committee were accepted, give the Natives an equal right to the same consideration, which was precluded by the expense.

AGAIN, there is rumour of Lord Lansdowne's early retirement and official denial by Lord George Hamilton of his nomination as the next Viceroy of India.

THE cyclone in the Bay of Bengal in the beginning of the month, was one of the strongest observed in recent years. The formation was a very sudden one as is generally the case. On the 1st of June there was not the least apprehension of such a storm wave. In the South of the Bay, a strong monsoon was blowing, and the surmise was that it was extending northwards. On the 2nd there was irregular distribution of pressure in the surrounding coasts, being high at the head of the Bay, and the look was suspicious. The next day almost the same condition prevailed, the wind being cyclonic but of moderate force in the northern half of the Bay. The day after a sudden fall of pressure was observed almost all over the Bay and the coasts, with the same irregularity in the north of the Bay, the cyclonic wind being less marked. The barometer though moderately falling, the condition of the Bay continued much the same on the following day. Except a rapid fall and a tendency to cyclonic circulation of the wind on the north, nothing more was observable on the 6th. In the south the winds were south-western on the 7th, the barometer falling moderately, nearly tenth of an inch, especially at the west coast, from Gopalpore to Madras, accompanied by marked cyclonic winds. The apprehension was that the centre of the storm was to the east of Gopalpore with a tendency to advance towards Orissa. The cyclone was now rapidly developing. On the morning of the 8th the centre was to the east or south-east of False Point. The lowest pressure then at Pooree was recorded at 29.425. The storm signals were hoisted this morning at the Hooghly stations and the Orissa ports. At 4 A. M. of the 9th "great danger" signals were exhibited at the Hooghly stations and at Calcutta, indicating the storm's probable advance towards them. This day was terribly cyclonic being more severe than in the previous storm of November last. The centre was advancing slowly towards the north. At 2 A. M., it was due east of False Point. Mr. Milner, a Senior Branch Pilot, who was on board the Sarsuti, fixed the calm centre of the storm on the evening of the 9th at 55 miles east by north of False Point, or about 80 miles south of the mouth of the Hooghly. During the night the storm advanced rapidly and recurved towards the west. At 2 A. M. of the 10th it was west-south-west of Saugor Island, the centre crossed the coast about 40 or 45 miles west of the mouth of the Hooghly at about 6.30 A. M., between Balasore and Saugor Island, the barometer at Balasore recording the low pressure of 28.670 inches. At 8 A. M., the centre was to the north-west of Balasore with a pressure of 28.731 inches, and on the 10th it advanced north-westerly towards Chota Nagpur. The rate of advance was more rapid than before. On the following day the centre was on the extreme south-west of Chota Nagpur and on the 12th at about 8 A. M. it was close upon Sutna. Here, the storm began to fill up and by the 14th, it was all over.

The cyclone travelled over an extensive area, its force being considerably felt at Chittagong, Akyab, Diamond Island, and even down to Coconada. Heavy rain accompanied this severe storm, and Orissa, Chota Nagpur and Behar had a large proportion of it. South-west Bengal had a normal share, in the east and north it was comparatively small. The storm over, the monsoon winds prevailed, stronger than usual in the north of the Bay. On the 16th, there was a fresh but very slight barometric depression near Bhamphore, with feeble cyclonic circulation of wind about that place. It continued the next day, entirely disappearing on the 18th. Up to the 21st, the ordinary monsoon weather prevailed almost everywhere in the Bay. In Bengal, it was of a very ordinary character. At Galle of a very strong one. The two following days the monsoon was blowing strong in the Bay with a break in rains in Bengal. Much the same condition was observed the next day with a strong wind in the north of the Bay. This morning the pressure came down slowly over the entire Bay, but it was more than normal, and irregular winds were blowing in south Bengal. In the north-west angle of the Bay it was a little stronger than usual with a rough sea. The rainfall in Calcutta was about an inch, with an equal amount at Chittagong.

There is as yet no indication of the general destruction—"loss of life and property by the inclemency of the weather on the 27th"—calculated by "Jyotishi Kulendra Prasad Saraswati," towards the end of last month.

THE Secretary of State for India has ruled that officers, on accepting high permanent appointments, which may extend over five years or more, must forego the intention of applying for ordinary furlough within two years from the date of their appointment.

The rule is made applicable to civil officers as also to military men in civil employ. It is, however, open to the Government of India and the Local Administrations to grant leave of absence when an officer is forced to apply for it by sickness or urgent private affairs. The Government of India, in its turn, empowers the Local Government or Departments which ordinarily grants the leave, to decide in each case whether the special circumstances are, or are not, of such a nature as to justify a relaxation of the rule. It is left to the Government of India to determine to which of the higher grades in each department of the service the rule will apply. There is as yet no delegation of this power to the Local Administrations. The Government of India had opposed the rule as neither necessary nor desirable. The instances which might have suggested it were not of frequent occurrence, inasmuch as an officer permanently appointed to a high post would not willingly forego the pay of the post in favour of leave allowance, which is independent of the pay and much less in amount. The Secretary of State was firm. He found the facts different and saw no reason to change his opinion.

We may mention that Lord Cross would not press his other suggestions made with the object of reducing the home charges by amendment of the Civil Furlough Regulations. These suggestions did not find favor with the Government of India as not having any appreciable financial effect.

FOR the Jangopal Mallik Scholarship for education in Europe, the rules of which were published in Reis and Rayyet in November last, fourteen candidates presented themselves. Six of these came under the rules, having passed the recent F. A. examination in the first division. The other eight were graduates, but as according to the terms of the Scholarship it could not be awarded to other than F. A.s passed at the last examination, the occasion did not arise for taking the graduate-candidates' qualifications into consideration. The choice has fallen on Sarat Kumar Chakravarti of the Presidency College, son of Pandit Behari Lal Chakravarti, of Nimtola, in this city. Sarat goes to England to prepare himself for the Civil Service competition of 1895 or 1896, for both of which he is by age eligible.

THE Registrar-General has taken notice of the waywardness of his inspecting staff. The Inspectors are prohibited from inspecting offices at unusual hours and on Sundays. It is, however, free to them to examine the office records on the weekly holidays if the officer in charge agree.

OUR own news from the Happy Valley is as queer as ever. One of the Members of the Council has worked himself into the confidence and into the credulity of the Maharaja. He has offered his terms for the full restoration of the Chief to his own. The abolition of the Council and the deportation of the royal brothers are no great matter with him. The price claimed for these offices is the Prime-ministership and the appointment of his son—now on employ in British India—to a high office in the state.

THE suspended head assistant and Treasurer of Colonel Prideaux in the Oudh and Mysore Pensions office, has turned up at Cashmere, under the ægis of his old friend and patron, the Resident. He has already made himself a terror in the state.

He is not satisfied with an immediate contract for Rs. 35,400. He must have its terms wholly suited to himself. The Revenue Member and the Governor of Jumna confess themselves beaten in his awful presence. They cannot but submit to the Resident's Own.

THE English papers report a remarkable phenomenon :—

"The British ship Habitant, Captain Potter, from Hull, which arrived at New York on May 16, reports having met a remarkable number of icebergs in latitude 49 deg. 30 min., longitude 45 deg. 20 min., on May 10. When the fog lifted in the morning the ship seemed to be in a great valley, with peak after peak of ice towering all around amid acres of floating ice-cakes 6 feet or 8 feet above the water. The captain counted twenty-five bergs within sight, averaging from 100 feet to 250 feet high. For some hours the ship sailed along a narrow passage between ice mountains, reflecting all the colours of the rainbow in the bright sunlight. Clear water was not entered until night, when the ship had run seventy-five miles through the ice. The captain thought he had taken a course far enough south to escape all the ice."

That was an unique sight—a spectacle of beauty and sublimity to inspire the poorest and most languid imagination. The danger of the situation was an additional element of fascination. Had there been notice of it, it would have been worth while sending a deputation from the Academies of Art and of Letters to await in the neighbourhood of the gulf stream the descent of the multitudinous icebergs down the Atlantic. With what enthusiasm would Ruskin have reported the sight! Perhaps Turner and Coleridge only could do justice to it, each in his line. We wonder if Swinburne, our grandest living rhapsodist on the sea, will be tempted to paint it from hearsay.

THE Madras Standard notes :—

"The Reis and Rayyet heads its weekly notes 'Weeklyana.' We may hereafter hear of Dailiana, Monthliana, Quarterliana, Yearliana, &c., &c."

No wonder. And no harm, either—except to ourselves, truth to tell. The fact is that there is an inordinate passion abroad in this country to copy Reis and Rayyet—not only our literary forms in writing but also our very headings. "Reis and Rayyet" and "Prince and Peasant" have become stock phrases with speakers and writers and we have no complaint. Every trumpery new venture in Lebdomadal journalism is a weekly newspaper and review of Politics, Literature and Society, with additions into the bargain, such as Science and Art, Commerce and what not besides. As if every conductor who can with difficulty present the news of the day in tolerable or intolerable grammar and work out some sort of an editorial out of his head, is entitled to call his printed rag a "review"!

The headings of two of the three different original sections of our journal have been so adopted by others that we have repeatedly changed them. We would not have minded at all had the headings been utilized for appropriate matter. But it was the fact of their being used for departments of cuttings and clippings that annoyed us, considering that we used them as sign-posts to direct the reader to matter more or less original, to writing of our own, or news carefully selected on a principle of our own and presented in our own way, or at least accompanied by some remark or information or anecdote from our own stores.

All the three departments of our paper from the beginning of the columns of miscellaneous news—now Weeklyana—to the end of the leading columns and, not unoften, as in this issue, even beyond, are in the highest commercial sense original as our own handiwork or rather brain work. Original too is our correspondence, as, except under peculiar circumstances, we do not publish any letter which has appeared in any other paper, and many a time have we broken up matter ready in type on seeing it in another newspaper. Likewise, our very "Official Papers" are often original in the sense that we alone of, and before, all the Press, by our enterprise and outlay, obtain them for the good of the public. From a public too dull and indifferent we rarely get any thanks for the service, though we may easily find ourselves in a hole. Indeed, the hazardous nature of the game prevents us from drawing pointed attention to our achievement, or else the laggard public would know more frequently, and think more highly, of our enterprise.

We wonder our contemporary did not criticise the issue of our mint, pointing out its glaring inaccuracy and say that it should be Weekliana and not Weeklyana.

REIS & RAYYET.

Saturday, June 25, 1892.

THE TRUTH ABOUT LOCAL SELF-GOVERNMENT.

SIR Charles Elliott is justly entitled to the thanks of all experienced and right-minded persons who are not carried away by the craze for an impossible self-government in Bengal, for his action towards amendment of the mofussil municipal Act. This action shows that he has discerned the difficulty of managing large and important municipalities through non-official chairmen, and realised the necessity of altering the present arrangement whenever it was found desirable for the efficient administration of the civic affairs of a city or town. An agitation is going on against the proposed moderate change in the law, but it is totally devoid of any real representative element and is as half-hearted and empty as such movements generally are and of which we have seen enough. Such meaningless and reckless agitations—such make-believe clamour—should always be treated with contempt. What is the worth of bogus telegrams reporting meetings of schoolboys and resolutions by nobodies? Government should take care to ascertain who's who? and what's what? Above all, Government should weigh the facts and arguments adduced against, rather than the numerical strength of the mob opposed to, the proposed revision of the Act, which, in its present shape, is doing harm. It is all very well to talk and write without knowing the real state of things, or criticise without possessing the necessary power of observation. It is very easy to please a mob of thoughtless school-boys and irresponsible enthusiasts with long and oratorical harangues, but not so to examine soberly and minutely the administration of a municipality and judge its effect upon the people. Since the introduction of the present system, things have, in many municipalities, gone from bad to worse, so much so that the municipal administration has become a burning scandal, and sensible people of all classes speak in unmistakable terms against it. Experience has forcibly demonstrated at least two things: (1) that the non-official element is wholly wanting in that power of control, self-reliance, and independence of action which are the life and soul of all administrations, and (2) that it does not possess that official administrative training without which it is generally impossible for a man to control and rule scores of servants and officers belonging to a corporation and command the respect of a town. Besides, many of our men are physically disqualified to exercise the active functions of a Chairman or a Vice-Chairman. There are again some who, if otherwise much better than others, are thoroughly conscious that they have not sufficient leisure at their disposal to devote to and promote local self-government, nevertheless the greed of power and influence impels them to canvas for and obtain such appointments.

The causes of municipal failure are not far to seek. They lie on the surface. They are congenital. Nor is there occasion for surprise. What ground had anybody to expect success? Is it possible for men who have never controlled half a dozen servants in their life to any purpose, to control properly a multitude of subordinates of different castes and grades? Can they command their allegiance? Can they send a thrill of awe through their veins by a frown of their forehead or by a stroke of their riding whip? Is it likely that men who have lived for generations in most wretched and dirty habitations, with all insanitary surroundings, and many of whom, notwithstanding their great boast of enlightenment and knowledge of sanitation, are still living in such houses where it is difficult to stand for half an hour without inconvenience and fear of some kind to one's health, will be able to look after the sanitation of a town? A person who is quite incapable of putting his own house in order, is entrusted with the duty of looking after the health and life of a city and improving its sanitary condition. Nothing madder than this is possible to conceive. I have seen non-official executive heads of municipalities being insulted by their subordinates and quite incapable of punishing the delinquents adequately and promptly and making their orders obeyed. Firmness, courage and manliness are absent in many of them without which it is quite impossible to successfully govern or control even on a small scale. This will account for the notoriously bad collections which cannot be denied. There are again many subordinates who are one way or the other connected with the Chairman, the Vice-Chairman or this Commissioner or that, and the executive cannot keep a tight hand over them, either for personal reasons or for fear of some Commissioners. They are no doubt very good at drawing up elaborate reports and satisfactory explanation, or in examining accounts, &c., but they cannot do that amount of good to the ratepayers and residents of a town in three months which an official Chairman does by his one morning's ride. One dhamki from the magistrate or his Deputy or Joint to the overseers, tax collectors or clerks will make them shudder and stand a whole day on their legs to do a particular work—a result the Babu cannot obtain by writing six sheets of paper in good and grammatical English. I have never seen a Babu Chairman or Vice-Chairman ride, although there may be some exceptions to the rule. Many do not know to ride, others do not attempt it, being in such miserable health. Some of these city fathers are miserable pictures of physical depravity and health. Some are subject to diabetes and some to asthma or dysentery, and it is hardly practicable for them to move conveniently in their professional circle, not to speak of a large town. Can we expect that these gentlemen will make useful, energetic and careful executive Heads of a municipality?

A magistrate or an official Chairman sees nearly one fourth of the town every morning before he takes his breakfast. Among the lower ranks of the corporation, his administration is effectually conducted by the point of his whip instead of his quill. His orders are respected and obeyed and his wishes readily carried out by the high and the low. He never hesitates to punish an officer on any personal or private grounds. He knows how to abuse the sweeper and how to threaten the overseer. If he asks anything for the good of the town, whether in cash or kind, it is readily given by the wealthy. A non-official Chairman cannot get a farthing from any one even if he begs for it. I know some of the best native non-official Chairmen and Vice-Chairmen and have great respect and regard for them as polite, honest, educated and good gentlemen, but many of them are too weak and quiet for superintending and administering a municipality. There are some exceptions, of course, but then their previous official training stands them in good stead. People erroneously think that university degrees and some success in a profession, whatever its nature might be, suffice to qualify a man for the most difficult work of municipal administration, for which great experience of the world, ample leisure, capacity for hard labour, much tact, and, most of all, sober courage and special training in business are indispensably necessary. These can mostly be acquired gradually, according to opportunities and not at the expense of the inhabitants of large towns, such as Dacca and Puri. There is much difference between the management of a godown, a large mudi shop, a class of schoolboys or a school, of a jute mill, a nursery, a Zemindari or a money-lending business, and that of a municipality, which avaricious and ambitious people cannot clearly see.

Municipal Commission is fast becoming a lucrative and charming profession, and municipalities have become paying concerns. The head executive offices are the prize appointments of the department and are therefore greatly coveted by all and especially by that profession which is most well paid and covetous.

Pleaders, particularly the prosperous among them, have very little time to devote to anything except their own profession, but this notorious fact never deters them from canvassing for the Chairman- and Vice-Chairmanships of Municipalities and District Boards, and the number of these aspirants is yearly increasing.

In conclusion, I must insist that I am not deficient in patriotism. I may add that I have had the experience of both the posts and have some real sympathy with the local self-government scheme, if it be warily introduced and if our application for its general extension is based upon the maxim of "first deserve and then desire."

—TRUTH.

A SKETCH OF

THE HISTORY OF THE PRESS IN INDIA.

By DR. SAMBHU C. MOOKERJEE.

As practised in this country, down to this century, the employment of a corps of scouts and spies was not an improper thing, nor so regarded. The official name for spy was hilkdrá or harkard—no offensive word certainly, being now a synonym for messenger. Nor was the occupation of a harkard or spy a disreputable one. On the contrary, it was an office of honour and distinction, because of great confidence. Raja Ram Narain Singh of Midnapore (brother of Raja Raj. Narayan Sing, a powerful landlord and a political factor,) as the head of the harkards and in charge of the Intelligence Department of Nawab Serajud Dowla, enjoyed the emoluments and held the position of one of the Principal Ministers of State. The famous Trimbakji Dangleah of Mahratta history originally held without reproach the post of a jasos or spy.

The correspondence between the British of Calcutta and the Country Powers during the Revolutionary Period in Bengal, which commencing with the death of Nawab Mahabbat Jung culminated in the grant of the Dewani to the British, printed in Parliamentary Papers or Proceedings or published in books or pamphlets in various interests, frequently mention hirkaras on both sides. There is a valuable collection of official records published under the title of Original Papers, in 2 vols., in London, 1765, in which one comes from time to time on such notices as—"advices of my hircaras."—vol. I., p. 147. The "papers of news" mentioned in that book are, of course, newspapers, written out from information brought in by the hircaras or spies—or newsmen, or special correspondents if you will.

The old Hindu system, adopted by the Mahomedans, was followed by the Europeans in India in quite the indigenous manner, though of course with a hastening decline in dignity of the service. In proof, I would refer you to an old publication, Hadley's Grammar of the Moors, with a Vocabulary. This curious and historically valuable book, of which I have a copy of the 6th edition, dated London, 1801, was published towards the end of the last century. It contains a typical conversation between an officer (English) and a spy into the backwoods of the Burdwan country to enquire after an aboriginal Chief with whom there was then war.

Proof still more clinching that neither the new British Government of India nor individual officers looked with disfavour upon the employment of the agency, is furnished by the fact of the adoption of the native word for spy for the name of one of the earliest ventures of the British in India in the journalism of print. Long the most respectable and the ablest English newspaper in Bengal was the Bengal Hircarah, dated from the last century. That was the old spelling, while the old meaning was spy. The spelling was changed from Hircarah to Hurkaru in the early part of the present century, while the meaning still continued. It is superfluous to insist that the learned gentlemen and officers of position who presided at the baptism of the newspaper, would not have adopted for it such a designation, if any the slightest opprobrium attached to the word hurkaru or its English synonym, in either Indian or Anglo-Indian acceptation.

It was usual in squibs in rival journals to suggest The Bengal Peada or the Bengal Porter as the equivalent of the Bengal Hurkaru, and, in later times, when the old traditions were forgotten and words acquired a new significance, the name was usually rendered the Bengal Messenger. This version was the accepted one, and it was certainly true to the philology of the day. But a Peada or a menial messenger was too humble a character to tempt the English in undemocratic times when dignity was observed in the smallest matters, and specially in India where it was most cultivated, to adopt it for the title of a newspaper, at a time when newspapers first came into existence and consequently enjoyed a unique importance. It is reasonable to suppose, therefore, that the name Hircarah or Hurkaru was taken not for its humility but rather for its dignity as well as appropriateness. The Hircarah or The Spy was certainly a designation fit and honourable for a newspaper as suggesting the importance and usefulness of a recognized and respectable service which used to supply the earliest accurate news.

In tracing the origin of the Press to its sources, I commenced with unfolding the whole system of the ancient Hindu ministry of state, and dwelt on the prominence given in it to the Intelligence Department. Allow me now to show the function of that Department in the Mahomedan Polity which rose on the ruins of Hindu government. The conquerors, who exhibited no violent intolerance towards the institutions of the conquered, no doubt heard of the solicitude of the national rulers for obtaining a regular and timely supply of correct information as an auxiliary to government. This is not so simple a matter as tyros in human nature and human history might suppose. The necessity of procuring intelligence about the enemy is so obvious that even savage tribes must be supposed to recognize it, at least in war time. Yet so conservative and barren is the mind of man that the next step, apparently so easy, to perceive the desirability of it in the piping times of peace, is not attained by many peoples in a state of considerable social advancement. Still more rare is it to see the idea so grasped and utilised or to lead to a system of intelligence and information at home and abroad as among the old Hindus. Thus, although all the best points in Mahomedan policy were of indigenous origin or Hindu suggestion, yet it was long before the very rudiments of the Hindu system of intelligence were adopted and longer still before a regular department arose among the Mahomedans. Even Akbar, the greatest administrative and social reformer, did not thoroughly grasp the utility of an intelligence department. His famous Regulations, embodying the model of all subsequent organization in India, do not provide for one. Yet before the decay of Mogul Power one was established.

As in regard to the Hindu period I cited no wild Purdna or staggering Itihasa but a law book—the code of Manu himself, so in regard to the Mahomedan times I will cite, if not an analogous, yet an equally business-like and satisfactory authority—a word-book. A vocabulary or glossary is above all nonsense, in a greater degree than even a juridical treatise. It deals simply in bare facts, without any sort of embellishment. I cite, therefore, Gladwin's Dictionary of Mohammedan Law, and of Bengal Revenue Terms, with a Vocabulary. Persian and English. Calcutta: From the Press of Thomson and Ferris, 1797. Francis Gladwin, who modestly represents himself as a compiler, was one of the earliest Englishmen who led his countrymen, fresh to the difficulties of Indian administration, through the mazes of Hindustani and Persian speech. He was no mere word-catcher that lives on syllables, having distinguished himself by the translation of important literary and historical works from Oriental languages. He was better acquainted with the whole system of government to which his lucky countrymen had succeeded almost by a fluke, than any other man. Therefore, I the more readily look into this guide to administrative and business terms prepared by him for the benefit of his countrymen, and come upon some curious facts. There were several sorts of reporters, though most of them did not bear affinity to journalism. In their laudable solicitude for information, the British have only followed their predecessors. Nor was Mogul Centralization a whit less perfect than British. The Mahomedan rulers took particular care to preserve the boundaries of the Empire. Not a rupee of the revenue of a straggling village on the skirts was left unaccounted for. The administration of the farthest Province was as regular and as systematically attended to, as that of the metropolitan districts. The difficulties of frontier management were well-understood, and to meet its special requirements a special officer of ability and experience as well as dignity was stationed on each frontier Province. He was appropriately called Sewanahnigar. The term is explained by Gladwin as meaning

"An officer stationed by the Mogul Government, in distant provinces, to transmit weekly to court, an account of all public transactions, such as the collection of the revenues, the management of the lands, and the state of the country."

An officer who transmits weekly an account of all public transactions and of the state of the country, no doubt in part fulfilled the part of a local newspaper, but he is not to be confounded with a journalist, inasmuch as the accounts were not available to the public, and as the staple of their contents was purely administrative information, to the exclusion of all others. These weekly accounts were simply official despatches, and as frequently conveying frontier political news—accounts of border raids, of the intentions, perhaps, of the attacks of next neighbours, of encroachments of the landlords or fiscals of other states, and so forth—they were necessarily confidential communications.

After all, it was only on the distant frontiers that the Sewanahnigars were located. There was, however, a similar provision for information from all the Provinces, far and near, in the Wakanagars. Let us see what Gladwin has to say on this head:—

"WAKANAGAR. A writer of news, or occurrences. There were formerly officers, established under this name, throughout every part of the empire, whose business it was to transmit weekly to court, by the post, an account of the collection, the management of the lands, and other matters which came to their knowledge, respecting the country and the revenues. A head Wakanagar resided at Patna, and his deputies were dispersed through every district."

Here then, at last, was a news agency of the modern sort. Here we have in embryo the Akhbarnavis and his akhbar.

There was a Waka business at least as old as Akbar. The famous Institutes of that great sovereign, the Ayin Akbari, as given in the contemporary history of his worthy Minister, mentions with distinction the office of Wakyahnaves. But although the words are apparently cognate and synonymous, they are not the same things. They represent very different occupations. Akbar's Wakanavis was an office of record of all the doings of the Emperor and of his government, in peace or war, and of all official transactions from day to day, taken down and laid before His Majesty every day, while a precis was made, doubtless for convenience of reference in future. The idea was worthy of an Emperor and it was carried out with imperial vigour and success. It was the Diary of the Empire and its Master, for it included abstracts of all important reports from the country at large in all its Provinces. But it was not a newspaper. There was no establishment of intelligencers or couriers or carriers attached to the Department, and though the Yaddast prepared in it was a daily chronicle of the Empire, it was not, so far as can be discerned from Allami's description, available, even in its precis, to the general public. Still it was in its way a fine germ of journalism, which developed into the Wakanagar of the great-grandson.

Before dismissing this part of my history, I must put in one word, to prevent misunderstanding. Although no prominence is given in the great Emperor's system to the machinery for obtaining intelligence, he was not without his couriers and spies. Without such a service he could scarcely get on. No commandant in the field could venture to march without the reports of scouts. We learn incidentally that Akbar had an establishment of a thousand. Under the head of Mewra or Mehra, in the military regulations, we see that these were chosen from a particular tribe, the Mewatis. They are said to be admirable for quick messages; excellent spies who will engage in the most difficult undertakings. Their being placed in the military department did not, of course, restrict their service to it.

The earliest distinct mention of antetypographic newspapers that I have discovered in the annals of Mahomedan India, so rich in historical literature, is in the times of Alimgir I. Notwithstanding the Emperor's prohibition, a hereditary historian, Mahammad Hashim, known in literature as the celebrated Khafi Khan, managed to record in secret the occurrences of that eventful period. In the year of the Hijri, 1110, corresponding with the year of Christ 1698-99, occurred the death of Ram Raja of Sattara, of the House of Sivaji. This was in the forty-third year of the reign of the Emperor Aurungzebe. At any time the death of the Mahratta Chief would have been an important political occurrence. But at the time when it took place, when the great Emperor was prosecuting his long and endless warfare in the South, with the Mahrattas among other Powers, it was to Aurungzebe no less than to the distracted heirs of the inheritance of Sivaji, a momentous event. How did the Emperor come by his knowledge of it? It was not from any official despatch or any special courier that he learnt of it, any more than from one of his advanced pickets or scouts. No staunch ally or adherent nor faithful feudatory sent the message. The first intimation was brought to the imperial camp by the newspapers. We read in the Muntakhabul Lubab of Khafi Khan:—

"The news-papers now reported that Rám Rája, after encountering some ill luck and failure in his descent upon Berár, was returning to his own mountain home, when he died on the way, leaving three sons of tender years, and two wives. Immediately afterwards it was announced that the eldest son, a boy of five years of age, had died of small-pox. On this the chiefs appointed Tára Bál, the chief wife, and mother of one of the sons, Regent. A clever intelligent woman, she had made a name during her husband's lifetime by her knowledge of civil and military affairs. Tára Bál proceeded to the almost inaccessible hills."

Nor did the Emperor disbelieve the account. Had it been one newspaper, it might have been imprudent to give it implicit credence and shape state action upon the information. A single sheet might be manufactured by the designing and thrown on purpose into the imperial camp to mislead. But the text uses the plural number. Evidently, more than one journal brought the same news, so the Emperor had no ground for doubt. He had confidence in the good faith as well as the accuracy of the Press. Accordingly, adds the Mussulman annalist:—

"On receiving this intelligence, the Emperor ordered the drums of rejoicing to be beaten,.....the soldiers congratulated each other,.....saying that another prime author of the strife was gone.....and that (now) it will not be difficult to overcome two young children and a helpless woman. They thought their enemy weak, contemptible and helpless; but Tára Bál, as the wife of Rám Rája was called, showed great capacity for command and government, and from day to day the war spread and the power of the Mahrattas increased."

That, following the preceding extract, if you will observe it closely, is a most suggestive passage. Besides the existence in number of newspapers, it proves several other things—their character, quality, status, and usefulness. It has been surmised that the so-called newspapers in the East, before the era of printing in this century, were simply confidential reports to Government. Such, certainly were not these Indian papers of the seventeenth century. They were not of the nature of special news-letters for the eye of the Emperor himself only or the Emperor and his confidential Ministers. They were in every sense newspapers—that is, public vehicles for the dissemination of news of the day. And they constituted a genuine Press—unto the best sense, as I mean to show presently. The Mahomedan annalist gives us clearly to understand that the common soldiers in Aurungzebe's camp were supplied with their newspapers like the British privates before Sebastopol, and like them discussed their contents. It will be seen that no modern journal—no telegram in the Times from its Paris or Berlin Correspondent is more implicitly believed in, or is capable of creating a more profound impression, than the manuscript newspapers mentioned by Khafi Khan. Nor is this a solitary instance. With a liberality which the Princes of Europe themselves might follow with the best results to themselves and their states, the former rulers of India allowed the utmost liberty to the press in, at any rate, the matter of news, and thus enabled the newspapers to be more useful than they otherwise might be. These did not spare princes and satraps, and they took cognizance of news sure, in colloquial parlance, to cause a row. A remarkable example is afforded by Aurungzebe in his latest relations with his grandson, Mirza Azim Oshan. This Prince held the important government of Bengal and Behar. As such he was second in resources and power to the Emperor himself. Yet the Bengal newspapers did not scruple to expose him. He was not a bad specimen of a Mogul Prince, but he had his foibles, as who has not? and these were seized by the argus eye of the journalists of the day. His Highness certainly harboured views of succession to the throne, like the rest of his family, and it was I believe with that object that he set himself to cultivate the people. But in procuring the good will of the Hindu subjects of the Empire, he went to lengths which could not fail to displease the Mussulmans. For he actually celebrated the Hindu Festival of the Spring with the appropriate red powder and red liquid. This was an abomination to the Sunni bigot on the throne, as the ruler of Bengal well knew, and it was Azim Oshan's interest to keep his Hindu proclivities out of his stern grandfather's notice. He was so far successful in this that no formal complaints from the orthodox Mussulman community in these Provinces reached the imperial ears. But that did not prevent the Emperor knowing of his grandson's vagaries. The Press did its duty, without fear or favour. It was through the newspapers that Aurungzebe learnt the truth.

Another more serious foible of the prince was his avarice. He would make money at any cost. This left him a prey to evil advisers and sycophants who served their own purposes by pandering to the prince's weakness. Under such advice he essayed to add to his functions of the ruler the character of the chief merchant in the country. He began with monopolising all the seaborne imports and vending them to retailers. This was a hardship to the foreigners, chiefly Europeans, as well as to the people of the whole empire, and must have stopped the external commerce of the country. He established agents at all the ports to buy up the foreign cargoes cheap, to be afterwards disposed of by other agents to the best advantage to merchants and traders for circulation throughout the land. The Europeans and Armenians who were the importers were threatened with the loss of their occupation, but they found complaining to the Viceroy useless and they dared not appeal to the Emperor. Luckily, there was in the Judimentary Press an indirect but effectual check even on satraps of the Blood Imperial. Again the journalists did their duty. The historians do not quote the words of the newspapers. I presume they allowed themselves no comments. It was enough to publish the news, and explain the system to which the Viceroy gave the name of Souda-e-khash—commerce in special—as distinguished from Souda-e-aam—commerce in general. Historians aver that Aurungzebe learnt of the innovation not from the official reports of his Sewanahnigars but from the newspapers. He immediately took steps for its discontinuance. On this double provocation, His Majesty wrote with his own hand to his grandson, commenting with bitter sarcasm on his vagaries. A yellow turban and saffron-coloured garments ill became a beard of forty-six years' growth, said the grave grandsire. As for Azim Oshan's fiscal reform, it was indeed Souda-e-khas, but only in the sense of personal insanity rather than particular commerce.

Under the Mogul Constitution in India, the revenue administration of the country was kept separate from the functions of maintaining military possession and preserving civil order. The theory was to leave these in different hands, and so they were left in the palmy days of the Empire. If latterly, from time to time, they became centred in the same hands, the offices and occupations themselves were always kept distinct, and there was a persistent tendency to their separation into several officers. One was the Nazim or Subadar, the Lieutenant of the Emperor, the Governor. The other was the Imperial Dewan or the Chief Fiscal or Revenue administrator. Thus, when Azim Oshan was appointed Nazim of these Provinces, the Dewanship was given to an experienced officer of Hindu extraction converted to Islam, by name Jafer Khan, under the title of Moorshed Kuli Khan. The capital of Bengal was then Dacca, where they both resided and worked.

Under the influences of poor human nature, the two offices are singularly well calculated to come into collision. Nor did the characters of the officers afford the least guarantee of mutual good understanding. The Viceroy was a Prince of the Blood, grandson of the Emperor, presumably a middle-aged imperial scapegrace who had not yet sown all his wild oats, surrounded by flatterers, and in whom the latitudinarianism of the House of Timour was barely kept under by fear of his austere grandsire. The Dewan was an abstemious bigot, careful of his pence and the pence of the state, who regarded an army for governing Bengal a costly luxury which could well be dispensed with. Moorshed Kuli Khan was always treading on the Prince's corns unawares. He insisted on reduction of establishments in order that he might send an ample tribute from the Province to Delhi. The Prince saw that the dignity and clat of his government was being continually shorn by this beggarly fiscal. His demands for money were frequently refused. Meanwhile, the viceregal court became the resort of disappointed soldiers of fortune, ambitious officers in the army, and dismissed officials in the civil service. Rowdies and desperadoes surrounded him at all times and poisoned his mind, already prepared by his own grievances, against Moorshed Kuli, until the Dewan's presence as well as office became hateful to him. At last, Azim Oshan, under the influence of his entourage, descended to a conspiracy against the faithful Moorshed's life. One morning as he was proceeding to pay his respects to the Prince at the Poshtah as usual, in his palki attended by a meagre retinue, he was stopped on the way by an ill-meaning crowd on pretence of demanding their pay. His guards showed funk, but the Dewan, who was no poltroon, at once descended from his vehicle and drew his sword. Unprepared for such a prompt exhibition of pluck, the rascals slunk away and dispersed, but not before the Dewan had recognized the leader Abdul Wahed, who commanded a favoured corps. Moorshed Kuli entered his palki and pursued his journey to the Poshtah and, presenting himself direct before Azim Oshan sitting in Durbar, reproached him for his pusillanimity in resorting to such underhand measures for compassing any one's death,—in the present case the death of a good servant, and challenged him to single combat there and then as the more honorable way of killing. The Prince was confounded. He, of course, denied his complicity in the attempt, if any had been made. But Moorshed urged that without superior countenance nobody could venture upon such an impertinence as to stop the Imperial Dewan in his passage or to meditate his destruction. The Prince could only feebly insist on his innocence and mutter his wonder and indignation at what had happened. The Dewan did not wait but went straight to the chancellery and summoning Abdul Wahed, gave him an order for the arrears due to his corps, and disbanded it. He now returned to his private residence and thence he wrote to the Emperor fortifying his complaint by a narrative signed and sealed by several public officers. Then in anticipation of sanction, and without the courtesy of a farewell salaam to the Prince, he removed himself and his office, with all the revenue records and establishments, to a fine village or township on the Bhagirati, not far from its confluence with the Ganges, which, first as the seat of the Dewan and the Dewani, and afterwards as the capital, became famous under the name of Moorshedabad.

The Viceroy doubtless did not neglect to report to the Emperor, remarking on the unaccountable hallucination under which one day, all of a sudden, the eccentric Dewan, of his own instance, removed the imperial exchequer and all the valuable records of generations of the most important Provinces of the Empire, to no body knows where! All to no purpose, however. Moorshed Kuli Khan's explanation must have been an able one and satisfactory enough. His character for veracity and probity supported it. And if anything was wanted to complete the favorable impression, that was supplied by the Press which was noted for its truth. No doubt the newspapers had before given some hints at least of the state of things in Bengal, and the strained relations between the two Chiefs of the state. And now they must have been full of the strange culmination, not only going into the origin and particulars of the famous quarrel but also informing the whole country of the great administrative coup, the change of venue of the Dewani and the whole Revenue Department, in detail. The end of it all was not only creditable to the Press and the Dewan, but also honourable to the Empire. Aurungzebe sanctioned the removal, supported his servant, and not only rebuked his grandson threatening with the severest punishment if a hair of his Dewan or an atom of his property were touched, but withdrew him from Dacca, bidding him to fix his residence at Patna. The virtual Government of Bengal was subsequently given to Moorshed Kuli.

Placed in full charge of Bengal, in both the Nizamat and the Dewani—the civil government and the revenue administration—Moorshed applied his whole energies and all the powers of his mind to justify the extraordinary confidence reposed on him by the Emperor. He attained the highest success and reaped its full reward from the justice of Aurungzebe. His chief solicitude was to acquire as large a surplus revenue as possible, which he religiously transmitted to Delhi. He held a great state ceremonial on the day of transmitting the treasure from Bengal once a year. The convoy was marched under a military escort with music playing and banners flying. The despatch was notified in the royal gazettes and newspapers, intimating the route to be followed, so as to warn the Governors and authorities on the way to facilitate the passage of the Bengal Tribute and take measures for its protection.

BABOO—NO GENTLEMAN.

EDITOR, "REIS AND RAYYET."

DEAR SIR,—What a perpetual butt of ridicule and contempt are the natives! Go where you will, dress any way you like, educate yourself as you will, you are sure to be pursued most pitilessly with this significant opprobrium. Natives can not be gentlemen, Babus, never.

A friend of mine, a few days ago, had been on a visit to an England-returned Bengali gentleman. This latter, though he had undergone all the phenomenal changes inevitable, and even married an English woman, had not altogether forgotten the traditions of his race, and was even courteous; in short, he seemed quite in touch with the much abused native, in spirit at least, if in nothing else.

My friend, accordingly, was graciously received in the drawing-room, where, on a sofa, the young hopeful of the host, of 12 or 13, lay absorbed in his own play.

And now the conversation began; from sympathetic it grew even warm: they seemed to enjoy each other's company. All on a sudden the boy enquired, in all the simplicity of his age, "Papa, who is he?" pointing to my friend. "A gentleman," was the brief reply of the father. That ogre of a boy seemed not satisfied, and with the conviction of one more knowing, rejoined whining, "No, he is not a gentleman, he is a Babu."

Horror of horrors! They could not be more surprised if the flooring beneath up-turned and outstarted a monster therefrom on the scene. The host grew red in spite of his native darkness, possibly more with shame at this bold unpleasant truth than rage, and rated his little hopeful soundly, my friend interceding all the while for the formidable juvenile, pleading his childhood, &c.

But who can describe the awkward position of my friend, the opposing feelings that agitated his breast, the painful efforts,

"The struggling pangs of conscious truth to hide?"

And this is how the very children of the "Darkies" are brought up, not to speak of the Whites and Browns and their issue! Yours,

JAY K. BANERJEE.

MR. CURZON ON INDIAN AFFAIRS.

The Hon. G. N. Curzon, Under-Secretary of State for India, addressed a great meeting of the Primrose League at Brighton, on May 10. After some references to general politics Mr. Curzon proceeded to give an account of recent frontier wars in India. The British Empire, he said, was spread over many seas and lands, and included the greatest maritime dominions and the greatest commercial dominions that the world had ever known, but no part of the Empire was equal in importance or comparable in prestige to India. If we lost India our sun would decline from the meridian, and there would be visible the first signs of the twilight of a long decay. But he had absolutely no fear of that result, not merely because he believed we were better fitted in India to meet any enemy than any enemy was to attack us, not merely because he believed our rule in India to be a wise and sagacious rule, just to the people and acceptable to the various classes and religions, but because he believed British character to be composed of the same fibre, that the same blood coursed in English veins, and the same pulses beat in English hearts as in the days when we carved our way to fortune and to fame. He would give three instances in recent history of acts of heroism calculated to make any English heart glow with pride. In India there were chronic petty frontier wars undertaken for the defence of the border, or of allied and feudatory States, against the turbulent clansmen, who inhabited the surrounding regions, wars not filling a large place in military or political history, but imposing a severe test on the character and capacity of soldiers taking part in them, fought as they were in a trying climate and with a small force against a numerous enemy expert in mountain and jungle warfare and animated with a savage bravery. If three niches in the temple of fame happened to be vacant he would commend to their notice three heroes of these wars. An expedition recently set out to coerce and punish two rebellious States among the mountains north of Cashmere in the depth of severe winter through a country so rugged and inhospitable that the enemy deemed themselves invulnerable. In the course of their advances they were confronted by the strongly fortified stone fort of Nilt, placed in an almost impregnable position. It was soon realised that entry was impossible unless the gate was broken in or destroyed. Captain Aylmer pushed forward and placed the slabs of dynamite at the gate in the face of a murderous fire. He ignited the fuse and retired. It failed, and the gallant fellow went back again, and, though three times wounded, succeeded. In an instant Captain Aylmer and Lieutenants Boisragon and Badcock, with their handful of men, were inside fighting like demons, and in five minutes not a single defender of the fort but was felled pell-mell down the valley. Continuing their way, the British troops were stopped by Sangars or stone breast-works on almost impregnable cliffs. For three weeks they sat down before their works, and then Lieutenant Manners Smith, with a hundred Ghoorkas and Dogras, undertook the task of storming them. They descended a ravine, crossed a river, and climbed the cliff higher and higher and were not discovered. Then they found that they had taken the wrong track, and had to descend and try again. Suddenly their presence was ascertained and down came upon their heads rock after rock from the defenders of the Sangars above. They held on until the moment came when they turned the corner, and then, with wild hurrahs, stormed the breastwork, and the deed was done.

Far away in another part of the Empire in Upper Burmah Lieutenant McMunn, followed by only 14 men with a camp following of 15 mules and three drivers, fought his way yard by yard and step by step for 24 miles in the face of an enemy greatly exceeding his force in numbers to the relief of a fortified post named Sadon. In the course of the march he and his little handful of men had to rush three stockades and to ford three deep rivers under a continuous rifle fire, but by that conjunction of prowess and luck which constituted heroism they pulled through to the end. Those three names of Captain Aylmer, Lieutenant Manners Smith, and Lieutenant McMunn, along with that of Captain Grant of Thobal, were names of heroes whom they should hold in honour. It was gratifying to know that British officers were thus showing in an age when war, he was told, had begun to be unpopular, and even surrender at any price had its advocates, that they were still made of the same grit which made a small island the Queen of the Seas. It was an answer to those who were always croaking about the attitude of the Indian peoples towards their British masters to say that it was not with British soldiers, but with Indian soldiers that these feats were accomplished. They followed English leaders and trusted them, and when he heard, in the House of Commons, men talking about India who knew nothing about it and who had never been there in their lives, and about the decrepitude or the hardness of British rule, he thanked his stars the defences of India did not depend in the last resort upon those voluble gentlemen of the town who would probably run away at the mere rattle of a popgun, but on true sons of the sword, who were also natives of the soil and who knew what British rule was and what it meant. He could not help rejoicing that he did not live in a day when the Universal Arbitration Society or the peace-at-any-price school had rendered it impossible for stout hearts and brave hands to defend by the sword that which by the sword was won, and which by the sword must be kept.

THE NATIVE PRESS.

Exception has been taken in interested circles to certain observations made by Dr. Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee in the paper recently read by him at the fiftieth meeting of the Hare anniversary. That an accomplished and scholarly writer like the Editor of the Reis and Rayyet should have condescended to notice the claims of certain newspapers to the estimation of the public is to be regretted. At first sight it would appear there was not much excuse to be personal in treating of a broad subject like the history of the Press upon which he was called to deliver an address. To do the speaker justice, however, it must be said that a history of the Press meant a history of individual journals that went to the making of that Press; and if we bear in mind the outspokenness and fearless candour that have always characterised the writings of the erudite Editor of the Reis and Rayyet, we need not feel surprised that he should have said what he honestly felt to be true, and what in the discharge of his duty as an honest historian he felt himself in duty bound to say. However distasteful his personal attacks may be to men of chiselled notions of propriety and decorum, we feel constrained to observe that, in the higher interests of truth and for the suppression of much intolerable humbug, it becomes imperative at times, on those that have the keep of the public conscience, to sacrifice sentiment for subject. Books like the "Rehearsal" or the "Dunciad" always have their value, and exercise a salubrious influence on society. Readers who have carefully followed the Reis from its birth in 1882, ought to know that it has always taken a particular delight in robbing the jackdaw of its borrowed feathers. In this age of humbug, when cunning thrives at the cost of honesty, and the true scholar or politician has to beg his daily crumb of bread, when worthless and unlettered sharpers and turncoats roll on the couch of luxury, it is sometimes a risky game, and often unpleasant to "good and virtuous" men, to unmask hypocrisy and dishonesty, or even to call a spade by its commonplace name of spade. Verily, it is folly to be wise where ignorance is bliss, and our friend has once been made to suffer and pay, rather dearly for his folly. We cannot permit ourselves the luxury of entering into an elaborate discussion as to whether the remarks passed by the lecturer in regard to some newspapers of Calcutta were unjust or unmerited. It would not be very wise to question the facts and figures that have been used by the Nestor of the native press who must have watched the little baby of the press as it first breathed the air of India, and through its successive stages of growth. Nor would such a discussion be of any benefit either to the public or to those papers that have come in for a large share of the speaker's censure. People whose conduct in life is not quite above suspicion ought to bear in mind the good old saying—"Let well alone." In conclusion, we may be permitted to hope that, now that some of our contemporaries have been made to see themselves as others see them, they will try to deserve the good opinion of the public and of themselves by withholding their support from such objects as tend to lower them in the estimation of all right thinking men.—The Indian Daily News, June 18, 1892.

Holloway's Pills.—In general debility, mental depression, and nervous irritability there is no medicine which operates so like a charm as these famous Pills. They purify the blood, soothe and strengthen the nerves and system, give tone to the stomach, elevate the spirits, and, in fact, make the patient sensible of a total and most delightful revolution in his whole system. They may be commended most unreservedly as the very best family medicine in existence. Though so powerfully efficacious they are singularly mild in their operation, and might be given with perfect confidence to delicate women and young children. They contain not a grain of mercury, or any other noxious substance, and cannot do harm. Delicate females and all persons of sedentary habits will find these Pills a blessing.

"IT RECOMMENDS ITSELF."
All who suffer find sure relief from

The Greatest Pain Cure Extant.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

BERTRAND DE BORN.

BY MRS. HOARE.

Henry the Second, harassed by the continued rebellion of his eldest son, Henry, at length went over with an army to France, in order to put down an insurrection which the young prince had raised among his vassals in Guienne. Bertrand de Born, Lord of Hautefort, was a noble equally celebrated for his poetic talent as a troubadour, and his valor as a warrior. He warmly espoused the cause of young Henry, and accompanied him to the castle of Martel, whither he had retired on hearing of his father's approach. The king encamped at Turenne, and hostilities had already commenced, when a messenger arrived at the English camp, bearing tidings that Prince Henry was dangerously ill, and longed to see his father, and receive his forgiveness before he died. Henry, however, had so often been deceived by his rebellious son, that he believed this to be a ruse, and refused to lift the castle of Martel. The day or two the prince died, and Bertrand de Born, dreading the king's vengeance, fled to his castle of Hautefort, and prepared to hold it out against the English. After an obstinate siege, it was at length reduced, and Bertrand was taken and led bound into the presence of Henry. The king was about to pass sentence of death on him, when Bertrand in a few touching words, spoke of the love which the dead prince had ever borne him, and the monarch, bursting into tears, pardoned the Lord of Hautefort, and, for the sake of his son, restored to him all his honors and possessions.

Why do the island banners gleam, the island knights advance,
Mid strains of warlike minstrelsy, across the plains of France?
The island host lies camped within the walls of old Turenne,
And forth they sally to the fight, who never fight in vain.
The hall was draped with banners, and there a throne was set
For the haughtiest king of England's line, Henry Plantagenet.
He sat him down in silence, his nobles standing by;
And they that knew him well might mark strange trouble in his eye.

His cold stern lip was quivering, his furrowed cheek was pale,
His brow was dark with the shade it wore when he listed the fearful tale,
How vengeance muttered, half conceived, was fully wreaked the while,
And proud à Becket weltering lay in Canterbury's aisle.
An English knight came spurring fast, he rushed into the hall:
'Good news!' he cried, 'my liege, I bring from Hautefort's ruined wall.
The strong-barred gates are battered down, the citadel is ta'en;
Our soldiers forced their bloody way o'er pyramids of slain.'

'And there within the donjon, at bay, and fighting still,
We seized the traitor Bertrand, and bound him at our will.
Without he waits thy sentence—will it please my liege to see
The rebel lord in life, or shall we bear his head to thee?'
'Bring him in hither,' said the king, 'I fain would see him near,
Who dared to raise his arm in fight, spurning our kingly fear.'
They led the sword-reft prisoner in, his stalwart limbs bound tight;
The ducal they scattered on his head had dimmed its golden light.

The father rose, and still he gazed ere he was there,
His proud lips moved, yet sent they forth no utterance of prayer;
He bent no knee in reverence, there stood that prisoned knight,
As proud as when his cuirass gleamed and falchion waved in fight.
Ere he spoke the words he spake, and yet they touched a string
That thrilled the parent-stricken heart of England's mighty king:
A chord whose plaintive tones broke forth erewhile by Judah's sea;
'Would God I had died for thee, my son, would I had died for thee.'

'Thou art the monarch, sire,' he said 'of fair and wide domains;
Thy horse has scaled the craggy hills, and ploughed the level plains;
Thy voice that summoned to the fight made many a dwelling lone;
Thou hast taken away the peasant's child—canst thou bring back thine own?

Thy son whom once thou loved'st so well, thy first-born son lies low;
No brother watched beside his couch, no father smoothed his brow.
I only held him in my arms till death's dark fight was won;
I only heard his last sad words—'Father, forgive thy son!'

A strange thing is a parent's heart—the words that Bertrand spake
Were strong to move the old man's soul, as breezes stir a lake.
The steel-clad bosom sternly heaved, the cold, clear eye was wet,
Of him who never quailed in fight—Henry Plantagenet.
And soft, sad memories awoke of the blessed far-off time,
When his boy was in his infancy, and he was in his prime.
Could the bold rebel that had turned to gall his cup of joy,
Have been indeed the gladsome child, the darling, fair-haired boy,
That rode his squire-led war-horse, that waved the mimic brand,
And kissed his father's bearded lip and clasped his mailed hand?

Now, now the loving lips are closed, never to speak again,
Never to say, 'Forgive me, father—shall thy child plead in vain?
And pardon him who served me better than words can tell;
He sinned 'gainst thee, my gracious sire, loving thy son too well!'
Such thoughts passed through the monarch's breast, and gently then he spake:—

'Bertrand de Born, I pardon thee, for my dead Henry's sake.
Take back thy castle—take thy sword, but wield it not in strife
Against thy king, who gives thee now thy liberty and life.'

He said, and low the Norman lord bent down his haughty brow;
That heart the death-stroke might not break was swayed by kindness now.

They cut the bonds that held his arms, and as he grasped his sword,
'Oh I would,' he cried, 'that my dead lord could hear the blessed word!'

He was a falcon, soaring high on proud but erring wing;
He did not know his father's heart, I did not know my king.
Would he could stand before thee now, and bend a suppliant knee,
And say, 'Kind sire, I render here my life and love to thee!'
But he is gone, and I can nought but offer thee my part,
My sword, my vassals, and withal true fealty of heart.
As I have served thy princely son, I fain would serve thee now;
God grant that merrie England's crown may long rest on thy brow!

WEEKLYANA.

THE Lieutenant-Governor arrived here yesterday, leaving Darjeeling the day before. The guns from the Fort announced the advent in Calcutta a quarter of an hour before the arrival at Sealdah. He holds his Legislative Council to-day, when Mr. Risley introduces the Bill for amendment of the Bengal Municipal Act, 1884. Sir Charles Elliott starts to-morrow night on his tour in the Bankura and Southal Pergunnahs districts.

MR. E. N. Baker, from the 24-Pergunnahs, on leave, will act as Under-Secretary in the Finance and Commerce Department of the Government of India. Fortunate for him that Sir Auckland Colvin is not now the Financial Minister. Mr. F. R. S. Collier, from Moorshedabad, has been appointed Magistrate and Collector of the 24-Pergunnahs.

IN announcing, with the rest of the Indian press, the Ninth International meeting of Orientalists to be held in London in September next, the Hindoo Patriot on Thursday says in especial—"The Ponorart president of the Congress is the Duke of Connaught." Can any one say what is the position assigned by our Patriotic friend to His Royal Highness in connection with the next assembly of Orientalists? "President" may be a freak of our contemporary's Pandemonium. But what Oriental language is "Ponorart"? It is not to be found in any English Dictionary. Not long ago, the Hindoo Patriot distinguished itself by the discovery of a new disease which it christened thisis. It acquires another feather to its cap by the creation of a new office or the coining of a new designation for an old office.

THE Judge of Alipur having, in the case in connection with the piggery on Mount Parisnath, decreed against the Jains, they have appealed to the High Court. For the last two weeks and more, Sir Comer Petheram and Justice Chandra Madhub Ghose have been hearing the case, Mr. Woodroffe, the officiating Advocate General, arguing on behalf of the Jains, Mr. Jackson being on the other side.

KUNDA Kedar Nath Chowdry Bahadur, of Mohiary, is undergoing trial in the Howrah Police Court on a charge of obstructing a thoroughfare. The Teli Bahadur has at least the consolation of good company in his misfortune—in the Brahman Raja of Muktagacha.

A POST CARD has put a girdle round about the world in seventy days. On the 19th March it was sent from London via Vancouver to Hong Kong where it was delivered on the 28th April. The same day the reply being posted, it was received in London on the 30th May.

THE habit of editors manufacturing sensation in defiance of the reality, after descending to the rank and file of contributors, has now reached the riff raff. The Santipore correspondent of a morning contemporary complains of being compelled by divine vengeance to live in a furnace. He says that if the drought continues much longer, dire consequences will result! We hope no one will be frightened by this tale of distress into disturbing the gods with prayers for more rain for Santipore. She has had enough of ducking. There never was a serious complaint within the last two months. There has been rain from time to time and copious showers occasionally, and a heavy downpour at the end of last week.

The same correspondent reports the doings of the local Brahmos. They have already bought land and are about to commence a place of worship of their own, of a rather ambitious character. At least we are told that, besides a prayer hall, there will be a large room for a library and other necessary apartments. This not only looks like business, but it suggests numerical strength. But are there any Brahmos at Santipore? We never heard of any. An old Santiporean, a respectable gentleman, who is with us at the time of this writing, knows no Brahmos in his town. There are Gossains and Vaishnavs in any number, and of late Theosophists, Mohimites, et hoc genus omne.

THE Lalbagh sub-division in the Moorshedabad district has ceased to have an independent existence from the 1st July, 1892, being amalgamated with the Sadar sub-division, with the exception of the Sagardighi independent outpost and the Kalianganj thana which are included in the Jangipur and Kandi sub-divisions, respectively.

KAYASTHAS are Kshetryas, according to some Kayasthas. They are Brahmans too, according to some members of the Kayastha Sabha of Etah. Such is the latest development of the claim.

THERE is a demand for pipe water in Travancore. The Travancore Times "hears of a mass meeting in the open air to memorialize the Maharaja for a project to supply good water by pipes to Nagercoil, Kottar, Susindium, &c."

MR Alexander Pedler, Meteorological Reporter to the Government of Bengal, has been elected a Fellow of the Royal Society. He was one of the fifteen selected by the Committee of that learned body. We congratulate Mr. Pedler on his admission to the most eminent fraternity of savants in the British Empire.

THE oldest resident of New Jersey—"Uncle Jimmy" Layton—is dead. He had attained the age of 105 years.

THE personal estate in England of the late Mr. George Yule has been sworn at 71,550*l*.

WE read:—

"For years now it has been noticed of the New York woman that while she was the best-dressed female in the country, she was also the most inconspicuous. But a change, says the New York correspondent of the San Francisco Argonaut, has come over the spirit of her dream. This spring she has burst out like a tiger-moth, brilliant as to colour, gorgeous as to material, startling as to cut and make. She is pranked out in every sort of shade, her hat laden with flowers, her parasol as gay as Joseph's coat, her gown of varied hue raised daintily out of the dust and revealing to the gazer a petticoat that shines with a combination of bright colours that would shame a bird of paradise. Even her gloves have taken a sudden freak to be as conspicuous as they know how, and the modest blacks and tans of a season ago have given place to the most dazzling white, or palest grey, or a sort of mahogany-red, that rise up and strike you in the face half a block down the street. A peacock is not more brilliant than this fanciful being when arrayed in her best. Sometimes she is in black, striped gorgeously with yellow and green and pink. Bright pink and green ruffles show all round her petticoat's edge, and her diminutive waist has tight bands of stripes round it. Sometimes she is palely clad, with great wing-like frills of lace falling out round her neck and shoulders. As for her hats, the flowers that bloom in the spring bloom on them in immense bunches—every sort and shade of flower, some nodding high up in the air on long stalks, some twining round and round in thick wreaths. Over all she ties a huge white veil, with white flowers all over it and long ends hanging down her back. The most remarkable thing in this sudden freak of fashion to deck its votaries out like the rainbow is that there seems to be no heed paid to harmony or the careful combination of colours. At the recent society functions nobody's hat matched her dress, nobody seemed to consider that a bright yellow and black gown did not harmonise well with a pale-green and blue hat. Women in stripes of the most glaring hue caught your eye on every side, and with the stripes went large hats ornamented with diamond buckles and great bunches of the palest-tinted feathers, or purple and yellow flowers nodding on their stems."

THEY are about to construct the largest reservoir in the world—in Texas. It is intended to be sixteen miles long and to contain 103,058,040,800 cubic feet of water.

THE Grand Duke George, the Czar's second son, who had to hasten back from his Indian tour, is being treated for pulmonary disease. A private letter received in St. Petersburg from Abbas-Tuman, in the Caucasus, where the royal patient had been wintering, thus speaks of the treatment:—

"The walls in his apartments are bare and unpapered, the furniture is of plain wood or cane without upholstering or stuff covering of any kind, and his bed consists only of the thinnest of mattresses. Throughout the winter only a very moderate fire has been kept up, while the windows of the Grand Duke's rooms have been continuously open. His attendants have suffered dreadfully from the cold, but his medical advisers hold that this low temperature is very beneficial to their imperial patient, as it tends to destroy the bacillus and prevent the formation of tubercle. They maintain that the progress of the disease has been arrested, and express hopes that, if the treatment which they prescribe is persevered with, the Grand Duke will in two years' time, have completely recovered."

—if he lives till that, of course. It is only a Russian who can survive such treatment.

THE habitat of the Mahatmas is to be transplanted from the Himalayas. They are projecting a colony at Majave, on the summit of the Tehachapi mountains. It is no long leap from India to California for those who possess astral bodies. But what is a Mahatma? The question has been answered for the uninitiated in the mysteries of Theosophy by Mr. William Q. Judge, Secretary of the Aryan Theosophical Society of New York, to a reporter:—

"The Theosophical definition of Mahatma is very long; but if you want a newspaper definition, it is a human being so wise that he knows all things in the universe and can control the elements at will. It can be either a man or woman, for in Mahatmadom the right of woman suffrage is conceded. A Mahatma is a perfect human being. The knowledge of the laws of nature possessed by Mahatmas is so complete that they can travel from San Francisco to New York in a jiffy. A Mahatma loves retirement. If one were to show himself, the people would prostrate themselves before him and worship him as a god. Mahatmas do not want notoriety."

SINCE the Editor of the Indian Mirror retired in a huff, no sooner than he had joined it, from the Native Press Association, that journal has been continually exposing the shortcomings of the nebulous organization and the sins of officials in connection with it. Politicians and publicists who could hold themselves in readiness for any political move and even to compromise the Press itself—the single popular institution in the land—at the beck of a Chief Secretary, or, for that matter, a Government clerk, are incapable of a blush. But do the Government labour under an equal disability? One would have thought that the constant exposures by our contemporary would have their effect upon the officials concerned. There was no sign, however, of contrition or shame. Assured of the advocacy of the associated brethren in disgrace, perhaps the Government think they can defy one native paper. Perhaps they rely on the lost credit of the Mirror as a shepherd boy who has been too often found to give false alarm of "the wolf!" Be that as it may, surely the Government cannot defy every other papers. Others do not cry "wolf!" for nothing. We are accordingly glad to see that the Indian Daily News has given its independent support to the cause of good government and right principles as against the constituted authorities. Will the officials ignore the veteran Englishman too who is the oldest member of the Anglo-Indian Press, and who never speaks without adequate ground? Says the Indian Daily News:—

"Since the institution of the Press Association the members do not appear to be a happy family; and it may be doubted whether it is in any way answering the purposes for which it was designed. Such at least is the opinion of the dissentient members. Whether this arises from jealousy or envy we are not concerned to enquire. But the Mirror has stood steadily aloof from the connection and has plied his batteries freely on the President of the Association and the connection of the Patriot with the Bengal Secretariat. There is no attempt to disguise the fact that the Patriot has sold itself for a mess of pottage occasionally to the Bengal Secretariat. There is no mincing of matters in this connection. It is affirmed again and again that the Patriot is inspired from the Secretariat, and there is no hesitation in asking whether Mr. Risley is paid by the country for editing the Patriot. These are not pleasant remarks to make, and yet they are made and repeated without reserve. Then it is further imputed that the Patriot has sold itself for a mess of "pottage" in the shape of 150 copies of the paper said to be subscribed for by the Government of Bengal. We cannot affirm that this is so, nor are we in a position to deny it except on the ground of extreme improbability. It is not much of a Patriot to sell itself on such terms nor much of a Government to make such a purchase. *In fact this Press concubinage is in no case a creditable connection especially where there is any disposition to concealment. Disguise is difficult if not impossible and discovery discredits both parties. It is felt that a Government that needs such support is not a strong one, and a paper that accepts the position is little more than a broken reed. The merits of the points of difference among the members of the Press Association we have no desire to investigate; and there is not much to be gained by the connection especially where the ministerial agency is connected with a daily paper and take the first bite at the cherry. It would be much better both for the Government and the Press if these unhallowed associations were avoided altogether. There would be advantage in candid and cordial relations between the two; and much good public service might thereby be rendered. But affectation of superiority on one side and of mystery on the other will effect no permanent good."

HERE is a recipe for rheumatism. Beat one egg, yolk and white together, add one wine-glassful of brown vinegar and one glassful of turpentine. Let the mixture stand one hour and then put it in bottle and cork, and apply it morning and evening over the affected part.

OUR OWN NEWS.

PARLIAMENT was dissolved on the 28th June. The new Parliament meets on the 4th August. The Speech from the Throne speaks of the Indian Councils Bill. Her Majesty has willingly accepted the measure, which she trusts will enable the Indian Government to ascertain more fully the opinions and wishes of the various races and classes in India, and secure the co-operation of those best qualified to advise and assist in the conduct of affairs. The words of Her Majesty ought to set right those who had opposed the Bill as not far-reaching enough, preferring the existing state of things to a small instalment of reform. The allusion to the new law in Her Majesty's Speech, we take to be a call on her ministers at Home and representatives in India to give effect to it as soon as possible.

IN a manifesto Lord Salisbury appeals to the electors to decide whether Parliament is to be devoted to internal legislation for improving the lot of the workers, or to an Irish struggle, perhaps entailing civil war. His Lordship implores the electors to pause before they abandon the Loyalists in Ireland to men whose crimes a Special Commission had denounced to the world. Mr. Balfour in his address to the electors of East Manchester emphasises the danger to the loyalists of a separate Parliament in Ireland. Lord Randolph Churchill too does not favor Home Rule. He considers it impracticable, unnecessary, and a national folly productive of imperial ruin. He has been elected unopposed for South Paddington.

WHILE driving to an electoral meeting at Chester on the 25th June, Mr. Gladstone was struck in the eye by a woman with a ginger nut. In spite of the great pain caused, he spoke for an hour. The injury, however, is not permanent as was at first supposed. Yesterday he was able to commence his Midlothian campaign, opening it at Edinburgh, where he declared that he had never retracted one syllable of his Irish proposal of 1886. He leaves the Liberal Government to settle the question of the retention of Irish members in British Parliament.

LORD Tennyson in a letter says—"I love Mr. Gladstone, but hate his present Irish policy." The feeling of all the best and wisest friends of the unhappy old statesman.

IRISH Elections are Irish elections still, and Cork maintains its notoriety. There was at that city on the 26th June, a serious conflict, with wreck of houses and breakage of bones, between the rival factions. Mr. William O'Brien was mobbed. For a long time the police were powerless against the rioters.

THE Congress of Chambers of Commerce of the Empire opened at South Kensington on the 28th June, Sir John Lubbock presiding. Lord Knutsford was present representing the Government. At the instance of Lord Brassey, the assembled delegates unanimously adopted the proposition that it was expedient to devise a closer commercial union between England and her colonies.

Lord Knutsford presided at the banquet at St. James' Hall to the delegates. Sir John Lubbock proposed the toast of the Empire, which, he said, was a united great brotherhood inspiring confidence in the future.

MESSRS. Rothschild have advanced to the Transvaal Government for railways 2½ millions sterling at 3 per cent. interest.

NATAL will be granted its own Government.

CAPTAIN Dale, the aeronaut, is dead. On the 29th June, at the Crystal Palace, he, with three others, went up in a balloon which at a height of hundred feet burst. The Captain was killed and the three companions injured, two, it is feared, fatally.

THE Bengal Tenancy Act (VIII of 1885) does not by itself apply to the Town of Calcutta, the Division of Orissa, and the Scheduled Districts specified in the third part of the First Schedule of the Scheduled Districts Act, 1874, but it or any portion of it may be extended by the Local Government, with the previous sanction of the Governor-General in Council, by notification in the local official gazette, to the Division of Orissa or any part thereof. Under orders of the 27th June last, it is now notified that sections 27 to 38 and 80 of the Act apply to the Division of Orissa. The first twelve sections relate to enhancement of rent; the last allows a landlord to apply for registration, by such revenue officer as the Local Government may appoint, of any improvement which he has lawfully made, or which has been lawfully made at his expense, or which he has assisted a tenant in making.

THE Government of India dissent from the finding of the Commission on Mr. Wheeler, holding it not proven that the Judge of Jaunpur in Debi Pershad's case did not write and deliver a judgment. As if the onus probandum lay on the Commission! As if such a negative admits of proof, or, at any rate, that it could be proved in a manner so as to preclude the possibility of all doubt. Thus Simla disposes of the first four charges. On the fifth charge, dealing with the decree against him, the Government agree in only censuring him. That conduct also was not such as to deserve dismissal. Notwithstanding this virtual reversal of the finding of the Commission, the Government of India do not think that Mr. Wheeler can be permitted to continue in the Service and that he must retire. Mr. Wheeler is saved the ignomy of dismissal but he must sever his executive connection with the Service. There is yet another hope for him for perfect clearance in the Secretary of State in Council. Such is government by Bureaucracy—of kith and kin.

MR. J. G. Ritchie, appointed, under Act II (B. C.) of 1888, officiating Chairman of the Corporation of Calcutta, will also act, under orders of the Lieutenant-Governor, as Chairman of the Burial Board for the Town and Suburbs of Calcutta, in place of Mr. Lee about to go on leave. We have already expressed our doubts as to the legality of appointing an outsider officiating Chairman of the Corporation without first making him a Commissioner. We are not any more sure that Mr. Ritchie can properly accept the second appointment. The Chairman of the Calcutta Corporation is precluded, by the Municipal Act, from holding any other office, excepting that of a member of the Port Trust or of a member of the Bengal Legislative Council. By authority of the Bengal Act (V of 1881) to provide for the appointment of a Burial Board in Calcutta and its Suburbs, the Chairman of the Calcutta Corporation is a member of the Burial Board, and the Lieutenant-Governor is empowered by the same Act to nominate the Chairman of the same Board. But that is an earlier law than the Municipal Act, and the Act of 1888, by its subsequent enactment, must have greater force. At any rate, the Act of 1881 cannot supersede that of 1888. At the same time, contraries cannot co-exist. How can then Mr. Ritchie be and not be Chairman of the Burial Board at the same time? Again, the Chairman of the Calcutta Corporation not being eligible as a member of the Burial Board, it is indeed a stretch of imagination to suppose that he can be the head of that body, though it may be desirable to have the same person to preside at both the Boards.

True, the Act of 1888 does not expressly repeal any of the provisions of the law of 1881. It cannot, however, be denied that its later enactment, in direct opposition to the earlier law, gives it, by implication, superior force. Law cannot be foolish. Effect must be given to it. The later enactment must have preference as more wise.

THE trial in the Allahabad High Court of Charles Spencer, a private of the Gloucester Regiment, at Nusseerabad, Ajmere, for shooting a cultivator while out to hunt, ended on Wednesday week. Mr. Justice Knox in his charge to the jury noticed the fact that the accused had undergone two trials, and that charges had been added in his court, but said also that these were not matters for the jury to consider. He just mentioned them only because they were referred to by counsel on both sides. After premising that the hinge of the case was, whether the accused had done the act in self-defence, he observed that no soldier or civilian, let him be the best marksman in the world, had a right to frighten a man by firing a gun at him even if he fired it over the man's head. His lordship said he might have misapprehended the evidence, but he gathered from the evidence of Major Wilford that the Martini-Henry rifle was, in the hands of soldiers, to use a Scotch expression, a very "uncanny" weapon indeed. They tampered with the trigger and interfered with it in a way that made it as unsafe as it could be. As no soldier or civilian was permitted by law to frighten a native by firing over his head, if an accident ensued he could not take the benefit of the plea that it was an accident. The only exception to this was when he proved that it was necessary so to act in self-defence. This plea of self-defence it fell on the accused to prove, and he could not ask the jury to give him there the benefit of any doubt. The right of self-defence was against any act that might cause harm. If one man were attacked by another with a stick he had the right of self-defence; but he must take care not use more violence than necessary to prevent the hurt. In the case of one man armed with a gun threatened by another with a stick, the former had no right to prevent the blow with the stick being repeated by firing the gun. The right of self-defence only went so far as to do what would prevent any harm that was likely to happen. Notwithstanding the Hibernian expression of one sentence, that is good law. His lordship then went on to state the law applicable to the minor charges against the accused. In the face of that clear exposition, the jury, after half an hour's consultation, returned and gave a unanimous verdict of not guilty on all the charges, and the accused was discharged.

THE Hindoo Patriot in its new guise has taken arms against a sea of troubles in the shape of the Partition Bill in the Supreme Legislative Council. For ten days continuously it had been harping on the measure, trying to make out its uselessness or its inadequacy. The measure as introduced is much more moderate than the one framed by the member in charge when not yet in that Council. That Bill, while it had its detractors, was welcomed by many good men and true. Those who thought it necessary to condemn the first draft welcome the second as a wholesome one. One of the earliest converts is the Calcutta High Court. The Judges have accepted the Bill.

RAJA Surya Kant Acharjee, of Muktagacha, has been fined Rs. 500 by the Assistant Magistrate of Mymensing Mr. A. G. Halifax. He was prosecuted under orders of the District Magistrate, the famous Mr. H. A. D. Phillips, for closing up a water channel and otherwise causing public obstruction. It seems that in consideration of two strips of land given by the Raja for constructing two new roads, the Nasirabad municipality had resolved to allow the Raja to incorporate a byelane in his premises, which the Raja did. The District Magistrate who had acquiesced in the arrangement subsequently discovered that in giving effect to it the Raja had closed an important water channel. Mr. Phillips also found that the sanction of Government to complete the transfer was wanting and that the road which the municipality had made over to the Raja had been previously transferred to the control of the District Board. To set matters right, Mr. Phillips gave his sanction as Chairman of the District Board for "prosecution under any byelaw that may be applicable." In transferring the case to his Assistant, the District Magistrate dispensed with the personal attendance of the Raja allowing him to appear by Agent. Mr. Phillips was agreeable to withdraw the charge if the Raja broke down a wall he had built and restored the drain.

The Raja considered it an indignity to be so called upon to demolish a portion of his premises or to appear in a criminal court. Under no circumstances could he agree to the first, as it would be a confession of offence charged to him. He made other proposals to get rid of this botheration, but they were not accepted. He had applied to the High Court to quash the proceedings of the local magistracy but it was not granted, the application being premature. His counsel would not advise a transfer of the case in the absence of sufficient grounds. So the trial proceeded. The Assistant Magistrate insisted on the accused's personal attendance and finally convicted the Raja. To complete the drama, while the enquiry was proceeding the wall was taken down by order of the District Magistrate.

BOTH Raja Surya Kanta Acharjee and his counsel Mr. Ghose and Mr. Barrow have come to Calcutta.

DEPUTY COMMISSIONERS of all tea districts in Assam have been instructed not to countersign any certificates for recruitment of coolies in the Rewa State at the instance of the Agent to the Governor-General in Central India, Indore.

THE Secretary of State for India has ordered that in future different sorts of papers required for Government use, should be obtained from the India Office, London, unless the local mills could supply them on more favourable terms.

THE military authorities have asked for the reservation of the Jalpauri elephant field for the Khedda operations of the Government of India.

THERE is at least one man in Europe who is truly and deeply aggrieved at the abduction of his wife and who rights himself in the rude Oriental way. He was lurking about the quay when the North German Lloyd steamer from New York arrived at Southampton Docks. As the passengers landed to take train (which was ready alongside the vessel) he sprang upon one of them and thrashed him with his heavy walking stick. He was separated by the Police. But he again found an opportunity of belabouring him. He gave a good explanation of his hostility. The victim had run away with the assailant's wife to the United States, and, as if one offence was not enough, afterwards deserted her to destitution in a foreign land. The heartless Lothario is a wellknown barrister. It is said by the correspondent of the Daily Chronicle who reports the scene, that the matter will come before the courts. That will be by the action of the man of law, we suppose. The aggrieved has taken his proper and full revenge, and ought to be satisfied. He cannot resort to another remedy without impropriety. If he go to law he will have committed an offence by the assault.

There are doubtless others in that part of the world of the same mind with this honourable assailant who, in the same circumstances, would take the law—the law of Nature—in their own hands. But their number must be very limited, or else the law there would not be so different from what it is in the East.

IT is satisfactory to read in an English paper that "the habit of wearing false hair in plaits, braids, or frisettes is being discarded. Ladies make the best they can of the hair nature has supplied them with, which they arrange to suit their faces according to their fancy." A little more of Nature in everything is the prevailing desideratum in Europe—Western Europe in especial.

A PHILADELPHIA journal has calculated that there are 240,000 domestic servants in London, and of these 10,000 are always in want of service. Who would have thought that there were so many servants in London? The popular impression here is that the help of personal servitors is a luxury reserved there for comparatively a few, and that even the Upper Ten in England are not encumbered with help like the employing classes in this country. This enormous extent of domestic servitude appertains doubtless to the population of the great capital including the outer ring. Considering that the population of London in this sense is 56,57,000, there are more than 6 domestics to every 100 inhabitants.

THE last was the one hundred and twelfth Derby Day. Bull-baiting doubtless is a much older and more venerable British institution.

ALTHOUGH the sports were instituted as long ago as 1780, their importance is quite a modern affair, within the memory of elderly men. The saying goes, Bell made the Derby Day. Bell made the other national Days, too. The fact is, that the importance of these national sporting holidays and of the sites consecrated to these periodical diversions of the people, is due to the sporting Press. These newspapers, aided by their trusty and intelligent agent the sporting special, brought them into popularity. Bell's Life in London was the making of the Derby.

THERE has just been a great battle between two heroes of renown, all by themselves, without the assistance or interference of common humanity, except in the way of seeing and seeing that nothing wrong takes place. It was a dreadful business—a desperate encounter between foemen worthy of each other's steel—or fist—in which no quarter was given nor expected. It is thus graphically described:—

"The scene at the National Sporting Club on the night of May 31st reminded one forcibly of the evening of November 11th, 1890, when Peter Jackson met and defeated the much-vaunted champion, Jem Smith, at the defunct Pelican Club. Then, as now, the black came off the victor, and never was a success more popular than that which Jackson last evening gained over his old rival, Frank Slavin. The theatre was filled by a large and thoroughly representative company, that took the greatest interest in a contest which is without parallel in the history of modern day boxing. Jackson was formerly the tutor of Slavin, and although a native of the West Indies he has spent the greater part of his life in Australia. The present match was the outcome of an old quarrel between the pair, but for five years past all efforts to bring them together in the ring had been unavailing until the National Sporting Club offered a purse of £2,000, of which the winner takes £1,750. Twenty rounds was the stipulated number, but in the brisk speculation that ensued prior to the contest a lot of money was betted that the men would not go four rounds. Slavin, who trained at Dovercourt with his brother Jack, looked in the pink of condition, and before they entered the ring odds of six to four were freely laid on him. He weighed 13st. 3lb. Jackson, who scaled 10lb. heavier than his rival, did his work at Brighton, where he was reported to have gone amiss about ten days ago, and although there was a certain amount of truth in this, he judiciously cased his work, and he, too, came up to the scratch in grand trim. The battle was a terrific one, and that the better man won there is not the slightest doubt. Slavin, knowing the class of man opposed to him, did not box as usual, and his rushing tactics gave place to cautious sparring. When it came to out-fighting, however, Slavin was no match for his rival, who displayed wonderful science. Jackson utilized his extra reach to good advantage, but for a very long time the issue hung in the balance. Once he had the opportunity, however, Jackson never gave his opponent a chance, and early in the tenth round he had Slavin at his mercy, and though the latter stood up manfully when his chances were hopeless, Jackson stuck to him and knocked him out within a minute of the close of the round."

Nor is that all. Such is the importance of this historic conflict the writer is not satisfied with the foregoing description. We for our part consider it both very well and vigorously written and minute enough. But we are not even novices in the subject. Accordingly, the Sporting Special narrates the war over again, campaign by campaign so to say. He notes the events of each round. By way of examples for the edification of our native readers, we will quote the description of a few of the most remarkable passages at arms.

Passing over the earlier rounds, mere parrying and scratches, we come to serious work in "Round 6.—Slavin took the initiative throughout the greater portion of the three minutes, and in the first half he put in some heavy work on the body with both hands. Once or twice he tried to get Jackson in a corner, but the latter, being tricky on his feet, dodged him, although, just before they went to their seats, Slavin landed two fine rights on the jaw."

Then to come to the end of the chapter:—

Round 10 and last.—By this time little doubt was felt as to the ultimate issue, for Slavin was to all intents and purposes a beaten man. For half a minute Slavin made the semblance of a show, but suddenly Jackson, with a terrific punch on the throat, drove Slavin back on the ropes, dazed. Jackson gave him no quarter, but Slavin was quite unable to defend himself and, although for a time he kept his feet, Jackson, who punished him severely, sent him to the boards when only half a minute was required to complete the bout. Here Slavin laid until the ten seconds were counted off, and, amidst a scene of the wildest enthusiasm, Jackson was declared the winner."

All that is typically British, and utterly removed from the quietism of the Oriental. We too have our athletes and athletics, our gladiators and their fights. But our fellows are only showmen and their fights are mere academical contests and are child's play before this downright steady havoc.

A HUNGARIAN paper says that in Hungary, in 1848, about a dozen women fought in the Insurrectionary ranks. Whatever the truth about that number, two ladies who had served in that year in the Revolutionary Army died in Hungary on May 30, at about the same hour. Dressed in the dress of their military rank they had fought several of the fiercest battles. One, under the name of Karl, had attained the rank of First Lieutenant of Hussars, when she left the army and married. The other, known as Josef, continued in the army, obtaining several decorations for valour in the field. It was several years after the campaign that she married.

LEAD poisoning from hydrant water is not an unfrequent occurrence in England. At Bradford, a tailor, aged 28, was in the habit of taking tea in the morning before leaving for work. Last summer he was ill and he attributed it to the water supply. This time he is dead from its effects, according to the medical attendant's deposition. His testimony showed that lead poisoning was increasing at the average of a fresh case a week. Not only Bradford but other places too are suffering from this contamination. Bad cases of lead poisoning occur generally from drinking water, first drawn from a tap in the morning, which has been in the pipes for a long time, and it is known that some times lead is found one-tenth or more in a gallon of such water. In Calcutta, we must not consider ourselves free from this danger. So it is advisable to let a good quantity of water flow out before using it for drinking purposes.

THERE is a move in England against patent medicines. In Regina versus Davenport, the proprietor of "Collis Browne's Chlorodyne" was fined for selling it without being labelled poison as the law requires. It was proved to contain two poisonous drugs, opium and chloroform, and the Treasury as a test case tried to get a conviction against the proprietor Davenport. The medicine had been for upwards of forty years without the poison label in the market. And without any casualties during that long period, notwithstanding the omission of the warning. This cry of "poison" is, for the most part, a mere bugbear to frighten people from seeking what really benefit them. At any rate, the present definition of poison requires revision.

UNDER which king, Bezonian? Is John Company still the Lord of India? In spite of the assumption of the title of Empress of India by Her Majesty the Queen, and not minding the celebration of the Jubilee of her reign, the Government of Bengal in the Judicial and Political Department still stick to the seal of the East India Company. Here is economy indeed! And how inconsistent this with the outlay of say about Rs. 1,000 on a rag and a permanent charge of at least Rs. 100 annually on the establishment to exhibit it! Before hoisting the banner on the heights of their palatial place of business, surely the Secretariat ought to have cleared the ground of the insignia of the previous Dynasty.

THE Mahomedan law of wakf is on its trial, so to speak. A Full Bench of the High Court, consisting of Sir Comer Petheram, and Justices Prinsep, Trevelyan, Ghose and Amir Ali, sat the whole of this week hearing counsel. Sir Griffith Evans, Mr. Bonnerjee and Mr. Hill are engaged for the Mahomedan appellant while Advocate General Woodroffe and Mr. Abdur Rahman represent the Hindu respondent. The question referred for the consideration of the Full Bench by the Division Bench (Petheram, C. J., and Hill, J.) is—Whether a document executed by the appellant constituted a valid wakf according to the provisions of the Mahomedan law? The argument of the counsel for the Mahomedan appellant was that the courts in British India under express legislative provisions, which had been systematically disregarded by them for a series of years, were bound to administer the Mahomedan law to Mahomedans, that the Mahomedan law should be administered according to Mahomedan notions instead of the English, and that the document in question according to the true and correct interpretation of the Mahomedan law constituted a valid wakf. In support of this contention authorities, both original and published, were cited in profusion. The Advocate General replied that the case being between a Mahomedan and a Hindu, the law of British India should govern the case; and that the law of British India was certainly not the Mahomedan law. Justice, equity and good conscience should form the rule of decision of the Court, contended Mr. Woodroffe. He then began to trace the history of the Mahomedan case law of wakf as administered by the British Indian Courts since the year 1798. Monday will be the sixth day, when Mr. Woodroffe will resume his arguments.

THE CHOWKIDARI BILL.

THE Chowkidari Bill which is now before the Bengal Legislative Council, deserves careful consideration of all people of Bengal who are interested in its efficient administration. Its principle has been objected to in certain quarters, and the Hon'ble mover and supporters of the Bill have cited authorities to show that it was sound in every way. There is little doubt that gradually the chowkidaris are to be brought under the control of the Police, as to all intents and purposes they now form a component part of the regular Police force. It is clear that the simple system of village watch has been contaminated to a great extent since it came in direct contact with the regular Police and was placed under the control and supervision of executive officers. The Police exercise their unwholesome influence not only upon the chowkidar but also upon the Panchayet. These they have come to consider their subordinates and to treat accordingly—the other they regard as little better than their slave. The prestige of the Panchayet as an organ of local government has long since passed away, if indeed it ever belonged to the poor creature of Anglo-Indian legislation. The chowkidar certainly does not carry the consideration of a legitimate limb of the village system. A chowkidar is no longer only a watchman of the village, but also a servant of the thanah and the humble khidmutgar, cooly, ghorami, and menial servant of every constable. His present duties are not those defined in the Act, being now to bring occasional presents and Bazaars, according to his means and lights, or as asked for by members of the Police force at the thanah. Of course these presents are not valuable, but they may be useful. He quietly repairs the lodging houses of the Sub-Inspectors and the Head Constables, and the Police station building. He cleans the Thana 'compound' from morning till evening, all the while reporting the important matters of his beat. He brings loads of fuel from distant Bazar for the Darogah Sahab, and from the moment a constable sets his foot in a village he carries his luggage as a cooly and acts as his private servant. If he is an intelligent man he gains the favor of his superiors by making himself useful, if he is the reverse he has his share of abuses and slaps from the Police officers. When the Sub-Inspector or the Head constable goes to a village on duty or otherwise, then the chowkidars have no rest. One would see them running in every direction and doing their best to please their masters. They who have experience of the interior can bear testimony to what we have stated. Indeed, most of the above facts have come to the notice of the magistrates judicially, in more than one district. Police officers have been punished departmentally and judicially on the complaint of chowkidars. And no wonder. Some chowkidars are more pliant and long-suffering than others, while some executive myrmidons will goad the worm to turn.

The chowkidar is no longer the old simple watchman who could have been trusted by the courts and upon whom the villagers could have relied for the protection of their life and property. He is totally demoralized and has learnt all the tricks of the civilized regular Police. He now freely perjures, intrigues, and plots to support the Police view of every case and is utilized recklessly for spoiling true cases, when necessary, and for causing innocent people trouble. He frames the first information just as he is directed, otherwise he would be nowhere. His bread is entirely in the hands of the Police on whose ex-parte report he is fined, suspended and, not unfrequently, dismissed. He has learnt to give false evidence, false information and false reports. He is dreaded in the village because he can put any person and every person in trouble if he likes. He is the official agency through which blackmail is levied from such dagis (old offenders) as can afford to purchase their freedom for moving about unmolested. Chowkidars never inherently fear or respect the magistrates so much as they do the lower ranks of the Police. It would be better if in the Bill these new and obligatory duties of the chowkidars were clearly defined.

It goes without saying that there can be no Police case without a chowkidar. He has become the ubiquitous gentleman sure to poke his nose in every interesting inquiry. Not that he is by nature officious. He is simply forced. He must put himself in evidence. In each case he is introduced somehow or other, and he is the witness of an important fact in connection with it. If a case falls through the chowkidar is blamed, but if it succeeds the Police officer is praised. We refrain from stating the other shameful ways in which these rural flunkies are employed by their so called official superiors, the thanah Lalpagriwallahs. In most true cases, a false element is introduced by the Police, that of the arrest of the accused by the Police officer or the constable, in order to get credit or reward for it. After the Police takes up the case, this additional fringe is added to it and the witnesses are accordingly tutored. Before inexperienced and suspicious magistrates such cases are doomed for the mixing of this little falsehood. The chowkidar has now been taught this trick, and in most cases coming from the interior he is present at the time of the occurrence, either to arrest the burglar, or to stop his escape, or to take him into custody. The poor fellow cannot manage this business so cleverly as his superiors do, and hence sometimes, when he is severely cross-examined along with other witnesses, the prosecution is gratuitously spoiled.

This is the present state of affairs and we have good authority for our facts. Under such circumstances, may we ask if it would be advisable to invest the Police with more power and control over the village chowkidar? A village watchman with all his deficiencies is a better person for all purposes than a perjured and wicked chowkidar who has been trained in all sorts of tricks by the lower class of Police officers.

It would be much better if the chowkidars were paid through some other agency than the Police, because that would remove the demoralising idea that their bread was at the mercy of the thanah. Why not make some gazetted officer distribute the salaries of the chowkidars?

If only Police officers above the rank of Sub-Inspectors are allowed to deal with the chowkidars and their cases, much of the abuses pointed out may be stopped, but how far it will be practicable from an administrative point of view we are unable to say.

In most cases "punishment orders" are written by the subordinates of the District Superintendent, who recommends a particular punishment and the magistrate signs it as a matter of form, just as he signs half a dozen statements and registers daily. This is not a satisfactory state of things, and we hope all these should be considered carefully before the Bill is passed.

A SKETCH OF THE HISTORY OF THE PRESS IN INDIA.

By DR. SAMBHU C. MOOKERJEE.

The Government of India is sometimes ridiculed as a Government of paragraphs. All civilized Governments, however, are Governments of paragraphs. Even the autocracy of the Czar of all the Russias is such a Government. Mr. Eugene Schuyler, not many years ago, disclosed to an astonished world an administration in Russia which for partiality to the system of record almost beats the much derided Government of British India. In a community in which writing is common, the rulers easily recognize the advantage of utilising the accomplishment for purposes of administration. So it was in India. In the introduction to Akbar's Ain 10 Bk. II., containing regulations regarding the Wakdnagar or Wakdnavis, stress is laid on the importance of writing. "Keeping records is an excellent thing for a Government, it is even necessary for every rank of society." Such is the view of the Emperor. It is then added, "Though a trace of this office [of the Wakdnavis] may have existed in ancient times," by which is doubtless meant the previous period of Hindu rule—"its highest objects were but recognised in the present reign." Perhaps they were not recognized to the full by Akbar himself. At any rate, it is not clear whether he perceived the importance of making the labours of his regiment of Mewatis and the records of his *Wakdnavis*es and *Sewdnavis*es or *Sewdnavis*igars available to the administrative staff generally throughout his dominions and the subject population of the Empire. Perhaps he did. The pains taken about the matter were extraordinary. Everything down to the veriest bagatelles of Imperial life, such as those relating to chausar and nard, were noted down by an army of writers. This vast diary was first submitted to a confidential servant, who corrected. Then it came to His Majesty. After his approval, copies were made by the Clerk of each report and with his signature furnished to those who required them. This report was called a Yaddasht. An abstract called Taliquah was made by the Taliquahnavis of these and calligraphers employed to make copies of such abstracts, which were signed by the Wakdnavis, and other officers. What was the good of all this infinite ado? what was the purpose the great Emperor had in establishing his gigantic Statistical Department? His own very Ain gives the answer at the conclusion:—

"His Majesty's object is, that every duty be properly performed; that there be no undue increase, or decrease in any department; that dishonest people be removed, and trustworthy people be held in esteem; and that active servants may work without fear, and negligent and forgetful men be held in check."

That is too vague, to be sure. One thing is clear, that these private and public Diaries in their various forms were all for the Emperor, if for any man. But was it possible for the poor Emperor to do the faintest justice to all that ever increasing mass which must have accumulated upon him? Akbar had evidently a rage for statistics and information. Yet however much he might wish to master all the materials laid before him, in reality he could scarcely attend to them at all. Nor would the Emperor be comforted by the thought that some, or for that matter all, of his ministers and principal officers might see them. So enlightened an utilitarian could not but lament such a monstrous waste of the most costly efforts. The political education of the people alone would be an adequate object. From the elaborate system of record instituted by Akbar—which amounted to the keeping of not only a diary of the Emperor such as some of his predecessors and his immediate successor indulged themselves in, but also a diary of the whole Empire, in all its Provinces and parts—the step to such utilisation of the work, is, in the nature of things, easy. It is so natural that news should be known and circulated, that what has been written should be given over to be read. Yet the natural thing is not the thing that always happens. When even now, in our advanced days, we remark the jealousy of so many officials however distinguished in other respects, we may cease to wonder at the inaptitude shown by this great monarch of the past in not following up his creation of the statistical and intelligence department and groping into the discovery of the antetypographic press. But though this press was not immediately discovered, it was near at hand. The foundations were being well laid and persevered in. It appears from the Memoirs of Jehangir that there was a Wakanavis in every Province. That proves that the Department was not a white elephant. Unless its utility had been experienced Akbar's successor would not think of adding to the establishment. Its utility could best be developed by the public dissemination of the reports. I think something of the kind was done. Step by step, in each successive régime, the Department more and more clearly assumed the character of a News Agency, until at the beginning of the British Period people could not realise that it had had any other.

In the invaluable history of Nawab Gholam Hossein who wrote as actor as well as reporter, there is an incidental enumeration of several of the chief offices at the Court of Mahammad Shah, among which mention is made of Kaem Khan, son of Jaaser Khan, head of the Post and Gazette Office. Upon this passage the Indo-French translator, who also is a reliable witness of contemporary facts, has a note, which is valuable as showing the difference between the two offices of Wakaanavis (otherwise Wakanagar) and Sewandhnigar (otherwise Sewanavis.) The distinction lies only in the different uses made of the labours of the two officers. Mustapha says that these offices are the same, only the reports of the Wakaanavis are published ab initio, while those of the Sewanavis are published in proper time, gradually. All this demonstrates the extraordinary development of an institution as near our present Press as could be in an age without print.

After a reign computed to extend over half a century, Aurungzebe, loaded with years and cares, died in 1707. The Empire was rotten to the core. His talents and energy had through a long period only prepared its doom. For intolerance and ambition neutralised the effects of the highest powers. His death was the signal for the struggle for the battered throne in the family of Timour which closed with the accession of Mahammad Shah in 1719. This was the period when the monarch declined and the minister was everything, and this inverted order remained till the final dismemberment of the Empire, with the independence of the Provinces and the rise of the Sikhs, the Mahrattas and the British. Throughout the long period of destruction and reconstruction extending through the whole of the eighteenth century down to our own, the Press was not extinct. How it was maintained, who paid for it, and who protected does not appear; these are fit subjects for historical inquiry; but traces of its existence and even vigour are discernible from time to time. In the second year of Mahammad Shah, in 1720, the Carnatic suffered from an awful visitation of Nature in the shape of an unprecedented flood which submerged a large tract of country sweeping away whole villages with their men and cattle and their habitations. We find from the Siyarul Mutaqherin that the Government at Delhi and presumably the people of Hindostan in general owed to their Press the best accounts of the calamity. The Imperial Gazette of Hyderabad, we are told, brought news of an extraordinary fall of rain out of season on the 7th Safer which not only overflowed the rivers and lakes but split a mountain or hill and drowned the population of the affected parts. And to emphasize the character of the court, the sly annalist reports that on learning of this disaster the Emperor went out shooting with one of his favorites to show him sport and, doubtless in reward for the plentiful crop of "Másh Allahs" with which the courtier acknowledged the spectacle of Imperial skill, advanced him in emoluments and rank to a surprising stretch.

Let us hasten through these troublous times. Mahammad Shah, the puppet of a faindant royalty, died in April, 1748, if not singing like the Phoenix, presumably with the strains of Sadarang in his ear. His successor, Alamgir II.—as far from the first as a lamb from a lion—maintained a show of Court till death relieved him from his shame and sorrows in 1759. The Heir Apparent Mirza Ali Gouhar Bahadoor who had separated from his father to try his fortunes in the imperial name down country, assumed the nominal Empire under the style of Shah Alam. He carried on the shadow of a show under infinite troubles and actual tortures and indignities worse than torture, till his death as a British pensioner in 1806, when there was practically an end of the whole thing.

During all this period the manuscript Press continued. Thus we find British popular historians noticing that in the summer of 1792 the public newspapers of Delhi stated that the Emperor had expressed to Madhhaji Sindhia and the Peshwa his hope that they would enable him to recover the Imperial tribute from the Bengal Provinces.* This writer doubtless was thinking of a Delhi Times in all the glory of Persian print.

We now come to this century. Here in the neighbourhood of living memories, we trace the workings of the indigenous press.

The Calcutta Gazette of April 15, 1813, begins:—"The late Lahore Ukhbars are principally filled with details of the progress of the united Arms of Runjeet Sing and of Futtch Khan, Vizier of Cabul, in the conquest of Cashmere" &c.—Selections, IV., 282. The same Gazette of April 22, opens thus:—"The Hindoostan Newspapers received since our last publication, remove all doubts as to the occupation of Attock by the forces of Runjeet Sing." Then follow details.—p. 283. Who after that will say that there were no newspapers in India before the British brought the Press to this country? In 1813, neither typography nor lithography had been introduced into the Upper Provinces or the Panjab.

These Panjabi newspapers were of course the result of private enterprise, though liberally patronized by local governments and chiefs. It would seem that the Press had struck root sufficiently and was so appreciated as an important agency for the supply of news that on the decay and destruction of the Mogul Power, the journalists continued it on their own account. The newspapers were still written, as well as their copies multiplied, by the hand. It would be worth while to search for specimens of this primitive journalism, if any such exist in the country, and to enquire into its system of payment and the method of its circulation. The modern native newspaper of print, whether typographic or lithographic, on the British model, commenced later.

The primitive Indian newspaper was the vehicle of news only, like not only the early European newsletter but also its successor the newspaper down to the last century.

The old indigenous Press had doubtless its heroes too, if we might recover their names and exploits. Even though confined to news, there was room for the introduction of meaningful hints and innuendoes. Much depended also on the presentation of facts. Above all, the task of the journalist was one of great difficulty under a despotism and in an age in which the people had not yet come to lisp. So in times of tumult and anarchy. At the least, the Press required in its conductors great courage and firmness to withstand temptations.

I am happy to have come upon one famous man connected with journalism in the eighteenth century. This was no less than Asof Jah's minister Azimul Omrah. He was originally a gentleman of the press. If France has her Thiers who rose from an editor's room to the bureau of a minister and the sceptre of the President of the Republic, India too can boast of her Azimul Omrah.

A PROTEST.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—In the last issue of your esteemed journal occur the following passages:—

"Is it possible for men who have never controlled half a dozen servants in their life to any purpose to control properly a multitude of subordinates of different castes and grades? . . . Is it likely that men who have lived for generations in most wretched and dirty habitations with all insanitary surroundings, and many of whom notwithstanding their great boast of enlightenment and knowledge of sanitation are still living in such houses where it is difficult to stand for half an hour without inconvenience and fear of some kind to one's health, will be able to look after the sanitation of a town?"

Do not these remarks hold good with greater propriety in the case of temporary or young Deputy Magistrates who are now placed in charge of Sub-divisions, and whom "Truth"—the writer of the paragraphs would appoint to the Presidentship of municipalities so many of which are, as he is aware, situated at the head-quarters of the Sub-divisions?

* Macfarlane's Our Indian Empire, vol. II., p. 18. Macfarlane makes the Great Mogul speak of the "British territories." That is the usual British way of putting the thing. It is not the language of the Great Mogul of Delhi, the Emperor of India. His Majesty could not have made such a blunder. Bengal was held by the East India Company as the Imperial Dewan. Though the sovereignty had practically been surrendered to the British, it was still a Mogul Province. It was Mogul de jure down to our times.

A non-official chairman is almost always selected from the ranks of Zemindars, pleaders or successful members of other professions. May I ask if they are not men of better social position, more accustomed to controlling servants and living in commodious houses than the place-hunting B. L.s or other graduate Deputies in other words the ordinary run of the officers of the Subordinate Executive Service? Yours, &c.,

NO UNTRUTH.

MANUFACTURE OF CRIPPLES.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—In a note under "Weeklyana" you have noticed at some length that "in Spain, they have taken to manufacture of cripples for the delectation of France,"—the foremost in the race of civilization of the West! Instead of trying to help nature to make up her man and fit him to take up his share of responsibility that naturally attaches to humanity, these so called civilized people pay and receive for worse distortion of even what nature in kindness spares. Torn away from their parents' bosom these unfortunate humans are made to cause merriment to people who never think at whose cost they enjoy! And this is perpetrated in cold blood in defiance of God and man alike. O for a Wilberforce to arise and put a stop to this most opprobrious practice of dealing in human commodity, all unconscious of the sufferings it entails! If anything is clearer than another, certainly it is our duty, morally bound as we are, to know and facilitate the functions and capacities of nature for the best interests of the creation, and not make dolls of men—the boast of the creator—and thus fritter away in wanton frivolity this essence divine! Can degradation go farther?—For France a blush, for Spain a tear! Yours,

JAY KRISHNA BANERJEE.

GOVERNMENT BY PERCENTAGES.

Somewhere in that book which we are all taught to regard as the repository of the most exquisite wisdom it is said that every man shall one day be rewarded according to his works. And it is, such a commonsense maxim that praise or blame should be meted out according to a man's merits that temporal Governments have not scrupled to borrow and act upon it. Thus it is that we see some persons lavishly decorated with stars and medals, while others are left to languish in the cold shade of official neglect. Thus it is that some public servants shine like constellations, while others are never heard of throughout their official career. The explanation of it all is that even in this world men are judged according to their works. True, it is sometimes a puzzle to the uninitiated to understand the grounds upon which the official verdict is based, but it would be a dangerous task for the lay mind to attempt to explore the hidden and mysterious motives which underlie the action of a local or even of a Supreme Government. We must be content to fold our hands in all humility, and be thankful that some persons have been placed in authority to think and judge for us, and we should accept their judgment as the final decision of consummate wisdom.

As the best of Governments are not omniscient, however, certain means are necessary by which the relative merits of officials may be gauged. We speak now of the rank and file—not of those great souls who have forced themselves above their fellows and risen to be what we may term the Generals of the official order. For them, of course, no means of comparison are needed, because no comparison is possible. But as regards the rank and file, some methods would seem to be necessary in order to test their comparative claims to promotion. One of the best of such methods of comparison is no doubt afforded by frequent inspections by higher authority, and it must be admitted that in these latter days, at least in Bengal, officials of all grades are inspected to distraction. But another and perhaps a more handy means of judging its officers is made use of by Government in the periodical returns which set out faithfully the amount of work done by each officer and the success which has attended it. These returns of work are considered to offer the most complete and accurate method of gauging the comparative worth of a public servant. A Munsiff decides so many cases in the year and the average time occupied in hearing each case is so much. What more valuable test of his efficiency? Another Munsiff decides only half the number of cases and takes twice as long over them. Let him go to the wall as an unprofitable servant. One Magistrate convicts ninety per cent. of the unfortunate persons placed before him, and thus establishes his right to be promoted to the top of his class; another convicts only fifty per cent. and naturally deserves to lose his place. And so all down the line. The highest percentages win, and those who gain them are good and faithful servants.

This system of judging the merits of an officer by arithmetical results is at once easy, plausible, and smacks of being scientific. And what more edifying than a scientific Government? How easy it is to gauge a man's capabilities by the comparison of a few figures! What a lot of trouble it saves! How completely it avoids the necessity of studying an officer's real character or testing the real worth of his work! That man ought certainly to have been rewarded with the Order of the Indian Empire who discovered this method of treating human beings like so many machines and registering their work in so simple a manner. But so rarely does real merit receive its due that we should not be surprised to learn that the inventor is still drudging in some Secretariat Office. And what a stimulus to good conduct for a man to know that his work will be tested in this way. How eagerly he looks forward to the publication in the Weeklyana of that annual Resolution in which he knows that the critical percentages will be faithfully chronicled! And when he reads that a copy of the said Resolution is to be forwarded to the Appointment Department, what visions rise before his mind of that terrible ledger which is believed to be kept in the archives of Government, and in which these percentages and averages no doubt are duly recorded! How such a man strives for a higher percentage, higher average year by year! How he will attempt impossibilities even, in order to bring about this result—no matter at what sacrifice, at what cost! Far be it from us to say that any but fair means are resorted to—though cases have unfortunately been known of work scamped, of returns falsified, of justice denied, even of evidence suborned, in order to increase the percentage. But these are, of course, exceptional cases. The great point is that a healthy competition is stimulated, and the question of promotion is so vastly simplified when a man's comparative official worth can thus be reduced to arithmetical proportions.

All Governments are more or less accustomed to govern by percentages, and even High Courts, it is said, have been known to employ a similar process in judging of the work of their subordinates. To judge from the recent Resolution on the Administration Report of the Calcutta Police, however, the Bengal Government would seem to be losing faith in the infallibility of this calculating machine. After contrasting the percentage of convictions and acquittals in the Courts of the Chief Presidency Magistrate, the Magistrate, Northern Division, and the Honorary Magistrates, the Resolution remarks:—"The Lieutenant-Governor has no desire to judge of the work done by these proportions; but"—and here the cloven foot seems to peep forth again—"the figures would seem to show that more care is taken in sifting complaints in the Northern Division Court than in others." And this, forsooth, because the Northern Division Court has the highest percentage of convictions and the smallest percentage of acquittals. And so the Northern Division Magistrate naturally comes in for the highest praise, "An extremely satisfactory result," "An excellent record;" but not a word for the Chief Presidency Magistrate, whose judicial record would seem to be equally successful, except in this matter of percentages. O the folly, the folly of it! Are our rulers so short-sighted, so blind, as not to know that figured statements of work done may be utterly deceptive; that no safe conclusion can be based upon a mere comparative record of averages? And why this striving after a high percentage of convictions? Is it the first object of Government to fill its prisons, or to do justice between man and man and enforce the safety of life and property? Is the cause of good government in any way benefited by the conviction of the innocent, and is not a Magistrate's first duty to acquit when he is not satisfied of the guilt of a prisoner?

Even a policeman ought not to be judged by the success of his prosecutions, which may depend on many circumstances with which he has no concern. But to a Magistrate, so long as he does his duty, the result of a prosecution ought to be as nothing. His business is to administer justice, not to secure convictions for the Government; and to judge of a Magistrate's merits by the percentages of cases in which he convicts, is really so foolish that one would think no one but a tyro in the art of governing would attempt it. But it is more than foolish. Has the Government never considered the incalculable mischief that may be done by fostering the belief, even if it is no more than a belief, that the promotion of a Magistrate or a policeman depends on his showing a high percentage of convictions? Has it never occurred to Government that such a belief may insensibly perhaps tend to interfere with the even course of justice? With men less conscientious than our Presidency Magistrates, with the rank and file of the police, such a belief may well give rise to practices which the Government itself would be the first to condemn. Never, never will be known the long list of crimes that are perpetrated in this country in order to establish a favourable record. And just because it is difficult to bring such cases to the light, the more reason why the Government should be careful to do and say nothing that may tend to encourage them. In this respect at least the time would seem to have arrived when Government by percentages should be abolished.—The Englishman, June 27, 1892.

Dated this 19th November 1891.

Holloway's Pills are admirably adapted for curing diseases incidental to females. At different periods of life women are subject to complaints which require a peculiar medicine; and it is now an indisputable fact that there is none so suitable for complaints of this nature as Holloway's Pills. For all the debilitating disorders incidental to the sex, and in every contingency perilous to the life and health of woman—youthful or aged or single—this great regulator and renovator of the secretive organs and the nervous system is an immediate cure. Their purifying qualities render them invaluable to females at all ages. They are searching and cleansing, yet invigorating; a few doses will speedily remove every species of irregularity in the system, and thereby establish health on a sound and firm basis.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

MY OWN PLACE.

A RHYME FOR ALL GOOD MEN AND TRUE.

BY MARTIN FARQUHAR TUPPER, AUTHOR OF "PROVERBIAL PHILOSOPHY," ETC.

WHOEVER I am, wherever my lot,
Whatever I happen to be,
Contentment and Duty shall hallow the spot,
That Providence orders for me ;
No covetous straining and striving to gain
One feverish step in advance,—
I know my own place, and you tempt me in vain
To hazard a change and a chance !

I care for no riches that are not my right,
No honor that is not my due ;
But stand in my station, by day or by night,
The will of my Master to do ;
He lent me my lot, be it humble or high,
And set me my business here,
And whether I live in his service, or die,
My heart shall be found in my sphere !

If wealthy, I stand as the steward of my King,
If poor, as the friend of my Lord,
If feeble, my prayers and my praises I bring,
If stalwart, my pen or my sword ;
If wisdom be mine, I will cherish His gift,
If simpleness, bask in His love,
If sorrow, His hope shall my spirit uplift,
If joy, I will throne it above !

The good that it pleases my God to bestow,
I gratefully gather and prize ;
The evil—it can be no evil, I know,
But only a good in disguise ;
And whether my station be lowly or great,
No duty can ever be mean,
The factory cripple is fixed in his fate,
As well as a King or a Queen !

For Duty's bright livery glorifies all
With brotherhood, equal and free,
Obeying, as children, the heavenly call,
That places us where we should be ;
A servant—the badge of my servitude shines
As a jewel invested by heaven ;
A monarch—remember that justice assigns
Much service, where so much is given !

Away then with "helpings" that humble and harm,
Though "bettering" trips from your tongue ;
Away ! for your folly would scatter the charm
That round my proud poverty hung ;

I felt that I stood like a man at my post,
Though peril and hardship were there,—
And all that your wisdom would counsel me most,
Is—"Leave it :—do better elsewhere."

If "better" were better indeed, and not "worse,"
I might go ahead with the rest,
But many a gain and a joy is a curse,
And many a grief for the best ;
No !—duties are all the "advantage" I use ;
I pine not for praise or for pelf,
And as to ambition, I care not to choose
My better or worse for myself !

I will not, I dare not, I cannot !—I stand
Where God has ordained me to be,
An honest mechanic—or lord in the land—
He fitted my calling for me :
Whatever my state, be it weak, be it strong,
With honor, or sweat, on my face,
This, this is my glory, my strength, and my song
I stand, like a star, in my place.

HOME SICKNESS.

FROM THE GERMAN.

THOU ask'st me why my heart is sad,
Why pensive thus I roam,
When all around are blithe and glad ?
My spirit pines for home.

'T is true the birds pour forth their songs,
'T is true this earth is fair ;
But, ah ! my aching bosom longs
For that which is not there.

At morn the flowers pour forth perfume,
At eve they fade away,
But in my Father's mansion bloom
Flowers that can ne'er decay.

Those fairy blossoms will not grow,
Save in their place of birth ;
They fade, they wither here below—
They were not made for earth.

Where is that mansion ? Far above
The sun, the stars, the skies ;
In realms of endless light and love,
My Father's mansion lies.

Then ask not why my heart is sad,
Why pensive thus I roam,
When all around are blithe and glad ?
My spirit pines for home.

WEEKLYANA.

BY order of Her Majesty in Council, the Besses and Minicoy Light dues have, from this month, been reduced by half.

A COMMITTEE for Privileges of the House of Lords decided the place for the Duke of York in the House immediately after the Duke of Connaught and Strathearn and before the Duke of Cambridge and the Primate.

HER Majesty has approved the appointment of Mr. Charles Henry Hill, as a Judge of the Bengal High Court in place of Mr. A. Wilson resigned.

MR. G. R. Elsmie, Barrister-at-Law, Financial Commissioner of the Punjab, has been appointed an Additional Member of the Governor-General's Council for making Laws and Regulations.

COLONEL P. D. Henderson, C.S.I., has been granted privilege leave for three months from the 12th July, Colonel H. P. Peacock, Political Resident in Turkish Arabia and officiating Resident at Jeypore, acting as Resident in Mysore and Chief Commissioner of Coorg. He will also officiate as Judicial Commissioner of Coorg.

MR. Justice Ameel Ali goes on one months' privilege leave from the 7th August.

IN the Mathematics Tripos list, among the male Wranglers, Cambridge, occurs a Bengali name. Mallik, Peterhouse, is the 23rd in order. Another Bengali—Datta, Emmanuel—is a Senior Optime, being 52nd in the list. There are two women Wranglers, and 5 Senior and 5 Junior Optimes.

ONE of the most interesting exhibits at the Conversazione of the Royal Society was the skeleton of a new Theriodont reptile from Cape Colony. It has some remarkable resemblances to a mammal—the molar teeth, among other features, being like those of a dog.

AT a meeting, on the 11th June, of the Congress of Surgeons then sitting in Berlin, Professor Wolff introduced a case of successful extirpation of the larynx. The operation was done eight months back on a Berlin dentist. It is so successful that, by an artificial larynx invented by Professor Bruns, the patient can speak and even sing. He gave proofs by reciting a monologue from Schiller's "William Tell" and singing the wellknown "Gaudeamus igitur."

DR. Vaughan, the new Roman Catholic Archbishop of Westminster, believes that England will become Catholic, for she is already half that way. Not that half the population has become so, but that half a revolution has been made towards Catholicism. In proof, he instances the High Church movement, which, according to him, is of a great service in that behalf, for "though it is true they arrest some who would otherwise have come over, yet on the whole they are doing our work, and nearly all the old controversies have died out. England herself will never, I think, be Catholic throughout, but her main religion will be so without a doubt." So expressed the Doctor to a representative of Black and White.

AT Rawalpindi on June 28, a rich money-lender was attacked by some of his infuriated debtors armed with heavy axes. It is doubtful whether he will survive the attack. No great matter for any body out of the family circle. One Jew will be the less.

A TWO-STOREYED observatory is being built at Paris for the top of Mont Blanc. It is of wood, has two floors of two rooms each, and can be taken to pieces. No foundation of rock being available among the frozen snow, it will be imbedded in the snow itself.

THE useful men who keep watch for the denizens of our planet over the doings of her sister globes in the far distance, have lately reported the inroad of a new intruder in the shape of a comet. We are all acquainted with this kind of visitors which no longer terrifies us as it used to frighten our ancestors. But the present comet is a regular monster. It has not only more tails than one but sports any number of them—a whole system, very complicated, of appendages. According to Professor Barnard, of San Francisco, as many as half a dozen distinct branches can be counted proceeding from the head, some of them being curiously curved. Photographs have been taken showing that in less than 24 hours the third tail had extended to a length of ten million miles, while the northern tail had completely vanished. Portions of the tail were seen to make abrupt angles from their original source.

We wonder our astrologers who know all the past, the present, and the future, have no news of this multitailed apparition.

TALKING of our astrologers reminds us that the late proud predictions about the weather of these far from Delphic oracles have been woefully belied by the event. There has been no cyclone and no loss of life therefrom on the 27th June.

THE Madras Standard says:—

"The Reis and Rayyet confesses to have had a sneaking fondness for the Hindoo Patriot, as it was the first worthy national journal whose greatness has not yet been exceeded."

and asks the pertinent question:—

"Why sneaking fondness?"

In kindness for our benighted friend, we will tell the secret. It was a "goak" and nothing more.

SIR Sarvanand is to the fore again. Having saved the Native Press, the Bangabasi in especial, and the Bengal Government above all, and having reduced the historic Hindoo Patriot to a daily, the middle-aged Hercules has had leisure for other labours. He is now engaged on a reform of the etiquette of correspondence. He is evidently dissatisfied with the epistolary forms in vogue and has inaugurated a change. He regards the mode of subscribing letters wrong in principle, thinking that the description qualifying the signature should come after it. According to him, the present custom is faulty: In the natural order the qualifying clause should follow, not precede, the name of the writer. Nor is he without warrant in custom itself, seeing that the titles to consideration of the writer are never given before. Even now under the irrational system in vogue, nobody subscribes himself B. A., Sarvanand, or Engineer, Fatik Chaud, or Lieutenant Colonel, Brown Jones, or Magistrate, 24-Parganas, John Robinson. So, in reliance upon the logic of precedents, he has boldly introduced Nature into his own written communications, in the full belief, doubtless, that his example will be followed and an absurd practice be rooted out of the world. In Thursday's issue of his own paper, the Hindoo Patriot, he publishes in full the British Indian Association's letter to Government on the Chowkidari Act Amendment Bill. Whoever wrote that letter, it was sent with the signature of the Secretary of the Association, which is himself. Had it appeared in any other journal its authenticity might be doubted. A rival journalist might possibly have been tempted to tamper with the text. The wag of the Anrita Bazar Patrika might have been suspected of perpetrating a hoax. But there is no room for any of these or other like suggestions. Was it possible that any body on his own establishment would dare to play a trick on Sir Sarvanand Bahadur? We dismiss the thought as absurd.

What, then, do we find in the Hindoo Patriot of the 7th instant? It is this. The letter of the British Indian Association in question "To H. C. Streatfield Esq. Under-Secretary, Government of Bengal," is subscribed in the following original way:—

"I have the honor to be,

Sir,

RAJKUMAR SARVADHIKARI,

Your most obedient servant,

Secretary, British Indian Association."

The world, we dare say, will note and mend its way.

DR. Wiederhold, of Kassel in Germany, was sentenced to three months' imprisonment for chastising a lady with sticks and blows to get rid of her hysteria. The treatment is indeed a novel one in these days. It reminds us of the old tale of a highway robber being transformed into a doctor by the grace of god Siva. Does Dr. Wiederhold, like the ignorant masses of India, hold hysteria to be a symptom of demoniac possession? According to the Indian maxim, devils depart at blows.

ARTS. All, the hanging instrument that is called after the name of Dr. Guillotin, was not invented by him, though he approved of it. According to a recent writer in the Saturday Review, the real inventor was Dr. Louis, Secretary to the Academie de Medicine, Paris. It was designed by him in 1785 as an improvement on an Italian instrument and resembled in principle the Scotch "maiden" and the Halifax "gibbet." It was exhibited to a select assembly of deputies on March 1792 and recommended by the Assembly three weeks after. During this period Dr. Guillotin spoke many a time in its favour, condemning the old instrument with rack and wheel, instead of which the new one was now introduced. It was first called "Louisson" but the public were for calling it after its chief advocate in the chamber, guillotine. On April 25 1792, it was first used for beheading a highwayman. Dr. Guillotin died in 1814. Is it possible that he acted under a vague instinct of personal selfishness? The new instrument might have been tried on the worthy doctor himself.

NOTES & LEADERETTES

with
 OUR OWN NEWS.

THE lame mule ends with catching the hare, says the Arab proverb. The Black Man, like the dark horse of the turf, has, after all, reached the winning post. Lord Salisbury's doubt—"I doubt if we have yet got to that point where a British constituency will elect a black man to represent them," has been dispelled. Mr. Dadabhai Naoroji has been returned a Member of Parliament. It is an agreeable surprise to us Indians. Mr. Dadabhai's patience has been rewarded. He had courted and been jilted. He again wined and won Central Finsbury. Until the eleventh hour he had no hopes when a lady stepped in and succeeded in retiring his rival in the same Liberal interest in which he had been working. He has been returned by a majority of three. In the previous election of 1886, the majority was five.

In honor of the event, meetings are being held in different parts of the country. Our Congress friends of this city have arranged to close the private schools and colleges, themselves being owners of most of the institutions, on Monday next, to be followed up by a public demonstration. Vigorous attempts are being made to get up a general illumination. Bombay will celebrate her Naoroji's success with genuine enthusiasm and all the honours.

OF the three Anglo-Indians recently retired from service in this country, who contested the elections, the late Military Member and the Law Member have been returned, and Mr. Douglas Straight, of the Allahabad High Court, been defeated.

THE General Election shows a distinct Liberal reaction. The fickle Metropolis has turned her back on the Ministry, and at other centres the same change is observable. England is too jealous of power to leave it long in the same hands.

So far as we can guess at this stage, the two forces of Government and the Opposition will be too equally balanced for administration. We trust there will be no necessity for another dissolution, which may dash to the ground the hopes of India at the election of Dadabhai Naoroji.

THE elections are not yet ended. The latest returns are:—

Conservatives...	165
Liberals	135
Unionists	25
Anti-Parnellites	15
Parnellites	4

showing that the Liberals have gained forty-three seats, the Conservatives thirteen, and the Unionists six.

WE learn—for we are not favoured with the daily—that the Amrita Bazar Patrika has issued a black border issue by way of mourning for the Parliamentary death of Mr. J. M. Maclean, who has not been re-elected by Oldham. This is the very reductio ad absurdum of irony. It is a pity that such a feeble and pointless practical joke should have been perpetrated on a serious subject by men who are not deficient in native wit. We regret it because it shows a bad spirit in our countrymen. Is it generous—is it honourable—is it even decent—to chuckle over the misfortunes of even enemies?

Surely our countrymen would not wish to see Mr. Maclean's income reduced, his uninsured house and effects on fire, his children die of the influenza! A slight ripple of satisfaction at his failure in the election, as it is natural, is the utmost stretch of ill-nature permissible to enemies. Thus far shall it go and no farther. Generous minded opponents will not humiliate themselves by even this degree of evil thought. Righteous men of course will never countenance it. Brave minds do not care to see the field cleared of enemies by accidents—they are ready to fight all comers. This indecent jubilation only enhances the importance of Mr. Maclean and is a confession of our imbecility. Is Mr. Maclean so formidable that we should so anxiously desire to see him out of the House? For our part, we should wish to see him in all the more now that our Naoroji will be there to meet him. Although inferior in brilliancy, our Black Man is a man of superior calibre and a politician of greater grasp as well as information and better grounded in principles.

THE chuckle over Mr. Maclean's parliamentary demise is premature. He may yet come in, after all. If this chuckle should be telegraphed, he would almost surely get in. He would try his best and Englishmen would have more sympathy with him than ever. This chuckle is bad in tactics as in morals and manners.

Apart from this incident, Mr. Maclean has displayed so much ability in debate that it will be worth the while of the Conservative leaders to find him a seat.

IN 1890, Congress passed an Act for celebrating the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America by Columbus. Among other things it provides that the discovery be commemorated by an exhibition of the resources of the United States of America, their development, and of the progress of civilization in the New World, and that such an exhibition should be of a national and international character, so that not only the people of the Union and the American Continent, but those of all nations as well, can participate. Such is to be the World's Columbian Exposition, Chicago, United States, America. It will be held on the lovely shore of Lake Michigan, in the great City of Chicago. It will be opened on the 1st May 1893 and closed on the 30th October following.

India will not be officially represented in the World's Exposition. In answer to General Goldsworthy, Mr. Curzon informed the House of Commons on the 13th June that "After very careful consideration the Government of India have come to the conclusion, in which they have the support of all the Indian Chambers of Commerce, that it is not necessary that India should be officially represented at Chicago, either directly or through the British Commission; or that any grant in aid should be made. The Government is, however, supporting the Calcutta Tea Association in the establishment of an Indian section at the Exhibition."

Notwithstanding the decision of the Secretary of State, the Government of India have ordered the issue of a circular incorporating the general regulations for foreign exhibitors and the United States Government regulations governing the free importation of articles for exhibition at the show to the Local Governments and Administrations and to the Foreign Department for such circulation to Political officers in Native States as may be considered necessary.

The Government of India have sanctioned Rs. 40,000 for the Indian tea section of the Exposition.

A MOST brilliant operation has been just performed in America which revolutionises at once the mental and the medical sciences. It is reported by Dr. Hugo Engel of Philadelphia in the Medical News. It was an operation of trephining followed by mental improvement. A boy of fourteen who had been in a good mental and physical condition until his sixth year, was attacked with severe epileptic fits which gradually transformed him into a savage animal as it were. The boy now behaved more like an idiot with maniacal symptoms coming on at times. There was a peculiar conformation of the skull which suggested to the surgeon the premature closing of the fontanelles by the junction of parietal and frontal bones. Two operations were performed by removing portions of the right frontal and parietal bones immediately contiguous to the coronal suture. There was a marked lessening of the fits in number as well as intensity, with an admirable improvement of the mental conditions. He regained his bright lively nature, and there was a complete change in his habits. Cases are found where mental lesions have supervened after injuries and have been remedied after trephining, but idiocy due to rapid closing of the fontanelles cured by an operation is extremely rare. Dr. Engel's case is a most important success in surgery which, while it utterly discredits the old psychology, opens a long vista to the applicability of trephining in the most obscure and desperate mental disorders due to malformation, congenital or post congenital.

THE late Professor Freeman's friends probably affected to regard him as a mere doctrinaire in affairs. In truth he was little better than a schoolmaster. He set great store by his own epigram, History is past politics; politics are present history, speaking with charming simplicity of his success with this grand organ for discovery of truth. He boasted, that in most of the political matters to which he had given any thought at all he had come to his own conclusions first, and had the pleasure of seeing the practical men come to the same conclusions later. That is unmistakably like the man of the ferule.

THE Report of the Medical Officer of the Local Government Board of London for 1890 contains many interesting features. In a case of food-poisoning at Portsmouth, Dr. Klein was offered an opportunity for experiment with the poisonous materials. He found that "these matters had, when he received them, definitely poisonous properties upon mice; and that with lapse of time this poisonous action was lost. At the time when the materials were poisonous, they exhibited in great abundance two forms of bacillus, the one mobile, and the other non-mobile. After the materials had lost their poisonous quality they continued to exhibit bacteria in great abundance, especially the mobile bacillus above mentioned, but the non-mobile was now no longer to be found." This proves how one species of bacteria is poisonous while the other is not only innocuous but plays an important part in maintaining the economy of nature and as such in destroying the morbid influence of the other. Dr. Dupré has illustrated these facts in deep-well waters—how the harmless ones have the superiority over the others. So even in bacterial life there is a continuous struggle for existence.

IN the same report there are fourteen instances of food-poisoning from 1880 to 1888. Of these ten are due to pig meat of one kind or another, veal, beef, butcher's meat (kind unstated) and tinned salmon, each forming one instance respectively. After all, there is more danger in the pig meat than in other kinds of flesh. The Hindus and Mahomedans have done well to forsake it.

THERE is an order to all port sanitary authorities signed by the President Charles T. Richie, dated August 28, 1890. The power of the Local Government Board extends over seas, rivers and waters of the United Kingdom and the high seas within three miles of the coasts. These regulations contrast with the laws of quarantine accepted by the continental nations of Europe, and are intended more to facilitate commerce than to enforce isolation.

A NOTE by Dr. H. Hamer, on certain conditions determining insusceptibility of the human system to poisonous materials, is appended to the Report. Therein he examines Metschnikoff's theory of the power of leucocytes to destroy the bacteria. Buchner's theory of the germicidal action of animal fluids apart from cells has too been noticed. Following certain experiments, Dr. Hamer is of opinion that the doctrine of phagocytosis is not in accordance with but in direct opposition to Ruffer's theory of diphtheria where "the diphtheritic membrane is a battle-field for amœboid cells and the pathogenic microbes of diphtheria."

DR. Barry, on an epidemic of enteric fever in Tees valley, reports that "I have personally no hesitation in attributing the epidemic of enteric fever in the Lower Tees Valley to the water pumped from the River Tees during the fortnight ending August 23rd, at a time, namely, when the river was in flood and when it must have contained abundance of excremental matter." The water was supplied by the Stockton and Middlesbrough Water Works. Unless the condition of the river or the water supply is improved, no good is expected. Persons residing in the locality were advised to boil their drinking water.

It is reported from Kurachi that for Rs. 10,000 paid by the Nawab of Junagadh for the Medressah building at Kurachi, at a large gathering of Mahomedans at the Medressah Hall, special prayers were offered for His Highness Nawab Rasool Khanji Bahadur and for Her Majesty. This is overdoing a good thing—to silliness and indecency. What is the rationale of the prayer for the Empress? Was it an acknowledgment of her graciousness as sovereign in not robbing the Nawab of his throne and property and effects so that he was able to pay Rs. 10,000 to a charity? Or was it a mere compliment like the toast at public dinners? In that case, Her Majesty should have been allowed the precedence in the prayers. Again, supposing the black Nawab had paid a lac, what would have been the proper form of acknowledgment? Would Kurachi have voted a Day of General Fast and Thanksgiving?

THE Panjab is in a fair way of being independent of Bengal in her coal supply. Her own coal-fields are being worked with success. According to official reports, the Dandot Colliery nearly doubled its output during last year. It was over 72,000 tons, the profits realised being nearly 15 per cent. on the capital outlay. The Bhaganwalia coal-field on the Salt Range, seventeen miles from Dandot, also seems very promising, with coal slightly better than that produced at Dandot.

THE Southern Mahratta Railway Company have, in supersession of their previous order for caps, prescribed the national turban for their upper native staff. The black uniform cap was at first an abomination to the latter. As we are told in a paragraph which appears in the Pioneer, "at first they did not take to it kindly. A few stoutly refused to relinquish their kinkobs and turbans of voluminous folds, and some only donned the black cap when they knew their Inspecting Officers were about. The rule was, however, applied with greater and less severity, and at length a factitious taste for black caps was actually created, so much so that clerks and others who were not required to wear black caps as a uniform took to wearing them. Some were bordered with gold lace and others with floral designs richly executed in coloured silk and gold and silver thread. The Company, becoming alarmed, has now ordered a return to the turban and the coquettish cap has been prescribed" (sic). The last word should, of course, be "proscribed," and it shows how our leading contemporary's great establishment is not above the typographic lapses to which minor offices and the Indian Press in general are liable. That correction, however, does not remove the inherent weakness of the sentence. That "coquettish cap" is an eye-sore and no mistake—in the text as well as in point of fact. A bold epithet indeed is "coquettish" for the infernal black cap prescribed! If the adjective is meant for the sumptuous lace cap decorated with flowery gold and silver thread worked in colored silk, the fancy for it was simply silly. Its adoption by any railway servant was not only against rule but an obvious impropriety also—a sin against the decencies of business life. But as it had never been prescribed, there was no occasion for its proscription. It is also amusing to see how, notwithstanding the admitted repugnance to the innovation of the hideous black cap, the growth of a taste for it is predicated, apparently as the result of not the steady pressure of the Company in enforcing their command but the greater and less severity with which the rule to wear the black cap was enforced. The writer perceives the weakness of his statement which he tries to bolster up by qualifying the taste said to be created by the word "factitious." But that word does not really alter the matter. Is it to be supposed that a taste, factitious or real, was created by the less severity with which a repugnant rule was enforced? The adoption of caps "some bordered with gold lace and others with floral designs richly executed in colored silk and gold and silver thread," was a strange proof of the creation of a taste—say "a factitious taste—for black caps."

The whole is a curious attempt to keep the Railway Company in countenance and gloss over their discomfiture. The black business did not go down with the natives and the sumptuary regulation had to be withdrawn. That is plain. But the defeat from the natives has gone to the heart of the railway authorities and their friends in the press. Let them not lose heart, however. They will yet obtain their heart's wish. Of course there can be no question about the repugnance of Orientals to the European's choice color, black. This side the country too there was great dismay on the E. I. R. when that black cap was introduced, and several men threw up their appointments rather than appear in that ridiculous head-gear. Others only donned it at train time when Europeans were about. This was the thin end of the wedge. Gradually the repugnance wore off, and we now see Brahmans, Vaidyas and Kayasthas wearing the undertaker's badge without fret or a conscious sense of humiliation.

Mr. Lambert's appointment to the Lieutenant-Governor's Council for making Laws, which we quietly and dubiously brought to public notice, has been warmly attacked. Two of our European morning contemporaries of this city have condemned it in no uncertain terms. The Indian Daily News, after quoting our paragraph, gives expression to the general complaint of the inordinate predominance of the official element in the local Legislature. As regards the appointment of Mr. Lambert to help to pass the Fire Brigade, the mercantile community is said to regard it as a tactical mistake, if not worse. The objection is not of course to Mr. Lambert as Mr. Lambert. But, says our contemporary,

"it is held to be a departure from the correct principles of legislation that an officer who is in charge of the working of the Act should be the one to make it. That Mr. Lambert can give valuable information on the working of the Act may be admitted. But that does not qualify him as a legislator. And further, the Act may outlast Mr. Lambert, and he may be succeeded by an officer of less discretion and knowledge. Moreover, it is pointed out that the 'other side' has now no representative on the Council, or is very inadequately represented. The merchants have a great interest in the Fire Brigade question, and they have hitherto been chiefly taxed for the support of the Brigade. They not unreasonably say that they have as good a claim to be represented in the Council as the executive who will have the working of the Act. It may have been for want of consideration that this arrangement has been made. But it is felt, rightly or wrongly, that it is another step in a too apparent tendency to subordinate all other influences, including the judicial, to executive authority, a course which bodes no good to the general public."

Soon after the Statesman followed up with great spirit. It perfectly agrees with the Indian Daily News in regarding the appointment of the Commissioner of Police as a "departure from the true principles of legislation that an officer who is to have charge of the working of an Act should take part in making and passing it." The writer goes on:—

"The opinion of such an officer as to what is required of the Legislature is, no doubt, entitled to the fullest consideration. But that furnishes no argument for associating him with the Legislature in the making or passing of the law; for there is nothing to prevent the Council having all the benefit of his advice without his actually occupying a seat in it."

"There is, moreover, a strong objection to Mr. Lambert's elevation to the Council, quite independently of the pendency of this particular Bill, in the mere fact of his being the Commissioner of Police. The same grounds on which it is considered necessary that executive and judicial functions should be kept apart, apply in an almost equal degree to the separation of executive and legislative functions. The Legislature should be in a position to judge with absolute impartiality between the interests of the executive and those of the public, and, in order that it may be in such a position, it should consist of men who are not actively engaged in the performance of executive duties. It is all the more necessary that this principle should be observed in a country like India, where the legislature consists of members in whose appointment the public has no voice, and over whose acts consequently it possesses no control. As we have had occasion to remark more than once, the executive in India, in recent years, have shown a strong tendency not merely to arrogate to themselves an undue control over the judiciary of the country, but to legislate themselves out of the jurisdiction of the courts, as regards their official acts. The tendency is one which strikes at the very roots of justice and liberty, and it should be promptly resisted whenever and wherever it displays itself. The appointment of an official in Mr. Lambert's position to a seat in the Legislative Council of the Province will, not unnaturally, be regarded as making a further development of this policy, which is wholly opposed to the spirit of British rule, and has only to be exposed to be condemned by the voice of British public opinion. We are strongly of opinion that the appointment under comment ought never to have been made, and should be cancelled."

In all the noble sentiments expressed above, we entirely concur. If the Constitution is in danger, we hope our other contemporaries will see the necessity of their coming forward in its defence. Will the Englishman do its duty on the occasion as befits its position and the traditions of its constituents?

AN enormous aerolite fell into the Caspian Sea not far from Apscheron. It came down with a loud noise and greatly disturbed the Sea for a long distance. It looks like an ordinary rock projecting over 12 feet over water 25 feet deep.

YESTERDAY, Mr. Jackson moved the Criminal Bench of the High Court in the matter of Raja Surya Kunt Acharjee of Muktagacha, against the proceedings, by himself and through his Assistant, of Mr. Phillips, District Magistrate, Mainensing. Mr. Jackson made two separate applications, one to set aside the order of the Assistant Magistrate under section 432 of the Penal Code, fining the Raja Rs. 500 with the alternative of twenty days' simple imprisonment, and the other to quash the order of the District Magistrate under section 143 of the Criminal Procedure Code on the Raja not to repeat or continue the nuisance of the wall the Raja had built and the District Magistrate had pulled down.

The proper course would have been to file an appeal to the District Judge, but this was not done in order that the Judges of the High Court might be given an immediate opportunity of expressing themselves on the extraordinary proceedings of the District Magistrate.

The Judges, though competent, would not depart from the usual practice of the Court in favor of a rich Raja appearing by an eminent counsel. One of them, in anticipation of the attack on the softness of the bench as though he expected a Tiger's spring, had fortified himself by putting himself in the same mood in which Sterne prepared himself at the sight of the monk to receive his clerical visitor with a predetermination not to give a sou. For once he would not let his tongue carry away his head. And he spoke to the same effect. So novel was his attitude that he was vain of his newly acquired prudence. After all, the court granted a rule on the District Magistrate. We quote the orders.

"Norris, J.—We think that sufficient material has been put before us by learned counsel to make it incumbent upon us to grant a rule calling upon the district magistrate of Mymensingh to show cause why an order of the 22nd June should not be set aside. With regard to the other application, that we should call for the records of the proceedings before the Assistant Magistrate with the view of revising them, we consider that no sufficient ground has been made out. If an application had been made by the humblest pleader in this court on behalf of the poorest of Her Majesty's subject in this country, we should have arrived at the same conclusion as we have arrived at in this case. The fact that the defendant, who has been fined an inconsiderable sum, is a gentleman of wealth and standing cannot make any possible difference to us in the discharge of purely judicial duty, whether or not the action taken by the district magistrate was right, or the steps he has taken were right. Whether he has wantonly, viciously, or maliciously put the Raja to shame is a matter which is not before us, and upon which we decline to express any opinion. The Raja has his remedy by a regular appeal, and when that regular appeal has been decided one way or another, he then can come forward before this court for revision.

O'Knealy, J.—It is right I should say that I entirely concur in the judgment which has just been delivered. No doubt from the number of letters read by Mr. Jackson there are many points which may be put forward in appeal, but the offence of which he has been convicted is one which carries no social stigma or stain with it, and he has his ordinary remedy. It is only a fine, and I venture to say that if we were to admit such cases to revision, we should not be in a position to refuse any possible case which may be applied for by any one. I think therefore that it would not be advisable for us to abandon the usual practice of the court where a man has his ordinary remedy. In the other case I also concur in thinking that Mr. Jackson has shown good cause for the rule which has been granted."

If the Judges would not admit the appeal, and would not be tempted to express any opinion on the proceedings of the District magistracy, one of them made certain remarks which must be noted.

"Norris, J.—The putting of the Raja into the dock is purely an executive matter, with which we are not called upon to deal judicially whatever opinion we may hold with regard to it.

Mr. Jackson.—Surely your lordships are competent to deal with a matter of this kind.

Norris, J.—Suppose that it was done in bad faith, maliciously, wantonly, recklessly; assume that all that had been done by Mr. Phillips against the Raja was done in this spirit: what has that to do with the question why we should abandon the practice and allow this case to be revised before the appeal is heard? What has the fact that this gentleman has been wantonly, recklessly, maliciously put into the dock at the instigation of the magistrate got to do with the question of revising judicial proceedings? All we can do is to set aside the sentence passed upon this gentleman, and order the fine of Rs. 500 to be refunded.

Mr. Jackson.—Nothing more? That's all!

Norris, J.—I am not going to be tempted into making any comments in this matter at this stage of the proceedings, directly or indirectly.

Mr. Jackson said that his lordship's remark staggered him. The proceedings were monstrous, and yet their lordships would not express an opinion on the extraordinary nature of the case. He again urged that the court should express an opinion on the case, apart from dealing with it under the revisional section.

Later on,

Norris, J.—Despite the signs of the times, which are easily read, I am sorry to say I trust the day is yet very distant when any judicial officer will fail to do what he considers to be right according to the dictates of his conscience, because the executive are parties to any proceedings before him. I am glad to have an opportunity of saying this publicly.

A fine way of keeping the predetermination not to give a sous!

Jesting apart, the last remark of Mr. Justice Norris is a valuable one and worthy of a British Judge. Whatever his faults of temper or tongue, he is always Englishman to the backbone.

REIS & RAYYET.

Saturday, July 9, 1892.

THE CADASTRAL SURVEY.

THE Cadastral Survey in Mozufferpore came into operation with the Bengal Tenancy Act towards the latter end of 1885. It was at the beginning an experimental measure, the object of which was to give effect to the provisions of the Tenancy Act and also to benefit all classes of occupiers and fix their rights and liabilities, a measure which if proved successful might be extended to all the territories under the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal. It was, however, abandoned under the orders of the Secretary of State in 1886. Later on, it was repeatedly represented to the Government of India that the preparation of a record of rights was absolutely necessary for the sake of good government, as the condition of the peasantry of Behar was most deplorable, while the conduct of the Zemindars was unparalleled in oppression and the provisions of the Tenancy Act were inefficient either to remove or alleviate the evils that had been existing for a long time. Stress was laid on the Behar famine of 1874 which showed how utterly incapable were the rayyets to help themselves on the failure of a year's crop. A searching inquiry ended with the suggestion for a change in the rent law of Behar. When the present law came into operation it was soon found out that the mere introduction of a law more favorable to the rayyets would be of no use when they were perfectly helpless and ignorant as a class to assert their rights out of court or to go to court to enforce their claims. The Famine Commission had pointed out that in Behar the relations of landlord and tenant were those of a high-handed proprietary habitually disregarding the law on the one hand, and on the other a peasantry ignorant, utterly helpless and sunk in abject poverty, and that it was the first duty of Government to guard jealously against the infringements of the law by the rich, and to put them down, as if they were offences against the public peace. It was urged that in Behar active measures should be adopted to enable the rayyets to resist illegal distraint, illegal enhancement and illegal cesses and to prove and maintain occupancy rights. The helplessness of the rayyets was attributed to loose Zemindari accounts, to the entire absence of leases and counterparts, and to other evils which placed the tenantry at the mercy of the Zemindars. In the discussion which led to the Tenancy Act, it was reiterated that without a record of rights the rayyets had no safeguard in spite of the various Rent laws. In submitting the proposal of Survey to the Government of India, the late Sir Rivers Thompson remarked that "no matter how excellent and liberal the rights provided for by the law may be for such a population as we have to deal with, it cannot be doubted that until a record of right shall have been completed the peasantry will, to use Sir John Strachey's words, remain the victims of chicanery and oppression and our Courts will be systematically made use of for the perpetration of injustice." It was also pointed out how the richest and biggest Zemindars of Behar attempted to induce the rayyets to execute agreements to pay enhanced rents and how on one occasion a number of them were dragged to the criminal court on the pretence of slaughtering a bullock and how the case was dismissed as false. This and other delinquencies of a leading Zemindar were largely availed of in giving point to the proposition of the Local Government. With him too other Zemindars were dragged through the mire and branded as criminals. All this at the back of the Zemindars who are still in blissful ignorance of the same and without any explanation or protest from them.

There was considerable anxiety in the mind of Government when the Survey was commenced, that there would be great and organised agitation under the advice of competent and experienced men acquainted with the land questions of the country. But the anxiety was soon removed when the success of the Survey was attained without friction and opposition as the following minute recorded by an eminent officer of Government who watched the proceedings shews.

"The Survey operations under the Bengal Tenancy Act are progressing as smoothly as possible, disputes as to boundaries and possessions are few and are chiefly connected with pieces of waste land and roads. Organised opposition there is none and it is now clear that apprehensions as to relations between landlords and tenants being embittered by Survey is groundless. Among the Zemindars, the Survey seems on the whole not unpopular, inasmuch as they see that it will produce facilities for identifying the whole of their lands and for realising their dues on account of every portion of their estates. The rayyets are quite indifferent in the matter and see no cause for resistance or opposition to the proceedings. The criminal cases connected with the demarcation and survey proceedings have been extremely few and have mostly on investigation turned out to be false and exaggerated. Nothing in the shape of a riot has been proved in any instance. The Survey will effect much good in the way of determining rights and facilitating the identification of land. It is probable that the Survey record will be looked upon as a charter of rights by all classes interested in land and no transfer will be negotiated without reference to it."

Accordingly, we find the Government of India, in recommending the adoption of the Survey, write, "We have heard of no opposition to the Survey." Later on, further assurance was given that the work of survey and record of rights was on the most satisfactory footing in Mozufferpore, on account of the tact and judgment displayed by those charged with it. The success of it was represented to be beyond doubt and all parties concerned in the land had, so it was said, received it as their Magna Charta. It was this unfaltering assurance that led the Home Government to accord its sanction to the proposition of the Bengal Government, supported by the Government of India, for the extension of the survey all over the country. The survey is now in full swing and preparations are making to introduce it to all and every district under the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal.

It behoves therefore those interested in the survey and the record of rights to lose no time in studying the history of the measure to enable them intelligently to watch the operations already commenced, and to devise means to stop it, if possible. The present is but the thin end of the wedge. Omission to take immediate steps will be fatal. The accusations must be met, the conclusions arrived at must be proved fallacious, if the arm raised is to be averted. The Government of India and the Secretary of State, in their breadth of views and their freedom from local bias, are yet open to proper and reasonable representation. At any rate, the Zemindars will also do well to take note of the measure which will soon be on the legislative anvil to saddle them with a new taxation.

Much as the landed interests of the country have suffered by default, they are always sure of a hearing. The situation, though difficult, is not desperate. Surely an ex parte judgment behind the back of those interested, on which this measure is founded, ought not to be difficult of arrest. Let the landlords recall the circumstances under which they submitted to the original settlement of the last century and the conditions, expressed and understood, under which they undertook it. Nor will it be so difficult to show up the later misrepresentations which have compromised them. A study of the N.-W. Provinces Revenue system, from which this Cadastral Survey had been borrowed, would be a great help in opposing the new efforts to impose the peculiarities of that system on the devoted heads of the people of these Lower Provinces. Ignorant as the present opposition to the Cadastral Survey in Behar seems of the complete history of the land question, we give some extracts from the minutes of two Governors-General which will show how they would have discountenanced the present survey. Lord Hastings wrote:—

"The regulation of the rents of rayyets is properly a transaction between the Zemindar or landlord and his tenants and not of the Government, and the detail attending it is so minute as to baffle the skill of any man well versed in it."

Lord Teignmouth, unrivalled for his familiarity with the landed system of these Provinces, said:—

"It may be urged that, unless Government intends to raise the revenues of the lands in future, any further knowledge of the value of them beyond what we at present possess is unnecessary, and to demand the accounts of it would only tend to excite suspicions in the Zemindars that the present assessment would not be permanent. The Court of Directors are themselves satisfied upon this point and discourage the idea of local investigation into the value of the land, directing that when the tribute of each Zemindar is fixed, he shall remain undisturbed in the administration and enjoyment of his estate and be assured that as long as he pays stipulated revenue he shall be subject to no scrutinies or interposition of the officers of Government, unless where a judicial process may become necessary to adjust claims between him and tenant or talukdars or partners of the same Zemindari."

THE GREAT MAHOMEDAN CASE.

THE LAW OF Wakf.

After the extraordinary case of Raja Surja Kant Acharjee, decided last week at Mymensingh by the Assistant Magistrate Mr. Halifax as the District Magistrate Mr. H. A. D. Phillips' humble servant, which was brought to the notice of the High Court in its criminal bench, by Mr. Jackson, the legal interest of the week has centred in the great Mahomedan case which has occupied a Full Bench of the High Court for a full fortnight without coming to an end. We call it a Mahomedan case though only one side is Mahomedan and the other Hindu, because it intimately affects the interests of the Mahomedan community only, and, indeed, the point referred by the Divisional Bench consisting of the Chief Justice and Justice Hill to the Full Bench (Petheram C. J., and Prinsep, Trevelyan, Ghose and Ali, J. J.) is a question in Mahomedan Law. The case arose out of a Mahomedan's relations with a Hindu creditor. The Believer borrowed as the owner of certain property and the son of Brahma freely supplied the means for the Moslem's extravagance on the strength of the latter's property. At length the difficulty came in the hour of repayment. The debt was not denied by the honest follower of the Prophet, only there were no assets for the interested lender of an infidel. If the creditor tried to recoup himself by the sale of the debtor's real property, he was sternly warned against laying violent hands on God's own. A pretty dilemma for a Jew who was very far from a Rothschild, to be in! The creditor could not soon abandon all his hopes. In fact, he considered the whole thing an imposition and a plot to defraud him. He had the sympathy of all classes except the Mussulmans. To the unsophisticated public it was monstrous that a man should not pay his creditor and yet enjoy a property on the credit or security of which he had borrowed. So, in full reliance on the justice of his case, he laid siege to the property. He was met by the plea that that property was a religious trust and could not be touched, he having created it Wakf. The Hindu won in the first court, and the Mussulman appealed. The case coming before Chief Justice Petheram and Justice Hill, they referred the following issue to the Full Bench, viz., Whether the document executed by the appellant constituted a valid Wakf according to Mahomedan Law?

This is the question the arguments on which have occupied the Full Bench all these two weeks. Five barristers are engaged, of whom four are leading men, Sir Griffith Evans and Messrs. Bonnerjea and Hill for the appellant and Mr. Advocate-General Woodroffe and Mr. Abdur Rahman for the respondent. If the one side has the advantage of a Mahomedan barrister, the other side also enjoys the assistance of a learned Mahomedan senior Vakil, Moulvi Mahammad Yusoof. The argument for the appellant was opened by Mr. Hill. The other barristers on that side were to follow. Instead, they allowed Mr. Yusoof, who was understood to have paid much attention to the original sources, to argue. We have procured an outline of his argument, and as the case has excited great interest in Mahomedan society and the community in general while the question affects all classes more or less, we have much pleasure in laying it before our readers.

Mr. Yusoof said:—

He was indebted to Mr. Bonnerjea and Sir Griffith Evans for the honor of addressing the Court after Mr. Hill. The adverse contention was that Wakf was not valid unless it was for the benefit of the poor; the appropriation to be good in law must be solely for charitable purposes and it was therefore contended by the other side that there could be no Wakf on one's self and his children. This contention was based on a misunderstanding of the law of Wakf and Mr. Hamilton's translation of the Hedaya had only served to encourage and perpetuate that mistake. The European mind was apt to take that mistaken view of the law of Wakf, because that view accorded with the European notion of the law against perpetuities. But in the first place it was altogether a mistake to suppose that the law of Wakf should be controlled by the law of perpetuities, because the law of perpetuities was a branch of the law of gift, and when a disposition was said to be void because it was against the law of perpetuities as in the case of Tagore vs. Tagore, what was meant was that the law of gift must be subject to the rule of perpetuities: but the Mahomedan law of gifts did not violate the rule of perpetuities because it was not his contention that a gift could be made so as to involve perpetuity.

His contention was that Wakf was not a branch of the law of gift: gift was a disposition of the corpus or substance (or the ain) of a thing in favor of an individual, but Wakf was the gift of the corpus or substance of a thing to God. Again, gift was always without consideration and therefore it could, under certain circumstances, be resumed: but Wakf or Sadka was for consideration and that consideration was Suwab or religious merit in the eye of God: it was therefore incapable of being resumed: the difference between Wakf and Sadka was that the latter consisted of gifts of moveables or immoveables whereas a Wakf was a gift of immoveables only, as explained above.

Wakf, therefore, being a disposition, for a consideration, in favor of God, it was perfectly competent to the Wakif to indicate whatever purpose he thought best on which the profits could be bestowed: he might bestow them on his children or on himself or on strangers or on the poor: the only limit was that the purpose should be one which was not prohibited to a Moslem. To suppose that the purpose of Wakf must be solely charitable, according to Western ideas, is to misconceive the very nature of Wakf.

There was an institution known to the Mahomedans called Zakat or poor rate, and every Mahomedan was bound to observe the rules of Zakat. There were four things obligatory on a Moslem—Numaz, Roza, Zakat, Huj. The objects of Zakat were the poor only, so that the man's father and children or other near relatives were prevented from sharing in the Zakat.

But Wakf was not a thing which was furs or obligatory, according to Mahomedan Law: It was merely taburroi or discretionary, and the purpose to which the profits of Wakf might be directed is not the same as in Zakat. In the former, those that are nearest should come in first. The traditions of the Prophet contained in the Saheeh Mooslim and the Saheeh Bokhary and also in the Mishkat, which latter had been translated by Captain Mathews, shewed that a man's own children and his wife should be the first object of concern.

He then read from the original Hedaya in Arabic and showed how Mr. Hamilton was in error in rendering Wakf to mean a disposition the object of which was wholly charitable. He also read from the Commentaries on the Hedaya and quoted and explained various passages from the Kafiya, the Inaya and the Fatuhool Kudeer and the Ainy. He also referred to the Shurah Wikaya and its commentary the Chuluky and to the Futawai Kazy Khan and Futawai Alumgiri and the Doorool Mookhtar and the Rud-dool Mukhtar. He showed how some of the cases decided by the Bombay High Court and the Calcutta High Court had misconceived the very elements of the Mahomedan Law of Wakf.

Whatever the ruling of the Full Bench may be, Mr. Yusoo's argument will not go for nothing. He shows the unsatisfactory materials on which the Mahomedan law has been administered during near a century. For one thing, his argument will seal the fate of Hamilton's Hedaya as an authoritative text. The circumstances under which the version was made ought to have discredited it ab initio. It was not Englished from the original Arabic but from a Persian translation of the Arabic, just as its fellow work of the same period and the same régime, Halhead's Code of Gentoo Law, was Englished not directly from the Sanskrit but through the interpretation of the Moulvies. Thirty-four years ago Mr. Morley, lawyer and Orientalist, uttered his warning against the English Hedaya, but still it continued to reign for want of a better. Mr. Yusoo has given it the quietus, let us hope.

HOMŒOPATHY IN BENGALI.*

This book is another of the many signs abroad which he who runs may read that Homœopathy has taken root in the land. Surely nobody in his senses would think of launching a goodly-looking, well-papered and close-printed thick octavo of some 400 pages of a scientific treatise devoted to the Homœopathic treatment of Fever only, unless this latest system of European medicine had acquired a considerable popularity in the land—a popularity which must cause a demand or at least the likelihood of a demand for a high class literature of the science. Such a publication presupposes the existence of a large body of respectable practitioners of superior intelligence, who are acquainted with only the Bengali language, or who may know a little English but are not sufficiently learned in it to master science in it. Nor is this the first large Bengali book in Homœopathy. It is now twenty years since Messrs. Berigny & Co., the great Homœopathic Chemists and Book-sellers, commenced their Bengali Homœopathic Series with the late lamented Harikrishna Mallik's Homœopathic Practice of several hundred pages. Since then many works of considerable size and more or less usefulness have appeared, not the least being the writings of the no less lamented Kali Krishna Mitra of Baraset, the last of which we reviewed some three years back. There must be a market for these productions, otherwise the supply would not have been kept up.

The work before us is not only considerable in bulk but also noteworthy for its contents. These are varied. For though professing to treat only of the Homœopathic Therapeutics of Fever, the book goes over much larger and more interesting ground. The long Introduction commences with a string of, valuable opinions from Hippocrates downwards on the vanity and worthlessness of the art of healing—the absence of any science of cure and the need of one. All was uncertainty and chaos. It was reserved for one European thinker and inquirer of the Continent towards the close of the eighteenth century to end the confusion—to introduce order where all was disorder—to essay certitude in a department which had been given up to fable and “fads,” idle conjecture and wild reasoning from uncertain premises and imperfect analogies. This was the illustrious Hahnemann, of whom we have a biographical outline in this book, with special reference to his great medical reform. This sketch naturally spreads out into a long disquisition on Homœopathy and its rationale. Thus is one-fifth of the book profitably occupied.

Then the author enters upon his main subject—the treatment of Fever according to the Homœopathic system. This is exhibited on an extensive scale with a precision and an eye to practical usefulness which will commend themselves to all practitioners and gentlemen and lady amateurs. All kinds of fever are embraced, from the every-day simple fever to such difficult complaints as brain fever and malignant malarious fever.

The arrangement might be improved, still as it is the book will prove welcome to Bengali readers, the more so to those who are tolerably acquainted with English. It specially recommends itself by its marks of authenticity. In fortifying himself with the opinions of eminent men of science, the author not only gives translations of those opinions but also adds the original English. This is a new feature in the book and a good feature.

The book is, of course, a compilation, but it is not a mere manufacture, having cost real study and much reflection. It is based on the latest authorities. The Bengali author is a loyal subject even in science. He renders allegiance to the British masters. He does not go in for the mysteries of high dilution affected in the New World beyond the Atlantic. He does not blindly accept any guidance, for he is familiar with the pretensions of the rival Schools. His Gooroo is Richard Hughes. It is an excellent choice. During a quarter century, Licentiate Hughes had been steadily advancing in repute as in merit and power until he is now the virtual king of British homœopaths. In rejecting infinitesimal posology, or at least its higher flights, he only obeys his British instinct for the positive, the practical and the substantial. Yet the seeker after the truth ought to be reminded that Nature is not all a solid or a collection of blocks.

This book is to us particularly interesting from its personal history. The author has a hereditary love of science. His father, the late Nobin Kristo Bose, who died rather suddenly a few years ago as a member of the Central Provinces Commission, was one of the lights of the elder generation of Young Bengal. He was a remarkable man. In youth he was an enthusiastic enquirer. He had a passion for science long before the subject attracted general attention, with a turn for applying it to practical use. He was an ethnologist before the word ethnology had been coined in Europe—certainly before it had been heard in this country. A graduate of the Calcutta Medical College he was a medical man by profession. But he soon abandoned practice from finding there was little of science in it. He would not be a party to a delusion which was almost a fraud upon the public. So he gave up pretending to heal, to devote himself to letters and sciences other than therapeutics, trying to make a living by making soap, &c., until his neighbour Dr. Duff recommended him to Sir Richard Temple, who gave him office in the Central Provinces. His son, the author, showed an early predilection for science and wished to enter the Medical College. The father naturally dissuaded the son from a barren pursuit as he had found medicine. He at length gave way, saying that he had no objection to his boy learning anatomy and physiology, chemistry and botany, but he must not think of practising what, according to Nobin Kristo Bose, was taking money under false pretences. On this understanding Amrita Kristo Bose went to the Medical College. His conversion from the Old School of Medicine to the New was, therefore, anticipated. When the father became a doctor, Homœopathy had not been heard of at all in India. Or else, he would probably have been one of its earliest followers and preachers in Bengal. The father's debt to medical truth has now been paid by the son.

The book is appropriately dedicated to the memory of the author's accomplished and righteous father.

LAYING DOWN THE LAW TO THE JUDGES.

There is one point in the Resolution of the Bengal Government upon the Police administration report for Calcutta and the suburbs which is deserving of the most serious attention. The Bengal Government has here seriously attacked a tribunal before which criminal charges were brought against certain persons by the Police, who however were unable to satisfy that tribunal, by the evidence adduced, of the guilt of the accused. The Lieutenant-Governor, doubtless following on the lines of the Police report, says:—"The prisoners were almost exclusively men who were wounded in the mêlée, and sent direct from the spot to the hospital, and never lost sight of, and as to the guilt of the great majority of whom no unprejudiced person could entertain a doubt. The Jury returned a verdict of acquittal, which the Judge, to the Lieutenant-Governor's great regret, accepted not thinking it advisable to refer the case to the High Court." Thus the Resolution adopts and declares to be well founded the view of the Police as to a trial in which they failed to secure a conviction, and upon the statement of these unsuccessful prosecutors the Government does not hesitate to condemn the action of the tribunal. It is impossible that it can have had as good an opportunity as the Judge of studying the case; nor does it claim to be possessed of any special knowledge upon which to form an independent judgment.

It is not, however, the mere absence of any special knowledge or competence in the Government to deal with such matters that renders the act of its publishing this Resolution a matter of such gravity. If His Honor and the Secretaries to Government were trained lawyers,—which, of course, they do not profess to be,—the publication of the Resolution would be equally indefensible. The facts stand thus: The Government is the prosecutor; the Police are, in part, the instruments or managers of the prosecution, and in part the witnesses by whose evidence it is supported. The tribunal appointed by law to try the accused, acquits them. That tribunal is the Jury, instructed by the Judge, who charges them. But although the tribunal is the Jury, there is a special power given by the Indian law to the Judge,—a power of a kind unknown in England,—of refusing to accept the verdict and submitting the case to the High Court if—(mark the careful words of the Code) "if he disagrees with the verdict so completely that he considers it necessary for the ends of justice" to do so. Then and only then, can he exercise this power. It is one of the most onerous duties which a Sessions Judge can be called upon to discharge. In the discharge of it, he withdraws the accused from the protection of the verdict of the Jury, which, in Jury districts, is the lawful tribunal to determine questions of guilt or innocence. But before he can do this, the law casts upon him the onus of carefully weighing the merits of the case, and it warns him that he must first, using his best judgment, disagree with the verdict. And it must not be a doubtful or hesitating disagreement, but so complete that he considers it necessary for the ends of justice to submit the case. It is plain that a Sessions Judge who should use his powers under this section hastily, or without strong conviction would wrong his character as a Judge and his honour as a gentleman. On him alone is this great responsibility cast by the law. On his conscience, and on his judgment the law, as is well-known, relies for the right exercise of this most formidable power.

Yet, as it would appear, the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, proceeding solely upon the narrative of an unsuccessful and dissatisfied prosecution in this important case, not only lays down the law but sharply rebukes the Judge. He expresses his "great regret" that the Judge should have accepted the verdict of acquittal, and no Court of Revision could condemn an error of judgment in terms of greater severity. Unfortunately the present is by no means a solitary incident of the kind. At one time, as was shown the other day, the Government, under the guise of a Resolution on a Police report, criticised the work of a Judge as appearing to show an unduly low average of convictions. Last year, the verdict of a Jury in Calcutta, unanimously given and expressly approved by the presiding Judge, was questioned upon the facts as stated by the Police; while in Mr. Risley's famous Resolution on the Income-Tax the officer-hearing appeals as to assessments were sternly directed to show more firmness in dealing with such appeals. That is, they were told by the Head of the Executive how they ought to perform purely Judicial duties. Needless to say, this course of procedure is wholly unconstitutional; indeed, it threatens the gravest mischief in the near future. The Income-Tax Resolution is a plain attempt to dictate to the Criminal Courts in the mofussil; the dictation is clear. Moreover, criticism of this kind has but one meaning when it comes from the Lieutenant-Governor, who promotes or removes the Civilian Judges. Now putting aside the question whether or not such interference could in the end affect the conduct of a body of men such as our Sessions Judges, what effect must it not have upon the minds of the population among whom they administer justice? Is it possible that an ignorant and suspicious people should not be led by such acts as these to doubt the independence of the Courts? Is it possible, if such dictation and fault-finding be allowed, that the Courts outside the Presidencies can maintain their independent character? And if these things are done in criminal cases, and at the seat of Government, can there be a doubt that in the mofussil and in the wider and perhaps equally important region of Civil Justice the same spirit will have full play, and the Executive will intrude there as elsewhere at its pleasure? In these days, and particularly in India, Government influence, in one form or another is felt almost everywhere. It is no reflection upon the Administration if we say that, from one place, its influence should be jealously excluded. The tide of encroachment is rising high; no person who observes the course of events can fail to see it. It is plainly, we suggest, the duty of all educated and thinking subjects of Her Majesty to whom a wise and prudent administration of affairs in this Empire is a matter of deep concern, to take note of these things, to protest against them, and, if need be when the time comes, to go to Parliament for a remedy.—The Englishman, July 4, 1892.

HIGH COURT: ORIGINAL JURISDICTION.

SOLOMON v. SOLOMON.

Mr. Garth applied yesterday (June 20) to Mr. Justice Trevelyan under section 375 of the Civil Procedure Code on behalf of the plaintiffs in this case to have a compromise entered into between the parties to the suit recorded and to have a decree passed in accordance with that compromise. Mr. Sale, instructed by Messrs. Dignam, Robin, son and Sparkes, opposed the application on behalf of the first defendant, Seraphim Solomon, and Mr. Zorab, instructed by Mr. Camell, on behalf of the second defendant, Teresa Mower.

Mr. Garth.—This is a case in which the parties have made a compromise, from which the defendants are now anxious to resile.

Trevelyan, J.—With reference to any questions of law that may be raised under section 375, I may as well say at once that I have recently gone into all the cases on the subject in my judgment in exceptions to the report in the suit of Gonesh Chandra Das v. Troiluckya Nath Biswas. I do not intend to depart from my decision in that case.

Mr. Sale.—That case is not reported yet.

Trevelyan, J.—No. It is not, because, I suppose, there was an appeal from my decision which has since been dropped. The only reported case in this Court is that of Hara Sundari Debi v. Kumar Dukhinessur Malia, I. L. R., 11 Cal., 250, decided by Pigot, J.

Mr. Garth.—Which has been dissented from in the High Court of Madras. The learned judge's remarks on this point were not necessary to the decision of the case.

Trevelyan, J.—That was a reason why I did not follow it. I followed the decision of the Bombay High Court reported in I. L. R., Bombay. I could find no answer to the arguments of Scott, J., in that case.

Mr. Garth.—The facts of the case are shortly these. The suit is for the construction of the will of Dr. Solomon, who was the father of the parties to this suit. The trusts of that will are admittedly void to some extent. The real questions in the case relate to what has happened since Dr. Solomon's death. After his death in January 1886 no probate was obtained of his will, but an agreement was entered into between his two eldest sons, the plaintiff, Valentine Solomon, and the defendant, Seraphim Solomon, who were then of the respective ages of 27 and 24 years, that the former, who alone of the children of Dr. Solomon's, the plaintiff Edmond Solomon excepted, was earning any money, should pay his salary monthly to Seraphim Solomon, and that the latter should expend it for the household expenses and maintenance of the family, and that, so soon as he and the other members of the family should be in a position to do so, they should repay to their brother Valentine the sums so advanced for their benefit. Valentine accordingly paid over his salary monthly to Seraphim till the latter left India for Scotland in September, 1888, and during that time the family had no other means of support except certain sums of money obtained by Seraphim from time to time by the gradual sale of shares, furniture and books which had belonged to their father. Seraphim did not return to India till last July. In his absence Valentine Solomon continued to spend his salary in maintaining, educating and clothing the family and repairing, and paying the taxes on, their house. With the exception of some small payments made by Seraphim Solomon, these family expenses were borne entirely by the plaintiff Valentine alone. After giving credit for the sums received from Seraphim and some small sums received from the other plaintiffs, the plaintiff Valentine said that the sums he had spent or become liable for, for the benefit of the family, amounted to some Rs. 5,893.

On his return to India, Seraphim claimed to be absolutely entitled to his father's house in which the plaintiffs were residing and to other property belonging formerly to his father, and he threatened to eject the plaintiffs who, thereupon, brought the present suit for the construction of their father's will, for an account of Seraphim's dealings with his estate, and for the administration of the estate. Shortly afterwards, Mr. J. F. Solomon, a brother of the late Dr. Solomon, persuaded his nephews to call a meeting of the family for the purpose of arriving at a settlement of the matters in dispute. A meeting was accordingly held on the 2nd November last at the uncle's house, and after much discussion the terms of a settlement were agreed upon and reduced to writing. The document containing these terms was signed by all the parties in their uncle's presence and left in his custody. The plaintiffs' attorney thereupon sent the defendants' attorney a draft petition for consent decree embodying the terms of this settlement, but the defendants' attorneys returned the draft with new terms substituted for those agreed upon. The plaintiffs' attorneys then wrote to point out that the terms sent by them had been agreed upon by the parties, but the defendants' attorneys replied that unless their alterations were agreed to the suit must proceed, and that their clients would in such case hold the plaintiffs liable for the whole of the costs of the litigation.

Trevelyan, J.—What is the meaning of this threat?

Mr. Garth.—I cannot say my Lord.

Mr. Sale.—I think the meaning of it will appear from the correspondence between the attorneys.

Trevelyan, J.—I find that so many attorneys' letters nowadays contain threats of sorts, which is not a satisfactory state of things. Cannot this suit be arranged in some way? It is not right for the children to be quarrelling like this over a small property of their father's. Cannot counsel settle the matter between them?

Mr. Sale expressed his readiness to attempt it, but Mr. Garth doubted whether under the circumstances the matter could be advanced materially by counsel acting on his lordship's suggestion.

Mr. Garth then continued: About the 16th November Valentine Solomon drew up a petition of a consent decree in the terms of the compromise, and all the parties together with their uncle went to Mr. Dover, the attorney, and asked him to make the application to the Court. On that occasion the defendant Seraphim admitted that those terms had been agreed to. Mr. Dover, however, refused to interfere, as the parties already had attorneys acting for them in the suit, and the case is still proceeding. Section 375 clearly applies to this case. It has been decided in the Calcutta case that the section does not cover cases in which the parties or some of them have declined to carry out the agreement before the judgment has been recorded. If this is the right view, the section is useless for, where the parties are agreed at the moment when the application is made, a consent decree may be made without resorting to this section. The correct view is that taken by the High Court of Bombay, Ruttonsey Lalji v. Pooribal, I. L. R., 7 Bom., 304.

Trevelyan, J.—To the best of my recollection I said in my late decision that I could not see any answer to the reasoning of Scott, J., in that case.

Mr. Garth.—The same reasoning is to be found in Appaswami v. Manikam, I. L. R., 9 Madras., 103, in which case Muttasmi Ayer and Hutchins., J. J., dissented from the Calcutta decision and followed the Bombay one.

Trevelyan, J.—I find that the decision here was not by Pigot, J., but by Tottenham and O'Kinealy, J. J., Pigot, J. spoke about it at the time and asked people to have their reports corrected.

Mr. Garth.—Yes, I ought not to have fallen into that error as our copies have been corrected as Mr. Justice Pigot requested.

Trevelyan, J.—I may add that I have discussed the matter with one of the judges who decided the case in I. L. R., 11. Cal., as I very much dislike differing from previous decisions of this Court. That decision, however, is not binding on this side of the Court, and the remarks on this point were not necessary for the decision of the case.

Mr. Garth then read the correspondence between the attorneys, and said that, as the case was not on his lordship's board yet, he thought it his duty to call his lordship's attention to the case of Pell v. Valetta, in which, Wilson, J. ruled that a consent decree under a compromise should not be granted unless the suit was entered in the cause list of the Court.

Trevelyan, J.—That was a very different case from the present one. It was the case of an ordinary consent decree and not a case under section 375.

Mr. Garth.—That was my opinion also, but I thought it my duty to bring the case to the notice of the Court.

Mr. Sale.—I do not intend to argue the point under section 375 as your Lordship has already decided it. The parties entered into this agreement without reference to their attorneys, my client afterwards consulted his attorneys and now acting on their advice desires to retire from the agreement.

Trevelyan, J.—Has your client himself sworn or stated anywhere that he is not still willing to enter into this compromise? Is there anything before me to show that the attorneys are not opposing the settlement on their own account?

Mr. Sale.—I submit that on the correspondence between the attorneys it appears that the defendant's attorneys are acting under his instructions in this matter. Under section 375 the Court can only deal with this agreement so far as it relates to the subject-matter of the suit, and this agreement goes beyond it.

Trevelyan, J.—It seems to me that this does not go beyond the subject-matter of the suit. As soon as the parties are out of their attorneys' hands they are ready enough to come to an arrangement.

Mr. Sale.—We are quite prepared to pay this gentleman the amount of his advances, but Mr. Garth, I understand, wants all the terms of the compromise recorded.

Mr. Garth.—We are quite willing to relinquish the conduct of the rule.

Trevelyan, J.—That only affects the question which attorney is to get the costs. Why don't you refer it to Dr. Solomon's brother, Mr. J. F. Solomon, again? He is a relation of all the parties.

Mr. Garth.—We have no objection to that.

Mr. Sale.—The difficulty is that he has intervened and put in an affidavit.

Trevelyan, J.—He had the original agreement and has verified it. All he swears to in his affidavit is admitted by both sides. He seems to have acted very properly.

Mr. Sale.—The parties may think he has got a bias.

Trevelyan, J.—How can they? He is their uncle and has stated nothing that is not admitted.

It was finally arranged that the application should stand over till next motion day, to enable Mr. Sale and Mr. Zorab to consult their clients as to whether they would assent to an order that the matter of the agreement and the other matters in suit be referred to the arbitration of Mr. J. F. Solomon and costs come out of the estate.—The Englishman, June 21, 1892.

CALCUTTA UNIVERSITY, NOTICE.

THE Senate will proceed in the month of August, 1893, to the election of a Tagore Professor of Law for the term of one year, to commence on the 1st of November, 1893. The salary of the Professorship is Rs. 10,000 per annum, and the professor will be expected to deliver a course of not less than twelve lectures on one of the following subjects:—

- (1) The Land Law of Bengal.
- (2) The Law of Estoppel in British India.
- (3) The Law relating to Joint Property and Partition in British India.

Candidates for the Professorship are requested to forward their applications to the Registrar on or before the 1st May, 1893, stating on which of the abovenamed three subjects they are prepared to lecture. Each candidate will forward with his application one hundred copies of a brief Synopsis of his proposed lectures, and, if he so pleases, the same number of copies of his introductory lecture.

The Professor will be expected to commence his lectures in November, 1893, and to complete the delivery thereof in the following January. He will be further required to send to the Registrar a complete manuscript copy of his lectures within five months from the commencement of the delivery thereof.

A. M. NASH,
Registrar.

ASRUKANA is a collection of poetical pieces of singular pathos and beauty of expression  It is a series of mournful songs that the reader is here presented with and they must touch a sympathetic cord in every heart that can feel. There is a singular appropriateness in the title of the work and in its pious dedication to the memory of the husband of the fair writer.—The Indian Nation. Bengal should be proud of this poem.—The Calcutta Review.

Holloway's Ointment and Pills effect wonderful cures of bad legs and wounds. If these medicines be used according to the directions which are wrapped round each pot and box, there is no wound, bad leg, or ulcerous sore, however obstinate, but will yield to their curative properties. Numbers of persons who had been patients in the large hospitals, and under the care of eminent surgeons, without deriving the least benefit, have been cured by Holloway's Ointment and Pills, when other remedies had signally failed. For glandular swellings, tumours, scurvy, and diseases of the skin there is no medicine that can be used with so good an effect. Though potent for good, it is powerless for harm; and though the cure it effects is rapid, it is also complete and permanent.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

MOONLIGHT ON THE MOUNTAINS.

WHEN evening, stealing o'er our northern sky,
Has furled the streaming glories of the west ;
And night's fair queen, in beauty mounted high,
Pours down her silvery light on nature's breast ;
How sweet to linger on the mountain's crest,
And gaze enraptured o'er the midnight scene !
Where all looks mild, and beautiful, and blest,
And heaven itself seems, through the deep serene,
Watching the slumbering earth with eyes of tender sheen.

Soft hour when Fancy, in her playful dreams,
Flings o'er the human soul her magic power ;
While yet the moonlight down the valley streams,
And lights the steps of Youth to Beauty's bower.
How soft the hush of that delightful hour,
When slumber deepens on the hearts of men !
And silence wraps cliff, cairn, and ruined tower,
Unbroken save by torrent of the glen,
And maddening Passion sleeps as ne'er to wake again.

Then blending with the tranquil mountain scene,
The soul forgets her earth-born grief and tears—
Smiles o'er the world with heaven's unclouded queen,
Soothed by the calm that nature's aspect wears ;
Then glance her thoughts along a thousand years,
All grasped within that lucid moment's span,
Tracing the light that Glory's pinion bears
On high, to gild the noblest deeds of man ;
Alas ! how brief the blaze—how flickering, faint, and wan !

For time's close shadows ever wait around
The paths which Glory's children dare to climb,
Lured by the glittering pomp, and maddening sound
Of trumps, inspiring to heroic crime.
Still earth exults in many a soul sublime,
Whose light hath passed not all with life away ;
But shines unchanging o'er the mists of time,
And guides young Genius, with benignant ray,
Through all the blighting storms that mar life's opening day.

Immortal spirits, who have walked the world !
Bards, sages, patriots, born to bless mankind,
Still sweep ye o'er the earth with wings unfurled,
To fan congenial bosoms left behind ?
Pouring the sunbeams of the eternal mind
O'er breathing man rejoicing in your lore ;
Till springs the soul, unprisoned, unconfined,
Through fields of light o'er earth's wide bounds to soar,
Where the vast universe unfolds her mighty store.

O ! let me oft, when falls this lovely hour,
A moment feel the fire such spirits shed !
Monarchs of nature ! who alone have power
To send your deep-toned voices from the dead ;
Frown on, ye darkening shadows, o'er my head—
Come, stern Adversity, to fix my fate—
Still nature's glories on my path are spread,
Still gleams of sunshine gild this dark estate,
O'er which my spirit bounds unbroken and elate.

Shall cold disdain from the misjudging proud
One hour the child of thought and feeling wrong ;
Shall earthly ills, which daunt the sordid crowd,
Beat down this bosom to the servile throng
Who crouch to glide in Wealth's proud train along,
And bend at Mammon's shrine the pliant knee ?
No—from this mountain whence I pour my song,
Still let me mingle with the great—the free,
Who taught my ardent soul to feel, to hear, to see.

To feel the bliss that fair creation yields,
When light and beauty clothe the earth and sky ;
To roam in joy through glens, and groves, and fields,
Or climb the mountain when the night winds sigh ;
Whate'er delights the heart or charms the eye
Throughout the volume vast by God unrolled,
These are thy birthright, Genius ; these thy high Prerogatives, oh Fancy ! Count thy gold,
Son of the clay ; our stars are boundless and untold !

I LOVE NOT NOW !

TAKE from me all thou once didst give—
Thy smiles and tears—thy sighs—that vow—
Nor longer in my bosom live ;
I loved thee once—I love not now ;
'T is better, in this wretched hour,
To fling from memory every trace—
Each shadow of thy broken power,
And all memorials fond erase !

Haply, in after times, the wrong
Thy fickle speech hath done to me
May strike thy soul, as, borne along,
Thou gaily sailest o'er life's sea ;—
And then, amidst the wreck of love,
That will thy sinking hope surround,
Some long-forgotten thought may move
Thy fluttering heart with grief profound !

WEEKLYANA.

THE fickleness of fortune is proverbial. Yet this fickleness is not often so surprisingly illustrated as it has lately been in connection with a recent testamentary devolution in France. The facts briefly are these.

A Frenchman named Adolphe de-la Boussiniere, a country gentleman who was a staunch supporter of Church and State, died a few years ago. He had made a will by which he left two millions of francs to his wife's nephew and to one of his own cousins, passing over his own brother, an ardent Republican—by way of penalty for the latter's political faith. The legatees came into possession without opposition, but were soon ousted by a new will which, revoking the old testament, made the discarded brother, a poor man and now an old man of eighty, the sole heir. The later dispensation was accepted by every one as genuine and given effect to. The poor man came into possession, hoping to end his life—the remaining spell of it—in peace and comfort. But Fate, alas! had ordained otherwise. The poor fellow—doubly poor—was cruelly tantalised. The new will was a forgery.

"A notary named Guyard, who had known the family, was the arch criminal, and he was aided by a lithographer named Charpentier. Guyard sought out the needy brother, at Geneva, and after obtaining from him the promise of an equal division, produced the will. The new legatee was no party to the fraud, but was simply deceived by the forgery, like everybody else. It had been effected in this way: Guyard, who must have possessed a great number of the testator's letters, had simply made tracings from them of all the words required for the new will. The tracings were transferred to the lithographic stone in their proper order with the aid of Charpentier, and the document was then produced from the stone. There was no contesting it, the new heir came into possession and the notary received his share. The lithographer began writing mysterious letters to the fortunate legatee. The latter showed them to the police; Charpentier was arrested; and then the whole matter came out. He declared that for his own part, he was quite innocent of any intention to commit forgery. The notary had simply asked him to aid in restoring the text of a genuine will in the brother's favour, which had been unaccountably lost. This was Guyard's own defence. He declared that the testator had given him such a will to keep, but that he had mislaid it. The Court acquitted the lithographer of the charge of forgery, but condemned him in damages, and sentenced the notary to imprisonment for ten years. The good faith of the poor brother was never in question. He leaves his chateau, and goes back to commercial travelling in Switzerland."

THE Lieutenant-Governor returned from his tour in the Sonthal Perganas on Thursday evening. He goes touring again in the Dacca country shortly after, leaving Calcutta on the 4th August and returning to it on the 18th. The places to be visited are Goalundo, Serajganj, Bogra, Daudkhandi, and Comilla.

THE next Entrance Examination of the Calcutta University will begin on Monday, the 6th February 1893 and the F. A. and B. A. Examinations on Monday, the 20th February following.

BABOO Sottish Chaudra Choudhri, Zemindar of Bhowanipur in Maimensing, has earned the thanks of Government by an offer of Rs. 5,000 towards the cost of constructing the proposed bridge over the river Brahmaputra at Naisirabad.

LALA Ram Charan Das, of Allahabad, has undertaken to build at that capital an eye hospital at a cost of Rs. 30,000.

OFFICERS in Bengal to whom the 55 years' rule applies, must, if so minded, apply for extension, whether for the first time or on any subsequent occasion, within six months of the expiry of the term.

FOLLOWING the Pioneer, the morning papers of this city announced that it is decided that Sir Auckland Colvin as Lieutenant-Governor of the N.-W. Provinces and Chief Commissioner of Oudh makes over charge in November next to Sir Charles Crosthwaite.

THE Bombay Land Revenue Code, 1879, (Bombay Act V of 1879), with the exception of section 104, has been extended to the Thar and Parkar district in the Province of Sind.

HER Majesty has approved of the grant of the India medal of 1854, with a clasp inscribed "North-East Frontier, 1891" to all the troops and followers who were employed in the late expedition to Manipur, and who came on the field service scale of rations between the dates of the advance of the columns from Tainu, Silchar, and Kohima on the 28th March, the 15th April, and the 20th April 1891, respectively, and the 7th May 1891.

ARTICLE 714 of the Civil Service Regulations prescribes additional pensions of Rs. 2,000 per annum to those who have served three years as (i) Chief Engineers, or officers who may have been graded as such, (ii) Director General or Deputy Director General of Telegraphs. A further concession has now been made. If an officer to whom the article applies is compelled to retire under the 55 years' rule or on medical certificate before he has served the full period of three years, he may, with the special sanction of the Government of India, receive a special pension reduced in proportion to the time short of three years which he has served in the grades referred to in Article 714 (a).

THE heroes in the Muktagacha raid on Respectability have, after their arduous labors, well earned their repose or promotion. Mr. H. A. D. Phillips has taken leave, to recruit himself for a fresh attack—which may now come from the other side. At the same time, his post office and conduit pipe in the Maimensing magistracy, Mr. A. G. Hallifax, Assistant Magistrate, has been rewarded with a subdivision, having been transferred to Dacca in temporary charge of the Narainganj jurisdiction.

THE Nawab Magistrate of Calcutta does not, however, go on leave. His privilege leave of one month gazetted has been cancelled.

MR. F. B. Hebbert has been confirmed as Under-Secretary to the Government of India in the Public Works Department and Deputy Director General of Railways, with permanent rank in Class I, Grade 3, of the Superior Revenue Establishment of State Railways.

THE Gazette announces the following changes in the political Department. On the retirement of Colonel Parry Nisbet, Colonel Prideaux is confirmed as Resident in Cashmere, Colonel Peacock at Jeypore, Colonel Mockler in Turkish Arabia. Lieutenant-Colonel Robertson and Mr. Martindale are promoted to the 1st class of Political Agents, Lieutenant-Colonel Loch and Major Temple to the 2nd class, and Captain De Laessoe to the 3rd class, without prejudice to the higher appointments which the officers may now be holding.

THE election of Mr. Dadabhai Naoroji to the House of Commons has naturally stirred our friends of Bombay most, specially the Parsees. A correspondent of the Advocate of India signing himself "R.," sings a long prose dithyrambic Iopæan in honour of the occasion. The singing is of the amateur kind, and not the best even of that, but the singer makes ample amends by a contribution of Rs. 50 which he sends with it with a suggestion that it form the nucleus of a Purse to be sent to Mr. Naoroji. An excellent idea. We hope it will be taken up in right earnest. Our people on this side ought to come forward to contribute. We shall be glad to forward any sums for the purpose.

THE Ice Factory at No. 3, Gas Street, belonging to the Bengal Ice Manufacturing Company, Limited, has been exempted from the operation of sub-section (1) of section 5 of the Indian Factories Act, 1881, rendering it free to work on Sundays.

THE Advocate of India quotes the following queer story from the Kathiawar Times :—

"It is reported that on Thursday last the wife of a Bhatia residing in the Rajkote city all of a sudden became unconscious and shortly after began swaying her head from side to side as if possessed by a spirit and said to the family members who were present: 'I am Govindjee [the name of her father-in-law.] About 48 years ago I had removed to Nusseerabad. Afterwards I sent for my family, I resided there for eighteen years and then died. After my death my family returned to Rajkot. My soul has been restless ever since owing to Avanti; and I adjure you to perform Narani Bal [certain ceremonies performed according to the Hindu religion.]' Whilst this happened a serpent came out of a small hole near the threshold of the room. It was a large one and of black colour. Seeing the serpent the woman went to it swaying her head as mentioned above and cleaned the floor and gave it some milk to drink; and pointing to it said that 'I [mean—ing Govindjee] am wandering in this wise, my funeral ceremony not having been properly performed.' For three days—that is Thursday, Friday and Saturday—the woman was in the same state and had partaken of no food, only giving milk twice a day to the serpent. A lot of people including some of the State officials, had also, I hear, visited the place. On Sunday morning the woman told the family members that [meaning Govindjee] am going'; and gave two cups of milk to the serpent which it drank. The woman then went out of the room, evidently dispossessed by the spirit of her father-in-law, and after that the serpent died. This happened at 10 o'clock, A.M. The serpent was then cremated with all human funeral ceremonies."

There is nothing inherently improbable in the eccentricities of a woman, the appearance of the black serpent and its taking milk and afterwards dying. The remarkable thing in the narrative is the supernatural element introduced—the Hindu theological connection sought to be given to the facts. Be that as it may, if the account comes from any respectable source, the facts are curious enough to merit particular inquiry. The account is too meagre, and the facts ought to be vouched for by known persons. At this demand we shall probably no more hear of the wonderful apparition of Govindji speaking through his daughter-in-law with a great black serpent by way of witness to his mission. When the facts are ascertained, it will be time enough to find their meaning.

AT the instance of the Chief Commissioner of Burma, the rules for the grant of advances to officers in the Civil Department who desire to build houses at places where none are available or where house rent is high, have been modified. The revised rules are:—

I.—Advances may be made, under the sanction of Local Governments and Administrations, to officers who desire to build houses, for occupation by themselves, at places where no houses are available, or where house-rent is exceptionally high.

II.—All such advances must be bond fide required for the purpose of building suitable houses for the personal residence of the officers concerned; and if more is advanced than shall be actually expended for the purpose, the surplus shall be refunded to Government.

III.—The advances may be made in instalments when considered desirable, and when so made, repayment shall commence from the fourth issue of pay after first instalment is taken; but when the advance is taken in one instalment, repayment shall commence with the second issue of pay. The repayment of the whole advance shall in both cases be completed in two years.

IV.—No advance shall exceed six months' salary of the officer to whom it is made.

V.—Recovery will be made by the Treasury Officer, or other disbursing officer, deducting monthly instalments equal to one-twenty-fourth part of the advance from the salary bills of the officer concerned.

VI.—In order to secure Government from loss consequent on an officer dying or quitting the service before complete repayment of the advance, the house so built, together with the land it stands upon, must be mortgaged to Government by whom the mortgage will be released on liquidation of the full amount of the advance.

VII.—The officer must satisfy Government regarding his title to the land upon which the house is or is proposed to be built.

VIII.—An officer quitting or removed from the station where he has built a house, before the whole amount of the advance has been liquidated, will continue liable to the deduction of his monthly instalment until the advance has been repaid; but, with the special sanction of the Local Government, he may be allowed to dispose of the house, provided he is thereby enabled to clear off at once the whole amount due; or to transfer it to any officer of his own or higher rank, the future deductions being made from the salary of such officer.

IX.—An officer will not, under any circumstances, be allowed a second advance whilst any amount remains due on a previous advance.

X.—Applications for advances must be made through the applicant's departmental superior, who will record his opinion as to the necessity for the assistance solicited. The applicant must certify that the sum is to be expended in building only, and pledge himself that, should there be any surplus funds after the house is completed, they will be at once refunded to Government.

XI.—The last pay certificate granted to officers under advances must specify the original amount of such advance, the amount repaid, and the balance remaining due.

A form of mortgage bond will be issued to officers who may wish to avail themselves of the advance."

The bond secures to the Secretary of State the power, on failure of full repayment of the sums advanced or on the death or retirement of the officer, to sell the premises or any part thereof either together or in parcels, by public auction or by private contract with power to buy in, or rescind any contract for sale, to resell without being responsible for any loss, which sale shall effectually discharge the purchaser, and to apply the sale proceeds first to payment of all expenses of the sale, then towards satisfaction of the debt, the balance if any being made over to the officer, his executors, administrators or assigns.

THE following may be read in many papers:—

"Captain Duncan Ross, the world's Champion wrestler, has had another defeat, though in the technical phraseology of wrestling it cannot be called a defeat. The field-day was in Ceylon and the opponent was a native of India in the person of Kader Mohideen. Captain Ross, to cover a possible defeat, with his elbow-lift under the opponent's chin, made his jaws rattle, and though that hurt sufficiently Kader, did not enfeeble him to give Ross a second defeat. Thus Ross was downed to the ground, and his brag was once more put an end to."

So here is a new verb in the poor dear English tongue—down.

NOTES & LEADERETTES

with
OUR OWN NEWS.

THE elections are nearing the end. The returns up to the night of the 15th are:—

Conservatives	253	} 301
Unionists	44
Liberals	250	} 317
Parnellites	8
Anti-Parnellites	59

Up to this, the Conservatives have gained sixteen, the Unionists eight and the Liberals seventy-three seats. At this rate, it is expected that the close of the poll will leave the Liberals a majority of fifty in the new House. The Conservative idea seems to be to continue in power until defeated in the House of Commons. Mr. Gladstone closed his Midlothian Campaign at Pennicuik on the 11th and was re-elected with 5,845 votes against 5,145 of Colonel Wauchape, the Unionist candidate.

THE Liberal programme as announced by Mr. Gladstone was first the general situation, next Ireland and then the labour question. He advocated the adoption of the principle of local option in limiting the hours of labour. He did not forget the East. England's action towards China as exemplified in the opium traffic was a disgrace and a shame. There was a considerable desire in England to get rid of the connection between the revenue of the Government of India and the growth of opium, and he himself would be prepared, subject to obligations of good faith, to forward any measure within the bounds of reason for limiting that connection or ending it altogether if possible—a desire which the present Government may equally claim with the G. O. M.

MR. Dadabhai Naoroji's opponent Captain Penton has demanded a scrutiny of the Black Man's ballot. There is therefore a risk of the majority of three turning against the Indian.

A GREAT visitation has overtaken St. John's, Newfoundland. Two-thirds of the town has been destroyed. For sixteen hours the place was a perfect sea of fire. The business portion, the valuable warehouses and the English cathedral all are in ashes. The provisions spared will last the inhabitants ten days. The distress is great without food and home for thousands. The loss is estimated at four millions sterling.

IN the Province of Upper Savoy, an enormous glacier became detached from Mont Blanc, and, in its descent, carried all before it, sweeping the bathing resort of St. Gervais and the neighbouring hamlet into the river Arve. Upwards of one hundred and fifty persons are believed to have perished.

MOUNT Etna is in flames. With three fresh craters, the eruption threatens to be formidable.

THE Argentine ironclad Almirante Brown is reported to have foundered in a storm off Uruguay with loss of seventy lives. As this was about the only ironclad belonging to the Argentine Republic, this loss means the extinction of its navy.

FAMINE has scarcely raised her siege before another foe no less dreadful, the Cholera, has invaded Russia. It is spreading and has now overtaken Kazan and Moscow.

THERE is an epidemic in Paris and its suburbs. It is declared by the Spanish Medical Commission to be Asiatic cholera.

It is reported from Tonquin that a French convoy having fallen into a Chinese ambush, two officers and ten men have been killed and seventeen wounded.

THE Shah had a narrow escape. His favorite, the little boy who accompanied him in his European travels, and who is always by his side as a buffer against all evils, almost proved a grave evil himself. He was playing with a revolver in the Royal camp in South Burujird, when the weapon accidentally went off close to his Majesty. The poor boy has been sent away.

THIS year the great Mahomedan Festival of the Eed-oz-Zoha popularly known as the Backreed, passed off peaceably. Grown wiser by their experiences of recent years, the authorities everywhere took ample precautions, with the happiest results. Not that there were anywhere any disputes between Hindu and Mussulman or any threats of collision. Still less can it be pretended that there was entire absence of friction between Government and the people. But All's well that ends well, and happily the end everywhere was merry as a marriage bell.

An auspicious occasion which is usually disgraced by bitterness and hate between man and man and even bloodshed, went off tranquilly. For once a festival of rejoicing passed without savage shouting and mad yelling followed by groaning and weeping and wailing. The Backreed of 1309 of the Blessed Flight was Peace.

The incidents at some of the principal centres are worth noting.

THE festive Buckreed at Benares, Bhelupura Police Circle, was celebrated without the usual sacrifice. Of late, the feelings between the Mahomedans and Hindus of Mohulla Bajardiha had ceased to be friendly, and the Mahomedans were prepared to annoy the Hindus and openly announced their intention of performing the Quarban at the mohulla. This the Hindus would not allow. The matter began to assume a serious aspect. The Magistrate interfered and advised the Mahomedans to perform the sacrifice at the usual place at Shivala, reserving the question for future solution of the eligibility of the sacrifice at Bajardiha. This decision of the Magistrate failed to appease the Mahomedans. They went up to the Commissioner who upheld the order of the Magistrate as just and proper under the circumstances. To mark their disapproval of the two successive orders against themselves, the Mahomedans without further ado decided to go without the customary sacrifice. This was going without a dinner-service or any other to spite the thieves, as the Bengali proverb has it. But on the present occasion it was a welcome resolve. We only trust that no feelings of discontent are harboured under that peaceful attitude. It would not be worth while to purchase a year's quiet at the cost of offending the Mussalmans of Benares. Efforts ought to be made, not only by officials but by all good citizens, of whatever creed or race, to remove any irritation that may have been caused.

IN Bengal, riots were apprehended at Gya and at Jehanabad in the same district over the sacrificial animal. But for the special precautions taken, the Hindus and Mahomedans would have come to blows. The Hindus were told that they could not reasonably object to their Mahomedan brethren doing their religious duty without their sight and without their hearing, though in their midst, at dead of night when the Hindus might be supposed to be asleep and dead to all external surroundings. The Hindu could not allow himself to make terms on such a subject. Not all the persuasion of the sub-divisional officer of Jehanabad, an officer of uncommon address, could dissuade the Hindus from their fixed resolve of resistance to the sacrifice. His stern attitude and preparedness to meet any emergency, however, kept the Hindus straight, and saved them from compromising themselves. Thus the riots were averted and the sacrifices held at the sub-divisional head-quarters. In the town of Gya itself, it was found necessary to import armed Police from Bhagalpur and troops were warned to be ready at Dinapore. At Jehanabad, the Police were strengthened. The Banias to mark their abhorrence of the slaughter and in apprehension of loot had closed their shops. Some arrests were made on suspicion.

THE Jeypore news writer in the Indian Daily News complains of intense heat, the monsoon not having reached Rajputana, and not more than 3 inches rain having fallen in all to date—5th July. As usual, the dry heat keeps the health of the victims who can stand it.

The Durbar has taken a step for the preservation of the health of the people, which it were to be wished the Hindus of Calcutta, with their boast of advancement, might, of their own instance, follow, before their sworn enemy of a ferocious Health Officer or an irrational Government were on them. Many marriages take place in Jeypore during these hot months. The Maharaja's Government does not forbid them, but it forbids the feasting of large parties on the occasion. This observance of the rule has visibly decreased cholera and other diseases.

A FRIEND writes from Bhurtpore under date the 10th July says:—

"We have had no rain to speak of yet, the actual monsoon is holding off not only in Bhurtpore territory but at Agra, Muttra, Jeypore, &c. If there be no rains in Sraban and Bhadro, there will be a dreadful famine. There have been small showers at long intervals, the heat consequently is intolerable. I am not fit for much. The enclosed was obtained 10 days ago, without my being able to write a covering letter yet—a feat I accomplished last evening, which was a little cool on account of east winds and a small shower somewhere at a distance from us."

HAPPY is the land that has no history, is a profound remark which is verified every day in all ages in all parts of the globe. It must be quiet in the City of the Nizam when the Indian Daily News correspondent at that place has nothing more stirring to engage him than Quacks and Lotteries.

By an Order in Council dated the 9th May 1892, Her Majesty doth order, direct and declare that, on and after the 1st July 1892, the second Part of "The Medical Act, 1886," shall be deemed to apply to India. The Act with the Order in Council is reproduced in the Gazette of India, Part I, of July 9, 1892.

IN his presidential address at the annual meeting of the Eastern Counties branch of the British Dental Association, Sir James Crichton Borwne spoke of the alarming increase of decay of the teeth in that country, especially among the young. He gave as the result of a recent investigation, that among 1,861 children under twelve years of age there were only 104 with normal or perfect teeth and only 26 per cent. of infants at five years of age who had teeth free from decay. In Leeds, 90 per cent. of the teeth of the population were bad. The number of artificial teeth used annually in England was 10,000,000. Sir James attributed the dental decay to the pulpiness and softness of the food in modern times, which obviated the necessity of mastication, which promoted the flow of saliva and scrubbed the teeth, so keeping them clean; to the removal from all breadstuffs of the outer husks of the grains, which were the chief source of a chemical element called Fluorine, which is essential to the formation of the enamel of the teeth; to the nervous tension of modern existence interfering with the growth and nutrition of the teeth; and to the growth of large towns, in which the atmosphere was loaded with bacteria injurious to the teeth.

THERE is another new medicine for nervous diseases of the heart. Cornilla Varia in five to fifteen drop doses may prove efficacious, though not in all, at least in some cases.

MR. Arthur Macdonald, in the New Englander and Yale Review, in his essay on "criminology" enumerates the following peculiarities in the skull as characteristic of criminals:—

1. Frequent persistence of the frontal median suture.
2. Partial effacement of the parietal or parieto-occipital sutures.
3. Frequency of the wormian bones in the regions of the median and lateral posterior fontanelles.
4. Development of the superciliary ridges, with the defacement or even frequent depression, of the intermediary protuberance.

TINCTURE Gelsemium in large doses has cured two cases of traumatic tetanus. Surely it ought to have a trial at least in very severe cases.

M. ADRIAN, at a meeting of the Societe de Therapeutique, mentioned the great variation in amount of the alkaloids in commercial opium. In thirty-eight samples taken at random from the drug shops, morphine ranged from 7 to 12 per cent. and narcotine from 0.10 to 3.975 per cent.

The cause of this striking variation lies, we think, in the fact that the supply comes from various countries. There is great difference between the produce of India and that of Smyrna. The late Dr. Waldie, who was an enthusiastic chemist, told us so, after subjecting both kinds to analysis. There must be difference in the several Indian varieties too. The Government must be in possession of the precise facts. These should be published for general information. A large quantity of the drug is consumed throughout the world as medicine, and the knowledge would be useful to druggists and apothecaries as well as the more intelligent class of patients. In this country, the commercial opium retailed by licensed vendors being adulterated by them, necessarily varies in strength. Not only is there difference between different Provinces but also between different localities of the same Province or District. There might be difference between different bazars of the same city. In Calcutta, for instance, unless the retail business were in the same hands, we should not be surprised to find the bazar opium different in different bazars. This is an anomaly which ought to be prevented. The Government might inquire. Perhaps the matter is within the province of the Health Officer.

A CURIOUS letter with an editorial note appended thereto appears in the European journal of East Bengal. In it we are reminded that sometime back, in the last half-year, there occurred in Reis and Rayyet the following passage, or words to the same effect, namely :—

"So long as there are orators like Mr. Maclean and writers like Colonel Malleon, and, we may add, newspapers like the Bengal Times, the people of India need not be in doubt as to what opinion of them is harboured by their British fellow-subjects. There is one consolation, however. Their sanity will scarcely be questioned by the most prejudiced."

The correspondent who, if he did not know too much of newspapers, would on his own showing be the leading physician of Dacca, with his "various professional engagements," seems a rather dubious character. "I am at a loss," writes he, "I am at a loss to understand your contemporary's [meaning Reis and Rayyet's] meaning." If that transparent piece of English, in which clear thought gives point to the expression, has really exercised M. B. as he signs himself, he is truly an object of pity. But there is much reason to suspect that this is not so. He is not quite the simpleton that he pretends to be. In fact, the whole business is an imposition. His presumption certainly is amusing. Safe in his obscurity he passes the press in review, dealing praise and scorn to the pigmies who conduct it. We are surprised that the Bengal Times has allowed an anonymous scribbler to speak with impertinent familiarity and derision of its contemporaries. It is one thing for newspapers to fight among themselves and another to invoke the aid of correspondents in their differences. The Bengal Times is quite competent—in both senses—to attack the Indian Daily News or ourselves, but not to open its columns to every unlicensed quill-driver in the land. By this time both our personal character and our literary characteristics are too well-established to be affected by any wild calumny or irrational criticism. This impudent person has dared to say that Reis and Rayyet "lubricates profuse, even servile praise" apparently on purpose to provoke us to tweak the audacious libeller's nose. Surely this M. B. must be a mad doctor. At any rate, if his diagnosis is equal to his perception of character, his patients are to be pitied. Servility is a thing of which its worst enemies have not yet accused this paper. As for "lubricating," &c., &c., its conductor never flattered his own father.

IN speaking on the Bill to amend the Bombay Abkari Act, the Governor thus spoke of the Press in India :—

"Now the opposition the Bill has met with has come from three quarters. It has come from the Press, several associations, and in a modified form from one or two talukas in the affected districts, but it is remarkable that the main opposition has not been from the districts affected, but from the city of Bombay and the city of Poona. Now as regards the opposition from the Press, I shall be very sorry if it was thought that I put any depreciatory value upon the criticism based on the Bill, but I do not think that that Press criticism is exactly of the same character that it would have been in a country, or in those countries, in which legislation is proceeded with on somewhat similar lines to that in which legislation is proceeded with here. I mean in this way. This Council legislation in India is proceeded with upon the lines which after centuries of struggle has been won by the people of western countries, and in course of time it has resulted that in those countries two parties, or more, as the case may be, have grown up and attached to each of those parties there is Press representation, and the consequence is that a question of an interesting character is invariably discussed from all points of view at considerable length in each section of the Press before a Bill becomes law. Now the same opportunity hardly exists in this country. Government is without any party Press behind it. There is a Press which I am glad to have the opportunity of saying, is upon many questions thoroughly impartial, and is certainly in the majority of cases, so far as I can see, extremely well conducted. But it is a fact that the proposals of Government are when opposed by the Press without that consistent support which a party Press gives to the proposals of Government in those western countries to which I have alluded. I am not only thinking of the Press support given in leading articles, I am thinking far more of that independent discussion which takes place upon legislative proposals, and which I think every one will admit produces a careful and critical discussion on the merits, or even the detail of measures that may be proposed by Government. In this country Government itself is so fully occupied—the Executive Part,—that its officers have not the opportunity of ventilating its side of the question in the Press in the way that the supporters of the Government do ventilate the views of Governments in those other countries I have mentioned. That is what I mean when I say in India when a measure is opposed by the Press there is not that full discussion from both points of view we find elsewhere, and consequently the public has not that opportunity of scanning the arguments of both sides which it has elsewhere. I am not, of course, challenging the right of any paper to take an independent opinion, but I do say under other conditions; those conditions being that parties have grown up—a measure of this kind would have received from the party supporting the Government an amount of ventilation which would have shown the reasons Government had for introducing it, in a far more able form than this Executive Council has, and, therefore, I do not attach so much importance to the unanimous opposition, and I must admit it was unanimous of the Press that we have met with that I should do in a country where there are separate parties, and where it is obvious, that the opposition of the Press would have at once killed a Bill."

At a subsequent meeting of the Legislative Council Lord Harris thus explained himself :—

"I must take this, the only opportunity I shall have, of correcting a false impression which my remarks last Saturday on press opposition appear to have led to. It has been inferred from them that I was advocating for India a system under which the Government would be consistently supported by a section of the press. I don't think my remarks warrant any such construction. I was drawing a comparison between the effect of unanimous press opposition in this Presidency on the legislative proposals of this Council, with what might be expected from unanimous press opposition in some country where a section of the press ordinarily supports the Government consistently. I offered no opinion as to the respective merits or demerits of the two systems, except on one point. The establishment of a Government press in a country which is already packed with sectional and sub-sectional divisions of race or creed, and which is more party-bound than any other portion of Her Majesty's dominions, might appear to some as not likely to worse confound the confusion; but whilst an interesting academical question, it is not within the domain of practical politics, and I did not discuss the point, or express a preference for a system under which there would be a Government press, except on one point, and that was, that I think the public are better informed of the Government proposals where the press is not all of one mind. Certainly, we consider, rightly or wrongly, that the arguments in favour of this legislation, and against the laissez faire proposals of our critics, would have been more clearly laid before the public if there had been something approaching equilibrium instead of unanimity in the press opinion. I fancy too, that I detected a note of surprise that I should have raised the point at all, but it seemed to me I was in duty bound to take notice, in defending our position, of a notorious fact. To have omitted to do so would have been a display of disrespect for the press and of contemptuous indifference to its criticisms and feelings, which I don't entertain. For that reason I raised the point, and gave my reason for declining to yield to opposition which would probably, under such other circumstances as I selected for the purpose of comparison, have enforced acquiescence."

ON Tuesday, at Baidyanath, the Lieutenant-Governor laid the foundation stone of the local Rajkumari Leper Asylum—the gift of the Hon'ble Dr. Mahendralal Sircar in the name of his good lady.

ON the 2nd July, the Hon'ble Mr. Risley obtained leave to introduce his Bill to amend the Bengal Municipal Act, 1884. At today's sitting of the Bengal Legislative Council, he introduced the Bill. The Bill being read in Council, the member in charge applied for suspension of rules for the conduct of business, which being done, the Bill was referred to a Select Committee, without any discussion. So the principle of the Bill is admitted and accepted. All the previous agitation against the proposed change in the mofussil municipal law and any subsequent protests against the Government resumption of power go for nothing and are virtually suppressed by mere silence in Council.

Next week, the Chowkidari Bill will be taken up.

SIR Charles Dilke has fully expiated the scandal coupled with his name. After six years of retirement, if not of absolute obscurity, he returns to politics. At the general elections now holding he has been returned in the Liberal interest for the Forest of Dean by a majority of 2,000 votes over Colchester Wemyss, the Conservative candidate.

WE do not know Mr. Hubert Smith of No. 13, Theatre Road, who figured on Wednesday as a defendant in the Police Court, but he is no doubt a respectable gentleman. As an Assistant Superintendent of the Geological Survey, he is by profession a Dryasdust caring for neither man nor beast nor plant. He would pore for months over a bit of rock to guess its chronology and know to what era of the Cycle of Brahma (whose one year is equal to a million of mortal years) it belongs. Although not

One that would peep and botanize

Upon his mother's grave,

he might go into fits over the find of a fossil vegetable. The decayed tooth of a hideous brute which has in God's Providence been extinct three million years, has presumably more interest for him than the tooth-ache tortures of a living creature in the precincts of his house. What cares such a philosopher for a poor cat, even though it be a fine tabby, and the pet of a respected neighbour? The tabby of stone and mortar might have more interest in the eyes of a man of science than the tabby of flesh and blood. At any rate, he saw no beauty or interest in the brindled pet of his neighbour.

A brindled cat in Theatre Road,

A tabby only was to him,

And it was nothing more.

And not only that, the tabby-cat in question was an objectionable neighbour. It was an unprincipled cat. It had not been well-grounded in Christian doctrine or civilized morals. Its master had entirely neglected its proper education, so that it had grown in vice. Accordingly, the Paleontologist who knows all about the creation in general and the origin of the earth in particular, who knows the insignificant function of the cat in the economy of Nature, had no scruple in shooting Mr. Justice Norris' pet. In fact, he thought it his duty to rid the world of such a pest. Such was the tenour of the defence taken by Mr. Smith in the prosecution against him. It may be a good defence in law, but whether it will be a good defence before the Creator of both the cat and the man, may be doubted. The recklessness with which we men take the life of our humbler fellow creatures, must some day recoil upon us.

Mr. Smith was fortunate in his Magistrate. Babu Ashutosh Dhur, who was the trying officer on the Honorary Bench, is an old solicitor and an able as well as strong man. It is not every magistrate, whether honorary or stipendiary, who could have given the accused the benefit of the technical grounds in his favour.

At the same time, Mr. Norris was right in allowing the matter to go to Court, on the circumstances of the death of his cat as they had been reported to him. If the facts turned out otherwise in court that was no fault of his. Apart from legal considerations, his love of the lower animals is an amiable trait in the man of law. It was no small courage in him in the face of a hard and cynical world to do his last duty by his dumb lowly dependant.

REIS & RAYYET.

THE CURRENCY AGITATION.

THE cry of the hour is the currency cry. It might seem a far cry from Simla to Calcutta, but as the City of the Hills and the City of the Plains are merely counterparts of the same capital of British India, dominated and peopled by not simply the same race of gods, more or less acknowledged, but also, to a great extent, by the very same divinities, there is little cause for wonder that the cry also is the same—that the voice at the South-East End is but an echo of the voice at the North-West End. The Mountain looks on the Plain and the Plain looks up to the Peak. The Commercial Capital of the English in Hindostan, as Lord Hardinge was wont to describe the City of Palaces, appropriately follows the lead of the Hill retreat of wisdom and Authority.

It is not often, to be sure, that such a spectacle of unison is presented. The British in India are not always a happy family. Even in the mother-country, this free, independent, and self-reliant people are habitually and perhaps normally divided into parties which distrust and abuse each other and fight each other tooth and nail. Just now at Home they are passing through a Saturnalia of mutual crimination and recrimination and calling of names in which their best and highest men are not spared. In India, although the same causes of contention do not exist, there is even less ground for sympathy, inasmuch as the foreign camp labours under class differences and antagonism of interests far more powerful for repelling than is ethnic or national unity for drawing and combining. Nor is the clement of racial and national diversity wholly wanting to set the handful of Whites by the ears. European society in India is divided between the official and the unofficial sections. The officials are English, Welsh, Scotch, Irish—all, in common parlance, British. Not so the non-officials. These are drawn from all the nations of the earth wearing European costume—French, Germans, Italians, Russians, Spaniards, Portuguese, Canadians, United Statesmen, Mexicans, Brazilians, Turks, Armenians, Syrians, Arabs, besides British Islanders, and mostly engaged in trade and commerce. The interests of these representatives of so many nationalities cannot well be the same, while the common interests of them all as non-officials are necessarily different from those of the officials. It would be the same everywhere. In every country the independent pursuit of gain by commerce forms of the pursuers a class by themselves which has little in common with the employés of the state. But in this country there is a peculiar cause which separates the mercantile and trading community from the officials. Here the officials are all members of a ruling body who being wholly independent of the rest of the community, including the European merchants and traders, have even less ground for sympathy than the Bureaucracy in other states for the other sections of society. The British mercantile community forms no exception. Indeed, there is a particular historical reason against that community's claim to sympathy from the dominant class of their own countrymen. This country was won by a Company of merchants, armed with a monopoly, who from the first excluded all others from it, a policy which was continued long after they had acquired sovereignty. The independent British merchant who sought a field of enterprise in the East, stigmatised as an Interloper and regarded as a criminal, was hunted down as though he were a vagabond fled from justice. When the agents of the East India Company—who were not regarded by their employers as gentlemen—were converted into the officers of a great Government, they could not all of a sudden drop their nature. They still carried, and they were encouraged to maintain, the ideas and feelings in which they had been brought up. The Company persisted as long as they could in holding the rod of empire and the balance of commerce, and in keeping out all comers. Thus some of the finest men were sat upon and suppressed as pestilential adventurers. Hence the independent mercantile community, which grew up with and upon the decay of the Company's trade, has had a long struggle with the aristocracy of office for social recognition. Nature and economic causes have no doubt favoured the merchants, and enabled them, in a great measure, to overcome their social ostracism, but still the struggle cannot be said to be all over. In society as two distinct castes, in politics, the two sections have always been in mutual opposition. The Ilbert Bill controversy was an exceptional event—a sporadic madness—and the entente cordiale on that occasion is not to be taken as a normal phenomenon. The bonds then forged were not maintained. Therefore, the present union is no continuation. Besides, the Ilbert Bill went against the very grain of the exiled Briton and evoked a union of hearts. We have to-day no such romantic question at issue, and the present phenomenon must be explained on more prosaic lines. The truth is, it is a question of pence. The pocket is as great a factor in affairs as the heart. It is confessed that the Briton specially feels at the pocket. What wonder at all this halloobaloo!

The pocket has shrivelled! That is a calamity more serious than the attenuation of the liver. The Europeans all came to the East on the same pilgrimage—the quest of the golden pagodas. In course of time, with the advance of the Iron Age, the pagodas became scarce; they were not to be had for every shake. At length, the pagoda itself disappeared, leaving a poor silver coin for substitute. In another cycle that silver coin showed signs of illness and lost flesh. There it remained the best part of a century. From pagoda to sicca was the descent from gold to silver. From siccas to the ordinary Rupee was a plunge into a lower deep. But now the poor lesser Rupee itself has been attacked with consumption; it is wasting apace, small by degrees and beautifully less. All the Europeans of every degree, in Government employ or out of it, merchants, tradesmen, men of different occupations, have gathered together in a common cause to save the endangered Rupee. Hence, for the first time, under the eye of the Viceroy, have great officers of state, without rebuke, fraternised with outsiders in a common cause. The agitation brewed on the heights of Simla has spread in all directions. The well-known machinery has been set in motion, and meetings are being held wherever a few men do congregate, followed by telegrams to that effect to the centre of the agitation.

On Wednesday a public meeting was held at the Town Hall to memorialize Parliament on the subject. The Hon'ble Mr. Mackay, Chairman of the Indian Currency Association, presided, and many officers of Government were present to lend weight to the occasion. Representative natives, both Hindu and Mahomedan, assisted by their presence and by taking part in the proceedings. The Chairman's address was as long as a pamphlet. He attempted a reply to the several criticisms against a gold standard which he advocates. Consequently, it was a very late hour when the meeting dispersed. Over 200 persons attended.

Even native merchants seem affected. The National Chamber of Commerce, Calcutta, has joined the movement. The leading merchants in Karachi, under the lead of the President of the local Chamber of Commerce, waited in deputation on the Commissioner in Sind and "begged him to be graciously pleased to make a representation to Government urging the essential need of some steps being taken to put a stop to the intolerable uncertainty as to the value of the rupee." The Karachi natives, though evidently under European guidance, certainly understand their own interests. They would not on such a subject lend a nominal swell to others' grievances. They are as intense as any Anglo-Indian. As their memorial is brief and to the point, we quote it entire:—

"The Humble Memorial of the native Traders of Karachi—

Showeth,—We Native Traders of Karachi, born and bred to trade exclusively, and having no other calling, are now in process of discovering that our occupation is likely to vanish altogether unless something can be done to make the value of the money by which our trade is carried on permanent, or at least to free it from the violent and unintelligible fluctuations to which it is now apparently always subject.

You are aware that for the last three months we have in self-defence been compelled to combine to cease purchasing European commodities in our customary way. For this reason; that the moderate profit which we look to make, we have found altogether inadequate to cover the risks and losses to which we are subjected by the constant change in the value of the rupee.

When we bought Manchester Grey Cloth two years ago on a basis of 1/4 exchange, we could have no idea that a loss of about 15 per cent. by the sudden rise in exchange would be inflicted upon us by causes altogether outside the normal fluctuations of our local market, and over which we had no control; nor could we have anticipated the causes which brought ruin to us through contracts we had entered into with exporting firms for wheat and seeds, when the rupee was valued as 1/8 in English money. Then, as we say, the value of the rupee stood at 1s. 8d., but when we came to carry out these contracts its value had fallen to 1s. 6d., and we found that in consequence we had to provide more rupees with which to buy the produce to fulfil our contracts than we had agreed to take from the exporting firms.

To illustrate the risk we are subjected to we have only to draw your attention to the fluctuations of the present month.

On the 2nd, Exchange was 1/3 7-16th.

On the 9th, Exchange was 1/3 14-16th, giving a rise of 4 1/2 per cent.

On the 16th, Exchange was 1/3 11-16th, giving a fall of 1 1/2 per cent.

On the 23rd, Exchange was 1/3 7-16th, giving a further fall of 2 1/2 per cent.

What it will be to-morrow, and whether for loss or profit to us, we cannot say.

The hardship of our position is intensified by the fact that we can in no way protect ourselves from these losses, because, while we may sell with the knowledge we have of up-country supplies to exporting firms, it is impossible for us to buy against our contracts till the produce collected in small quantities in the districts is brought to market, and it is in this interval that the constant changing in the value of the rupee turns our legitimate trading transactions from safe business to purely speculative gambling. It is this which makes us fear that unless some means can be found to give steadiness of value to the rupee, let it be high for low but steady, which will enable us, as in days gone by, to calculate with some certainty the result of our transactions, an absolute destruction of our trade must sooner or later overtake us.

We therefore beg that you will be graciously pleased to make a representation to Government urging the essential need of some steps being taken to put a stop to the intolerable uncertainty as to the value of the rupee."

That is unquestionably a genuine production, in both matter and manner. The concluding prayer to his Serene Highness the Commissioner in Sind Bahadur that he will be graciously pleased to make a representation to Government to rectify the situation, is a downright native touch. The writer could not be more loyal in speech to Her Majesty the Empress.

For the rest, that memorial is the expression of a panic. The memorialists are evidently alarmed. Indians are not easily ruffled, being long suffering. They have already suffered much, as they show in black and white and by figures, and they are threatened with more loss. That is the worst of it. There is no end to this descent. Such a situation is well calculated to raise alarm.

Much as we sympathise with these honest merchants and tradesmen in their genuine losses, we confess we cannot second their memorial. All that they say about the vanishing rupee and its effects on their business, is true. Yet it is not shown that all the business of the country has suffered. They speak as importers only. We should like to hear the Karachi exporters' view. What is loss to the importers, must be gain to the exporters. That is the point. On the memorialists' showing the variation in exchange has affected the import of European goods to a point which threatens to end in zero. Therefore, export being the countertraffic to import, the export of Indian merchandise to Europe ought to expand from the same cause. And people have seen or think they have seen certain indications of that, though of course they are nothing before the doctors who explain away the figures of the Custom-house returns. There is, however, another point for the consideration of all Indians, including those foreigners who have cast in their lot in this country. If this exchange difficulty has pressed so heavily upon the import trade, here is a fine opportunity for our countrymen to rouse themselves into setting up their own manufactures so as to be independent, as far as practicable, of outside help. This is, indeed, the opportunity for Indian manufactures. Let our capitalists and our speculative and energetic men be up and doing. If the opportunity could be utilised, it would be some compensation for the undoubted hardships of many worthy people.

ADMINISTRATIVE INSPECTION.

FROM THE POINT OF VIEW OF THE SUBS.

SOME months ago I had to pay an official visit to a town in Bengal. When I was making preparations to go, my friends got some information that small-pox was raging there. As I had some time in hand I postponed my visit for about 10 or 12 days, but as the epidemic continued I was obliged to start for that place though under the strongest protest from my friends. I could not help risking my life. Reputation was more valuable than life to an honorable person. I thought that if I neglected or delayed the visit, I would be held out to public scorn next year and that my credit would be wrecked. Prompted by a keen sense of honor I proceeded to that hotbed of small-pox where some 200 or more cases had occurred. The whole town was panic-stricken. I could see on my way to the Dak Bungalow half a dozen children with fresh marks of pox on their body in most of the streets that I passed through. The poor things were like flayed animals. Their look was ghastly and repulsive and it filled my mind with all those dangers that my friends had predicted. On arriving at the Bungalow I had to wait for the Khansaman who came and informed me of the state of affairs in the neighbourhood and expressed his surprise at my being there at that time. I commenced my business in a half-hearted manner and was obliged to drive in a very dirty and rickety hackney carriage to my place of business. I perceived a very bad smell in the carriage and who knows that a few minutes or hours before some small-pox patient was not driven in it? In the course of business an orderly class of officer had to attend me daily. On the second or third day of my arrival he came to me with folded hands and asked my permission to say something. Permission being granted, he said with tears in his eyes that he wanted leave for the day. On being asked what was the business for which he wanted the leave, he said that his sister or cousin had died of smallpox and he wanted to go and arrange for her burial. On further questioning, to my great horror I learnt that there were two more smallpox patients in his house besides the deceased and that they were suffering from a very bad type of the disease and that he had to attend them constantly. Here, then, was a very messenger of death in attendance upon me for nearly eight hours or more! I gave him leave instantly and forbade him to come again. You can well imagine my feeling at that time.

At another very out of the way hilly station while staying in a Dak Bungalow I got dysenterical diarrhœa. I got much alarmed as the disease seemed to take a bad turn. The evacuations were dirty and full of offensive matter and as I passed them I did not feel weak but rather relieved. At this stage I sent for the Civil Surgeon not knowing that to my misfortune there was a raw apothecary there. He came and in good faith I received him as a Civil Surgeon, explained my case to him fully and asked him to prescribe. He at once wrote out a prescription and handed it over to me. From his looks and the manner in which he diagnosed my disease I at least suspected that he was very inexperienced and more of a veterinary surgeon than a Civil Surgeon. I sent for the medicine and took one dose when I felt that there was a very large quantity of chlorodyne. Within half an hour I felt severe pain in my stomach with heaviness. The bowels were nearly stopped making me very restless. I also felt the symptoms of vomiting. I at once stopped the medicine, and after closely examining the prescription found that a large dose of chlorodyne had been ordered evidently to check the evacuation. Learning that there was a Hospital assistant of some standing I quietly sent for him, explained to him my case and without showing him the prescription asked him if I could take chlorodyne. He said "no, it would do much harm as it would at once stop the stools." I then showed him the prescription which he disapproved totally and suggested some ordinary medicine which cured me in two days.

Officers ought to take a lesson from my case and never place themselves under such treatment. If a Civil Surgeon is not available, send at once for the Assistant Surgeon in charge of the Hospital or in his absence for the best Assistant Surgeon who has a large private practice and is considered to be the most experienced Doctor. I have always seen the best European doctors—the most experienced Civil Surgeons—consulting experienced Assistant Surgeons in difficult cases. In every town now-a-days there are Assistant Surgeons who practise independently.

These lines will show Sir Charles Elliott to what dangers and discomforts inspecting officers are exposed and under what difficulties they have to carry out his orders. No option or discretion of any kind is left even to the high European officials. Every one cannot be expected to move with the ease, comforts, and precautions of a Lieutenant-Governor, stopping on the Rhotas in mid-stream and driving in the best carriage available. In most cases, officers cannot get correct information about the health of the places where they go before arriving there, and have to take most unwholesome food and water and to sleep in very exposed and dangerous houses. Let the head of the Government travel once in some out-of-the-way place in a malarial and epidemic tract, under the conditions that his poor subordinates are compelled to travel in and he will then be able to realize correctly their dangers and difficulties. It is a pity that he does not know what trouble is taken by a whole city and by the local authorities as well as non-official magnates—how all available means in their power in the district are employed to protect him and his party from all possible dangers and exposures, and how every creek and corner of a town is cleared before his visit, and what amount is spent in such work.

ONE OF THEM.

ANSWER TO ENQUIRY.

THE inquiry of our correspondent "One Interested" in Reis & Rayyet of the 11th June has not, we regret to say, borne fruit. Up to this we have received only one communication touching it, and that is of a flippant kind. We think we better lay it before our readers for what it may be worth. It is as follows:

"Hutwa, 13th July 1892.

In response to "One Interested," in your issue of the 11th ultimo, I beg to say that strictly speaking the proper feminine of 'Rai Bahadur' ought to be Raie Banduri. This is the correct word according to Grammar and Philology. Allow me to show how this is. The feminine of Rāya would be Rāyai, which by the method of phonetic decay and by Panini's rule I. I. 45 and VI. I. 108, becomes Rai, and that of Bābadur would be Babaduri; but as no Pardanasibin ladies of our country would prefer that Amazonian title it is satisfactory to know that the same great philological law of phonetic decay, like a knight-errant of the Middle Ages, will rescue them from this danger, by eliminating the letter b, expressive of Birarasa (Heroic Emotions) and introducing in its place the dotted crescent mark producing jingling music in response to their anklets, (c. f. English pronunciation of Maharaja being Mārājā.) I hope the term will be acceptable to One Interested, though I cannot answer for the fair ones. But they are notoriously fickle and difficult to please. I may well be credited with having added something to the vocabulary of the age and aided Government in making a nice selection of a new honor to be bestowed on the next occasion, of course not on my better-half, as she is determined to die a simple Devi. But will the wives of the Mahamahopadhyas weep in the wilderness? I see no body asking about them.

/MAXMULLARIAN PANINI,
G. K. BANNERJI."

LORD DUFFERIN AND THE LORD WARDEN-SHIP OF THE CINQUE PORTS.

LORD DUFFERIN INSTALLED.

On June 22, in beautiful weather, the Marquess of Dufferin and Ava was installed at Dover as Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports, the imposing ceremony being witnessed by a large concourse of spectators. The Marquess, accompanied by the Marchioness and their family, Earl Stanhope, Lord-Lieutenant of Kent, and Countess Stanhope, Sir Arthur and Lady Nicolson, &c., drove over from Walmer Castle to Dover Castle. Here the party was received by Major-General Lord William Seymour, commanding the South-Eastern District, and his staff. At eleven o'clock the mayors of the Cinque Ports and their liberties met in the ancient banqueting hall of the castle for the purpose of electing the Speaker, who at the Court of Shipway should request Lord Dufferin to take upon himself the duties of the office of Lord Warden. The Court having been formally opened by the seneschal, the Mayor of Hastings was chosen. From the banqueting hall a procession was formed to proceed to the Church of St. Mary-in-the-Castle. As the procession was entering the church the Lord Warden and party drove up. The service was conducted by the Bishop of Dover, assisted by the Rev. Canon Puckle, rural dean, and the Rev. F. Sadleir, senior chaplain to the garrison. The Bishop of Dover delivered a short but eloquent address with special reference to the occasion. During the service the first portion of a procession was in course of formation. This included representatives of the various friendly societies, the Dover and Hastings fire brigades, the lifeboat men with their boat, which was gaily decorated, the Coastguards' Shipwrights' Society, &c., with a number of bands. When the official party came from the church they joined an imposing procession, which altogether extended to nearly a mile in length. This included the dignitaries already mentioned, in carriages, the mayors being attended by their mace-bearers, some of whom were in quaint costumes, various officials, &c. The new Lord Warden wore his uniform of blue with a cocked hat, and Lord Herschell, Captain of Deal Castle, was also present, and there were detachments of cavalry and mounted infantry. Proceeding to the Drop Redoubt at the Western Heights, the installation ceremony took place. Three tents had been erected, in close proximity to the Bredenstone, at which the installations have taken place during the past two or three centuries. The quaint ceremony was begun by the seneschal making a proclamation and reading the precept of the Lord Warden summoning the Court. After this the returns of the barons elected by the various ports and members were handed in, and the seneschal announced the Court to be formed. In token of his nomination, the Lord Warden then requested the seneschal to read his patent of office, which was done. The Speaker of the Court next requested his lordship to undertake the duties of the office, and upon Lord Dufferin announcing his acceptance the Court did reverence, and, upon a signal, the gun of the adjoining fort thundered forth the Lord Warden's salute of nineteen guns. The Judge of the Court of Admiralty of the Cinque Ports (Mr. Arthur Cohen, Q. C.) then delivered a congratulatory address to his lordship, which Lord Dufferin suitably acknowledged, and the Court was dissolved. After the ceremony Lord and Lady Dufferin and a distinguished bevy of guests attended a luncheon given by the officers of the Highland Light Infantry. In the evening a grand banquet in the Lord Warden's honour took place at the Town Hall.—The Overland Mail, June 24, 1892.

BELUCHISTAN.

Report by AHMAD ALI KHAN, Sub-Surveyor, on his exploration of Sarhad (Persian Baluchistan) and Sistan (Eastern Persia) during season 1890-91, with a brief description of the country.

I was directed by the officer in charge of the Baluchistan Survey to join the Agent to the Governor-General, Baluchistan, at Panjgur, who would instruct me as to the scope and extent of my exploration in Sarhad of Persian Baluchistan, and Sistan of Persia. I accordingly left Quetta on the 27th December 1890, and reached Panjgur 20th January 1891. Here I reported my arrival to Sir Robert Sandeman, who then made arrangements for me to proceed northwards.

On the 27th January a large Durbar was held for the Baluch Chiefs, and the Agent to the Governor-General was gracious enough to present me with a khalat in recognition of my previous work. On the following day I left Panjgur for Jalk via Kuhak, Isfandak, and Kallagan. From Jalk I started plane-tableing en route to Ladis, leaving the road now and then, and reached the latter place on the 24th February. Continuing my work northwards via Duzdap and Malik Siah Koh, I reached Sekoha on the 9th March. Here different arrangements had to be made, as I was not permitted to proceed to Nasirabad until permission was obtained from the Sarhang in command there. After a delay of nine days the welcome permission arrived.

On the 19th March I started, leaving my camp equipment behind and most of my escort. My following consisted of four mounted men and one khalasi. The latter was utilised for pacing to check my timing on horseback, for I could take nothing in the shape of surveying instruments. Thus the position of Nasirabad and also of the eleven villages north of Sekoha should be considered approximate, as I had even to judge my direction to the best of my ability. After a stay of two days at Nasirabad, during which time I collected as much information as possible, I retraced my steps to Sekoha. Here I was again detained, as the inhabitants refused to sell me supplies, and it was only after much difficulty and persuasion that I obtained what was wanted at three times the local rates. From Sekoha I struck across country, taking the direction of the Taraku fort. Then, marching and working along the northern edge of the Hamun-i-Zirreh, I traversed its whole length and caught up the Nasirabad-Kharan route at the Orak springs. This route I now adhered to, and crossing the Amir Chah Kotal I made my way to Kharan via Paniham and Kondi. On the 14th May I reached Kharan, after having completed the $\frac{1}{4}$ inch reconnaissance of nearly 22,000 square miles of ground, and compiling route reports not only from authentic information, but from personal observations also, of nearly 1,000 miles in length.

I should not omit to note that the whole of the reconnaissance, with the exception of the bit north of Sekoha, is based on trigonometrically fixed points furnished by the Afghan Boundary Commission, and also by Mr. G. P. Tate, Assistant Surveyor.

Sarhad comprises an area, roughly speaking, of about 11,000 square miles, and is confined between the parallels of 28° and 30° North Latitude, and 60° 45' to about 62° 45' East Longitude. The average height of ground level is about 4,500 feet. Continuous chains of hills traverse the country in a N. W. and S. E. direction, with broad intervening valleys along which pass the principal routes. The whole of Sarhad is considered Persian Baluchistan, and is supposed to be directly under the authority of the Governor of Kirmán, the present incumbent being Mirza Abdul Majid Khan, Farman Farma-i-Daulat. The authority, however, is almost nominal, for the inhabitants are a wild, turbulent race, and lead a very independent life. Not a tabii or ibana exists throughout the land, and no man who has any vested powers from Persia resides in Sarhad.

The most important place is Ladis, which comprises seven villages and a fort, situated close together, the population of which at present may be estimated at about 1,200. The fort is built on the right bank of the Ladis river and is 150 feet above the bed: its dimensions are approximately 600 feet square, and it is surrounded by a wall 20 feet high, with bastions at the corners. Altogether the fort is a very inferior one. In the interior there are 100 houses, which are inhabited during the summer months only by Rekis. Surrounding Ladis there are about 1,400 acres of cultivated land, the cereals grown being wheat and barley. The produce suffices simply for home consumption, and gbi is the only commodity exported. There is a perennial flow of water in the Ladis river and numerous springs, all of which are utilised to a great extent in irrigating the land. I was informed that the Governor of Kirmán intends shortly to build a fort at Ladis capable of accommodating 200 sowars, and has levied a tax on the inhabitants of one-sixth of the annual crop: this they have refused to pay, and have signified their intention of bodily migrating to Khárán if any attempt is made to enforce the tax. The total number of houses in Ladis is about 300. South and west of the volcanic mountain of Koh-i-Taftán there are numerous villages.

The cultivated land, both in Persian and Afghan Sistan, amounts to about 3,000 square miles, which large tract is irrigated chiefly by canals fed from the Helmand river. The soil is so fertile that the sowing of one season is sufficient to yield crops for the following two. Afghan Sistan possesses 70 villages: the Persian side 100. During the period of Timur's (Tamarlane's) invasion of the country, nearly 800 years ago, numerous strong forts were erected between Puzai Margo and the Helmand. These are still in a state of preservation, though never looked after or occupied. The name of the tract where these forts stand is Sar-u-tar, signifying deserted.

The great Hamun or Gaud-i-Zirreh is 85 miles long, about 30 miles broad, and has an average depth of 10 feet. In dry seasons, however, this is greatly reduced and kbaflus easily cross. The water is utterly undrinkable, and animals even refuse to touch it. On the north, running the whole length of the Hamun, is a bank 40 feet high, forming the southern limit of the Dasht-i-Taráku. Herds of wild asses abound in the neighbourhood. The soil all round the Hamun is covered with a white efflorescence. The camarisk is found in small clumps scattered about, and grazing for camels is very plentiful. When the Helmand river receives an unusual supply of water, either from the melting of the snows or an abnormal rainfall, the reservoirs which receive its waters, such as the Hamun-i-Sistan and the Hamun-i-Sowaran, overflow; the volume of water takes a southerly course, and after inundating a tract of land 130 miles long, with an average width of 30 miles, empties itself into the Hamun or Gaud-i-Zirreh.

The place second in importance to Nasirabad in Sistan is Sekoha; it is 23 miles south of it. A rectangular wall, 1,200 feet x 900 feet and 20 feet high, encloses all the buildings. In the centre, on a knoll 200 feet high, a small pukka fort is built, which contains a company of infantry. The population of Sekoha is equal to that of Nasirabad. The present Sirdar is Pasánd Khan, who has friendly feelings towards the British. The water-supply from a canal is very good. Supplies, such as wheat, barley, bhusa, etc., can be procured in large quantities. No pasturage for animals exists nearer than 15 miles from the town, and wood is almost as scarce. The camping ground is on the west side of Sekoha. Every European travelling northwards is stopped here until permission is received from Brijand for a safe conduct. In the case of Native foreigners travelling in the same direction, permission or otherwise from Nasirabad is sufficient. In ancient times Sekoha was the capital or chief town of Sistan, but on account of the constant depredations of the tribes from Sarhad, Nasirabad was brought into existence and gradually took the first place.

There are other forts of minor importance about 30 miles south, such as Hauzdár, Machi, Kunder, Ramród, etc. There are traces still visible that the whole tract of ground where these forts stand, was once well populated, and that in fact it was in a flourishing condition. Twenty-five miles east of Ramród, on a hillock 200 feet above ground level, there stands a very strongly fortified post, called Taráku, which, although unoccupied, is in perfect order. Inside of the surrounding wall there are very good specimens of architecture, the walls of which are all ornamented with paintings. The tradition is that 1,500 years ago this was the birthplace of Rustam Pailwán, the Persian Palladin, whose life is shrouded with romance and mystery. The fort is called Taráku, derived from Tarkiden, which signifies 'bursting,' as the mother of Rustam Pailwán had to undergo the operation called the Cæsarean section before she could give birth to her son. Taráku was then the most important town in Sistan.

There are two canals worthy of note. The first and longest is that called Nair-i-Sistan; it is 60 miles long, with an average width of 30 feet and depth of 10 feet. The main branch with its numerous outlets irrigates about 3,000 square miles of land. The second largest is called the Nair-i-Taráku, which passes the fort of Taráku half a mile to the south. It is about 30 miles in length and of variable breadth, and used, in times gone by, to irrigate about 1,000 square miles. At present it is not worked on account of the deserted state of the land. Both these canals are fed from the Helmand. In 1885, when the river overflowed, a large volume of water found its way into the Nair-i-Taráku, burst its banks and inundated the country westwards for miles.

About 22 miles due west of Nasirabad there is a flat hill called Koh-i-Khwaja. It is about 500 feet above ground level. A fort stands at the southern base. The remains of numerous houses are still visible, all more or less fortified, on the summit, and huge caves exist on the slopes. The area of the level ground on top would be about one square mile.

The men of Sistan are on the whole a pacific lot. Very few are to be seen armed, and then only with the antique matchlock.

Koh-i-Taftán is the most remarkable mountain in Sarhad. There are two peaks a mile apart on the crest lying north-west and south-east, which are about equally high. To the north-west peak an approximate height was obtained giving a result of 14,000 feet above sea-level. The south-east peak is volcanic; there are two distinct craters on it which, when witnessed from any distance, appear to be only one. The whole of the higher crest of this range is covered with snow throughout the year, and the volcano lies dormant during the winter months. The streams which take their source from the range have a continual supply of good drinkable water. Skirting the bases on both sides there are numerous villages possessing large orchards and vineyards. Pomegranates, apples, apricots and peaches are to be had in abundance, the first two especially being of excellent quality.

The physical features of Sarhad present no difficulty whatever to any enterprise that may be undertaken either in the construction of railways or roads. The valleys are all broad and fairly level, with an average height of about 4,500 feet above sea-level. The *kotal*s or saddles over which the principal routes pass are all accessible even in their present state for laden animals and mountain batteries. The main ranges which take a north-westerly direction are all more or less continuous and skirted on both sides by rather rugged ground, sparsely covered over with stunted trees. There is, however, an abundance of pasturage in the valleys during the summer months. Sarhad is actually the hot-weather resort for the inhabitants of Sistan and the Helmand valley.

The soil is unfit for cultivation, even when irrigated, as there is an admixture of sand combined with stones: this is particularly the case in the valleys. The ranges are all of sandstone formation totally devoid of any vegetation. The majority of the water-courses have always a good supply of running water. The best springs are to be found at the base of the Koh-i-Taftán range.

As a very small proportion of the inhabitants are agriculturists, large quantities of wheat and barley are imported into the country from Sistan, which are bartered for ghi in the proportion of 7 maunds of wheat for one of ghi. The maund is equivalent to about 6½ seers Indian weight. With the exception of woollen numdabs nothing whatever is manufactured in the country, and all muzzle-loading guns, matchlocks and swords are imported from parts of Persia.

Sistan comprises an area of about 20,000 square miles. The Helmand river from Chahar Burjak takes a northerly course and flows through it, dividing it into two parts. From the east or right bank of the Helmand up to the great Dasht-i-Margo plain is Afghan Sistan; that on the left bank up to the lofty Paláng Koh range is Persian Sistan. From north to south it extends from Lash Juwain down to the Lar Koh and Kach Koh hills.

The tri-junction boundary pillar of Persia, Afghanistan, and Baluchistan stands on the summit of Malik Siah Koh, and was erected by General Sir F. Goldschmidt in 1872, south of Sistan; the pillar was found destroyed. A fresh pile of stones 8 feet high and 5 feet broad at the base was erected. Afghan Sistan, comprising Chakansur, Kali-Kang, Kalifat, etc., is subject to the authority of the Governor of Farrah: Western Sistan, comprising the important town of Nasirabad, and others of less importance, such as Sekoha, Dowlatabad, etc., is under the direct authority of the Governor of Brijand in Persia.

The town of Nasirabad is about half a mile long and a quarter broad. Before the Husseinabad fort came into existence, twenty years ago, the fort of Nasirabad was attacked and destroyed by the Baluchis under Sher Muhammad Khan, Sanjaram of the Helmand valley. The population of the town now is about 4,000, inhabiting 700 houses. The majority of the people are agriculturists. Woollen numdabs and carpets of inferior quality are manufactured. There are no bazaars or shops, and even the ubiquitous bania does not find an abode here. The reason of this is that the religious teaching of the Persians, who are Shiabs, precludes them from buying or receiving anything for consumption from a Hindu. Atta, dhal, ghi, fowls, eggs, sheep, and bhusa are to be obtained in large quantities and very cheap. The imports are sugar, tea, indigo, and ingredients for cooking. The following are the rates obtainable:—

Wheat	6 maunds for 1 karan.
Barley	10 maunds „ 1 „
Ghi	1 maund „ 7 „
Fowls	4 or 5 „ 1 „
Eggs	120 „ 1 „
Wood	1 maund „ 2 „

The maund is equivalent to about 7 seers Indian weight. The karan equals 6½ annas.

The exports are sheep's wool, goats' hair, and ghi. One-third of all the produce of the country is taken as revenue by Government. The Persian Sistanis are not migratory, while the Baluchi Sistanis on the other hand are never stationary. The latter being a pastoral race move about with their cattle wherever grazing grounds are most favourable. The animals are taxed at the rate of 1 karan for every bullock or cow, and 1 karan per annum for every seven heads of sheep or goats. The whole amount of taxes thus imposed amounted during the past year to 40,000 karan.

(Author of Kabittahar, Bharat Kusam, Abhas, &c.)

Nicely got up and neatly bound.

Price, paper cover, Re. 1; cloth gilt, 1-4.

ASRUKANA is a collection of poetical pieces of singular pathos and beauty of expression * * * It is a series of mournful songs that the reader is here presented with and they must touch a sympathetic cord in every heart that can feel. There is a singular appropriateness in the title of the work and in its pious dedication to the memory of the husband of the fair writer.—The Indian Nation. Bengal should be proud of this poem.—The Calcutta Review.

Holloway's Pills.—For the cure of debility, bile, liver and stomach complaints this inappreciable medicine is so well-known in every part of the world, and the cures performed by its use are so wonderful, that it now stands pre-eminent above all other remedies, more particularly for the cure of bilious and liver complaints, disorders of the stomach, dropsy, and debilitated constitution. In these diseases the beneficial effects of the Pills are so permanent that the whole system is renewed, the organs of digestion strengthened, and a free respiration promoted. They expel from the secretive organs and the circulation the morbid matter which produces inflammation, pain, fever, debility, and physical decay—thus annihilating, by their purifying properties, the virulence of the most painful and devastating diseases.

CALCUTTA, SATURDAY, JULY 23, 1892.

No. 534

A LAY OF LACHEN.

[BY THE LATE MR. COLMAN MACAULAY.]

THE purple shadows upward crept
On Sikkim's mountains blue,
The snows their solemn vigil kept
Those stately watchers true.
The frosted peaks of Chola gleamed,
Broken and bare and bold.
On the glittering crest of Kinchin streamed
The sun-light clear and cold.
The fleeting clouds brief shadows flung
On mighty Junnu's brow, or hung
On Pindim's forehead near ;
And Dongia's beetling bastions frowned
A silent warning far around
No foot may venture here.

II.

The light air bore the sullen roar
Of Rungit rushing by,
And Bengal's Lord in thought was deep
As he gazed across the mountains steep,
And he spake his counsel high :—
"No travellers come from far Thibet,
From the mystic land no tidings yet
For many a month are sent ;
No more the tinkling bells ring clear
On Lingtu's heights, by Bedden's mere ;
On Jelep's path no step resounds,
No smoke at even upward bounds
From weary trader's tent.
Do thou, Macaulay, ready make.
To Sikkim's Chief my greeting take
And see his father's solemn pact
Is true fulfilled in word and act.
And hie thee to the frontier far,
Journey towards the Northern Star,
Speak fair the Lord of Kambajong
And seek his friendship new.
The path is steep, the road is long,
But the purpose high and true.
Say that you cross the snow drifts sad
But to seek the grasp of friendship's hand,
We wish but the welfare of the land
To make both peoples glad."

III.

Macaulay took his Chief's commands,
And, for that the city was long and steep,
And the ice was thick and the snow was deep,
And the wind that blows across the sands
Of Tartary is biting keen,
He called companions three
To go with him across the sheen
Of the snow fields wild and free.

IV.

First genial Evans—wisest he
Of all wise lawyers, and his place
At Bar and Board is ever high,—
Sage in council, for a space
Fled from the wiles of Doson's race
And Rent Bill papers dry,
To breathe the air of Sikkim free,
To wander by her purling rills,
And seek the beauty of her hills,
The blueness of her sky.

V.

And Paul who Sikkim loves so well
That still the Native chieftains tell,
With kindly smile and grasp of hand,
That of the *Sahib log who cross
The Rungit's silver fall,
None know the story of their land,
None can its meaning understand,
As does that Sahib tall.

VI.

And cheery Gordon, blithe and gay,
Sang as they toiled along the way
To Thibet's frontier far ;
That soldier minstrel whose guitar
By Lachen's stream or Lushai hill
Has often cheered the camp, and still Is heard in Cuch Behar.

VII.

And in the vales of Sikkim lone,
As gay he bought her brooch or zone,
Did many a maiden fair
Sigh, as she brushed a tear away,
"He will not buy what eke he may ;
He buys all things throughout the land,
Oh, would he only buy my hand,
That soldier debonnaire !"

VIII.

And Sarat Chandra, hardy son
Of soft Bengal, whose wondrous store
Of Buddhist and Thibetan lore
A place in fame's bright page has won,
Friend of the Tashu Lama's line,
Whose eyes have seen the gleaming shrine
Of holy Lhasa, came to show
The wonders of the land of snow.

* European gentlemen.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given, any other being unnecessary and likely to cause confusion.

IX.

They journeyed over steep Tendong,
And through the vale of Tista fair,
By Shilling's slopes and Yeung's Mendong,
And Kubbi's smiling pastures rare
And Ryott's roaring falls,
To where, high perched on Mafi's breast
With banners gay and brazen crest,
Shone Sikkimpati's halls.

X.

Right royal welcome Sikkim gave*
With high carouse and banquets brave,
And many a pledge of right good-will,
And many a promise new
His compact ever to fulfil
And prove his fealty true.
And to the Lord of Kambajong
Swift messengers he sent :
" Lo, o'er the hills to Giagong,
By Lachen's vale and Phallung's snows,
From great Bengal an envoy goes
To greet thee in his tent."

XI.

And leaving Sikkim's halls, the four O'er Mafi's hill, by Ringun's rill
'Neath stately Gnarim's summit hoar,
By Nanga's shades and Chakung's glades,
And rapid Tista's rocky shore,
And Chungtam's marshes low,
And fairy Lachen's forests green,
And boiling Zemu's silver sheen,
And cherished still of Hooker's name,
Travelled till they the torrent crossed
At Tullam Samdong hard in frost
And Tungu deep in snow.

XII.

The moon to nearly full had grown
Ere they the frontier cold and lone
Did reach, where winds swept Giagong,
Near twice six thousand cubits sheer
O'er India's plains and people's throng,
Lies white and chill and drear,
'Twixt Kinchinjow and Chomiom.
No man or beast may make his home
That barren snow-field near.

XIII.

The day was waning, and the crest
Of Chomiomo paler grew,
As sank the sun into the west
And ever lengthening shadows threw
The giants hoar between.
The north wind sharp and sharper blew,
The frost was piercing keen ;
Night followed day, but still no sound
Was heard the silent snow drift round
Of coming footsteps, and no light
Of lantern or of torch did peer
Across the waste of gleaming white
To say that help was near.

XIV.

No light had they, nor drink, nor meat,
Nor could they forward go or back ;
The drifts were deep around the track,
The snow was thick around the feet ;
And night like a funeral pall lay black
On a snow-winding sheet.

XV.

The moon rose slow, and pale, and sad
O'er the royal crest of Kinchinjow,
And Chomiomo's peak was clad
In the light that bathed his icy brow ;
And a shimmering moonbeam sad caressed
Her white still face and summit proud,
As they laid their weary limbs to rest
On her silent spreading shroud.

XVI.

At length that awful night was past.
No more they shuddered 'neath the blast ;
The morning smiled across the wild,
And the tentsmen followed fast.
Down Kongralamo's snowy waste
The yaks with stately movement paced,
And five score swordsmen's weapons glanced
As Kamba's chieftain grave advanced
The mystic *chorton past.

XVII.

And in Macaulay's tent that day,
In high Durbar and bright array,
With welcome glad and presents fair,
Was Bengal's greeting told,
And Kamba's Lord did oft declare
That Thibet's people fain would dare
The dangers of the road, to see
Victoria's Empire, rich and rare,
Of mighty Tarat regent she,
And with her happy people free,
Would friendly converse hold.

XVIII.

Next day with many a greeting kind
And many a pledge of friendship true,
They parted ; and the wondrous blue
Of Thibet's sky was left behind.

XIX.

And the Yule-tide far away,
As sweet young faces wondering gaze,
When downward fall the ashes grey
And upward leaps the yellow blaze,
Those comrades four may tell the tale
Of how they trod fair Lachen's vale,
So lovely and so long,
And how they braved the withering gale
And lay beneath the snowpeaks pale,
At lonely Giagong.

WEEKLYANA.

MR. F. C. Barnes has obtained leave for one month and ten days from the 16th August. We are glad to find that Khan Bahadur Abdul Jubbar will be allowed to officiate for that period as Superintendent of Stamps and Stationery.

THE Lieutenant-Governor has ruled that when an exchange rowana has to be taken out in consequence of the quantity delivered on the original rowana being less than the quantity covered by it owing to no fault of the holder, such exchange rowana shall be granted free of cost.

MR. Justice Prinsep goes on privilege leave for one month and five days from the 3rd August next, that is, as many days immediately before the Long Vacation.

* Sacred pyramidal buildings, originally tombs of departed saints.

† The Goddess of Divine Wisdom, adored by the Northern Buddhists.

* The present Maharajah.

MR. W. J. Cuninghame is on privilege leave for two months and twenty days from the 19th July last. Mr. J. A. Crawford, the Under-Secretary, acts the Deputy-Secretary to the Government of India in the Foreign Department, Mr. A. Williams, Under-Secretary to the Government of the Punjab and officiating Deputy Commissioner, Lahore, officiating as Under-Secretary in the Foreign Office.

THE Secretary of State has sanctioned the estimate amounting to Rs. 18,71,294 of the cost of constructing the Hyderabad-Umarkot State Railway, 77½ miles in length.

THE wife of a timber-cutter in New York has brought to litter three girls and one boy. They are expected to live. The boy has been named, after the American President, Benjamin Harrison, the girls being christened Faith, Hope, and Charity.

CALIGRAPHY is not only neglected in the Indian Universities, but illegible handwriting seems to be the boast of modern India. The other day the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal issued instructions for distinct and full signatures of native officers. The Bombay High Court has just now made an order to that effect. The proceedings of the First-class Magistrate of Sattara (Mr. Panse) having come up in review, the court called on the District Magistrate to certify a legible copy of Mr. Panse's English record. He was also asked to inform that Magistrate that it is the duty of every judicial officer to record his proceedings in legible handwriting.

THE Allahabad High Court goes into Long Vacation on the 13th August.

HERE is the full text of the Queen's Speech dissolving Parliament:—

"My Lords and Gentlemen,—

The time has arrived at which it is expedient that the electoral body of this country should be consulted by the assemblage of a new Parliament. I have therefore summoned you for the prorogation of Parliament at an earlier period than usual.

I am glad to record that the friendly relations I have maintained with foreign Powers remain unaltered.

The treaties have been duly ratified which refer our differences with the United States in respect to Behring's Sea to arbitration.

The ratification also of the final Act of the Brussels Conference for the suppression of the slave trade has, after many delays, been completed. The Government of France, however, has made reservations in regard to some of the provisions which affect operations against the maritime slave trade.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,—

I recognise with satisfaction that, before separating, you have made full provision for the requirements of the public service.

My Lords and Gentlemen,—

I have gladly given my consent to several Bills which you have been able to consider and to sanction, notwithstanding that the duration of the Session has been exceptionally short. The arrangements you have made for enabling labouring men to become purchasers of small agricultural holdings will increase the class of cultivating owners, which is of great importance to the State. The application to Ireland of those educational measures which have been recently adopted in Great Britain will confer great benefits upon the poorer classes of that country. You have sanctioned valuable provisions for reforming the police administration in Scottish burghs and for extending to Scotland the facilities for the hire of allotments which were given to the people of England and Wales a few years ago. At the same time, you have done much to lighten the burden of local taxation in that country, and to foster the interests of secondary and of University education. The Act for strengthening the discipline of the Church of England in regard to moral offences accomplishes a necessary reform which has too long been delayed.

I have willingly accepted a measure for improving the constitution and proceedings of the Legislative Councils in India which will, I trust, enable my Government in that country more fully to ascertain the opinions and wishes of various races and classes of my subjects, and to secure the co-operation of those best qualified to give advice and assistance in the conduct of affairs.

I have assented gladly to the measures which you have wisely and generously adopted for the relief of my subjects in the island of Mauritius under the unexampled calamity which has overtaken them.

In closing this Parliament, which has been unusually laborious, and has also been highly fruitful in beneficent legislation, I thank you for the assiduous performance of your momentous duties during the last six years, and I heartily commend you to the favour of Almighty God."

This was the Seventh Session of the Twelfth Parliament of Queen Victoria. It met first on August 5, 1886 and was dissolved on June 28, 1892, after a life of 5 years and 328 days. The whole Parliament lasted 7,146½ hours. The days of the last Session numbered 88, and of the whole Parliament 827. The number of questions for the session is given at 2,889 and for the whole Parliament at 26,104, the time occupied in answering them being 435 hours.

NOTES & LEADERETTES

with

OUR OWN NEWS.

WITH the exception of two returns from Orkney and Shetland, the elections are over. There are in all 670 members of the House of Commons. Of these England returns 465, Ireland 103, Scotland 72, and Wales 30. Of 670 again only 645 elections are held, for in twenty-four boroughs and three universities the constituents elect two members each upon one poll.

The latest returns of the present elections by Reuter are

Conservatives	262	} 314
Unionists	52
Liberals	274
Parnellites	9	} 354

showing the Conservative gain of sixteen, Unionist gain of nine and Liberal gain of seventy-six seats.

Thus, the Liberals with all their ramifications have a majority of only 40 over the Conservatives. It is not yet definitely announced how Lord Salisbury will act on the final return. He had two conferences with Her Majesty. It is stated, that the Queen and Lord Salisbury have agreed that ministers shall meet the new Parliament, when it is probable that Mr. Gladstone will move an amendment to the Address to force the Government to resign. The Morning Post (London) suggests that even if defeated on a division, Lord Salisbury should merely prorogue Parliament until February, retaining office till then.

MR. Labouchere, in his Truth, thus announces the programme of the Liberal House of Commons. He advises the new Government to deal with the following subjects before touching Home Rule, namely: one man one vote, reform of registration, the payment of members, local option, and the constitution of the parish councils. The Daily News, however, is positive that Home Rule remains the first imperative engagement of the Liberals, though it may be necessary to combine urgent Liberal measures therewith.

HOME Rule has been the Liberal war cry in the elections. Mr. Gladstone is prepared to extinguish the Lords if they reject a Home Rule Bill. Addressing an open-air meeting, while passing through Chester from London to Hawarden, in favour of the candidature of Baron Halkett, a Separatist, he said:—"Three forces are being used by the supporters of the Government in the present elections, namely, intimidation, invention, and religious bigotry. Lord Salisbury was a great intimidator. For the first time in our history the Prime Minister was the chief political firebrand in the land. Mr. Gladstone ridiculed the invention that there must be another dissolution if the House of Lords rejected a Home Rule Bill. That might be a reason for dealing with the Lords, but not for dissolution."

It is not a little amusing to hear Mr. Gladstone call the Conservative Premier a firebrand and the rest of it. But the G. O. M. is not blessed with the faculty of humour, otherwise he might have remembered the story of the pot and the kettle. With equal unconsciousness he accuses Lord Salisbury of intimidation in the same breath that he threatens the Upper Chamber.

A STRANGE rumour is prevalent in some circles in connection with the Premier's frequent conference with Her Majesty. It is said that Lord Salisbury will take the wind out of the sails of the enemy by himself granting Home Rule. We refuse to believe it. Our Cecil is not a Disraeli. He has character as well as convictions—which are genuine Conservative. He who quarrelled with Disraeli rather than be a party to a Conservative Reform Bill, is the last person to attempt a Conservative Home Rule measure.

THERE is uneasiness in Anglo-Indian circles at the prospect of Lord Ripon being the Indian Minister of the next Gladstone ministry. We believe after all, the Marquis will elect not to hamper a new administration not over-strong in the House by his visible apparition at the India-house.

A WHOLESALE destruction of the island of Sangir near the Celebes group with a population of twelve thousand, is telegraphed from London on the 18th. The visitation took the form of a volcanic eruption.

DROUGHT has been followed by flood. Excessive rains destroying bridges and committing other mischiefs are reported from several parts of the empire.

WHILE Sir Charles Dilke re-enters Parliament, Mrs. Crawford of the Dilke scandal has gone to a nunnery—with the vows that she owes no money and has made her will. She is a Tertiary sister of St. Mary's Franciscan convent, Mill Hill. As a divorced wife she cannot take the veil. She was introduced by Mr. W. T. Stead to Cardinal Manning who converted her to Roman Catholicism.

The Catholic priesthood seem to have one function in common with the Chaitanyaites Goswamis of Bengal—that of offering a way of salvation to the fallen.

As a development of the Salt monopoly, in 1876, a trader residing in any town having direct railway communication with Sambhar was permitted, on payment of the duty and price at the nearest treasury, to indent for salt direct from the lake, the Salt Department undertaking to book the consignment to the station named in the indent. The system proving successful, it was extended to Pachbadra and the Khewra mines. A further concession was made in April 1890. To afford equal facilities to traders as are not always resident at district or tahsil head-quarters, permission was given them—as an experimental measure—to indent for salt direct from the salt sources on payment of the price and duty into the nearest post office. This plan was at first restricted to the salt sources at Sambhar, Pachbadra and Khewra, the receipt of indents and advance payments being limited to head offices and sub-offices within the tahsil stations or on the railway or mail cart lines. The trial proved highly satisfactory. The system “has been largely used by traders in preference to the system of payments into treasuries, has created a class of small dealers dealing direct with the salt sources, stimulated greatly the through-traffic sales, and has also been effective in breaking up combinations of middlemen at the salt sources, and in keeping down the price of salt in places where it would have otherwise risen.” It has therefore been permanently sanctioned not only for the salt sources to which it tentatively applied, but also for that of Kharaghora. To avoid the risk of large payments at sub-post offices, post offices where, owing to the proximity of a treasury or sub-treasury, the public already possesses facilities for payment are not to receive payments for salt. For this convenience the Post office is authorized to charge eight annas per cent. of the money paid in.

UNDER the head of “News and Gleanings” in the Tribune of July 13, we read :—

This translation business seems like the attainments of the prodigies in a dozen or two dozen languages, which provoked the famous retort from Wordsworth. We think it a mistake to render such a book as Mrs. Stowe's in an Asiatic tongue. There has been these ten years or so at least a Bengali story called Tom Kikar Kutir. But we have not heard a single man having read it. Perhaps it is well that nobody attempts it. Uncle Tom's Cabin is a great book which nobody can forget who has once read it. Its effect was unparalleled. It was the cause of the War in the United States and finally of the abolition of Slavery. The number of Bengalis who can understand it thoroughly must be extremely limited. Our translators do not come from the select few. After all, no translation could preserve the humour or the local colouring. Some day we may hear of an enterprising spirit “doing” the Biglow Papers in Bengali or Tamil !

ONE of the principal objects of Mr. Risley's Bill to amend the Bengal Municipal Act III of 1884, is to remedy the difficulty raised by a Divisional Bench of the High Court, which, in the words of the Statement of Objects and Reasons, “held that a notification of the Government of Bengal of the 18th March 1882, extending Part VII, Chapter II of the Bengal Municipal Act, V of 1876, to the Municipality of Kushtia, was not a ‘notification’ within the meaning of section 2 of the Bengal Municipal Act III of 1884, but an ‘order’; and that, as that section contains no provision saving all orders made under the former Act, none of the provisions of Part VI of the present Act, corresponding to Part VII, Chapter II of the old Act, were in force in Kushtia or in any other municipality to which they had not been extended by the present Act.” The remedy still open was a cumbrous process and the Bengal Government decided to rectify the defect pointed out by the High Court by fresh legislation as the easier course. Accordingly, it is proposed in section 2 of the Bill that “The expression ‘notification’ as used in this section shall be deemed to include and to have always included all directions, declarations and orders given or made and published, under any enactment referred to in this section.”

The Bengal Government is all respectful to the High Court and has not the slightest intention of acting against its judgment. So a proviso is introduced to protect it, thus :—

“Provided that nothing in this definition shall be deemed to affect any decision or order of a competent court made before the date on which this Act shall come into force.”

What then is the necessity of section 2? If the decision of the High Court is to prevail, the section is contradictory. It enjoins prohibition and acquiescence in the same breath. While it nullifies the judgment of the High Court, it means to retain it in tact. If the judgment is to be in force, the section cannot apply. Or, will it apply to municipalities other than Kushtia?

SIR Charles Elliott is the head of a far from happy household. The Bengal Secretariat is divided within itself. The two Secretaries in the Local Legislative Council are opposed to one another. Each finds or thinks the other's Bill revolutionary and unfit to be passed in its present form. Mr. Risley has already openly recorded his dissent to Mr. Cotton's Chaudidari Bill and has given notice of a series of amendments. It is no secret that Mr. Cotton sees danger in Mr. Risley's Bill. He has found his organ in a native weekly, which has opposed the Municipal Bill with a pen of vigour foreign to our contemporary. For the safety of the measure, the Chief Secretary has been kept out of the Select Committee on the Municipal Bill.

THE Governor-General in Council has exempted Raja Hari Raj Singh, of Kashipur, Tarai, in the Naini Tal District, N.-W.P., from the operation of all prohibitions and directions contained in sections 13, 14, 15, and 16 of the Indian Arms Act, XI of 1878, other than those referring to cannon, articles designed for torpedo service, war rockets, and machinery for the manufacture of arms and ammunition. It is left to the Local Government to decide the number of armed retainers to be allowed. Raja Hari Raj Singh is the worthy son and successor of the late lamented Raja Sheoraj Singh, C.I.E., who, as an Additional Member of the Viceroy's Council for making Laws in Lord Lawrence's administration, did excellent service. A fine specimen of the old Rajput Chieftain, he was a favorite with European and native. He was one of the few upcountry additional members of the Legislative Council who became popular in Calcutta society. The Rajas of Kashipur have a sadly interesting history. They are the representatives of the illustrious Royal House of Kumaon, which reigned for nearly seven hundred years before the Goorkhas, in collusion with the Brahman minister of the Raj, came into easy possession of the kingdom.

WE see the Brahman sellers of “sweets” in Madura have combined, on pain of a fine of five rupees, and fixed the rate for the different kinds of their articles at ten annas a seer. Hitherto the prices varied. Sweets at Ans. 5 per lb. ! This is ridiculously high for even a monopoly price. We suspect it is sweetmeats or pastry that is meant. We hope the “sweets” now offered will be palatable and wholesome. We wonder what they are made of. Are they all cocoanut and sugar? or meal cakes fried in cocoanut oil and dipped in syrup? Now that genuine butter and ghee have practically disappeared in Calcutta, why don't the Hindu pastry-cooks try if cocoanut oil will prove a good substitute? We are afraid the oil does not keep. Perhaps for puris and *mithkai*s for immediate household consumption it will make a passable frying vehicle. We merely guess, of course.

IN abruptly closing our notice of "M. B.'s" flippant letter in the Bengal Times, we were precluded from acknowledging the kindness of our contemporary himself. The poison of the correspondent's communication was neutralised by the footnote of the Editor. The latter has spoken of this journal and its conductor with generous appreciation. "Our old friend," says the Bengal Times speaking of us, "our old friend retains a good deal of his sparkling humour, and dry cutting wit." Again, "Reis and Rayyet is a fresh, crisp, incisive journal." This is all the more valuable from a writer who can make matters very stiff and hot if he lists. Indeed, we have a sufficiently good opinion of ourselves to care for the opinion of those who have no right to sit in judgment. What was the value of a certificate of drollery from Saturn? Happily, there is no such disqualification in the case of our contemporary.

IN a subsequent issue, the Bengal Times, after quoting our announcement of Mr. Dadabhai Naoroji's success in being at length elected to the House of Commons by Central Finsbury, remarks:—

"Central Finsbury electors have disgraced themselves, and by their attitude have shown that gold is a more powerful incentive than patriotism, or national sympathy. Old Daddyboy knows nothing of English feeling, in a national sense. He is unable to realise what our countrymen hold as sacred, and revere as heirlooms; he cannot identify himself with our history and our glorious traditions; he cannot identify himself with our people. How can he represent them? More. He belongs to a race of people, who cast out their dead from their midst to be devoured by birds of prey. And this is he who aspires to experience and defend English sentiment and to reciprocate English nationality! His heart has not a throb in unison with our inborn impulses, our warm hearted, insular pride of family and of greatness."

The Bengal Times has from the first taken an unaccountable grudge at this election. What is there in it to be surprised at or to take to heart? Our friend has not seen Mr. Naoroji. Had he done so, he would have been reconciled to him and his return. He regards this election as if it were the election of a pure Hottentot. Such a choice would have been an absurdity and worthy of the highest censure and ridicule. But this selection is not anything like it. It is virtually not different from the election of almost any English candidate. If Mr. Naoroji called at the Dacca Editor's under an English name, he would not only be received as an English visitor, but, from Mr. Naoroji's winning ways, probably also be asked to dinner, and the stranger would, we presume, not leave except as the friend of the Editor and his family. The Bengal Times may form some idea of what Mr. Naoroji is like from his portrait published in the current number of the Empress—the Calcutta illustrated journal. It is a speaking likeness. Of course the portrait being in ink does not pretend to give the complexion. But nobody should jump to the conclusion that the Parsee is a black man. He is perfectly fair and is undistinguishable from a Northern European. The accompanying biographical sketch shows him a worthy man. He has long been a man of mark even in England, chiefly among the knot of Anglo-Indian politicians. He has certainly been elected as an English politician, all the babblement of our home patriots notwithstanding. On principle and as a rule, a Hindu, Mussulman or Parsee representative of a British constituency is a contradiction in terms. It would be as absurd as an English President of an Indian Congress. It would be an anomaly like Mr. Hume.

ON June 13, in the House of Commons, Mr. Summers drew the attention of the Under-Secretary of State for India to a letter in the Pall Mall Gazette from Mr. W. S. Caine, stating that Mr. Oudh Behari Lal, of Allahabad, who had been nominated for a Government appointment in the N.-W. Provinces, was refused the appointment by the Chief of the department, because he had publicly advocated the views of the Indian National Congress, and was the Honorary Secretary of the Allahabad branch of the Anglo-Indian Temperance Association, and asked whether it was the intention of the Government of India to disqualify for Government service those Indians who identified themselves with the Congress and temperance movements. Mr. Curzon replied that the Secretary of State had no other information on the subject save what appeared in Mr. Caine's letter and that there was no such intention as attributed in the second paragraph of the question, so long as applicants for official employment, whether natives or Europeans, do not identify themselves with movements of the nature of those mentioned in a manner which would be inconsistent with the proper discharge of official duties.

The following letter from the Government of the N.-W. P. and Oudh to the Secretary of the Board of Revenue, supplies the necessary information on the subject:—

"I am directed to forward the accompanying copy of a letter received from Oudh Behari Lal, Superintendent, Kayestha Pathshala, Allahabad, in which he states that he was nominated a Probationary Deputy Collector by the Board of Revenue in April last, and that his nomination was not sanctioned by Government owing to his having been connected with the Congress and Temperance movements.

"I am to request that the Board will inform Oudh Behari Lal that His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor and Chief Commissioner selected from among candidates for Probationary Deputy Collectors those whom he considered best fitted for appointment, and that the nomination of Oudh Behari Lal was not rejected on account of his temporary connection with the National Congress or Temperance movements, of which His Honour was ignorant, and which is not in any way in question.

"I am to invite attention to the opening sentence in paragraph 2 of the letter from Oudh Behari Lal, and to say that His Honour considers it desirable that nominations for Probationary Deputy Collectors should, as far as possible, be kept from those concerned till the issue is known."

That clears the Government and its head. But it does not exonerate their subordinates. Oudh Bahari Lal was formally asked by the Board whether he had been a paid agent of the Congress and was an officer of the Temperance Association. Therein lies the sting. Surely that was not an irrelevant inquiry. It is fair to presume that the Board do not consider a man so connected as eligible for Government service. When, therefore, Oudh Behari Lal answered the inquiry in the affirmative, when he acknowledged his connection with the Congress and the Temperance cause, he naturally concluded himself as doomed, so far as his chances of service went. And when, finally, after such answer and admission he did not obtain the appointment, he could only conclude that he suffered for his connection.

THE new Law Courts in Madras have been completed and are ready for use. They will henceforth be one of the chief "lions" of the Southern metropolis. Situated on the Light House Esplanade, they cover about 1,00,000 square feet of ground. The cost of the buildings is given at Rs. 1,298,163. It took four years to complete them. The accommodation consists of 9 courts and about 250 rooms and corridors, with verandahs right round. There are 22 towers ranging from 100 to 175 feet.

The new buildings were, on the 12th, with some ceremony, opened by the Governor. At the main entrance, Lord Wenlock was received by the Chief Justice and the Judges of the High and Small Cause Courts and the Law officers. A procession being formed of them and others, a circuit was made of the courts, the National Anthem being played as the principal court was entered. On arrival at the dais, the Secretary to Government, P. W. D., Colonel J. Penny-cuik, offered the key—a massive silver one, a foot long—of the building to the Governor, who in his turn made it over to the Chief Justice. The Bishop of Madras then blessed the building, when, by command of the Governor and in his name, the Chief Secretary, Mr. J. F. Price, declared the building open. After a flourish of trumpets which followed, the Advocate-General asked the Chief Justice for an order to enter the proceedings on the records of the High Court, which was granted. The procession was re-formed and the National Anthem repeated. A salute of 17 guns closed, as it had commenced, the proceedings.

These ceremonies were sufficiently Orientalish. They had certainly none of the absurdity of some European forms still extant. The circuit-making reminds us of our own custom. The Staté Purohit's invoking the blessing of God, was the best part of the function. A banquet and gifts to Brahmans and to the poor invariably seal every Hindu ceremony. As a feed to Brahmans cannot be recommended to Europeans, they cannot have any objection to giving alms to the poor. To us, the Bishop's blessing, without some visible act of charity to God's creatures, smacks of hollowness.

The ceremonies with which the new Madras Law Courts were opened, raise a political question of some importance. The people of India may well complain of the loss of caste of the new courts. If they were not baptised, they received certain rites. Why was the religious part of the opening ceremonies Christian? Under what law was it? or is there any other warrant? The Anglican Establishment does not warrant it. Our sovereign is Christian and makes no secret of it, but she does not impose her faith on her people. The State in India has no religion or several religions. A Shastri and a Moollah ought to have been called to bless the new Temple of Justice according to their respective rites, besides the Christian ecclesiastic. Nor is the opportunity over yet, perhaps. It may be done any time before business commences in the new buildings. Our Hindu and Mussulman fellow-subjects down South would do well to make petition to Lord Wenlock and the Chief Justice to that effect.

The matter is not so trivial as those who have lost faith in the religions of their forefathers might imagine. It is a constitutional question, and in matters of constitutional right there are no degrees. Our patriots and publicists have no imagination, and they have no originality. They depend for the most part on the initiative of foreigners, without thinking out their own situation themselves. What a vast amount of money has been sunk—irretrievably sunk—in the Congress craze and other items of the brood of Hume crazes! Yet there are fifty ways of advancing the political status of the people without starrng it through the country or from land to land as political mountebanks. A battle on the issue suggested by us, fought with persistence, would be a distinct gain.

THIS time exactly three years, immediately before the Mohurram, the two eldest sons of Nawab Abdool Luteef Bahadur were married to the third and fourth daughters of the late Chowdhry Mahomed Rusheed Khan. The third son has just now led to the altar another daughter of the same Zemindar. Three brothers are now united to three sisters. We wish the new couple all joy and happiness of this auspicious union, and the Nawab long life to enjoy the reflex.

DOMESTIC OCCURRENCE.

MAHOMEDAN MARRIAGE IN HIGH LIFE.

At Natore, District of Rajshahi, at the Family Seat of the Khan Sahibs, on the night of Thursday, the 21st July, 1892, was married Moulvi Hafiz Abul Fatah Mahomed Abdool Hufeez, the third son of Nawab Abdool Luteef Bahadur, C.I.E., to the fifth or youngest daughter of the late Chowdhry Mahomed Rusheed Khan, Khan Bahadur, Zemindar.

AUTHORSHIP IN INDIA.

THE complaint is generally heard that our University does not claim, as the fruit of its protracted activity, a single great name in science or literature. It every year turns out legions of young men decked with sounding titles—some of them with any number of them. But among its alumni very few have yet been able to earn any distinction as an author or as a savant. The charge is well grounded to be sure. What is the reason? We cannot admit that the barrenness which characterises our University education is due to any natural defect in the intellectual capacity of our countrymen. The descendants of the great sages who have made themselves immortal by their achievements in the domain of literature and science, cannot be quite so devoid of originality as they are by many in these days supposed to be. The fact is that what the authorities sow, that they reap. There is no encouragement whatever to original authorship and original research. In dealing with the limits of the province of Government, Mill deprecates in the strongest manner possible the practice of neglecting the claims of scientific explorers and bestowing high rewards on the power of committing to memory what has been done by others. But in this country, almost the entire patronage at the disposal of Government is bestowed by the test of cramming, and no encouragement is given to really sound scholars and thinkers. In Europe, good authors generally derive a considerable income from their books, and are quite above soliciting Government patronage. In this country, the only books that command a large sale are school books, and no really good author has any chance of being patronised by the Education department unless he can, in vulgar parlance, curry favour with educational officers—Inspectors of Schools and so forth. In this state of things, the only wonder is that we have some among us who devote themselves entirely to the pursuit of letters.

Loud are the complaints which are made in the columns of the public press of Bengal regarding the selection of text books for the lower classes of our schools, English as well as vernacular. The feeling of dissatisfaction is intense among all interested in the working of the educational institutions of the country. The teacher who has to accept as his text the worthless compilations prescribed by the Educational authorities, the student who has to read them, and the guardian who has to pay for them, have all their grievances which every now and then find expression in some shape or other. But neither the Director of Public Instruction nor any ruler of Bengal has yet been able to check the abuse. On the contrary, it has been of late growing in dimensions to such an extent as to call for the application of some drastic remedy.

There is a standing Text-Book Committee under the Director of Public Instruction. But organized as it is, its function is only to approve or disapprove such books as are submitted to it. It has very little power for good; but as its decisions are final and as its members are not bound to give reasons for their decision, its capacity for mischief is very considerable. It may reject any good book with impunity, but has no power to give substantial encouragement to a deserving author. It may approve a book, but its approbation has commercially no value whatever.

The defects and abuses in the existing system of education are too numerous to be adequately described in a newspaper article. The method in which English is taught in the schools of this country, is specially open to exception. Almost all the primers used in initiating the native children of Bengal in the mysteries of the English tongue, are based on the plan of the Spelling Books used by English boys, who, before they enter any school, are well acquainted with almost all the words used in ordinary conversation; and have only to learn their spelling. The only rational way to begin the study of a foreign language, is to master at the outset its pronouns and the different grammatical forms of such verbs and nouns as are both simple and useful. But, instead of taking this course, our boys are made in the beginning to learn the spelling of some of the most difficult words in the English language, and also to study the construction of such sentences as "I am up," "He is up," &c., which they may not have occasion to use even once in their life. The subject may appear to some too trivial for serious notice. But to us it seems to be one of great importance. The question has been so well argued, in a correspondence which has come to our hands, by a gentleman of wellknown attainments in English, who is an eminent lawyer and Sanscritist into the bargain, that we feel no hesitation in drawing the attention of the authorities to the letters relating to a primer entitled "First Lessons in English," which we publish in another column.

The earliest European friends of native education recognized the obvious absurdity of teaching English to Indian youth from books after the pattern of the primers used in England, though they were ill-provided with means for avoiding the mistake. Strange that the mistake continues with authoritative sanction!

A SKETCH OF

THE HISTORY OF THE PRESS IN INDIA.

By DR. SAMBIHU C. MOOKERJEE.

History, with its usual neglect of the heroes of peace, has not left on record the names of the Pioneers of the Press in India. An occasional name is all that has been left by accident. These biographical notices of the Press, scanty as they are, are most interesting, showing the character of the journalism of those days and the status of the conductors. The names of some of the principal journalists of Aurungzebe's reign have been preserved. The Imperial Gazetteer (Wakanagar)—the Doyen of Journalists throughout the Empire—was Mirza Ali Beg. There were many places of profit without toil and trouble under the great Mogul, but the office of the intelligencer by appointment was not one of such. This officer was in constant attendance upon His Majesty, following the court like its shadow wherever it went. Ali Beg was with the Emperor through all his campaigns in the South, and doubtless reported them. But the records must have been destroyed, purposely by order of the Emperor. Aurungzebe had an insuperable prejudice against the preservation of the annals of his reign. Hearing that some one was writing the Emperor's history, he was alarmed and vexed and instantly ordered the luckless man of letters to proceed no farther. This was Khafi Khan, a hereditary historian, and hence many deride his name. If, notwithstanding imperial embargo, he has given the world the most reliable details of Aurungzebe's reign in chronological order, we owe it to his enthusiasm of letters which made him continue his narrative in secret. Aurungzebe had his frontier gazette too as well as his home journal. A Syed of Belgram, well-known in literature for his epistolary style, Abdul Jaleel, was the official intelligencer in Guzerat. His dignity may be understood from the fact that he was also Paymaster of the Forces in that important Province. Simultaneously appointed to these posts, he was at the same time raised to the peerage as a mansabdar, and granted a jagir to support his elevation. So sudden an accession of good fortune could not fail to excite jealousy against the lucky man and rage against his patron the Mirza. Complaints are never wanting, and those against the new Paymaster and Gazetteer of Guzerat were encouraged, if not fomented, at the Durbar. Nothing definite was made out against him, nevertheless, it was thought expedient for peace to remove him from Guzerat. No degradation was contemplated and no loss inflicted on the faithful public servant. Similar situations were provided for him in the same frontier to the North-West. He was appointed Bukshi and Sewanagier at Bukhir in Sind. Here too the tongue of malice followed him. The times were difficult. The great Alamgir Shah had long since gone to his rest. His successor too had passed away. The weak and easy Ferokhsheer was now on the throne. It was the era of uncertainty and hastening confusion. Juleel was recalled. But his good star had not yet deserted him. His explanation satisfied the Emperor or the Syed in power, or rather Raja Ratan Chand who as the Syad's trusty factotum ruled the Empire, and Juleel was restored to his offices and dignities and emoluments. But he was growing old and had no more inclination to go to his frontier station. The aspect of the times also warned him to stay at court to maintain his interests. So he prayed to be permitted to execute his office by proxy. This indulgence was allowed. So he remained at Delhi, occasionally visiting his home at Belgram. Latterly, in 1133 Hijri, he resigned in favour of his son. He did not long survive. He died in Delhi in 1138 Hijri. His remains were carried to Belgram to be buried.

The unsatisfactory character of early history is the universal complaint of these days when nothing is accepted on trust. The obvious reason for this unsatisfactory state of things is that that history refers to a period when men took no minutes of their doings, when the art of record was not established, when perhaps men had not learnt to write, or when some few only had learnt to write imperfectly. When, at a later stage, the accomplishment became more general and the practice of record had begun, people were unable as a rule to weigh evidence and judge properly and were too simple not to be impressed with the wildest story. Hence the fables of gods and demigods, giants and fairies, heroes, centaurs, devils, magicians and what not, which constitute the staple of the early history of every community. In fine, the early history of every people is all obscurity. And not of every people only, but also of every art or science, every invention or industry, every discovery, every movement or undertaking, every convenience or comfort, every contrivance, every occupation. In favour of a single department only is one inclined to harbour an exception. One would think or expect that at least the arts or agencies which have signally favoured the preservation of the memories of man in all his manifold activities and befallings would be exempt from the common lot—that at least the history of the Press, embracing Typography and the Newspaper—would be safe. Nothing of the sort! There is some excuse for vagueness and obscurity in the early history of nations, institutions or inventions, whose foundations lie in the far off ages computed by thousands of years. No such plea holds in the case of arts and inventions of historic times, and indeed not by any possibility more than three hundred years old. It is more than lamentable, it is a shame, that there is as much obscurity about the foundation of Printing and the Press as about the foundation of Rome.

Not that there has been any indifference to the subject, any absence of inquiry. There is, indeed, a commendable thirst for knowledge but without adequate result. Whatever may have been the matter in the past, in our times at least when the spirit of investigation is abroad, when the origin of everything is being sought and nothing is taken for granted, it would have been strange had the antiquities of that art and that agency which constitute the speciality of this flower of modern times been neglected. There is neither want of curiosity in the public nor absence of desire in the learned to satisfy it. Men in number are in the field hunting for the origin of the printing press and of the newspaper. But all to little purpose. We are no nearer certainty than ever. The literature of the subject is vast, but the conclusions are few, and even these few are conflicting.

It is scarcely credible that up to this day we have not decided the question who invented printing and where, when and how. The nations are still fighting over the claim to priority. Four towns in four different countries, Haarlem, Strassburg, Mentz and Venice—early set up their respective claims to have been the birth-place of the noble art. The last named, after a brief struggle, retired from the field, but the other three have not yet made up their differences. A whole library of controversial literature has been published on the Continent of Europe, consisting of books and tracts in Latin, in German, in Dutch, in French, in Italian, and not a few writings have appeared even in English in Great Britain. The tone of this literature is highly cantankerous and bitter, so that notwithstanding the industry expended on the research and the undoubted learning of many of the writers, the true issues have often been confused in the alacrity shown on all sides to seize a collateral advantage and inflict a literary defeat on a rival. The last great investigator was Dr. Van der Linde, a Dutch scholar and bibliographer of immense erudition. A lover of books, he collected a vast library, the extent of which may be estimated from the fact that the catalogue of a portion which was sold at Brussels in 1864 extended to nearly 400 pages octavo. From the midst of this store-house of knowledge, he sent forth books, mostly in German, in various departments of inquiry, from the orthography of the English language to Christian Theology, from the bibliography of Spinoza to the History and Literature of Chess. The origin of Printing could scarcely fail to attract the attention of such a mind. Indeed, it naturally suggested itself to him in the course of writing his Bibliography of Haarlem. He set to work with the patience of a Hollander as he was by birth and with the love of knowledge of a German Pandit as he was by association and sympathy. His labours were Herculean. He left no stone unturned. Even he has not been able to rescue the question from its vexed condition. Nevertheless, his contributions are of the highest negative value. In his elaborate Haarlem Legend he has torn to tatters the claim set up for Laurence Jans Coster of Haarlem as the inventor of printing and mercilessly exposed the extraordinary series of frauds of his own Dutch by which that claim has been supported. He then attacked the Gutenberg claim, but his work on this subject* is an inferior one, not up to his usual mark, as the English translator of his Haarlem Legend, Mr. J. H. Hessels, of Cambridge, promptly showed in the Printing Times and Lithographer. The latter then took up the subject himself and, after pursuing it with wonderful perseverance and industry, hunting all the libraries and archives of Europe and travelling hundreds of miles to verify the veriest trifle, has given the result in a 8vo. volume of nearly 230 closely printed pages. His monograph, Gutenberg: Was he the Inventor of Printing? is the latest contribution to the antiquities of the art. And it is worthy of the learning and research of our day. Unfortunately, for any positive conclusion, his book is Love's Labour Lost. His labours and ingenuity have gone for nought. His question—Was Gutenberg the inventor of Printing? he simply does not answer, any more than Dr. Van der Linde. "I regret", writes Mr. Hessels, "I regret that, after all my labour, I have not found anything which enables me to answer this question either with yes or no." Thus, both the Coster and Gutenberg legends are disposed of, and, except that many frauds have been detected and myths exploded, the main question remains where it was. These learned books of Dr. Van der Linde and Mr. Hessels fill one with despair. It seems that the possibility of identifying the father of the European art has passed away.

The same obscurity rests on the origin of newspapers. And, for one thing, from the same cause—fraud. The oldest existing English journal is the Stamford Mercury and it is not yet full two hundred years old, having been founded in 1695. The other journals of the highest pretensions to seniority all sprang in the eighteenth century. The most senior of them, the Nottingham Journal, was born in 1710, and the next in years, the Northampton Mercury, came into the world ten years later, in 1720. Surely English journalism is older than two centuries. There were "Mercuries" before the Stamford Mercury flourished. The founder of that weekly sheet of news was a contemporary of the Indian journalist Mirza Ali Beg. It is to be presumed there were journalists before them in both countries, just as there were kings before Agamemnon. The popular idea has long been that journalism sprang in the day of anxiety when the English people were expecting the approach of the Spanish Armada, in 1587, when sheets of news respecting the movements of the enemy and the preparations of Government to meet him were circulated with the full support of the court and cabinet to meet the general demand. These were flying sheets for the occasion. With the great English naval victory and the destruction of Philip's Fleet, though the immediate danger was passed, there remained enough reason for anxiety, and the demand for information which had been quickened continued, so that in the following year, 1588, a permanent arrangement for the supply of news was established in the shape of a sheet under the style of the English Mercurie "published by authorities for the prevention of false reports." This was the first British newspaper. This was the legend of the origin of English journalism. It was accepted as the final gospel when the antiquarian Chalmers gave it his authority. In proof of its truth, the curious were referred to the British Museum in which were deposited copies of the original English Mercuries. In India, as late as 1867, M. D. M. Traill, a gentleman who might be presumed to know, in a booklet published in this city, gave it currency. Many years before that, however, the legend had been exposed and exploded by one of the Pandits of the British Museum itself, Mr. Watts. He showed that the English Mercuries in deposit in that great store-house, some of which were in MS. and others in print, were unblushing impositions—mere forgeries in fact, of a much later date. I say "unblushing," because the trick is of the rudest, and it is a wonder that such an important history had been built on such an absurd foundation. The fact is, that the paper of these Mercuries bears the water mark of George I. So the origin of British journalism still remains a mystery. We do not yet know the date of the first newspaper in Great Britain.

Thus the history of the noble art of Printing in all its varied applications, has been mystified—confused and confounded at every step. And learned men have assisted at the frauds. What a reflection upon the vanity and pettiness of man, to say nothing of principle!

TEXT BOOKS.

From—Baboo Jogendra Nath Bhattacharya, M. A., D. L.

To—Sir Alfred Croft, M. A., K. C. I. E.,

Director of Public Instruction.

Dated Calcutta, the 21st December 1891.

SIR,—In accordance with your verbal orders I submit herewith a copy of a primer entitled "First Lessons in English." For facilitating comparison, I send with it also a copy of Messrs. MacMillan and Co's First Book of Reading which may be taken as typical of the primers now generally used in initiating the boys of this country in the study of English. A glance at Messrs. MacMillan and Co's First Book would show that it is compiled on the plan of the Spelling Books which are meant for English boys who before going to school are already well acquainted with the pronunciation, meaning and application of most of the words used in ordinary conversation and have only to learn their spelling. Like its prototypes the First Book of Reading contains in its Spelling Lessons some of the most difficult words in the English language without giving their meaning or their pronunciation. In the beginning the reader is taught to pronounce the letter combinations ba, be, ca, ce, ga, ge, &c., according to arbitrary direction given by Bengali transliteration, and the tendency to incorrect pronunciation which is thus caused is seldom shaken off completely even at an advanced age. In the Spelling Lessons, he is called upon to master such words as "dad, fad, fag, cyme, gyve, quaim, choir, chasm, phlegm, junk, joust" which can not be of any use to him except at an advanced stage of his educational career. He makes some efforts to master them. But he has to depend at each step on his teacher, and at last he is advised to omit them altogether; thus acquiring at the outset the habit of never aiming at being thorough.

The Spelling Lessons being omitted the Indian student practically begins his study of English with the Reading Lessons containing such expressions as "I am up," "He is up," "He is to go," &c., which may at first sight appear to be very simple, but the peculiarity of their grammatical construction renders it impossible for our teachers to make them intelligible to beginners.

The present system might have been justifiable, if it were of any importance for the boys of this country to learn at all the very outset such expressions as those quoted above. Their only recommendation is the simplicity of their wording. But after all the trouble taken to master them, of what use are they to the Indian student? He may not have any occasion to express the idea conveyed by "I am up" even once in his life. But it is of the greatest importance to him to learn such phrases and recognised modes of expression as are given in pages 67-72 of my primer. Such expressions are conspicuous by their absence in the text-books now used in the English schools of this country, the result being that even among the advanced students, those who are found very few who can give an appropriate reply when challenged by another person or questioned as to the state of his health. My own view is, that in the beginning, it is much easier to master words than to understand the construction of sentences. There is, in fact, no reason whatever, why the student should be in a hurry to represent one or two solitary ideas in English, before he has learned the simplest words in the language. After having acquired some idea of the pronunciation of the letters and of their various usual combinations, he should get by heart such words as are both simple and useful. Before proceeding further, he should learn at least the pronouns and the various forms of the auxiliary verbs, as they appear when conjugated with the pronouns. When a sufficient stock of words is acquired, then he may be taught to study the result of the combination in which they are found in the Reading Lessons.

It is on these principles that my primer has been compiled. It is divided into three parts as detailed below.

The first part deals with the letters of the alphabet and illustrates their pronunciation by actual words and not by arbitrary letter combinations like ba, be, ca, ce, &c.

The second part gives lists of words beginning with the pronouns and ending with the different forms which the verbs undergo in the past tense and perfect participle.

The third part commences with the conjugation of such verbs as be, have, do, go, &c. And, after giving a list of some of the important idiomatic phrases in the English language, concludes with a few reading lessons, giving useful information on various subjects.

To enable boys to remember the pronunciation of the words, I have, wherever possible, transliterated them in Bengali. This system may be taken exception to on the ground that it may, in some cases, lead to a little awkwardness in pronunciation. But to some extent transliterations are given in other primers also. I have only given in print what the boys note in their books--oftentimes very incorrectly--in writing. The Bengali transliterations will certainly help them to remember the different pronunciations of the same letters in such words as "get," "gem," &c. The system may lead to mispronunciation now and then. But it ought to be the look-out of the teacher to prevent that. The Bengali transliteration is not meant to enable boys to do without the help of the teacher, but to save his trouble to such extent as is possible.

In conclusion I beg to state for your information that my primer has been approved of and strongly recommended for the use of schools in this country by several eminent scholars including the Editors of the "Reis and Rayyet" and the "Statesman." A printed slip containing the opinion of the "Statesman" and "Hope" is sent herewith for your kind inspection. There is, no doubt, room for considerable improvement in details, and I need hardly say that if the general plan of my Primer be approved of by you, and if it be appointed as a text-book for the schools in Bengal, then I shall be glad to give effect to any suggestion that may be kindly made by you.

No. 1604.

From--Sir Alfred Croft, K. C. I. E.,

Director of Public Instruction, Bengal.

To--Babu Jogendra Nath Bhattacharya, M. A., D. L.

Calcutta 11th March 1892.

SIR,--In continuation of this office No. 44 dated the 6th January last, I have the honour to state that your "First Lessons in English" has not been recommended by the Central Text Book Committee for inclusion in the authorized list. While not disapproving of the principles on which the work is professedly drawn up, the Committee are of opinion that it fails in many of the transliterations as well as in the translation and selection of words and they are therefore unable to include it in the list in its present form.

From--Baboo Jogendra Nath Bhattacharya, M.A., D.L.

To--The Secretary to the Central Text Book Committee, Calcutta.

Calcutta, July 1892.

SIR,--From the Resolution recorded by the Text Book Committee regarding my "First Lessons in English," it appears that, while the principles on which it has been drawn up have been approved of, exception has been taken, in general terms, as to its transliterations and translations and also as to the selection of words given in it. With regard to the transliterations, I have the honour to observe that I have not adopted any of those standard systems which have been framed with reference to the requirements of the whole country. My book is meant only for the few districts of Bengal proper, and, in the transliterations which I have given, only such Bengali letters have been employed as, by their actual pronunciation in Bengal, are the nearest equivalents of the English letters and letter combinations whose sounds they are meant to represent. For instance, the 32nd letter of the Bengali alphabet is pronounced as S throughout the greater part of India. But in Bengal, it is pronounced as Sh and not as equivalent of S. I have therefore used the 7th letter as the equivalent of S.

As Bengali transliterations can never exactly represent the sounds of English words, it may be said that the method ought to be avoided altogether. But the native students, in every English school in this country, do, in fact, learn the pronunciation of English words by noting their Bengali transliterations in writing, just as Europeans usually learn the language of this country by transliterating vernacular words in English. As with all its defects the Sanskrit alphabet is a decidedly more perfect one than the English, the boys of this country might, it seems, use with advantage Bengali transliterations in order to learn the pronunciation of English words. The English spelling of English words generally gives no idea as to their pronunciation. But the Bengali transliterations, with all their defects, are calculated to give a better idea. Whatever difference of opinion there may be as to the utility of transliterations for advanced students, there can be no doubt that they are a necessity to beginners. As stated in my letter to the Director of Public Instruction dated the 21st December 1891, I have only given in print what the boys note in writing--oftentimes very incorrectly. So far as my experience goes, there are very few even among the advanced students in the English schools of this country, who can correctly pronounce even such simple words as sew, suite, slough, sugar, dairy, gaol, tear, forte, gig, gibe, gauze, divorce, err, elite, indict, naïve, ogre, ochre, onion, octroi, phlegm, tout, bauteur, douceur, souvenir, penchant, melée, patois, brochure, &c. To me it seems, that the pronunciation of such words can be learnt much better by Bengali transliterations, than by such general ideas as can be gathered by the boys from the lessons in ba, be, bo which they are now made to study in the beginning. There are, it is true, such words as regime, protégé, rouge &c., which can not be transliterated in Bengali. But that is no reason why transliteration should be eschewed altogether.

In my letter to the Director of Public Instruction, dated the 21st December 1891, I have explained in detail the considerations which led me to give the transliterations in my "First Lessons," and as the principles, on which it has been drawn up, have been approved by the Committee, I do not think, I need say anything more here in order to justify my plan.

As to my method of transliterating, I have already referred to the reasons for the departure, and, so far as I can see, it does not, generally speaking, seem to me possible to give more exact equivalents, consistently with the principles approved of by the Committee.

As to the translations, I submit that there is room for considerable difference of opinion. The difficulty of translating the idiomatic expressions of a foreign language lies in giving the exact equivalents of the component words, and at the same time making the translation idiomatic and intelligible. For instance, the idea conveyed by the expression "Hold your tongue" can, by no means, be expressed in Bengali by giving only the literal meanings of the component words. I have tried my best to make the translations intelligible, though it is quite possible that some of them may be slightly improved.

As to selection of words, I beg leave to observe that in order to illustrate the sounds of some of the letters and letter combinations, I have been obliged to use a few difficult words. But I have given their pronunciations and their meanings, and by mastering them, the memory of the students would not be taxed quite so unnecessarily, as it is now by their being called upon to learn merely spelling. In the first chapter of my book, which deals with the sounds of letters, some of the illustrations might have been omitted without any disadvantage. But in that case exception might have been taken on the ground of its being defective. The second chapter, which deals with words, begins with the Pronouns and ends with the different forms of such simple Verbs as, do, see, go, &c. I submit that verbs like these and the pronouns are not only the simplest words in the English language, but are the most useful for conversational purposes. The native students ought to know them by heart before attempting to express any idea in English. The present method of teaching them English is to accustom them to study the construction of sentences, before they have any idea of the grammatical changes which words undergo on account of their number, person, tense and case, and before they have any knowledge of even the simplest words. To me this method seems to be like calling upon a man to spend before he has been able to earn anything. I have avoided this method. There are a few points of detail as to which my book is susceptible of improvement. But the gentlemen outside the Committee, to whose criticism I submitted my book, have not been able to discover any such glaring error or defect in it as to preclude it from being selected as a text book, or to place it on a lower level than the books which, blindly following the method of the spelling books meant for English boys, give only long lists of difficult words which to a foreigner beginning to study English, are practically useless. I have shown that this method is not suited to the boys of this country who have to learn not only the spelling of English words but also their meaning, pronunciation and use; and as my views have been virtually accepted by the committee, I hope I may be excused for not being satisfied with their decision as to my book. I therefore hope, that you will be kind enough to move the Committee to reconsider their decision and, in case it be adverse, to let me know the particular instances of transliteration, translation and selection of words which they do not approve of.

THE ALLEGED LITERARY FRAUDS.

THE ACCUSED AT BOW-STREET.

SIR Gilbert Edward Campbell, of 8, Barnard's Inn; Charles Montague Clarke, of Glen Legan, Droma, Ireland; William James Morgan, of 38, Lynette-avenue, Clapham-common; David William Tolmie, accountant, of 84, Lady Margaret-road, Camden Town; and Edward Sherwin were charged at Bow-street on June 14th with conspiracy to defraud the Rev. Marcus Richards and others. Mr. C. F. Gill and Mr. A. Gill (instructed by Mr. Frayling of the Treasury) prosecuted; Mr. St. John Wontner defended Sir Gilbert Campbell; and Clarke was defended by Mr. Crawshaw. Mr. Eastwood appeared for Sherwin.

Mr. Gill, in opening the case, said that the prisoners had been connected with several societies which had been instituted for the express purpose of swindling the public. The Societies were called by a variety of names. Circulars and letters were sent all over the country describing the International Society of Science and Art as a society for the promotion and advancement of literature, science, and music, and the education and advantage of its members and fellows; the encouragement of students of all ages and both sexes in all branches of science, literature and art; the distribution of prizes; the selling or publication of manuscripts; introduction, by means of which artists could sell their painting at a high price, and the publication of a journal for the use of the members. The entrance fee was £2 2s.; the annual subscription £1 1s.; and members were entitled to write F. S. L. after their names. The objects set forth were excellent; but it would be shown that the intention of the prisoners was to obtain subscriptions and entrance fees from the public, and in return they gave absolutely nothing. The prospectuses contained a great many names, some of which had been placed there without the sanction of their owners. The executive of one of the societies included W. J. Morgan and D. Tolmie. Another of the prospectuses included the names of D. Tolmie and C. M. Clarke, who sometimes used one or two other Christian names. In some instances the prisoner Sir Gilbert Campbell was described as Sir G. Campbell. It was suggested that this was done to lead people to suppose Sir George Campbell was referred to. Some time ago proceedings were taken in the High Court to recover certain manuscripts from Morgan and a man named Tomkins, who was connected with some of the societies. This gave great publicity to the case, and the bogus societies with which some of the prisoners had been connected had been traced back to 1873. Premises were obtained by the prisoners by referring landlords to each other. They remained in the offices they thus obtained until they were ejected for the non-payment of rent, and then took another place. In the same way, as soon as the name of one society was worn out they started another. It was marvellous with what success and for what a long period the swindle had been carried on. The Charing-cross Publishing Company came into existence in July, 1873. It was started by the prisoner Morgan and a man named Tomkins, who was not yet in custody. When the Charing-cross Society died out its place was taken by the City of London Publishing Company (Limited), which was started by Morgan and Tomkins. The society proposed to assist authors by employing readers to go through their MSS. and report as to their value. The result might be imagined. The story, or poem, or whatever it might be, was always favourably reported upon, and, according to the reader had a great future before it. The society undertook to publish the work on receiving half the cost, and the delighted author willingly parted with his money. He never, however, saw his work in print, and repeated applications only resulted in repeated excuses, the printers generally being blamed for the delay. One of the bogus societies was the Authors' Alliance (Limited), of which Tomlie, Sir Gilbert Campbell, Clarke, and Morgan were the directors. Morgan was also secretary under the name of W. James. The Authors' Alliance took over the business of the City of London Company, which was very favourably reported upon in the prospectus by the directors. It was evident that whatever literary ability the prisoners possessed was devoted to framing prospectuses in such a way as to defraud the public. Morgan, who was the vendor of the City of London Company, actually guaranteed a minimum dividend of 8 per cent.; but of course it was never paid. Eventually premises at 59 and 60, Chancery-lane, were taken by some of the prisoners, who recommended each other. Then the Berners-street Gallery Company was started by Morgan and Tomkins. This was succeeded by the Literary and Artistic Union, of which Morgan was the manager. That had a very short existence, and gave way to the Artists' Alliance, which came into existence in November, 1889. This was a great success from prisoners' point of view, as money came in freely for some little time. The Artists' Alliance was at 9, John-street, Adelphi, and Sir Gilbert Campbell was connected with it. Sherwin was the secretary and signed the cheques. It would be proved that the affair was a fraud, and that the society only existed for the purpose of obtaining money for subscriptions and diplomas. The concern was carried on until the door was screwed up in Sherwin's absence, money being owing for rent. The International Society was started by Morgan and a man named Steadman. This enterprise was enquired into by Mr. Labouchere, of Truth, and a written agreement between Steadman and Morgan was put into his possession. According to this agreement, the two were to share the expenses and profits. They also shared any money obtained by either of them by appointing additional secretaries, who had to pay for their position. Inspector Richards, who had conducted the case with great ability, had discovered that during the twelvemonth this society was in existence Steadman and Richards received about £2,450.

Some evidence having been given in support of counsel's statement, the further hearing of the case was adjourned. Bail was refused for Morgan and Tolmie, Clarke and Sir Gilbert Campbell were admitted to bail in two sureties of £100 each, and Sherwin in two sureties of £50.

PARLIAMENTARY PRIVILEGE.

(London Law Times.)

Although privilege is correctly defined as the discretionary authority of each House of Parliament, and an authority which Coke lays down ought to be exercised "in that House to which it relates, and not elsewhere," it must be borne in mind that no new privilege can be created. In 1704 the Lords communicated a resolution to the Commons at a conference, "That neither House of Parliament have power by any vote or declaration to create to themselves new privileges not warranted by the known laws and customs of Parliament," which was assented to by the Commons. The power of the Lords to commit for contempt was questioned in the case of the Earl of Shaftesbury in 1675, and of Flower in 1779, but was admitted without hesitation by the Court of King's Bench. The power of commitment by the Commons is established upon the ground and evidence of immemorial usage. Any resistance to the Serjeant-at-Arms or his officers, or others acting in execution of the orders of either House, has always been treated as a contempt, and the parties in numerous instances have suffered punishment accordingly. If the warrant write that the person to be arrested has been guilty of a breach of privilege, the courts of law cannot inquire into the grounds of the judgment, but must leave him to suffer the punishment awarded by the High Court of Parliament by which he stands committed. The Habeas Corpus Act is binding upon all persons whatever who have prisoners in their custody, and it is therefore competent for judges to have before them persons committed by the Houses of Parliament for contempt. But although the return is made according to law, the person who stands committed for contempt cannot be admitted to trial, nor the causes of commitment inquired into by the courts of law. In 1751 Mr. Murray was committed to Newgate by the Commons for a contempt, and was brought up to the Court of King's Bench by a Habeas Corpus. The Court refused to admit him for trial, Mr. Justice Wright observing, "It need not appear to us what the contempt was, for we could not judge thereof. The House of Commons is superior to this Court in this particular. This Court cannot admit to trial a person committed for a contempt in any other court in Westminster Hall."

In several important particulars there is a difference in the methods of punishment adopted by the Lords and Commons in cases of breach of privilege. The Lords claim to be a court of record, and as such not only imprison but too impose fines. They also imprison for a fixed time, and order security to be given for good conduct, and their customary form of commitment is by attachment. The Commons, on the other hand, commit for no specified period—of late years have not imposed fines. The last case of fine by the Commons occurred in 1666, when a fine of £1,000 was imposed upon Thomas White who had absconded after he had been ordered into the custody of the Serjeants-at-Arms. No period of imprisonment is named by the Commons, and the prisoners committed by them, if not sooner discharged by the House, are immediately released from their confinement on a prorogation. When the offence has not been so grave as to cause the commitment of the offender, he is generally directed to be admonished only. This course was pursued in the recent case. What is said by the Speaker in reprimanding or admonishing persons at the Bar is always ordered to be entered on the journals. Formerly also persons who were censured for breach of privilege were compelled to receive the censure upon their knees. In both Houses, however, this practice has long been discontinued, although the entries in the Lords' journals still assume that the offenders are on their knees at the Bar. The ceremony is said to have been brought into some ridicule in 1751 by a culprit who, on rising from the floor, exclaimed in a tone that was audible to all, while ostentatiously dusting his dress, that this was in truth "the dirtiest house he had ever been in," and in the same year Murray on being ordered to kneel, informed the indignant House that he never knelt except to God alone. It was found impossible to make him yield, and he was imprisoned in Newgate for four months, and then released by a prorogation. A few printers appear to have been subsequently censured in the usual form, but in 1772 the practice of kneeling was abolished by a standing order of the House of Commons.

Holloway's Ointment and Pills.—For the cure of burns, scalds, wounds and ulcers, this justly celebrated Ointment stands unrivalled. Its balsamic virtues, immediately on application, lull the pain and smarting, protect the exposed nerves from the air, give to the vessels the vigour necessary to heal the sore, and confer on the blood a purity which permits it only to lay down healthy flesh in place of that destroyed. Holloway's Pills, simultaneously taken, must assist the Ointment's purifying and soothing power. Together these medicines act like a charm; no invalid, after a fair trial, has found them fail to relieve his pain, or completely cure his disease. The combined action of the Ointment and Pills, in all disorders, is too irresistible to be withstood.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

ETERNITY.

BY C. D. STEWART.

THOU rollest on, O! deep, unmeasured sea,
Thy length and depth a mystery profound;
Days, weeks, years, centuries, in immensity
Pass on, nor leave a footstep, nor a sound.
Thou lightest up thy smooth, unwrinkled brow,
Beyond the limit of our utmost thought;
A shoreless space—where Ages mutely bow
Like bubbles on thy bosom, and are not!
We hear a tramp of feet, we see a throng
Of generations flashing through the gloom;
They fade, and others rise, and far along
Thy caverns yawn, and Nature finds her tomb
In thee; but thou, nor young nor old, art evermore
One all-pervading space—a sea without a shore!

THERE'S LIGHT BEHIND THE CLOUD!

IN the lone and weary nights, my child,
When all around is drear;
When the moon is hidden by the clouds,
And grief and pain are near—

O, never think, my gentle boy,
In that gloomy, trying hour,
That thou art not protected still
By a kind Almighty Power!

Soon will those dark clouds roll away,
And the glorious stars appear;
And the pensive moon, with her calm, pale light,
Will shine in beauty clear.

There is an Eye above, my child,
That slumbers not nor sleeps:
There is a Friend in heaven, love,
Who still His vigil keeps.

And though in trouble's darkest hour
His face He seems to shroud,
Believe—remember—O, my child,
There's light behind the cloud!

THE AURORA BOREALIS.

OFF in the solemn night,
When Earth is veiled in darkness to the eye,
There comes a sudden and mysterious light
Within the azure sky!

'T is not the twilight beam,
Nor the pale radiance of the starry throng,
Nor Cynthia's pensive ray, nor meteor's gleam,
Shooting the heavens along:

But a strange, shifting glow,
Bright'ning and fading, like to flickering flame—
High o'er the North, white columns upwards go—
Then die—then soar again.

Light of the dreary North,
Fain would we know thy far and hidden springs,
And on what bidding thou dost issue forth
In ghostlike wanderings.

Art thou the icy smile
Of Arctic oceans, streaming in the sky?
Or light from some unknown, volcanic pile,
Uptwining, huge and high,

On a far northern shore,
With giant craters gaping to a sea,
Fiery and vast, that deep within Earth's core
Burneth unceasingly?

Or art thou near allied
To the bright spark that gilds the thunder-cloud?—
Yet moving voiceless through the heavens wide—
Piercing night's sable shroud?

Vain is each prying thought,
To find the source and nature of thy ray,
For thou art ever with deep mystery fraught,
We cannot cast away.

He, whose stupendous plan
Worketh unchanging through all space and time,
For unknown ends, thy fitful flames doth fan,
And laws for thee assign.

And He thy home hath cast
'Mid seas of ice, unchanged by Summer's ray—
'Mid frigid deserts, stretching far and vast,
Where life can never stay.

Yet doth thy nightly glow
Glad the far dwellers of the dreary North:
The Greenlander, amid the drifted snow,
Doth hail thy coming forth.

Thou cheerest Siberia's gloom,
Sweden's cold clime, and Norway's ice-girt shore;
And northern men their hardy toils resume
When thou dost brightly soar.

WEEKLYANA.

A FAMOUS duel was lately fought without arms in America between a Whiteman from Europe and a blackman of the United States. We refer to the contest between George Dixon, the coloured featherweight of Boston, and Fred. Johnson, the English champion, for the Featherweight Championship of the World and a purse of £1,000. This sporting event came off on June 27th, at the Coney Island Athletic Club in New York. Notwithstanding the high price of admission, the place was packed full to its utmost capacity. Dixon was the favourite. He forced the fighting from the first, but in the first round Johnson displayed much skill, and at the outset seemed to be gaining the upper hand. Dixon, however, maintained his ground. Thus it went on till the twelfth round, without any decisive result. Both were cautious in the extreme, and each succeeded in holding his own. The thirteenth round gave Dixon a decided advantage, the coloured champion landing some well-directed blows, which had a marked effect upon Johnson, who began to show signs of unsteadiness and some fatigue. The fate of the day was decided early in the fourteenth round. In a few moments Dixon discharged and hit Johnson a tremendous left-hander on the jaw, following it up with his right hand, which floored him, and Dixon himself falling on top of him, completed the business, for poor Johnson's head struck the floor, making him insensible.

WE read in the English papers :—

"One of the most sensational crimes ever perpetrated in a court of justice was witnessed in the Court of General Sessions, New York, on June 27th. Judge Martin was on the bench, and the court was crowded, when the case against a man named Clerger, accused of having assaulted a girl Sarah Devine, fifteen years old, was being heard. Clerger pleaded guilty, and was being conducted from the room by an officer, when the spectators were startled by the discharge of a pistol-shot. The prisoner dropped on the floor dead, shot through the heart, and at the same instant the prosecutrix, Sarah Devine, exclaimed, 'My God! it is my brother.' For a moment the judge and court officials were paralysed. The terrified spectators blocked the doorway, and the brother of the prosecutrix, John Devine, who had fired the revolver at the prisoner, was promptly placed under arrest."

It was a case of vulgar sensation. For the taking of the law into his own hands by Sarah's brother was perfectly gratuitous, the defendant having pleaded guilty. The shooting was a deed of mere savagery.

Two influential land-holders of the Pilibhit district were tried for murder of a young man who was supposed to have intrigued with a daughter of one them. The Sessions Judge of Bareilly has acquitted both of them. One of them has, however, been fined for delaying to report the death.

SYUD NURUL HUDA, Officiating Joint Magistrate and Deputy-Collector, Nawada, Gya, will officiate for 25 days for Mr. J. Tweedie, on leave, as District and Sessions Judge of Patna. Such appointments of natives has ceased by their number to draw special interest of the native community. The present appointment, however, shews that our Mahomedan brethren have made up their deficiencies and have established an equal footing with the Hindus. This is the second Mahomedan appointment of the kind in these Provinces. We are glad to see our Mahomedan fellow-subjects coming to the fore. Only for the sake of their community we wish the choice, for some time at least, to be made with intelligence and judgment.

IN the same gazette we find Babu Kedar Nath Roy from Sealdah is transferred to Birbhum to officiate as District and Sessions Judge for Mr. J. Whitmore.

THE Madras Standard gives a full dose of its WHIP to the Judge of Coimbatore who sat upon Dewan Bahadoor Subramanier Iyer, when the latter, in his capacity of Government Pleader, lately appeared before him to prosecute an interesting but difficult case of murder from superstition among the Todas. The article is a trifle long, and it is spoiled by misprints, but it is a favorable specimen of banter of the Indian press. The proceedings of a District Judge of such pronounced self-consciousness are appropriately headed "His Honor." And throughout the phrase is repeated and reiterated at every step.

SURGEON-MAJOR-GENERAL W. R. Rice goes on leave for three months from the 8th August next, Surgeon-Colonel J. Richardson, Inspector General of Civil Hospitals, N.-W. P. and Oudh, acting during the period the Surgeon General and Sanitary Commissioner with the Government of India.

THE Wild Birds Protection Act (XX of 1887) has been extended to the territories for the time being administered by the Agent to the Governor-General in Baluchistan as such Agent.

THE Governor General in Council has exempted from custom duties all arms, ammunition, and military stores imported into British India, with the sanction of the Government of India, for the use of any portion of the military forces of a Native State in India which may be maintained and organised for Imperial service.

IN Queensland, they still lock up the jurymen. The Chief Justice Lilley denounces the practice as an arbitrary invasion of the rights of free citizens and scornfully wonders why the Judges are not equally treated. The privilege of Jury trial is not without its disadvantages.

A SOUTH American Court at Guayaquil, unable to fix the relative guilt of two prisoners, Francisco Briones and Victor Hiquera, passed the following sentence :—

"They shall draw lots, and the one favoured by chance shall not be executed, and shall have his sentence commuted to that of imprisonment for life, which sentence he shall serve in the prison of the capital of the Republic after being present at the execution of the other murderer."

There is honesty in that, at any rate. Unfortunately, that is not the only instance proving that justice in the law courts is oftentimes a game of chance.

IN the Manchester County Court, in a suit for recovery of money lent, the Judge found that the borrower had agreed to pay interest on arrears of instalments at the rate of one half-penny per shilling per week, which amounted to more than two hundred per cent. per annum. There was a decree for the principal with interest at five per cent. per annum from the dates of the several defaults, which the Judge considered full justice.

MR. Vanderbilt went one day to Meissonier and asked him which of his works was, in his own opinion, his chef-d'œuvre. Meissonier answered, "The Chess-Players." Whom does it belong to? was Mr. Vanderbilt's next question. To Herr Meyer, of Dresden, was the answer. That very night Mr. Vanderbilt despatched a secretary to Dresden, who went straight to Herr Meyer and demanded to know his price. "£10,000," replied the owner, thinking that he had effectually frightened his interrogator. "I take it," said the secretary, to the great astonishment of Herr Meyer, and take it he did.

THE Government of Bengal has promptly published the proceedings of the Belvedere Conference of the 18th July. The following resolution embodying the decisions arrived at, is published in the week's Calcutta Gazette with the proceedings of that day and the papers circulated beforehand :—

"In considering the various schemes which have been brought forward from time to time for the purpose of providing the town of Howrah and the small municipal towns on the west bank of the river between Howrah and Hooghly with a supply of filtered water, the Lieutenant-Governor was led to the opinion that the existing municipal law did not make adequate provision for inducing municipalities to undertake schemes of water-supply or drainage, or to combine their resources for the purpose of undertaking such schemes. Tentative proposals were therefore drawn up with this object, and were circulated to selected officers and non-official Chairmen of Municipalities. On receipt of their opinions, a number of gentlemen who were qualified by their experience to advise the Lieutenant-Governor on these difficult questions were asked to meet His Honour at a Conference at Belvedere on the 18th July. The reports and papers bearing on the subject were circulated to them beforehand for consideration. The Conference agreed in adopting the following Resolutions, one member dissenting from the first three, but concurring in the fourth :—

- I. That it is expedient, in the opinion of this Conference, that the Local Government should be empowered, if the existing law does not already empower it, to require municipalities to apply under section 221 for the extension of the provisions of Parts VI and VII of the Municipal Act (i.e. to provide for projects of drainage and water-supply).
- II. That it is expedient, in the opinion of this Conference, that the Local Government should be empowered to require municipalities to combine with one another, and with District or Local Boards and Cantonment authorities, for the purpose of improving the water-supply of the area subject to their jurisdiction.

III. That it is expedient, in the opinion of this Conference, that the Local Government should be empowered to require municipalities to combine with one another, and with District or Local Boards and Cantonment authorities, for the purpose of improving the drainage of the area subject to their jurisdiction.

IV. That when an application is made to Government on the part of the inhabitants of any tract where malarial fever prevails, or when it is notorious that there is a high rate of mortality due to the want of drainage, provision shall be made by law for ascertaining the wishes of the majority of the inhabitants or owners of property concerned, as represented by the District Board, and if the majority support the scheme, the Government shall be empowered to carry out comprehensive schemes of drainage, and to raise from the area affected such funds as may be necessary for meeting the cost of such schemes.

2. Steps will now be taken to add to the Municipal Bill pending before the Legislative Council provisions giving effect to the first three resolutions. Application will also be made to the Government of India for permission to introduce into Council a Bill embodying the principle affirmed in the fourth resolution."

There were present at the Conference, the Lieutenant-Governor, the Hon'ble the Secretary H. H. Risley in charge of the Municipal Bill, the Hon'ble Dr. Mahendralal Sircar, Mr. D. R. Lyall, of the Board of Revenue, the Joint Irrigation Secretary Mr. C. W. Olding, the Sanitary Commissioner Surgeon-Lieutenant-Colonel W. H. Gregg, Prince Khoorshed Kader Syud Iskandar Ali Mirza Bahadar, Chairman of the Lalbagh Municipality, Raja Pearymohun Mookerjee, of Uttarpara, Rai Bahadar Eshan Chunder Mitter, Chairman, Hooghly and Chinsurah Municipality, Rai Bahadar Nalinaksha Basu, Chairman, Burdwan Municipality, Rai Bahadar Shib Chunder Banerjee, Chairman Bhagalpur Municipality, Babu Surendranath Banerjee, Rai Bahadar Gopal Chunder Mookerjee, Chairman, Cossipur-Chitpur Municipality, and Khan Bahadar Fuzl Imam, Vice-Chairman, Patna Municipality.

The dissenting member was Raja Pearymohun Mookerjee, and he proved a host.

IN the course of its leader of Thursday, the Englishman writes:—

"The electors of Finsbury claim the proud privilege of presenting a Parsee to the High Court of Parliament, and thereby give innocent pleasure to, for instance, other good people in Madras."

Do the Parsees hail from Madras? So much for the well-regulated household of a "leading journal"!

OUR OWN NEWS.

THE order of the Garter has been bestowed on the Duke of Devonshire (Lord Hartington) and the Duke of Abercorn.

The Commander-in-Chief of Cashmere, Raja Ram Singh, has been made a C. B.

THE disaster at Sangir is not wholesale. Not the entire island, but only the north-west portion has been destroyed. The mortality is confined to 2,000 inhabitants and not 12,000. No European has been killed.

LORD Sherbrooke is dead.

THE petition against Dadabhai Naoroji's election has been lodged. The Conservative leaders in Central Finsbury think that they have come upon sufficient evidence to outvote the Indian and to return their own Captain Penton.

THERE have been during the week vague rumours in the Bazar of immediate war in Afghanistan involving both Russia and England. It was all, we suspect, the reflection on the native mind of European conversation.

IN point of fact, the tension of the relations between our Government and the Amir has a trifle abated. The Government of India had adressed another remonstrance to the ruler of Cabul against his proceedings against Bajour, to which His Highness has replied with moderation. He of course still accuses Omra Khan as the cause of the mischief. Nevertheless, he will abstain from attack till provoked. As regards the settlement of the frontier about Asmar, he is understood to show some disposition to discuss the subject with our Government. This may well be considered an improvement on the previous spirit of sullenness.

THE Hazara revolt in Afghanistan seems to be a serious affair. News has been received at Simla from Cabul to the effect that, besides the regular troops, the Amir has seventy thousand tribal levies from the Cabul, Candahar, and Ghazni districts employed to suppress the Hazara revolt. An incredible statement! The Achakzai and Murzai tribes, who refused to furnish levies to the Governor of Candahar unless commanded on service by their own chiefs, are said to be emigrating to British territory for fear of the Amir's vengeance. The reason of their refusal to supply levies was that the Candahar troops had lost heavily in the previous fighting owing to bad generalship.

It is said that the Afghan general had seized a number of inoffensive people near Orusghan and sent them in chains to Cabul in proof of the suppression of the revolt.

THE Amir has put to death two Shia mullahs of Candahar on suspicion of endeavouring to excite revolt of the Shia Hazaras. This severity has aroused angry feeling among the Kazilbashs of Cabul and Candahar, who are all Shias. It was very inopportune at the particular time of the year, close upon the Moharam when the religious frenzy of the Kazilbashs will be roused against all the oppressors of the Imams and their followers to the latest generations.

THE Bombaywallahs are determined to make the most of the Chicago Exhibition as an opportunity for putting money in their purse. They are organising an expedition of the Barnum kind by which they expect to clear over half a lac of Rupees after paying all expenses. They propose to open a restaurant with Hindu servants—in their picturesque costume—and Native music, which is sure to attract. Here they hope to sell a million cups of Indian tea at 10 cents each, netting a lac of Rupees. They do not take into consideration the contingency of opposition from India itself. The Bengal Tea Planters have decided to open a Pavilion where they will probably offer tea free to all comers. They may dish Ducks in their own gravy by sending over a khansama service dressed in grotesque finery and a band of dhaks and *dhol*s to keep the black waiters in countenance.

THE Indian Planter's Gazette is a business organ rather than a political journal, but that very circumstance gives it an advantage in the treatment of politics, when it comes to treat them. That treatment, alike for manner and matter, is usually free from conventionality. The J. P. G. generally pursues a line of its own. No journal has exposed the inconsistency and absurdity of the Government of India's decision in the case of Judge Wheeler with such downright bluntness or with more plain vigour. The Judge of Jounpore was accused by the High Court of not having written his judgment in the case of Devi Persad, as he pretended to have done. The Commission appointed by the Local Government to enquire came to the conclusion that he did not write and deliver his judgment. The Local Government accepted that conclusion. But the Government of India, when the matter came before it, thought differently. The Governor-General in Council held that the charge of not writing the judgment was not proven. Mr. Wheeler's conduct with regard to the decree of the Bank of Upper India was, however, held to be "censurable." That surely could not be ground for sacrificing an old servant of the state. Nevertheless, the Supreme Authorities

"proceeded to notify to Mr. Wheeler that he is to be compulsorily retired. On what grounds? Because there was some evidence on the record before the Government, that he, Mr. Wheeler, had been guilty of carelessness in doing his work as a District Judge. Can any reasonable man say that this was a just way of dealing with Mr. Wheeler? There was not a single charge made against him before the Special Commission that he had been careless in his work. He naturally made no attempt to give any evidence as to his work as a District Judge. There was no notice given to Mr. Wheeler by the Government of its desire to deal with the question, whether he had been careless or otherwise in his work. No explanations were asked and, without being called upon to defend himself, the Government find him guilty and force him to retire."

No doubt, power is blinding. Still it were strange if such obvious considerations did not suggest themselves to the conclave of supreme authority! Our idea is that the Government of India blundered with open eyes in order to bring the Civilian safe through, without outraging justice. The bureaucrats at Simla had a most difficult problem.

THE people of this Presidency are by no means over-informed about the more distant parts of the Empire and rather disposed to despise and ignore them. That attitude is neither just nor politic. More knowledge would lead to better appreciation and mutual cordiality and united strength. Few in Bengal and Hindostan are aware that the far South has a respectable and strong country press. We have lately made the acquaintance of some of its members and they would do credit to any place. We may instance the Western Star, a weekly published at Cochin, which is marked Vol. XXVIII. Who would in these latitudes have thought that Cochin has had an English newspaper all these twenty-eight years!

By way of an example of the ability and worth of the Southern press, we would notice a discussion that our Malabar coast contemporary has lately had with a wellknown Coromandel coast contemporary. The Hindu had justly been exposing with its usual adroitness the Government training of Native Princelings. Said the Madras journal:

"Your anglicised Prince is certainly a thing of beauty, but scarcely a joy even for a second to his sorrowing subjects. Billiards, badminton and tennis, golf, polo, and cricket, piano, balls and banquets, monopolize his entire time and he can not even spare a moment to cast even a sidelong look at the affairs of his State."

That is a real complaint smartly put. Of course, it is not the whole truth, and the Western Star holds up the other side of the shield. He asks—

"whether the Native Prince is a thing of beauty and a joy for ever, even though favourites, flatterers and dancing girls, nautches, nadagams, and tambourines minister to his pleasures and, monopolize his time, and whether pan supari, processions, and private debauchery have ever turned out statesmen or strong administrators? Better by far, the hour spent in healthy exercise like polo and cricket than in the enervating and demoralizing atmosphere of the Zenana, and better the European ball room than the questionable surroundings and vulgar witticisms and absurdities of the Indian stage. Of all the unfortunates under the sun the conservative Hindu Raja or Maharaja is the most miserable! Man was not meant to live alone, and yet isolation is the fate of the conservative Hindu Maharaja. Equal he has none in his Court, and without equality there can be no companionship, no interchange of ideas, no exchange of sympathy, no confidence, no love. It is what Carlyle would call, 'a very nightmare of existence,' and is it any wonder that cut off by oriental etiquette from all true friendship, a fruit which only ripens under the sun of perfect equality and a mutual independence that, the average Hindu Prince sooner or later learns to lean upon and be guided by the good or evil counsels of some well meaning, or designing, but strong nature, who has his sovereign's will under his control and makes or mars the ruler of the State. We are not exaggerating when we say that nine times out of ten, this human instinct for sympathy and fellowship, which the Hindu Prince is altogether deprived of, and which, unless he is possessed of a very strong individuality he is unable to battle with, compels him to seek in privacy and concealment, companions and pleasures utterly incompatible with his position and entirely inimical to all physical, mental and moral development. On the other hand, a liberal Western education, combined with travel to great centres of civilization like Paris and London widens a Hindu Prince's horizon of life, modifies his conservative views of the equality of men and things, knocks off his angularities, gives him a liberal education and as Dr. Wendell Holmes would say 'depolarizes' his ideas. He comes back to India a new man and, is inclined to treat his officers and advisers on a plane of equality, and on a footing of respect, born of the conviction of his own shortcomings in many directions."

That is powerfully presented. Although our sympathy is all on the other side, yet we cannot help acknowledging the general accuracy of the contrast exhibited in such vivid colours. After making all admissions, however, the truth remains that Anglicism in the palace of a native court is a profound mistake. Could it make the Princes themselves good and happy it were something, but that was impossible. The scorn of native and European alike, they have neither self-respect nor happiness. And there is a sufficient reason for this: They are not truly anglicised. It is only a disappointing veneer only that is put on them. They are simply denationalized without being Europeanised. Hence they only repel and do harm without drawing and doing good.

AFTER disposing of their sporting journal to the great Annexander (Mr. Abbott), Captain and Mrs. Hayes have gone to South Africa. They are still sporting as well as literary. We are glad that their connection with the Indian Planter's Gazette has not been determined. In a late issue of our contemporary is a letter from Mrs. Hayes dated Pretoria, May 10. That is a land of painful recent memories.

"I visited yesterday the place where they buried the British flag with Military honours and erected a mock monument to its memory. Some Englishman, however, managed to remove and hurl into oblivion the degrading stone, so a mound is all that is left to mark the place where our flag of which we sing 'has braved for a thousand years the battle and the breeze' lies buried."

Of course one must not look a lady's grammar in the face. Otherwise, the account is interesting.

The Boers are no better than Bengalis.

"The Boers here we found to be a conceited, boastful set of men who were particularly amused on seeing our advertisement to the effect that we would give a public 'show of horse breaking and riding in the Berea Park. Admission 2/6.'"

Ought the Boers to have taken the matter seriously? Notwithstanding their impertinent hilarity, however,

"Over a thousand of them mustered to our show including the great General Joubert in a uniform and queer hat resembling a member of 'the ancient order of Foresters.'"

The fair writer was evidently charmed with the General. The old gentleman must be a handsome person. A description is nothing if not critical, so she would recommend him a hair-dresser—that's all. And no great matter that. It is a thing of individual fancy—perhaps the veriest caprice of fashion, when our literary lady says—"General Joubert would not be at all bad looking, if some one would cut his hair which hangs down to his shoulders, and trim his beard up a bit." How the beaux and belles of Lucknow would be amused at the queer taste of the Nazarene Peri!—that is, supposing the old ideals still to reign among the natives at the Paris of India. When we resided there after the Mutinies, our singing master, a tall Mussulman of seventy who was innocence itself, cherished curls floating down below his chest, which unrolled would touch his thigh. We can never forget the pride he took in them, or the affectionate care with which he would lubricate them with perfumed oil. Doubtless the old Daiji, as he invariably designated his wife, who was a midwife by profession, was not a whit less proud of those hirsute streams. Possibly he won her in the olden days more with his hair than his nightingale voice. Samson was not the only man whose strength lay in his hair.

The Hayes party had nearly got into a scrape with the Boers. The mob attempting to "rush" the gate of the entertainment enclosure, a look and a word from the old General converted the rowdies into good boys.

Our lady did not charm the President.

"I could not leave Pretoria without calling on President Kruger, so got a friend who spoke Dutch to escort me to his presence. This old man is quite uneducated and a typical Dutchman. He condescends to receive visitors in his verandah at 5 o'clock in the morning when he takes his early coffee. He understands English but will not allow it to be spoken, and is very angry with any English visitors who do not take their own interpreter with them. On such occasions the sum and substance of the interview consists in enquiring of one of his servants if the Englishman has brought an interpreter, and in summarily dismissing the visitor with a warning not to appear again without one. Our interview was not more satisfactory; for after nodding to me the old man asked my friend in Dutch if I understood that language, and on hearing that I did not, took no more notice of me; but began talking and laughing with an enormous old woman in a dirty dressing gown, who I was told was his wife. I felt uncomfortable, as they seemed to be criticising my clothes, so made my exit as soon as I could. Neither of them asked me to sit down, and take a cup of coffee or shewed themselves at all friendly disposed towards me."

The illiterate brute!

WE publish elsewhere the Indian Councils Act, 1892, being 55 and 56 Victoria, Chapter 14, an Act to amend the Indian Councils Act, 1861. The new law empowers the Governor-General to nominate not less than ten nor more than sixteen, being an increase of not less than four, additional members for his Council for making laws and regulations only. In the same way the Governors of Madras and Bombay are enabled to raise the number of members of their respective Councils, besides the Advocate General, from not less than four or more than eight to not less than eight nor more than twenty, the highest limit of the law of 1861 being made the lowest, and the highest being raised by double and half. The law of 1861 does not originally apply to Bengal or the North-Western Provinces. But it is left to the Governor-General in Council, by proclamation, with the sanction of the Secretary of State for India, to extend the provisions relating to the legislative Councils of Fort Saint George and Bombay to Bengal, the North-Western Provinces and the Punjab. The Punjab has not yet a Council of her own. The new law raises the number of members for Bengal to twenty and for the N.-W. P. to fifteen. The number of members for the Lieutenant-Governors' Councils is limited by the old law to the number in the proclamation of the Governor-General, one-third of which must be non-official members. This proportion of non-official members seems to have been made away with in the new law, for, according to it, any person resident in India may be so appointed. A new provision is, however, added enabling the Governor-General in Council, with the approval of the Secretary of State in Council, to "make regulations as to the conditions under which such nominations, or any of them, shall be made by the Governor-General, Governors, and Lieutenant Governors respectively, and prescribe the manner in which such regulations shall be carried into effect." Thus the Governor-General and the Secretary of State are to determine as to who shall in future be the additional members and members of the several councils and how. It is a provision which is capable of indefinite expansion. It is competent to these two authorities, independent of Parliament, to grant any reasonable expectation of the natives of this country so far as regards the legislative councils in this continent, including election. A greater concession is the right of interpellation and of discussion of the Annual Financial Statement, though without the power of proposing any resolution or dividing the council on any such financial discussion or answer to any question. It is no wonder that such a trial should be hedged in by stringent rules which must be sanctioned by the Secretary of State or the Governor-General. 24 and 25 Vict., c. 67, s. 22; 3 and 4 Will. IV, c. 85, and 16 and 17 Vict., c. 95 restricted the Governor-General in Council to making laws for the territories then under the dominion of Her or His Majesty. The question arose whether the existing laws could apply to after acquisitions. One of the High Courts decided that new territories were included. The amending Act confirms that decision. It is now declared that the existing statutes equally cover new territories. We hope this is merely a correction of an omission and not an indication of the revival of a policy of annexation and acquisition.

In case of vacancy by death, acceptance of office or resignation of an additional member, the Governor-General or the Governors had power to fill it by another nomination without diminishing the proportion of non-official members. Those powers are now recalled, and new provisions made. Hereafter, in the absence from India for two months consecutively or inability to attend for the same period, a membership shall cease and the seat declared vacant. For the vacancy thus or otherwise created, a new nomination will be made, preserving the full complement of non-official members. A local legislature is left free, with the previous sanction of the Governor-General, to "repeal or amend as to that province any law or regulation made either before or after the passing of this Act by any authority in India other than that local legislature." Finally, notwithstanding these provisions, the Governor-General in Council at meetings for the purpose of making laws and regulations remains supreme.

THE Indian Daily News, in its leading columns of the 27th July, writes:—

"The services of Pundit Ramnath Tarkaratna, as a travelling Pundit under the Asiatic Society of Bengal for exploring the mass of unprinted Sanscrit literature that is still available in the country, have been dispensed with on the ground of 'neglect of duty.' It was only in January last, that the late President of the Society, Sir Alfred Croft, showed his appreciation of these services by granting the Pundit an increase of Rs. 10 to his monthly pay. It is understood that the Pundit has been made the victim of misrepresentation. The Council of the Society would have acted more worthily of itself by informing the Pundit of the charges against him, and by waiting for his explanation before taking such a decided step. This was due in common fairness to a servant of twenty years, who, it is believed, has explored more than 4,000 manuscripts, many of which have justly been regarded as invaluable treasures by oriental scholars all over the world, and who assisted the late Dr. Rajendralala Mitra in cataloguing about an equal number of manuscripts. Besides being the author of an original Sanscrit epic poem called Vāsudeva Vijaya, which has been pronounced by competent critics both in India and Europe, to be a production of great merit, not inferior in any respect to the best efforts of the Sanscrit Muse of mediæval India; and of two other valuable works on Vedānta philosophy, in course of publication, and which are deservedly held in high esteem, Pundit Ramnath, during the agitation on the Consent Bill, boldly declared himself for the Bill, and exposed in a brief but vigorous Vyāvasthā, given at the solicitation of the Government, the weakness of the Garbhādhānist and the miserable devices of misquotation to which they had stooped to bolster up their cause.

Ever since that time Pundit Ramnath has been an object of persecution at the hands of unscrupulous enemies. The Pundit has petitioned the Council for a reconsideration of the order after receiving an explanation from him. We have no doubt that the Council will grant his prayer. If he is to be dismissed after such a brilliant record of services under all sorts of privations undergone for 20 years in course of his journeys of exploration into remote and out-of-the-way stations in the Mofussil, and so soon after the unsolicited increase granted to him in January last, he should be accorded the opportunity of a hearing."

Pandit Ram Nath is the most notable victim of the vengeance of disappointed Garbhādhānism. His offence is great. It was bad enough that he a Pandit among Pandits, a high-priest of the noblest Brahmanocracy in Bengal, should give in his adhesion to the Age of Consent Bill (now Act.) He crowned his baseness by delivering an argument in Hindu Law in support of the Bill which went farther than that of any other Pandit supporter of it in any part of India, and in which, quoting or citing chapter and verse from the most authoritative Sastras from the Vedas downwards, he demolished the positions of the Pandits of the opposition, even convicting their leader, the great Sashadhar Tarkachuramani himself, not simply of gross sophistry but also actual falsification of texts. It was an unanswerable document. After one feeble essay, all attempts at reply were given up. This was the enormity of which the poor Pandit was guilty. It was gall and wormwood to his own immediate superior in the Asiatic Society, Raja Rajendralala Mitra, who had, like so many of the best in the land, gone crazy with Garbhādhānism, but he had the magnanimity to forgive.

Mahamahopadhyaya Pandit Mohesh Chandra Nyaratna too proved a true Brahman, the typical Brahman being soon appeased and never harbouring any grudge. Others were unrelenting. They vowed their determination to make Ram Nath rue for his boldness to the end of his days. And they have succeeded. They first ostracised him, preventing his invitation as one of the learned to feasts and festivals—the gifts received at which form the main income of the Pandit class, besides any pieces of rent-free land which the more fortunate may inherit. Even an enlightened man like Babu Nilamber Mookerjee, late Minister of Cashmere, has been prevailed upon to withhold his gifts from a Pandit of unequalled learning and a Sanskrit Poet unapproached by any modern, on the same occasion on which he has been bountiful to scores of sciolists and not a few of the illiterati who crowd at every obsequial assembly in Calcutta. And now they have delivered the finishing stroke by depriving him of the difficult and most painfully toilsome office at which he has worked in obscurity for twenty years to the aggrandisement of others' reputation and the advancement of the world's learning in the hidden treasures of Sanskrit and Prakrit genius.

By a strange irony of fate, the final crushing blow of Garbhādhānist vengeance comes immediately through the hand of a Pandit who, like Ram Nath, was guilty, as an officer of Government, of supporting the Bill. He makes his peace by offering the greater victim.

It is comparatively lucky that on the present Moharram the differences are inter-Mussulman, being confined to the camp of Islam. The quarrel is between the Orthodox and the Sectarists—the Sunnis and the Shias. That is bad enough, but we might have worse—a conflict between Mahomedans and Hindus, as on the Bakrid. In the Bakrid the cause of offence to the Hindus is the sacrifice of the cow to which some Mussalmans openly resort to spite the Hindus who worship the animal. In the Moharram there is no sacrifice. But the Moharram is a moveable festival, timed according to the lunar year, whose months have no unalterable correspondence to the same solar months, it is always shifting. Hence the Moharram is sometimes synchronous with Hindu festivals, and then the Government must look out. If the Hindu and the Moslem processions cross each other in any way, actually or figuratively, there is sure to be a collision, perhaps a bloody collision. It has always been so. Here is an extract from the Calcutta Gazette dated October 1, 1789:—

"The two great holidays of the Mussulmans and Hindoos, the Mohurrum and Dooiga Poojah, falling together, have occasioned the greatest tumults and riots in the Bazars for some days, and been productive of several murders.

On Monday afternoon, as Ramcaunt Chatterjee, a rich Banian and Brahmin, was carrying the Doorga to the river, attended by a large procession, he was met near the Boitakannah by a party of Mussulmans, who, as we understand, first attacked the Hindoos, destroyed their images, and dangerously wounded several men and women, and, amongst others, the daughter-in-law of Ramcaunt Chatterjee. In consequence of this outrage, Ramcaunt Chatterjee, on Tuesday morning, assembled about fifty or sixty armed peons, and demolished all the Mohametan Durgahs they could find in the neighbourhood of the Boitakkannah.

In the evening the Mussulmans formed in a body of two or three hundred men, and attacked the house of Sookmoyi Takoor in the Bow Bazar, and plundered it of furniture, jewels, 5,000 Gold Mohurs, and Company's bonds and certificates to the amount of 8,000 Rupees, and, to show their contempt of the Hindoo religion, killed two cows.

Sookmoyi Takoor escaped with his life by running away as soon as his house was broke open, but two of his people were killed, and several dangerously wounded. A Mussulman was also killed, and a number wounded.

We understand the ringleaders of this outrage and robbery have been apprehended and carried before Mr. Justice Hyde.

Sookmoyi Takoor made oath that several of his things were carried into the Madrissah, and a search warrant was granted in consequence, and, as we are informed, part of Sookmoyi Takoor's effects have been found there.

The house of Conny Boiragi, in the Mutchy Bazar, was also attacked, but fortunately, before any damage could be done, a Guard of Sepoys arrived and dispersed the rioters.

We understand every precaution has been taken to preserve the peace and security of the Town by stationing a number of Sepoy Guards in different parts."

That ought to reassure us that Calcutta under Commissioner Lambert has not very much deteriorated.

THE MOHARRAM.

We are again in the thick of the Moharram. It is always an anxious season, for both the people and the Government. Warned by previous experience, both the general Mahomedan community and the authorities of this Province have been wide awake and have taken the necessary precautions.

The members of the Shia community of Chupra applied to the Magistrate for permission to take out the Alam with Mashak and Tir in procession, during the present Moharram. Alam is flag or standard, such as the Shias carry in their Moharram processions. There is no objection to it, except in those places, where the Shias profess it to be their duty to utter the Tabarra or imprecations on the holy chiefs of the Sunnis. Mashak is skin for drawing water such as the bhistis carry. Tir is arrow. These latter are intended to recall a most heart-rending scene in the tragic death of Hassan, the son of Ali, and his family and followers. The enemy had shut them out of all water supply. They were perishing of thirst. At length, Abbas, (a son of Ali and step-brother of Hassan,) who was standard-bearer to Hassan, unable to stand the groans of the little children crying for water, went himself with a skin to bring water from the Euphrates. Eluding the guards, he reached the river and, after filling his skin, he was carrying it tied to his standard to camp, when on the way one of the enemy aimed an arrow at it and pierced it through. Thus the only chance of assuaging the thirst of the Holy Family was lost. The exhibition of a skin depending from a standard and pierced through by an arrow is intended to recall to the Shia faithful the horrible death to which the family of Ali was doomed, and to incite them to curse the memory of not only the immediate foes of the family but also the enemies of the House of Ali, past, present, and future, or, in other words, to repeat the Tabarra. The Sunnis strongly objected to this, as, in their opinion, it was a feint on the part of the Shias in order to secure the opportunity to utter the Tabarra in connection with that form of procession. The Magistrate, after satisfying himself that what the Shias asked for was an innovation and that there was likelihood of serious breach of the peace if their prayer was granted, disallowed it, and directed that if any Shias acted against his decision, they would be held responsible for any disturbance that might take place. The Shias have, thereupon, moved the High Court, praying that the order of the Magistrate may be reversed. Papers have been called for, and the case is pending.

The Shias of Gya have also for some time been trying their best to obtain permission from the authorities to take out the Alam with Mashak and Tir in procession on the present occasion; and as the Sunnis could not be persuaded to agree to this proposal and were prepared to oppose them, they subscribed several thousand Rupees to take the required steps to enforce their religious rights. Thus armed with the sinews of war, they applied to the Magistrate of the District, through a European barrister. The Sunnis also were not backward in appearing before that officer attended by another barrister. The Magistrate, after hearing the arguments on both sides, decided that as it was an innovation that they sought, he would not as magistrate grant the application of the Shias, but if they wanted it, they could apply to the District Superintendent of Police to arrange the procession. The Shias now besieged the Head of the local Police, who, notwithstanding the strong remonstrance of the Sunnis, has passed an order to the effect that the Shias will be permitted to take out the Alam with Mashak and Tir on the seventh day of the Moharram. There is great sensation among the Sunnis of Gya in consequence, and they have appealed to the Commissioner of Patna against the decision of the local authorities. The Commissioner's final order, our correspondent says, is every moment expected by both the sects with breathless anxiety.

Our readers are aware that the year before last there had been a row between the two sects at Moorsshedabad, the Shias uttering the Tabarra whilst taking out their Alams in procession through the public streets, and the Sunnis resenting such reviling of the revered leaders of their Faith, namely, the first three Caliphs. The fracas was followed by arrests and prosecutions ending in the conviction of members of both communities. Accordingly, last year, in anticipation of the Moharram, the Sunnis of Moorsshedabad presented an elaborate memorial to the Lieutenant-Governor praying that steps might be taken in time to prevent the recurrence of a similar disturbance during the then coming Festival. Sir Charles Elliott visited Moorsshedabad, collected the members of the Nizamut Family at the Palace, and strictly enjoined upon them the necessity of adopting measures whereby the uttering of the Tabarra on the public streets might be put a stop to. The Princes agreed, and the Nawab Bahadoor who had, as confessed by the Sunni Memorialists, always lent his powerful influence to the cause of peace and social harmony, readily undertook to do the needful, with the result that the Shias abstained from uttering the Tabarra and the Moharram processions passed off without a hitch. This year again, the Sunnis, apprehending a serious riot, having reason to know that the Shias were so far from reconciled to the peaceful solution that they accused the good Nawab Bahadoor of being a traitor to the integrity of the Shia Creed, memorialised the authorities, and we hear that orders have been issued that the same procedure was to be adopted as was done last year. We therefore trust that no disturbance will take place at Moorsshedabad during the Festival through which we are passing.

Nearer home, there was a fear of a serious riot at Garden Reach. But thanks to the vigilance and tact of the head of the Police, and the strong measure timely adopted by Mr. Lambert, Calcutta has, we hope, been saved the spectacle of another Shambazar collision. For some time, there has been a dispute going on between the Shias and the Sunnis of Garden Reach, in consequence of the former introducing the words Bila-fasl in their Azan or call to prayer. These Arabic words mean without separation. Applied to Ali, they mean that he is the true Caliph and next in succession to the Prophet, despite his artificial separation from his rightful place which was the effect of brute force, the historical succession intervening being of no account with the Shias. The Sunnis strongly protested against this innovation, as it was a distinct form of the Tabarra implying that the first three Caliphs were sacrilegious usurpers and deprivors of the lawful right of Ali, the fourth Caliph. The matter was placed before the authorities, who decided that the words "Bila-fasl" should not be used by the Shias in their Azan, and this order was carried out accordingly. About six weeks ago, however, the Shias, while carrying a corpse to the burial-ground, again uttered the words, Bila-fasl, aloud on the public road, in connection with the prayer which they were chanting as an accompaniment to the funeral procession. The Sunnis resenting the objectionable words uttered within their hearing and feeling that it was done with the deliberate intention of hurting their religious feelings, complained to the Commissioner of Police, who called for a report from the local police. Finding that there was almost a certainty of a breach of the peace taking place between the Shias (who numbered about a couple of hundred or so) and the Sunnis (who were some thousands in number), if the Shias were not prevented from uttering the Tabarra in that form on the public road, Mr. Lambert sent for the representatives of both the sects to his office on the 20th instant. After patiently listening to the arguments of both the parties, he told the Shias that, as the uttering of the words "Bila-fasl" was the only cause of all the dispute, and as he had learnt from reliable sources that their introduction was a pure innovation, they having never before been uttered in public by any Shia either in Calcutta or the Suburbs, he could not allow the objectionable phrase in connection with any procession. He advised the leaders of the Shia sect to advise their people to abstain from provoking their co-religionists of the other persuasion. He even told them that, unless they agreed to it, he would refuse the license for the processions in this Moharram. This firm attitude on the part of the Commissioner of Police had the desired effect, and the Shias have agreed to give the Sunnis no such cause of resentment.

THE HYDERABAD CASE AT SECUNDRABAD.

APART from the standing anxiety in respect of the annual Moharram, the social sensation of the hour is supplied from Hyderabad. There has commenced another Hyderabad litigation with a British subject. This time the venue is transferred nearer home—to Secundrabad. On that occasion, the victim was a Syrian—this time it is a Bengali.

On Thursday se'nnight, the man of the hour in Hyderabad, Nawab Fattah Nawaz Jung (Mahdi Hassan), Home Secretary to the Nizam's Government, applied to Mr. Bosanquet, Magistrate, Residency Bazzars, for a warrant against S. M. Mitter as the author of the pamphlet, (now known as the scandalous pamphlet) in which Mrs. Mahdi Hassan and the Nawab are held up to public scorn. The warrant was issued on Friday following and the Baboo arrested at about 9 O'clock in the same evening. He was enlarged on depositing the sum of Rs. 1,000 (one thousand) as cash security. Mr. Inverarity, barrister-at-law (from Bombay) will lead the prosecution.

We believe there will be no difference touching the character of the publication. It is a pasquinade of a pronounced type. There is no mincing of matters in it. No mere indulgence in sarcastic railery—no taking refuge in dark innuendo or even in broad hint. It is an undisguised plain statement, a lengthy affidavit translated into smart newspaper language. The allegations are many and circumstantial and all of the most serious kind. They may be summed up in one word, namely, that the lady is a Eurasian who had been a noted character as a member of the demi monde of Lucknow and other towns in Northern India, and that the gentleman who knew her well has insulted his master the Nizam and the Empress herself by introducing her to them as a respectable lady. He who publishes such writings does not—cannot—hope to take shelter in equivocations, for equivocations there are none. He means to stand by his guns—to stick to his words. He has burned his ships after landing, and there is nothing for him but to fight—to win if possible or die hard. Under any circumstances that is an arduous rôle. But if he is driven to bay, his best, though desperate, resource, is in fight. But weak is human nature, and the bravest may quail before overwhelming odds, and at the last moment his courage may fail. The assistance he may have relied upon, may not be forthcoming. The sinews of war may fall short, &c., &c. In such a case, the poor dupe of self and others had better reckon on an ignominious defeat and destruction.

Already, the accused has found out the frail nature of the staff on which he leaned. At the very outset, he experienced great difficulty in finding surety for a Rs. 1,000. He could not get one after all, in that great city, in which he has been a journalist for some years. He ought to have been warned by the experience of the Bangabasi in the late State Trial. The conductors of a newspaper of enormous circulation could not, in their own country, get a surety. With commendable magnanimity and courage, a comparative stranger, a Vaidya of Vikrampur, practising Sanskrit medicine in this city—whom the Babudom of Cockaigne would despise as barbarian—readily stepped into a position which belonged to friends and men of Calcutta and the metropolitan districts. Not that their nearer and dearer people were afraid of their running away. They were afraid for themselves. It was a state prosecution—there was the rub. Their friends were charged with treasonable language—with exciting sedition. They were under the evil eye of Government. Herein lay the difficulty of friends. It was all very well as long as the thing was confined to reading the Bangabasi week after week, with loud enjoyment and receiving its writers with vociferous cheers. But to identify themselves in open court with men tried for a serious offence against the state, was a different matter. We remarked the same feebleness on the occasion of Babu Surendra Nath Banerjea's arrest for contempt. All the overflowing demonstrations that accompanied him to the High Court, vanished as soon as an adjournment was ordered and the prisoner allowed to be enlarged on giving a surety of Rs. 5,000. Not a mouse came to comfort. There was not a man near our great Demagogue when he emerged from the crushing crowd, except his lawyer. A quarter of an hour ago the admirers of the agitator, their ranks swollen by battalions of schoolboys, had been trying to storm the gates of the great Gothic pile in which Her Majesty's Justice is dispensed, in order to come to his assistance—now not a soul to enquire or condole. Under the order for a punitive bail, the spirit of patriotism hitherto so defiant, had collapsed. In that case too, a stranger, though by no means an outsider, saved the already too-tried accused a most disagreeable detention for how many hours who knows. After that, it is idle to expect more manliness in the despot-ridden atmosphere of Hyderabad.

Apart from the merits of the case, the public cannot help sympathising with a man in such a peculiarly difficult, not to say desperate, situation. Assuming that the accused has had anything to do with the pamphlet, he can be but a secondary instrument at best—a mere intermediary—a go-between, a cat's paw. His guilt is none the less, but it is the guilt of thoughtlessness, perhaps want. He can hardly be supposed to bear any personal malice towards either Nawab Mahdi Hassan or Begum Hassan: He is too insignificant for that. He is not in the running for the contingent vacancy in the Premiership: he is not a possible candidate. It is among the seekers of office and power that the true enemy is to be found. Any scores of Mitters, Boses and Ghoses, and Mookerjees and Chatterjees into the bargain, may be hanged, drawn and quartered, without touching a hair of the true Simon impure.

THE LATE BAKRID AND THE PRESENT MOHARRAM IN THE GYA DISTRICT.

TO THE EDITOR.

FOR some months past, the people at Gya had been watching the approach of Bakrid and Moharram with a growing sense of anxiety and alarm. Anxiety, because it was feared the deeds of notorious Maina Pandit, a full account of which went the round of the press this time last year, might be repeated, and alarm, because a local Shia pleader had been moving heaven and earth to take out *alam*s with arrow and mashak symbolising the dismembered Abbas pierced with the shaft and holding the skin of water by the teeth. The religious sentiment of the Sunni masses was deadly opposed to the introduction of the idolatrous innovation here. The educated Sunnis, on the other hand, took an attitude of indifference but advised their Shia brethren, whenever the latter cared to consult them, that, considering the excitement among the lower classes of the Sunni population against the proposed novelty, it was not proper in the interest of peace and order to introduce it. The Shias would not listen, and thus the prospect of peace was rendered uncertain.

To the great relief of the public, however, all fears are over now, and it is interesting to detail the course of events which brought about the happy end.

Bakrid is past. Mr. Macpherson, the new Magistrate, anticipated and managed the occasion capitally. A body of infantry was sent for and quartered in the town. On the eve of the festival it marched through the principal streets overawing the people and giving them to understand that the authorities were prepared to suppress any disturbance by force of arms. On the day of the Bakrid, constables and Head-constables armed with long heavy clubs (lattes) patrolled the streets at short distances, while sepoy with loaded guns guarded the sarai gate and the last year's scene of battle at Muradpoor. The Vice-Chairman, Mr. Halim, rode out, visiting every Mahomedan quarter where a sacrifice was expected, and telling his coreligionists to perform the ceremony but not hurt the Hindu feeling by any undue and unnecessary exhibition. The Magistrate, the Assistant Magistrate, the District Superintendent of Police, and a Deputy Magistrate drove through the streets to show that they were wide awake and ready. The Hindus and Mahomedans both behaved well, and the occasion passed without a disturbance. Although an outbreak was not unreasonably feared, there had apparently been no predetermination to riot—certainly no overt indication in that direction.

Different was the case at the Sub-Divisional town of Jehanabad (in the Gya District.) There nearly a thousand professional lattials, collected from the neighbouring villages, were secretly quartered in different Hindu houses, awaiting the signal of their leaders, a Khatri and a Brahman, to join in a crusade of vengeance against the cow-killers. The provision dealers and grocers being all Hindus, all the shops were closed to prevent the Mahomedans getting provisions for their grand annual feast. The hour when the Mahomedans should engage in prayers at the mosque was fixed to attack the houses where cows were to be sacrificed. The situation was truly serious, requiring courage and decision as well as judgment and tact. The Sub-Divisional officer Khan Bahadur A. K. M. Abdus Subhan was a young officer who had taken charge of the place only two days ago. Fortunately, he proved himself thoroughly equal to the occasion. He acted with laudable strength and resolution and displayed extraordinary coolness of judgment and promptness of execution in dealing with the affair. He went to the scene of the apprehended riot and there, from his exalted seat on elephant-back, addressing himself to the vast crowd of Hindus and Mahomedans assembled round him, declared his principle and policy in a most emphatic tone. He said he would punish the Mahomedans who might sacrifice a cow in a place open and exposed to the public gaze and also the Hindu who under the colour of religious frenzy might trespass upon a Mahomedan house where a cow was being secretly sacrificed. This announcement of policy, however, did not calm the agitators, and the resolution to loot Mahomedan houses at the prayer time continued unshaken. So keenly did Moulvi Abdus Subhan realize the difficulty of the situation; that he did not feel himself at liberty to join his co-religionists in the function of the auspicious day. He sent all the Mahomedans to pray at the mosque, while, foregoing his own prayers, he remained behind to prevent the threatened outbreak. The Police Inspector and constables patrolled the town, and the Mahomedan houses upon which attacks were feared were strongly manned.

Thus the ruffians were cowed down by the vigilance and strength of the Sub-Divisional Officer and none dared to create a whiff of disturbance. The sacrifices were offered but in no militant manner, and the day passed peacefully.

One little incident, just to show the possibility which management and luck had avoided, took place. Two lattials had rushed forth from their hiding places and were seen inciting the people to rise. They were promptly arrested by the Bengali Inspector, and are now undergoing trial.

The District Magistrate, it is said, has thanked the Sub-Divisional Officer for his having managed the affair so well.

Thus ended the long feared festival of Bakrid. As for the Moharram, it has not practically set in yet, but the contested question of the show of the alam, which alone lends a dreadful colour to the occasion, is almost set at rest. The Shias, a handful of the population, represented by Mr. Howard, petitioned the Magistrate for permission for that hostile demonstration. Eighteen hundred Sunnis, represented by Mr. Jones, opposed the application. The result was that the Magistrate refused the Shia prayer on the ground that the alam was an innovation likely to cause a serious breach of the peace. The Shias have now applied to the District Superintendent of Police, and they have apparently received from him encouragement. This officer is said to have spoken valiantly like a Briton. He would like to see the alam paraded by force of arms. We hope this is not true, and, if it be, we fear the D. S. will be ill able to discharge a responsibility which his superior the District officer, with his far greater power and prestige, did not think it proper and politic to undertake.

THE LAYING OF THE FOUNDATION-STONE OF THE RAJKUMARI LEPROSY ASYLUM, BAIDYANATH,

BY THE LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR OF BENGAL.

Dr. Mahendralal Sircar's Address.

HONORABLE SIR,

It is my proud privilege to-day to be able to ask Your Honor to perform a ceremony which inaugurates a work which, if I am not mistaken, has been recognized as one of charity only since the great exemplar of humanity did not hesitate to touch lepers and heal them.

I need not remind Your Honor that Leprosy is a disease which is dreaded and abhorred more than any other flesh is heir to, and the horror and abhorrence with which it is looked upon are more than justified by the ravages it makes in its victims; leaving not an organ, not a tissue, not even a microscopic constituent of the body free from its relentless hold, and giving rise to such frightful distortion of the human form divine as to drive the strongest sentiments which bind man to man away from the discharge of their legitimate functions.

And when it is remembered that the disease is contagious, that it does not end with its immediate victims but makes victims of others who come in contact with them or their foul discharges, we shall be in a position to realize its terrible nature.

Such is the dire disease which counts not less than 250,000 human beings as its victims in India alone. I am quite satisfied that the figure given by the last census is widely divergent of the fact. It gives but half the actual number. And there is every probability that the disease is on the increase, and this is not to be wondered at when we remember that the disease is contagious and that the people have not awakened to a sense of their duty in regard to it.

I am sorry I cannot exonerate the medical profession from this culpable neglect of duty, and indeed I may go so far as to charge it with positive mischief, inasmuch as even to this day medical men are not unanimous as to the contagious nature of the disease, a fact that has contributed not a little to exert a most deterrent influence upon the people and the Government.

I do not think, however, that there was any necessity of correct medical opinion as to its contagiousness for the disease to excite the sympathy of the people and the Government towards those afflicted with it. Their condition is so pitiable that it might have been expected that it would not fail to excite pity in the most hard-hearted; but as I have said, it is only since the time of Jesus Christ that they have begun to be looked upon as legitimate objects of charity, and though very nearly nineteen hundred years have passed since that blessed life lived on our earth, the sympathy that has been accorded to these unfortunate beings, is very far from the full measure that ought to be accorded. The very loathsomeness of the disease which ought to have touched the hearts of those who are fortunately free from it, has served only to create abhorrence rather than pity.

This neglect of duty, involving unmitigated suffering to our fellow-men, has only redounded to the injury of those who have been guilty of this neglect. And it has been proved that the best safety from the disease is in the kindest treatment of those afflicted with it. And the first step towards that kind treatment is to give those of them whose poverty compels them to lead a vagrant life, an asylum where they can find a shelter from the inclemencies of the weather, where they can have food and raiment without being forced to molest and endanger their healthy neighbours, and where they may have such medical treatment as may mitigate their sufferings.

This place of pilgrimage has been the resort of lepers from all parts of the country. They come here in the vain hope of getting their disease healed by the presiding divinity who has somehow or other got the name of sovereign healer, Baidyanath—Lord of Physicians. Whether any one was ever cured of this fell disease in olden times, nobody can tell. But this much is positive that not only has no one within the memory of the present generation ever had the slightest relief of his sufferings, but that the disease has begun to make fearful havoc amongst the resident population, and chiefly amongst the very priests of the idol.

This deplorable state of things has been going on for years, I may say for centuries, and what is more deplorable nobody seems to have spent a thought about it. Human beings afflicted with the most loathsome and the most malignant of diseases, with sores eating away skin and flesh and bone and thus causing the most frightful mutilations and disfigurements, almost without food and absolutely without shelter from sun and wind and rain, have been leading here a most wretched existence till death puts an end to it, but Oh! in ways most heart-rending to behold. And yet hundreds and thousands of pilgrims visiting these shrines year after year, from the wealthiest rajahs and zemindars downwards, have been looking on without a thought of doing something permanent for their benefit.

While I make this statement, I need hardly assure Your Honor that it is not my intention to cast the slightest reproach upon any one. Though no fatalist I still believe that the fullness of time for the amelioration of the condition of the lepers of Deoghar was not come till in 1886 the attention of a schoolmaster was drawn to that condition, and his heart moved in their behalf. Fully a year elapsed before Babu Jogendra Nath could venture to resolve to do something, and it was not till August 1888 that he got his first subscription from a Maharaja who had come on a pilgrimage. Three years elapsed but the subscription list did not advance beyond Rs. 516. Illness brought me to Baidyanath in the beginning of 1891, and during my stay here of nearly a couple of months I had opportunities of observing the condition of the unfortunate lepers. Heart-rending as that condition was I did not know what to do, and I would in all probability have done what others before me had done, that is, would have done nothing, had it not been for Babu Jogendra Nath Bose who came to me for some subscription. A shelter for the unfortunate lepers was urged as an immediate and most urgent necessity, and his estimate for thatched sheds to accommodate fifty people was Rs. 2,000, to meet which he had got promise of only Rs. 500 in three years. Seeing that the chances of making up that sum were very very remote indeed, I gave up the intention I had of building for myself a retreat in Deoghar for occasional rest from harassing professional and other duties, and told him that I should deem it a privilege to be permitted to bear the entire cost of building the asylum on the simple condition that it should bear the name of my life's partner, through whose unwearied and tender care and nursing, under God's blessing, my health was restored. I need hardly add that Babu Jogendra Nath and his co-projectors, Babu Raj Narain Bose and Pandit Girijanand Datta-jha, readily accepted my offer. The outcome of this is that I have now to bear, which I do most cheerfully, an expenditure which will be more than treble of the original estimate; for on mature consideration I have thought it advisable to have pucca buildings which will be more substantial and durable in place of thatched sheds which will require constant repairs and renewals, and for the present to serve as accommodation only for half the number originally contemplated. The plan, laid on the table for Your Honor's inspection, shows what it is intended to do in the way of building.

But the building is not all. The inmates, especially as they will not be allowed to lead a vagrant life, must have provision for their food and clothing and medical treatment. For all this we shall have to depend upon public subscription, as I set forth clearly in my letter to Babu Jogendra Nath. Permission was taken to publish my letter, in order that supported by it an appeal might be made to the public. The result of the appeal is what I had anticipated. The people have awakened to a sense of their duty, and they are responding liberally. The projectors have already in hand Rs. 7,000 which will yield an income of Rs. 20 a month. I propose for the present to admit only a dozen, eight males and four females. Under economic management Rs. 50 a month will meet all the expenses for this small number. So that unless we have fresh subscriptions we shall have a deficit of Rs. 30. As a safeguard against uncertainty this deficit, or whatever it may be, I offer to meet myself for a year or as long as it will continue. Already I find that the burden I have imposed upon myself is beginning to be lighter; for I am happy at this stage to be able to announce that the Maharaja of Gidhaur has with his usual liberality subscribed Rs. 1,000 in aid of the maintenance fund; and I have no doubt that others will not be slow to follow his noble example.

This is our humble plan of the asylum and this our humble scheme for its maintenance, and notwithstanding that altogether it is a very small affair, it may be said, as it has been said, there is so much of uncertainty about it, so much of dependence upon charity which is a more fitful thing than love itself, that I should not be sorry if one were so ill-natured as to say that the whole thing, for the purpose intended, looks like building a castle in the air. I can only say in reply that most of the great and good things of the world have often had small and not unoften shadowy beginnings, and that I have some confidence from my past experience in similar matters. I am in the habit of building castles in the air, and somehow or other they come down on solid ground and become durable structures. Of one of these castles, which goes by the name of the Science Association in Calcutta, Your Honor is now the presiding divinity. Fully convinced of the sacredness of our cause, though our plan and scheme are very humble indeed, we have not hesitated to approach Your Honor as a ruler in whose eyes small things are no less important than great, and who has noble antecedents of large and discriminate charity,—we approach Your Honor with our prayer for the stamp of your high approval on our undertaking, which, though now small in its beginning, is destined to be from the very fact of that approval a really good and great thing in course of time; such that it will commend itself to the spirit of Father Damien himself who literally made himself a leper amongst lepers, and such that Your Honor will not have to regret the trouble you have undergone in taking the high priest's part in this day's ceremony.

One word about the name which it is proposed to give to the asylum. As a general rule, throughout the world, but especially in my country, we are forgetful of woman. Our worthy Deputy Commissioner of these paraganahs, in his interesting little work recently published, has deplored the condition of our women. That condition is deplorable indeed, and I have not, whenever occasion has represented itself, hesitated to bear my testimony to the sad fact. I must say, however, that my devotion to woman as the guardian angel of infant humanity, my reverence for woman as our first preceptor, my love of woman as the sweetener of life, have not been derived from western education, great as its influence has been in otherwise modelling my character, nor from our own shastras. They are inherent in me, and the great wonder with me is, how any man can be void of them. I deplore the condition of woman not in my own country alone, but all over the world more or less. It is to wipe off to the extent in my power this reproach to which we men have rendered ourselves liable, and to lighten the debt of gratitude I owe to one without whose incessant and tender care I would have long ceased to be, that I have ventured to propose the name, and I trust that in this small matter I shall not fail to have Your Honor's approval.

My last word is that Your Honor be pleased to grant our prayer by laying the first stone of the Rajkumari Leper Asylum; and I need hardly add that by this act Your Honor will not only lay under the deepest obligation Mrs. Sircar and myself and the lepers but the whole community of Deoghar.

INDIAN COUNCILS ACT, 1892.

[55 & 56 VICTORIA, CHAPTER 14]

An Act to amend the Indian Councils Act, 1861.

[20th June, 1892.]

Be it enacted by the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:

1. (1) The number of additional members of Council nominated by the Governor General under the provisions of section ten of the Indian Councils Act, 1861, shall be such as to him may seem from time to time expedient, but shall not be less than ten nor more than sixteen; and the number of additional members of Council nominated by the Governors of the presidencies of Fort St. George and Bombay respectively under the provisions of section twenty-nine of the Indian Councils Act, 1861, shall (besides the advocate-general of the presidency or officer acting in that capacity) be such as to the said Governors respectively may seem from time to time expedient, but shall not be less than eight nor more than twenty.

(2) It shall be lawful for the Governor General in Council by proclamation from time to time to increase the number of councillors whom the Lieutenant-Governors of the Bengal Division of the presidency of Fort William and of the North-Western Provinces and Oudh respectively may nominate for their assistance in making laws and regulations: Provided always that not more than twenty shall be nominated for the Bengal Division, and not more than fifteen for the North-Western Provinces and Oudh.

(3) Any person resident in India may be nominated an additional member of Council under sections ten and twenty-nine of the Indian Councils Act, 1861, and this Act, or a member of the Council of the lieutenant-governor of any province to which the provisions of the Indian Councils Act, 1861, touching the making of laws and regulations, have been or are hereafter extended or made applicable.

(4) The Governor General in Council may from time to time, with the approval of the Secretary of State in Council, make regulations as to the conditions under which such nominations, or any of them, shall be made by the Governor General, Governors, and Lieutenant-Governors respectively, and prescribe the manner in which such regulations shall be carried into effect.

2. Notwithstanding any provision in the Indian Councils Act, 1861, the Governor General in Council may from time to time make rules authorising at any meeting of the Governor General's Council for the purpose of making laws and regulations the discussion of the Annual Financial Statement of the Governor General in Council and the asking of questions, but under such conditions and restrictions as to subject or otherwise as shall be in the said rules prescribed or declared: And notwithstanding any provisions in the Indian Councils Act, 1861, the Governors in Council of Fort St. George and Bombay respectively, and the lieutenant-governor of any province to which the provisions of the Indian Councils Act, 1861, touching the making of laws and regulations, have been more or are hereafter extended or made applicable, may from time to time make rules for authorising at any meeting of their respective Councils for the purpose of making laws and regulations the discussion of the Annual Financial Statement of their respective local governments and the asking of questions, but under such conditions and restrictions as to subject or otherwise as shall be in the said rules applicable to such Councils respectively be prescribed or declared. But no member at any such meeting of any Council shall have power to submit or propose any resolution, or to divide the Council in respect of any such financial discussion, or the answer to any question asked under the authority of this Act, or the rules made under this Act: Provided that any rule made under this Act by a governor in council, or by a lieutenant governor, shall be submitted for and shall be subject to the sanction of the Governor General in Council, and any rule made under this Act by the Governor General in Council shall be submitted for and shall be subject to the sanction of the Secretary of State in Council: Provided also that rules made under this Act shall not be subject to alteration or amendment at meetings for the purpose of making laws and regulations.

3. It is hereby declared that in the twenty-second section of the Indian Councils Act, 1861, it was and is intended that the words "Indian territories now under the dominion of Her Majesty" should be read and construed as if the words "or hereafter" were and had at the time of the passing of the said Act been inserted next after the word "now"; and further, that the Acts third and fourth William the Fourth, Chapter eight-five, and sixteenth and seventeenth Victoria, Chapter ninety-five, respectively, shall be read and construed as if at the date of the enactment thereof respectively it was intended and had been enacted that the said Acts respectively should extend to and include the territories acquired after the dates thereof respectively by the East India Company, and should not be confined to the territories at the dates of the said enactments respectively in the possession and under the government of the said company.

4. Sections thirteen and thirty-two of the Indian Councils Act, 1861, are hereby repealed, and it is enacted that—

(1) If any additional member of Council or any member of the council of a lieutenant-governor appointed under the said Act or this Act shall be absent from India or unable to attend to the duties of his office for a period of two consecutive months, it shall be lawful for the Governor General, the governor, or lieutenant-governor to whose council such additional member or member may have been nominated (as the case may be) to declare, by a notification published in the Government Gazette, that the seat in Council of such person has become vacant;

(2) In the event of a vacancy occurring by the absence from India, inability to attend to duty, death, acceptance of office, or resignation duly accepted of any such additional member or member of the council of a lieutenant-governor, it shall be lawful for the Governor General, for the governor, or for the lieutenant-governor, as the case may be, to nominate any person as additional member or member, as the case may be, in his place; and every member so nominated shall be summoned to all meetings held for the purpose of making laws and regulations for the term of two years from the date of such nomination: Provided always that it shall not be lawful by such nomination, or by any other nomination made under this Act, to diminish the proportion of non-official members directed by the Indian Councils Act, 1861, to be nominated.

5. The local legislature of any province in India may from time to time, by Acts passed under and subject to the provisions of the Indian Councils Act, 1861, and with the previous sanction of the Governor General, but not otherwise, repeal or amend as to that province any law or regulation made either before or after the passing of this Act by any authority in India other than that local legislature: Provided that an Act or a provision of an Act made by a local legislature, and subsequently assented to by the Governor-General in pursuance of the Indian Councils Act, 1861, shall not be deemed invalid by reason only of its requiring the previous sanction of the Governor General under this section.

6. In this Act—

The expression "local legislature" means—

(1) The Governor in Council for the purpose of making laws and regulations of the respective provinces of Fort St. George and Bombay; and

(2) The council for the purpose of making laws and regulations of the lieutenant-Governor of any province to which the provisions of the Indian Councils Act, 1861, touching the making of laws or regulations have been or are hereafter extended or made applicable:

The expression "province" means any presidency, division, or province or territory over which the powers of any local legislature for the time being extend.

7. Nothing in this Act shall detract from or diminish the powers of the Governor General in Council at meetings for the purpose of making laws and regulations.

8. This Act may be cited as the Indian Councils Act, 1892; and the Indian Councils Act, 1861, and this Act may be cited together as the Indian Councils Acts, 1861 and 1892.

Vol. XI.

CALCUTTA, SATURDAY, AUGUST 6, 1892.

No. 536

From the Papers of 1850.

A CEMETERY WITHOUT A MONUMENT.

MANY a tear has been dropped in memory of Capt. Ira Bursley, who, with his noble crew, after sending all the passengers ashore from the ill-fated Hottinguer, went down with her to the "cemetery without a monument."

Like the lamented Dustan, on board the Atlantic, he stayed by his vessel until the last efforts were put forth to save the lives of others. One is reminded of Cooper's description of long Tom Coffin, which, though fiction, has proved the mournful truth concerning many a brave sailor. In looking over a volume of poems by Brainard, I copied his

LAMENT FOR LONG TOM.

Let us think of them that sleep
Full many a fathom deep,
By thy wild and stormy steep,
Elsinore!

Thy cruise is over now,
Thou art anchored by the shore,
And never more shalt thou
Hear the storm around thee roar
Death has shaken out the sands of th
Now around thee sports the whale,
And the porpoise snuffs the gale,
And the night winds wake their wail,
As they pass.

The sea-grass round thy bier
Shall bend beneath the tide,
Nor tell the breakers near,
Where thy manly limbs abide;
But the granite rock thy tombstone shall be.
Though the edges of thy grave
Are the combings of the wave,
Yet unheeded they shall rave
Over thee.

At the piping of all hands,
When the Judgment signal's spread;
When the islands and the lands
And the seas give up their dead,
And the North and the South shall come:
When the sinner is betrayed,
And the just man is afraid,
Then Heaven be thy aid,
Poor Tom.

From the Oxford Edition of Milton's Works.

MILTON ON HIS LOSS OF SIGHT.

I AM old and blind!
Men point at me as smitten by God's frown;

Afflicted and deserted of my kind,
Yet I am not cast down.

I am weak, yet strong;
I murmur not, that I no longer see;
Poor, old, and helpless, I the more belong,
Father Supreme! to thee.

O, merciful One!
When men are furthest, then thou art most near;
When friends pass by, my weakness to shun,
Thy chariot I hear.

Thy glorious face
Is leaning toward me, and its holy light
Shines in upon my lonely dwelling-place—
And there is no more night.

On my bended knee,
I recognize thy purpose, clearly shown;
My vision thou hast dimmed, that I may see
Thyself, thyself alone.

I have nought to fear;
This darkness is the shadow of thy wing;
Beneath it I am almost sacred—here
Can come no evil thing.

Oh! I seem to stand
Trembling, where foot of mortal ne'er hath been,
Wrapped in the radiance from thy sinless land,
Which eye hath never seen.

Visions come and go;
Shapes of resplendent beauty round me throng;
From angel lips I seem to hear the flow
Of soft and holy song.

It is nothing now,
When heaven is opened on my sightless eyes,
When airs from Paradise refresh my brow,
The earth in darkness lies.

In a purer clime,
My being fills with rapture—waves of thought
Roll in upon my spirit—strains sublime
Break over me unsought.

Give me now my lyre!
I feel the stirrings of a gift divine;
Within my bosom glows unearthly fire,
Lit by no skill of mine.

WEEKLYANA.

THE Wharves, Tidal Basin, and Dock No. 1 at Kidderpore have been declared by the Local Government to be places for the landing and shipping of cargo.

THE newest member of the Bengal Legislative Council is Mr. Patrick Playfair. He succeeds Mr. C. H. Moore. The date of his appointment is the 27th July and he took his seat on the 30th following.

MR. C. A. Samuells, Officiating Commissioner of Excise, Bengal, takes three months' leave from the 12th instant. Mr. T. Inglis, Officiating Junior Secretary, Board of Revenue, will, in addition to his own duties, have charge of the current duties of the other office. This may be taken as an argument against independent existence of the new office of Excise Commissioner.

THE second half-yearly departmental examination of 1892 of Assistant and Deputy Magistrates, Special Deputy Collectors, and Sub-Deputy Collectors in the Regulation and Non-Regulation Districts, and of officers in the Police, Medical, Public Works, Forest and Opium Departments, will begin on Thursday, the 27th October next and be concluded on the Saturday following.

IN the Hyderabad libel case, S. M. Mitra has been allowed a month's time to prepare his defence. It will be taken up on the 29th.

THE Chief Presidency Magistrate, Bombay, has fined the manager of Messrs. D. B. Taraporewala, booksellers, Rs. 201 for selling an obscene book, "The Theory and Practice of Neo-Malthusianism," the one Rupee being added to give the defendant an opportunity of appealing to the High Court.

IN the same city a young man of twenty-one, Thomas Martin, formerly employed on the local railways, having been thrown out of work, and the mother of the young woman to whom he was engaged having broken off the match, swallowed opium to end his troubles and his life. Failing to kill himself, he was prosecuted for the attempt. The Magistrate showed his just appreciation of the law by sentencing him to one day's imprisonment.

JOHN HAWKINS, of Taunton, a plate-layer on the Great Western Railway, is being prosecuted for marrying Jane Caswell, his step-daughter. The charge is that he made a false declaration of marriage, saying that he was not related to her.

ON July 8, at the West London Police Court, Captain Walter Barnes Pugh was brought up for being drunk and disorderly in Hammersmith-road. The Magistrate, Mr. Montagu Williams, suspected in the prisoner a school fellow, and satisfying himself on the point by enquiring of him, ordered his discharge, advising him not to be drunk again. A stern judge would have acted differently.

HERE is a snake story from Japan which beats hollow all others, including the legends of the most imaginative American journalists:—

"One called Saito Tora-no-suke was one day breaking up some land, when he came upon a snake three feet long. Seizing it in his hands, he called out to his companions that if they would give him four dollars he would swallow the snake. Although dollars are scarce in Japan, it is stated that the money was at once subscribed, the onlookers not believing that the bet would be won. But, true to his word, Saito put the head of the creature into his mouth and swallowed the whole three feet of snake without difficulty. The punishment of his temerity was swift and fell. While his companions were gazing at him speechless with horror and astonishment, he was seen to change colour and fall to the ground in great pain, and he died in a few minutes."

That feat is worthy of the race that in a night effected in the same breath a political, a social, and a religious Revolution. Verily, these islanders of the Pacific coast are the rakshases of the Sanskrit authors.

WHILE the Government in India are anxious about the increase of population shewn in the last census, in France they have introduced in the Chamber a Bill providing against the steady decrease of numbers.

IN July last, M. Delafosse, Vicar-General of the diocese of Rennes, was fined 8*l*. for preaching sermons directed against the Government. He had denounced secular schools, saying that parents who sent their children to them were no more entitled to absolution than if guilty of blasphemy or immorality, and had spoken of a conflict as going on between God's soldiers and devils.

MR. Exshaw, of brandy fame, was born in France, is a British subject and resides at Bordeaux. His son, Alfred, was born at Bordeaux in 1871 and, under the Nationality Law of 1889, was inscribed on the Conscription List, and subsequently adjudged to serve in the Army. The son when of age had elected the British nationality. He now claimed to be freed from service in the French Army. The French Court has decided against him as both father and son were born in France.

AS a movement against Bremen and Liverpool, arrangements are making to found a Cotton Exchange at Hamburg.

THE terrible efficiency of the mannlicher was proved the other day near Arad, in Hungary, by a fatal accident. At a distance of nearly one and a half mile, a labourer was shot dead by a soldier at the practising ground, the labourer deeming himself safe for the space intervening.

THE Advocate of India notices that a Calcutta church warden advertises for "an M. A. or B. A., strong in Mathematics and English, to be a private tutor to a second year boy, salary Rs. 20 a month with free board and lodging. Residence in the house is compulsory." and asks,

"Has higher education reached this despicable level?"

Our contemporary moralises in this strain and concludes an excellent "leader" with an appropriate paragraph, whereof we submit the best portions:—

"The outlook for a relief to the possessors of University degrees is not bright. An overstocked market is being still more overstocked. In industries when there is over production the brake is put on, production is restricted until an equilibrium is established between demand and supply. No such law is either recognized or followed in higher education, and yet political economy and its laws are fully taught in the colleges. Should these colleges practise what they teach? Yes, says everybody, they should be true to their principles."

This is the writer's advice to the guardians of youth:—

"Should not these parents and friends make some forecast of the future economic condition of India? If they make this forecast they will find in the industrial centres that machinery is becoming the deity of the day. Engines and boilers, and tools and mechanical plant are being dragged all over the country and distributed everywhere, and if India is once so released from her currency difficulty as to attract European capital into the country the land will be filled with mechanics both of higher and a lower order. Mechanical industries are therefore the most promising life for Indian youth in the future. These industries are increasing rapidly while the field of candidates is not overstocked. It is exactly the reverse with higher education; the candidates for such employment as University men can engage in are ten times in excess of the business appropriate to their training. Hundreds of such candidates have committed irretrievable error by devoting the best part of their lives and no inconsiderable portion of the household means to secure a training which can gain an M. A. strong in Mathematics and English with the miserable pittance of twenty rupees a month."

THERE is a general movement among the Local Administrations against municipal management. This is not visible in the Bengal Legislative Council only. The Madras Government lately appointed a Chairman to the Municipal Board of Calicut, to the annoyance of the forward party in Malabar. They have now passed the following order:

"As M. R. Ry. M. Tillinayakam Pillai Avergal's duties in connection with the Revenue and Magisterial administration of the two important Taluks of Madura and Tirumangalam render it necessary that he should be relieved at the earliest possible date of the office of the Chairman, Municipal Council of Madura, and as no fitting Municipal Councillor can be found to take up the appointment, the Government considers it desirable to appoint a paid Chairman, but before passing final orders on the matter, the Municipal Council will be requested to submit as soon as possible any remarks it may have to offer on the proposal."

The Madura Mail loudly condemns the proposition of a paid Chairman for a Municipality. According to our contemporary,

"It means that the right of election which was purposely and deliberately granted to the Council by the Act of 1884 is to be permanently taken away from it. It means that the Government is to have the sole voice in appointing or removing the Chairman and that the Council is to be a puppet in his hands. It means that Lord Ripon's beneficent object of training indigenous talent for self-government and giving non-official gentlemen the rudiments of political education by initiating them in the administration of local affairs, is to be frustrated and set at naught. It means increased expenditure, which must sooner or later mean increased taxation. It seems to us that the only dignified course that the Council can adopt is to ask the Government to give it back the right of election, which the Government took away from it simply because the Act was so defective that there was no other way of getting rid of a Chairman whom neither the Council nor the Government wanted to remain where he was. After electing their Chairman, the Council may afterwards, if need be, consider the desirability or necessity of paying him a salary or an allowance. The Council can easily create a paid nominee of Government, but it would by no means be easy for it to get rid of him when it finds him to be needless or mischievous. As we have pointed out before, neither the Council nor the Government has the power to pay a Chairman, without the consent of the other."

The Malabar and Travancore Spectator has been speaking in the same strain of the official action at Calicut.

It seems a part of local self-government as understood by our countrymen of both Bengal and Madras, not to pay the labourer his hire. It is a mistake which must be rectified sooner or later. Municipalities equally in the North and the South have ceased to deserve the consideration claimed for them by our contemporaries.

NOTES & LEADERETTES

with OUR OWN NEWS.

THE new Parliament met on the 4th as announced at the dissolution. The first business, the election of the Speaker, was gone through quickly. The Right Hon. Arthur Wellesley Peel was re-elected unopposed, Mr. Gladstone seconding. Then commenced the swearing in of Members. Lord Salisbury's Government has decided to face the new House. The Queen's Speech will be read on the 8th, when the Opposition will move for a direct vote of want of confidence in the Government. It is probable that the Parliamentary Session will close directly after the vote is passed, after a debate of two days. To give point to the capture by the Conservatives of five Irish seats, one of the Ulster Members, Mr. Barton, has been selected to move the address in reply to the Queen's Speech. On the 5th, the Labour Member for South West Ham, Mr. Keir Hardie, went to the House in some state. He drove in a waggonette with a brass band playing the "Marseillaise." He was, however, dressed in a tweed suit and a cloth cap, which he wore in the House.

The anti-Parnellite new Committee, which reckons among its members Messrs. Blake and Michael Davitt, has re-elected Mr. Justin MacCarthy, Chairman.

CHOLERA is decreasing along the Volga but is on the increase along the river Don, where there were five hundred deaths in one day.

It has even attacked St. Petersburg. There was one death there on Monday.

Grain riots have been followed by Cholera riots in Russia. Stringent measures to suppress the disease at Tobolsk and Tomsk were resented by Sarts, who in thousands attacked and pillaged the house of the Deputy Governor and ultimately killed him. In return for the attack and murder, the troops who had to be called out fired upon the rioters and killed sixty and wounded upwards of a hundred.

ON the 3rd, there were seven deaths from cholera in Paris and the same number in Tours.

RUSSIAN secret despatches are being officially published by the Bulgarian Government, proving the complicity of high Russian officials in the plots to murder Prince Ferdinand. The Russian Government denounce the documents as forgeries.

HEAT is intense in New York and all the cities in the Eastern States of America. There have been several deaths from sunstroke. Business is almost at a stand-still. The weather at New York has since cooled down.

WE are evidently on the brink of a crisis. Matters seem to be coming to a head on the outer Afghan frontier. A Simla telegram of the 4th says that the Afghans have come into collision with the Russians and Chinese on the Alichar Pamir and have also carried off a number of Kirghis as captives. General Yanoff and his party are said to have come down to Aktash. The number of Russians on the Pamirs is uncertain, varying, according to different accounts, from five hundred to two thousand. A later report says that five Russians were killed and about fifteen taken prisoners, but whether the former were Russians or Kirghis it is impossible to say. Gholam Haider's whereabouts are still unknown. The English Conservative papers connect the Russian descent on the Pamirs with the accession of Mr. Gladstone to power.

ACCORDING to a London telegram of the 4th instant, several thousand rioters who took part in the late disturbances at Tashkend, fled and tried to enter Ferghana, but were repulsed by the local troops. The position of the Russians, however, is critical if the insurrection spreads, the majority of the Ferghana troops having gone to the Pamir. The Governor of Turkestan, who has been asked to send reinforcements from Tashkend, has refused owing to excitement among the Mussulmans there.

THE voluminous and rather angry correspondence which has lately been going on between the Government of India and the Ameer having failed to convince the latter against his will, the Viceroy invited him to a conference. It was on the face of it a wild suggestion to the Afghan ruler to leave his country at a time when it is in war with the tribes and beset by dangers on all sides. But the Viceroy had no choice. As he expected, the Ameer expressed his inability to come to India. Then His Excellency offered to send his own trusted man to samjao Abdur Rahman Khan. The Afghan has readily, and we believe gladly, consented. Accordingly, a deputation from India to Afghanistan will shortly leave, Lord Roberts heading it.

THE Gaekwar of Baroda and family are still travelling in Europe. They had an audience of the Queen of England and Empress of India at Windsor. In the wretched taste of the day, which cannot too severely be condemned, the Farzand-i-Khas-i-Doulat-i-Englishia was habited as a European with the exception of the head dress. The Maharani, however, was Oriental and not Occidental in her costume. She wore, says "Atlas" in the World, "a dark blue sari with heavy gold border, a bright pink jacket, and some of the finest pearls, emeralds and diamonds ever seen in Windsor in the day time." Her Majesty was all graciousness. "The Maharani addressed the Queen in very fair English and the Queen answered without much difficulty in Hindustani." There! there was an event, for those who have the imagination to see it. It was a prolonged conversation. The Gaekwar subsequently dined with Her Majesty. The Gaekwari party consisted of the Maharaja, the Maharani, their two sons, attended by Shriinant Sampatrao Gaekwar, the brother of the Maharaja, and Shrimant Sita Bai, Mrs. Elliott, and Rajashri Vasuan Madhan Samarth. The dinner party included their Royal Highnesses Prince and Princess Henry of Battenberg, his Highness the Maharaja of Gaekwar of Baroda, the Countess of Antrim (Lady-in-Waiting), Miss McNeill, the Marchioness of Lansdowne, and Lady Evelyn Fitz-Maurice, Viscount and Viscountess Cross, the Earl of Romney (Lord-in-Waiting), General the Right Hon. Sir Henry Ponsonby, the Hon. Sir Edmund Monson, Sir Gerald Seymour Fitzgerald (Political Aid-de-Camp), and Colonel Reynolds (Governor-General's Agent at Baroda).

THE Conference at Venice, in January last, for the sanitary control of ships passing through the Red Sea to Europe, proved abortive. A code on sanitary basis was prepared by France, and many of the Powers saw that it would be more acceptable than the diplomatic arrangement contrived between Austria and England. After discussion, the French code was modified and improved, and all the Powers accepted it except England and Turkey. With a view towards final settlement they lately reopened the Conference at Paris. Although Austria, France and England have each appointed a diplomatic delegate, yet it is known that the technical delegates—Dr. Proust, Professor Brouardel and Dr. Thorne—will decide the matter, and they have come to a satisfactory conclusion. A convention has been agreed upon. Mr. Constantine Phipps and Dr. Thorne have accepted it for England, M. Barrere, Professor Brouardel and Dr. Proust signed for France and Count Keufstein agreed for Austria-Hungary. The last Power will submit the convention to other Powers for their approval. The measures are now much less stringent, and consequently a greater facility will be afforded to vessels passing through the Suez Canal. Cholera patients, their nurses and immediate adherents are only to be landed in a hospital. If they are to be kept on board, the detention of the vessel will vary from a few hours to five days according to the date of the last attack, to put them under observation. But vessels without doctors will be under the control of doctors of the Alexandria Board. For some years an idea has grown identifying Moses' Wells near Suez as the plague spot on the route from which the cholera radiates to all parts of Europe. There is no excluding devout men from pilgrimage to a holy shrine, but the international physicians are not for receiving them back, believing that the pilgrims are sure to draw cholera from the Wells and on their return to contaminate the Western world. Hence stringent measures of isolation and disinfection are to be provided to their full extent. The English Government has consented to less authority on the Alexandria Board to make it more international in its character, and this has occasioned great satisfaction amongst the Continental Powers.

MATTERS are going from bad to worse in the Straits Settlements. The Malay insurrection has become a formidable thing. Six months ago, the Orang Kayah, in revenge apparently for some wrongs, real or imaginary, proceeded with a few followers and looted one or two police-guards. Armed with the captured rifles, he pursued a career of raiding, dacoiting several small towns or villages, until he was emboldened to threaten Pahang. A handful of Sikhs were sent to stop the further spread of Orang-ism, but it was then too late. Kayah had become a power. The utmost that could be done was to place Pahang into a temporary state of defence. The Straits Government then called upon the Sultan to suppress what threatened to become a very serious rising. They, furthermore, in especial requested him to operate against the Orang Kayah. He promised of course, but wasted valuable time in inaction, when the Resident was roused and goaded him. By that the Orang Kayah had over-run a large area of the country, maiming and murdering two Europeans, and it was not until he was within an ace of attacking Tras and Ruab that the Straits Government awoke to the fact that the situation had become serious. Still no European troops were pushed to Pahang on the absurd ground that the "climate was not suitable for Europeans," nor were the men-of-war, then lying idle in port, despatched for the safety of the besieged places. The Sultan, whose loyalty was suspected, allowed to take the field against the insurgent leader without the presence of a European in his camp, made no impression on the course of events. The rising was not stamped out, any more than the Orang Kayah was caught. Even after that, Government would not see the necessity of adequate measures. Once more some Sikhs only proceeded to mop away the flood. The rebels quietly took shelter in the jungle where the handful of sepoys dared not to follow them. The Sultan having already returned home, the country at large is practically at the mercy of the rebel leader and his horde. Add to all, the latest news is that the Sultan's own followers, headed by the Datoh Gajah, has destroyed a quantity of valuable new machinery belonging to the Raub Gold-mining Company.

Unless the Government of the Straits can soon show more activity and capacity, and concentrate all their forces, naval and military, for a crushing blow, the rebellion will pass beyond their power, and the Government of India will have to be called to reconquer the lost Province.

WE received yesterday the following telegram from Gya :—

Two thousand Sunni Mahomedans assembled in the Jumma mosque today, prayed for Nawab Abdool Luteef Bahadur's long life and prosperity and wired to him a message of gratitude for keeping Government informed of the true state of the Sunni feeling here on the late alarm and agitation by the Shias of this place and securing timely interference of Government in averting much apprehended breach of the local public peace.

A NEW feature of elective system has come to our notice. It shows to what low depth respectable and educated people can stoop when they have to defeat and insult their opponents. During a bye-election in the Natore Municipality, one Zamir jamadar, a head-peon of a local Magistrate, has been elected a Municipal Commissioner. We are told that this fortunate peada—porter or messenger—has been elected through the influence of an enlightened local Raja or Maharaja, whose object is to compel some of the most useful and respectable Commissioners to resign. The election has caused a great sensation in that little town, and it is said that a large number of Commissioners are going to resign. They cannot, they think, continue in their posts with a grain of self-respect in them. It is said that no meeting will be held again, as it is believed that most of the Commissioners will not attend. The new Municipal Commissioner is illiterate, and the object of thrusting him upon the Corporation is that he might insult the opponents of his master. It has also been notified in the Bazar that all the rayyets of the Rajdhanee shall call him a Moulvie in future. The Moulvie Peadah was to have been installed as a Commissioner on the 1st August and a valuable khillat given him after the ceremony by his high-minded and liberal patron.

Here is a godsend for Mr. Cotton. This incident unexpectedly supports several of his contentions.

As the municipal Bill is now before the Bengal Council, we hope the legislature will take notice of this election. If any one simply for vexatious and wicked purposes gets an unfit person elected in order to annoy and insult other Commissioners, it is very necessary that there should be some remedy, otherwise all good and honest people will be gradually driven out of the infusill Municipalities.

Party feeling being at its highest, the municipal administration of Natore has come to stand-still, and no useful work is done. The sufferers are the rate-payers. The town is one of the dirtiest in Bengal, full of all sorts of filth and sewage. There is no drainage and the rain water has no outlet. Malaria is making havoc among the population.

RAJA Surjakant Acharjee has appealed against the order of the Assistant Magistrate of Maimensing fining him Rs. 500 for building a wall of his house. While the appeal is pending before the District Judge, the High Court has made absolute the rule issued against the District Magistrate calling upon him to show cause why his order on the Raja not to rebuild the wall which the Magistrate had himself taken down, while his Assistant, before whom the complaint was pending, had not yet made his order, shall not be set aside. The High Court is of opinion that there can be no prohibition against repetition of what has not been declared a nuisance by a competent Court. Mr. Justice O'Kinealy argues that "if a man has been acquitted of an offence, it is hardly a proper thing to pass an order from an executive point of view, and say 'don't do it again.' Nor can it be said that he continued a public nuisance of any kind, for if the statement on the paper be correct, it appears that the nuisance has been abated. That being so we think that the order under section 143 is not an order that we should allow to stand on the record, and in making the rule absolute we set aside the order."

At the hearing, the Crown was not represented. Mr. Kilby indeed appeared but he was not ready to argue. He asked for an adjournment on the ground that the Advocate-General was unable to appear to show cause against the rule. The Court, however, refused the application on the opposition of Sir Griffith Evans, as it was not shown that Mr. Woodroffe's absence was due to any official business.

At the rising of the Court, Mr. Woodroffe appeared before the Chief Justice and asked for an order for a re-hearing of the rule. He took up high ground. Standing on the inalienable rights of the Sovereign whom he represented, he contended that the Divisional Bench had no jurisdiction in the matter in the Advocate-General's absence, however occasioned. The Crown, he said, was dominus litis in all criminal matters, and the Judges being servants of the Crown were bound to grant postponement of cases in which the Crown was concerned, on the demand of its representatives, not being competent to decide such cases unless those representatives were present and had been heard. The argument was worthy of the Advocate-General's subtlety. Considering what a labyrinth the English law is, who shall undertake to assert the soundness of the contention? Enough to know that Sir Comer Petheram saw no reason to interfere.

THE following attracted our notice in an article quoted from the Saturday Review in the Allahabad Morning Post :—

"Sterne's Maria's 'God tempers the winds to the shorn lamb' appeared long ago in Herbert of Cherbury's Jacula Prudentum (where perhaps that false Yorick found it, or he didn't know too much French, even of Stratford-at-Bowe) as 'To a close shorn sheep, God gives wind by measure'; and Lord Herbert must have translated this—for its form is not English—from the French proverb which Littré gives, 'A brebis tondue, Dieu mesure le vent.' This is also in Leroux (of 1786); but Cotgrave (1660) has it not, although he does give a right good answer to it in 'Les malvestus devers le vent,' just our 'The weakest to the wall.' But there are endless other French forms of Sterne's saw all over the place."

Unless there is an inherent and special confusion in the matter, that correction cannot go unchallenged. There are in English literary history two contemporaries of the name of Herbert, who were brothers—George the divine and sacred Poet, and Edward, Lord Herbert of Cherbury, the diplomatist and statesman, who wrote probably the first autobiography in English, but is better known for his deistical publications. Did each of the brothers Herbert publish his Jacula Prudentum? This kind of work was, no doubt, a favorite with men of wit and learning in those early times, and the great Bacon himself did not disdain it. We have before us the good George Herbert's Jacula Prudentum first printed in the year of the Revolution, 1640, but of course the alleged original of poor Maria's maxim, worthy of Holy Writ—a maxim, by the way, which has always profoundly struck us with its pathos and its trustfulness—does not occur in it.

We were shocked to hear of the death of Baboo Surendra Nath Mitter, eldest son of the late Mr. Justice Dwarkanath Mitter. He died suddenly of a short and apparently simple fever. The doctors themselves are as much surprised at the silent prognosis and startling finale as his unsophisticated friends. As was remarked in the case of General Washington, the news of death preceded the report of illness. There are evidently mysteries in the commonest complaints beyond the Faculty.

The deceased had been a brilliant boy who disappointed his early promise. It was due partly to the entourage of his father who not only saw a prodigy in the boy but some of them thought it politeness, and others conceived it their interest, to pile proofs upon proofs of the fact, in season and out of season, before the partial parent. Not content with that, several of them dwelt on the supposed proofs in the presence or in the hearing of the prodigified. The result was, that if the brilliant parent narrowly escaped demoralization, the poor boy could scarcely help being in some degree spoiled. Still he was an uncommon lad and might have done uncommonly well. Here the father was in the boy. Brilliant men do not make good fathers any more than good husbands. The brilliant Bengali Judge of the High Court was no exception. With the best intentions in the world, he was his son's worst enemy. He was at him from the earliest period, and at once distracted and overburdened him. He would teach him everything, but specially he would see him distinguish himself in the mathematical and physical sciences in which he most delighted. The precocious aptitude which the boy showed in these, only aggravated the intellectual persecution against him—drew down on him further tortures of learning on his devoted head. What wonder the poor fellow broke down!

His mother had died before his father, and the untimely death of his father left him doubly an orphan. Thus thrown upon the world without guardians, a scion of wealth within his teens, without a career, without any urgent occupation, it is very creditable to young Surendra that nothing worse was alleged against him in a censorious community than extravagance. But his expenditure lay in a harmless direction. He had a weakness for purchases. He filled his large house and grounds with all sorts of things. He was still scientific in his tastes, still pursuing astronomy, zoology, botany and other sciences. Photography and the arts too attracted him. On the whole, he found himself in good occupations, and doubtless he lived a more interesting and not unuseful life than most youngmen of wealth in this or any other country.

He was a chip of a fine rare block. A noble soul, ever ready to relieve others, indeed charitable to a fault, manly, truthful, hating falsehood, and honest to the backbone. The death of such a man is a greater loss to society than the passing away in triumph of many a "bogus" notability.

THE din of the Moharram has been loudest in the Allahabad High Court. Mr. Justice Mahmood, in open Court, resented the preparation of the cause list of his Court without reference to himself, though under rules of the Court sanctioned by himself and the other Judges, and refused to attend Court during the whole period of the Moharram. He had no religious scruples in the matter, but as a matter of social propriety, he thought that he had the right as one of Her Majesty's Judges to decline to be forced to sit during the Ashr-i-Moharram. He is, however, a loyal servant of the Crown, and would not put the Government or the public to any real inconvenience. He said:—"I intend to remain in Allahabad during the whole of this Ashr-i-Moharram and I shall during this period be available for any emergent work that may arise during that period and which may be required by my own sense of duty under the Letters Patent with which Her Majesty has honored me as a puisne Judge of this Court, and which I have loyally accepted." Mr. Justice Mahmood is a very able Judge who knows his rights and means to assert them. But he knows his duties too, and will strictly perform them. He claims equal privileges with the Chief Justice except in one or two matters.

The revolt of the Mahomedan Judge was taken up by the Mahomedan lawyers and they too kept away. An appeal came up before the Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Blair. Mr. M. A. Rushid, Counsel for the appellant, being absent, the Chief Justice dismissed it, as no previous application had been made for its postponement.

Englishmen are not likely to sympathise with a contention of Easterns independent of religious scruple. But they ought to appreciate the manliness which takes its stand on civil rights, scorning to take shelter under a religious plea which might sometimes or in the case of some be false.

We are afraid there is a mistake in the reading of the telegram received by us from Gya which appears at the bottom of p. 376, col. 1. The word "and" between "alarm" and "agitation" in line 5 of the telegram was of our introduction to make sense. It makes poor sense, to be sure, though better grammar. It now appears that "alarm" is a blunder of the signaller in wiring alam—the standard which is carried in the Moharram procession and which is now being employed in many places as a signal for uttering the Tabarra or imprecations. The passage should be read "the late alam agitation" &c.

We may as well here state that we received the telegram from a gentleman whom we do not know, but as he dates it from the Jumma Masjid, he must be the Superintendent of that religious edifice.

The spontaneous impulse of two thousand Mahomedans at a great city in Behar assembling at the Cathedral-mosque of the city and praying for Nawab Abdool Luteef Bahadar, is a great thing for that gentleman. This, speaking secularly. From a religious point, it is a great deal more—of incalculable value. Islam is still a living faith. The Mussulmans have not yet degraded their religion by making of it a political stock-in-trade. No tyrant in the world could send two thousand Mussulmans to a mosque to make a hypocritical profession. Is there any serious-minded, not to say religious, man who doubts that the sincere intercession of two thousand men with the Almighty counts for nothing?

Humanly speaking, the Nawab deserves the thanks of not only Mussulmans but all communities as well as of the Government, for his exertions in preventing bloodshed and the horrors of a bitter internecine religious struggle.

AN esteemed Mahomedan correspondent writes to us in connection with our leader on the Moharram in our last issue :—

"The article on the Moharram will cause a great sensation. I am sorry however that two errors in spelling have crept in which would not be noticed in any other paper, except in the Reis and Rayyet. One is Hassan. The martyr of Karbala was not Hassan, but his younger brother Hossain—the elder, having been poisoned a few months earlier. The other is Bhishti. The word is Bihishti, which means one whose dwelling place is or ought to be the Heavens, on account of his business being to supply drinking water to the thirsty, a most pious act. It was first corrupted to Bhishti and the Europeans dropped the h after the s and made it Bhishti. This last word is quite vulgar. Bhishti, with the h is passable."

LADY Evelyn Fitzmaurice, daughter of Lord and Lady Lansdowne, was united in holy wedlock, on the 30th July, to the Hon. Victor Cavendish, at St. Margaret's Westminster, in the presence of the highest society. It is difficult to regard without mixed feelings this grand wedding in high life in England, while the father of the young bride is locked up in splendid exile on the heights of the Himalayan hills on the borders of Chinese Tartary. Lord Lansdowne must be musing at heart in the strain of the Poet,

O, had I the wings of a dove,
How soon would I be home again, to preside on the happy occasion! May all the joys of married life without its trials be theirs!

To the people of India, it was immaterial whether the wedding took place in Europe or Asia. They have no part in such functions, even as mere beholders. Even if the great Lord Saheb married his son or daughter in this country, no shrine would be the richer by a minished Rupee, nor any beggar be fuller in the belly by a single fried bread (pooree). There would be no noisy procession with music and lights to enjoy. No crowds would be permitted to hover round the church to contemplate in mute wonder at the white ladies and gentlemen and their seemingly well-rehearsed pantomime. If the more curious attempted a peep within the lofty spired pile, they would stand a good chance of being sent by a zealous constabulary to make the acquaintance of the inside of a lock-up. No native of the soil would be invited. Not even the Chiefs and Princes of the land who may have many a time been privileged to receive the Viceroy and family and suite as honoured guests at their own seats, would be apprised of the happy event. Certainly, the people would not know that anything was the matter in the family or at the Palace of the Ruler—the great Satrap of all the Indies. Far be it from us to complain. Where nobody was to blame, complaint were gratuitous injustice. We only indulge in obvious reflections on a changed order. It is well that our people do not know the personal joys and sorrows of our rulers. Where ignorance is bliss, 'tis folly to be wise! The marriage of the heir of the British Nawab Viceroy and Governor-General of India could scarcely stand comparison for popular effect with the least demonstrative wedding at the house of the Nawab Nizam-ool-moolk Bahadur of the Deccan, or of the Maharaja of Patiala, or even, coming down to non-ruling Chiefs, with such a grand wedding as took place the other day at the seat of Dumraon. The people still cherish the memory of the pomp and profusion with which Mahabbat Jang celebrated the nuptials of his ill-fated grandson, on which occasion, for one thing, open table was maintained for a whole month at the Nawab's expense for the people throughout the country.

But the ways of the Mussulmans and Hindus are not the ways of the British. We shall not be surprized to hear that Lord Lansdowne had, by way of marking his joy, sent donations to the Charities of Calcutta, Bombay, Madras, Lahore and other cities.

A TRAVELLER in Italy, while passing through Turin, recently called upon the aged Hungarian patriot Kossuth, who lives there in modest and comfortable circumstances. He was surprised to see a man of ninety rise to greet him with the ease of a man of seventy or less. Kossuth still reads and writes without spectacles, is not deaf, takes his daily walks, and speaks England's English as he did when delivering eloquent lectures on Hungary forty years ago. Throughout life, Kossuth has, in diet, lived simply, and this moderation now has its reward in an old age full of surprising elasticity and vigour.

AFTER all, the old man is not happy. He has turned a misanthrope, with all his fervent republicanism. We learn—

"Kossuth continues a consistent Freethinker, and is more pronouncedly Republican than in '48, considering Presidents of Republics as needless and as but an imitation of Monarchy. The social question, he considered, and the question of capital and labour would become aggravated as years went on, and culminate in a frightful convulsion. That was another certainty. 'I have quitted humanity,' said Kossuth, 'left it at a distance.' There is no wonder at this, considering the universality of hypocrisy and ingratitude, the littleness of the public mind, the ignorance of the masses, and the debauched state of the world's political press. 'La société moderne est une grande bête.'"

So this is the latest gospel of the great Patriot—Modern society is a huge beast. Alas! alas for the world!

KOSSUTH is still engaged in the memoirs of his eventful life. Three only of the dozen volumes in which he hopes to complete them, have already appeared. He dwelt with much pleasure on his recollections of the reception given him in America after quitting Europe. In the six months of his stay there, he delivered six hundred speeches. He never reads books printed about him, nor notices in the newspapers. The old story!

GOOD luck, like ill, is contagious. Home Rule flushed with success at the General Election, has scored a literary triumph of no little consequence. It has drawn from the veteran bard Robert Buchanan a charming little poem. Here it is:—

✓"THE UNION."

"This is the Unionist—yea, this is he Whom every honest heart would choose to be!"

The speech our English freemen spoke
Still fills the plains afar,
Where branches of our English oak
Wave 'neath the Western star;
"Be free!" men cried, in Shakspeare's tongue,
When smiting for the slave—
Thus Hampden's cry for Freedom rung
As far as Lincoln's grave!

Back rings that cry from far away
To fill the Motherland,
Where 'neath the Union Jack this day
Both false and true men stand.
Hark to the foes of all things free,
Who, arm'd in hate, intone:
"The Union! Let our war-cry be /That word, and that alone!"

"The Union! Kiss the dead Christ's face,
While brandishing the sword,
Foster the scorn of race for race,
Exult, and praise the Lord!
Carry the rule of pride and hate
O'er earth from pole to pole!
The Union! leave men desolate,
/But keep the Empire whole!"

"The Union? Yes, in God's name! still,
The Union!" we reply:
The Union of a Nation's will Against each timbrel'd Lie!
The Union beautiful and good
Of lands by Love made one!
/One heart, one cause, one brotherhood,
One Empire, 'neath the sun!

"That Union which hath been so long
Our boast from sea to sea,—
Justice, redressing human wrong,
Love, keeping all men free;
Not that which starves one hapless Land
While others smile full-fed,
Not that which from a brother's hand
Would snatch his daily bread!"

"Union in strength of Love, not Hate!
Union in Peace, not Strife!
Union to keep inviolate
/The sacraments of Life!
Union in one great common aim,
Triumphant late or soon,
To share the freedom we proclaim
With all who beg the boon!"

"Not Union based on braggart's boasts,
Or on the robber's creed,
Not Union thrust by armed hosts
On lives that would be freed !
Not Union fed by hate and wrath
Where'er the weak make moan !
No ! Union on the heavenward path
Where Justice hath her throne !

"Justice to all, and first, to those
Who speak our common speech—
Help to our brethren, great or small,
Free thought, free laws, for each :
Who chains his brother to his side
Seeketh his help in vain,
And Might is impotent to guide
The Souls that Love may gain.

"This is the Union which is still
Our strength from sea to sea—
Freedom, whose mandates we fulfil
By leaving all men free !
To sheathe the sword, to help man's lot,
To break each cruel chain !
The Union ?—Yes, by God !—but not
A pact 'tween Christ and Cain !"

THE MOHARRAM.

THE Moharram has passed off in Bengal without any disturbance. This we say from what we have been able to learn up to this date. The authorities at Chuprah did not allow the Shias to take out the Alam with Mashak and Tir. The motion against that order of the Magistrate is still pending in the High Court, and may very likely be taken up by Messrs. O'Kinealy and Amir Ali some time next week. Although the Moharram has come to an end, the Shias of Chupra are anxious to take out the Alam, if allowed to do so, on the day of the chihlum which will take place in the beginning of September next.

As for Gya, there was great commotion among both the Shias and the Sunnis and there was an apprehension of a serious breach of the peace. The Commissioner calmly considered the representations of both sides, and discovered that the Shias of Gya had made a similar attempt in 1882, but owing to the strong objection of the Sunnis, permission was refused by the authorities—and ever since no further application had been made by them for the taking out of the Mashak and Tir with the Alam. Their application this year being thus a pure innovation, he was unable to grant it, especially as there was a likelihood of a disturbance among the members of the two sects. He accordingly reversed the order of the executive authorities and issued instructions not to allow the procession in question. We have not yet heard of any disturbance at Murshidabad, and we trust that everything has passed off satisfactorily there.

At Garden Reach, there was some fear of a quarrel, and Moulvi Abdool Jubbar Khan Bahadur the Suburban Police Magistrate, was present at the spot on the last day of the Moharram. We understand that Prince Jehan Kadr adopted special measures to warn the Shias of that locality against using any expressions which might give offence to the Sunnis. This had the desired effect, and there was no disturbance.

In Calcutta, there has never been a dispute between the Shias and the Sunnis, as the leaders of the two sects have always been on the best of terms, and neither has ever given cause of offence to the other. The Moguls, or Persian merchants, who celebrate the Moharram in two richly furnished Imambarahs, and who are the most influential and wealthy Shias in Calcutta, do never allow the Tabarra to be uttered in their Imambarahs, or in the company of their grand processions with richly caparisoned horses and valuable Alams,—nor do they ever think of taking out any Alam with Mashak and Tir—or in any way offending the religious susceptibilities of the Sunnis. The result is that their Imambarahs and Processions are daily attended by a very large number of respectable Sunnis.

These processions occupy about two and half hours on each of the three days in the Moharram, during which the public roads are held by the Police and traffic entirely stopped. But the whole thing is so nicely and decorously managed, that there has never been any dispute or disturbance. This has been going on for the last 70 or 80 years, and the authorities or the various communities inhabiting the metropolis have never found cause for dissatisfaction with the arrangements of the Moguls. The chief credit belongs, however, to the Hon'ble Mr. Lambert and his predecessors in office for the very effective arrangements made by them for the passing of the processions through the crowded streets of Calcutta. Besides the processions of the Moguls, thousands of low class Mahomedans, almost entirely of the Sunni sect, take out numbers of large Taziahs in procession through the streets of Calcutta, accompanied by drums, torches, &c., and this is really a source of great anxiety to the Police. But they have, under the leadership of Mr. Lambert and his Deputy Mr. Barnard, managed the whole thing in such an admirable manner that it has passed off most satisfactorily and without a single hitch. We would be wanting in our duty to Sir Charles Elliott if we did not tender him the grateful thanks of the general community, for the firm attitude which he has assumed since his accession to the guddee at Belvedere, in putting down with a strong hand all breaches of the peace between the different communities on religious grounds throughout the territories under his Government.

THE LUNGAR PROCESSION OF HYDERABAD.

ON Saturday last, the 30th July, there were grand doings at Hyderabad, in the Deccan, which threw into the shade all the Moharram exhibitions throughout India. It was the day of the Lungar there—the Carnival of the Nizam. Like the Bera at Moorshedabad, it is not the observance of any religious injunction, Hindu or Mussulman, yet it is duly observed, year after year, and has been so observed for nearly three centuries, without interruption. Unlike the Bera, however, whose beginnings have been lost by the popular memory, the Lungar has a well-remembered historic origin. Not but what a Niebuhr or a Lewis could not suggest doubts in it, but as no palpable improbability is involved in it and as it is not timed in the dim past but belongs to a late modern and civilized era, the origin assigned may be believed. The able Hyderabad correspondent of the Bombay Advocate of India gives the account as follows:—

"On the fifteenth of the month of Zilhaj 1003 H. corresponding with A. D. 1594, Prince Abdulla whose father, Sultan Kulu Kutub, was then reigning left Hyderabad for Golconda with a large body of nobles and attendants. He was mounted on an elephant and shortly after leaving the Purana Pool Gate the animal became mad and charged amongst the nobles and attendants, compelling them to flee for their lives. After this the elephant moved off towards the jungle, still having the unfortunate Prince on his back. His mother, Haryat Baksh Begum, when she heard what had occurred became much alarmed for her son's safety. She ordered food to be placed in various places around Hyderabad for both the elephant and her son. She vowed that if he returned safely she would make a chain of gold similar in thickness and weight to that used for fastening up elephants. Her son returned safely on the same elephant after an absence of six days—so the chronicles say,—and his mother, in conformity with her vow collect all the goldsmiths of the city together and set them at work to make a gold chain. When it was finished her son carrying the chain and followed by an immense procession of all the nobles and troops of the State, went to the shrine of a Shia saint in the city to offer up thanks for his preservation from the elephant. At the conclusion of the ceremony the gold chain was broken into pieces and distributed amongst fakirs and other religious mendicants—and from that date the procession became an annual custom here, the Nizams, although not Shias, following the custom of their predecessors, the Kutab Shahis, in allowing it."

Doubtless, the stern Tartars and Moguls who succeeded the Kutab Shahis in the Deccan, continued the Tamasha by way of conciliating their subjects, the more so as their own stern Faith is deficient in those elements which appeal to the imagination of a childlike people wedded to colour and sound.

The same correspondent gives a graphic account of the last Lungar procession. The weather was delightful. In this connection he has invented a phrase, which will doubtless be popular among the flaneurs, clawbacks, pickthanks, bhats, and encomiasts with which Hyderabad abounds. The new coin, an adaptation of an existing one, is Nizam's weather. Says the writer:—

"The Lungar on a rainy day is as gloomy as it is the very opposite on a bright one. On Saturday, fortunately for sight-seers, the squally monsoonish weather and high winds that have been prevailing of late gave way to glorious sunshine tempered by light invigorating breezes—real Nizam's weather. It is a notable fact that when any great function takes place at Hyderabad at which His Highness presides it is invariably favoured by magnificent weather, what is known as Queen's weather in England."

That is a delicate compliment creditable to the literary man and of which no civilized ruler need be ashamed. But, then, the surviving native courtiers of the old school of the time of Afzal-ud-Doula are sure to run it to death by attributing a miracle to a Prince, who never came to expose himself to foul weather for a Tamasha.

The Advocate's correspondent saw the Lungar procession to the best advantage—with a full stomach and a body and soul fortified and exhilarated by genuine Nawabi pilaos and the rarest wines. On this occasion it is customary for the Minister to invite the European society of Hyderabad, Chudderghat, Secunderabad and Bolarum, as well as European ladies and gentlemen from distant places, besides the elite of the capital to pass the day with him at his town residence and depart after seeing the procession in the evening. This year as usual invitations had been issued, more than a week previous, to more than five hundred persons likely to attend. Accordingly, on Saturday there was a gathering "of all the beauty and the chivalry" and all the representatives of civil power and of wealth at His Excellency Sir Asman Jah's Palace the Khana Bagh. The advent on holiday-making of so many guests, all of the well-favoured and influential classes, including not a few representatives of wealth and of landed possessions and of power, in their different equipages, attended by liveried attendants as they passed through the crowded thoroughfare and descended at the gate of the vast mansion, formed itself a procession—which would be remembered at any other city—as if to offer a foretaste of the grander pageant to follow. Mr. Correspondent Saheb knew even by sight but a few of the concourse of notabilities. He says:—

"Amongst the throng I noticed Major Gough, Colonel Ludlow, C.I.E., General East, B.C., Mr. and Mrs. Dunlop, Captain and Mrs. Beauchamp, Mr. and Mrs. Fellowes, Mr. and Mrs. Hugh Gough, Mr. and Mrs. Harold, Mr. and Mrs. Robinson, Mr. and Mrs. G. Heenan, Mr. Gauntlett, Mr. and Mrs. Pendlebury, Mr. and Mrs. Berkley, Mr. and Mrs. Gordon, Mr. and Miss Gallagher, Mr. and Mrs. F. Schaffier, Miss (Dr.) Elzhoiz, Rev. Mr. Hill, Rev. Mr. Rowe, Mr. H. Fitzpatrick, Mr. Lamont, Mr. Pollard, Mr. Warner, Mr. Fardoonjee, Mr. Mrs. and Miss Gribble, Miss Shortt, Captain and Mrs. Cary, Mrs. Dobbie, Nawab Vicar-ul-Mulk, Rajah Sheoraj Daramwant, Rajah Murli Manohur, Miss Nundy, Mr. and Mrs. Mohamed Ahmed, Syed Ikbai Ali, Syed Ali Bilgrami, B. A., Mr. Mehdi Ali Khan, Nawab Mohsin-ul-Mulk, Mr. Dorabjee Dossabhai, Nawab Framurz Jung, Mr. Sham Uddin Ali Khan, Syed Serajul Hossein, Dr. Kareem Khan and a number of other officials European and Native. The Resident and family were not present in consequence of the indisposition of Mrs. Plowden but of the Residency staff there were Mr. Irwin, First Assistant; Captain Adye, officiating Military Secretary; Mr. Bosanquet, Second Assistant, and Lieutenant Arbuthnot, A.D.C."

The writer gives a graphic description of the scene he beheld from the Khana Bagh. His picture of Native Hyderabad on the Lungar Festival is painted with vivid but by no means extravagant colours, showing the hand of a true artist. But we have no space for it. We hasten to the far-famed Lungar itself:—

"It consists of a procession of all the troops, regular and irregular, in the Nizam's service, interspersed with elephants in gorgeous trappings, camels decked out to look as respectable as those ugly animals can be, led horses with the most elaborately embroidered saddle-cloths and head-gear, and a motley crowd of natives dressed in the most fantastic costumes that their imaginations can devise. Besides these there are numerous bodies of fierce and villainous looking Arabs, Rohillas and Pathans in the service of the State and the nobility, who march or rather trot past, to the sound of the strongest and most weird music imaginable, with old flint matchlocks on their backs and shouting out praises of their chiefs and their own bravery. The bells of the elephants, the beating of tom toms, the braying of the different bands of the irregular troops playing execrably out of tune, the yells of the Arabs, the led horses prancing and neighing, all these go to make up a universal din that must be heard to be believed and which is simply indescribable."

"Rohillas and Pathans" seems a slip, for the Rohillas are Pathans. But that by the way. We conclude with the account of this year's Lungar:—

"As usual this year the pageant was headed by the city police forces, both mounted and foot, led by the Kotwal, the Nawab Akbar Jung, C. S. I., seated in a fine howdah on the back of a huge elephant. Then followed for the space of about one hour an interminable procession of Arab jamadars and their strange followers. Pathan jamadars and their men, elephants with the sons and relatives of city magnates, seated in gorgeous howdahs, camel sowars, irregular cavalry, led horses saddled and bridled or caparisoned in cloth of gold, saddle-cloths and bridles and bodies of men in blue, scarlet and green. After these came the irregular troops, and very irregular most of them were too, both as regards dress and marching. I notice that some of the irregular are still clad in uniforms of the old French pattern with the quaintly shaped head-pieces. These are the men amongst whom the name of the great French adventurer,—Monsieur Raymond—is still cherished.—The deeds of "Mussuram" as they style him, are still themes of speculation and story with them. They honour his tomb and once a year go thither to sing at his shrine. The whole of these irregular troops are armed with the Old Brown Bess, so that if they are not dangerous they are still ornamental and help once a year to add to the glories and picturesqueness of the Lungar. The shrill sounds of a cavalry band next announced the approach of that small but splendid body of men known as the Golconda Brigade. At the head of his men rode that fine cavalry soldier, Major Asfur Jung, surrounded by a brilliant staff gorgeous in gold lace. First came the Golconda Cavalry, three squadrons strong, each numbering from 90 to 100 sabres. These elicited much praise as they defiled past in splendid order, as also did the Maiseram regiment clad in a picturesque Zouave costume and the Golconda Infantry both of which regiments went past at a swinging pace keeping excellent time to the music of their infantry band stationed opposite the Khana Bagh. A bullock battery of artillery, with five guns, brought up the rear of this fine brigade, numbering in all some three thousand men. Next came the division under Colonel Nevill, known as the Nizam's Regular troops, the finest body of troops in the service. The cavalry especially the African guards in their dark blue uniform with white braid, were much admired. Besides the African Guards, the Cavalry brigade consisted of the 1st and 2nd Hyderabad Lancers, one in white and the other in yellow facings and head dress. Behind these came two horse batteries of four guns each horsed by fine large walers and every thing looking very spick and span. Following the Artillery came the Infantry in one brigade of three regiments. The first that went past, heading the brigade was Captain Hartle's regiment, the second with their drums and fifes playing the British Grenadiers. This was by far the best regiment of the three composing the brigade. The next the 4th Infantry under Captain Finglas—did not show to advantage in their shabby looking Khakée trousers and faded head dress and the last, the 6th Infantry under Captain Griffin were not very much better as regards marching. As this last regiment came opposite the Minister's residence there was a long stoppage and many of the guests getting impatient and it being already 6 o'clock, began to depart but the long procession did not finish to defile until nearly two hours later, the rear being brought up by the Paigah troops of Sir Asman Jah and a miscellaneous body of irregulars, Jamadars, camel sowars, Rohillas and Jawans."

Thus passed the Lungar of Hyderabad. It was not only a most magnificent pageant but a unique spectacle such as is not to be seen in any part of the world. It recalls the glories of old Delhi during the height of Mogul supremacy where two hundred thousand soldiers were habitually quartered. In no part of India out of the Nizam's Dominions in these days, could so many troops be turned out for a tamasha year after year to swell the triumph of the Lungar at Hyderabad.

TODS' AMENDMENT.

The World hath set its heavy yoke
Upon the old white-bearded folk
Who strive to please the King.
God's mercy is upon the young,
God's wisdom in the baby tongue
That fears not anything.

The Parable of Chajju Bhagat.

Now Tod's Mamma was a singularly charming woman, and every one in Simla knew Tod's. Most men had saved him from death on occasions. He was beyond his ayah's control altogether, and perilled his life daily to find out what would happen if you pulled a Mountain Battery mule's tail. He was an utterly fearless young Pagan, about six years old, and the only baby who ever broke the holy calm of the Supreme Legislative Council.

It happened this way: Tod's pet kid got loose, and fled up the hill, off the Boileaugunge Road, Tod's after it, until it burst in to the Viceregal Lodge lawn, then attached to 'Peterhoff.' The Council were sitting at the time, and the windows were open because it was warm. The Red Lancer in the porch told Tod's to go away; but Tod's knew the Red Lancer and most of the Members of Council personally. Moreover, he had firm hold of the kid's collar, and was being dragged all across the flower-beds. 'Give my salaam to the long Councillor Sabib, and ask him to help me take Moti back!' gasped Tod's. The Council heard the noise through the open windows; and, after an interval, was seen the shocking spectacle of a Legal Member and a Lieutenant-Governor helping, under the direct patronage of a Commander-in-Chief and a Viceroy, one small and very dirty boy in sailor's suit and a tangle of brown hair, to coerce a lively and rebellious kid. They headed it off down the path to the Mall, and Tod's went home in triumph and told his Mamma that all the Councillor Sabibs had been helping him to catch Moti. Whereat his Mamma smacked Tod's for interfering with the administration of the Empire; but Tod's met the Legal Member the next day, and told him in confidence that if the Legal Member ever wanted to catch a goat, he, Tod's, would give him all the help in his power. 'Thank you, Tod's,' said the Legal Member.

Tod's was the idol of some eighty jbampanis, and half as many saises. He saluted them all as 'O Brother.' It never entered his head that any living human being could disobey his orders; and he was the buffer between the servants and his Mamma's wrath. The working of that household turned on Tod's, who was adored by every one from the dhoby to the dog-boy. Even Futtch Khan, the villainous loafer kbit from Mussoorie, shirked risking Tod's displeasure for fear his co-mates should look down on him.

So Tod's had honour in the land from Boileaugunge to Chota Simla, and ruled justly according to his lights. Of course, he spoke Urdu, but he had also mastered many queer side-speeches like the chotee bole of the women, and held grave converse with shopkeepers and Hill-coolies alike. He was precocious for his age, and his mixing with natives had taught him some of the more bitter truths of life: the meanness and the sordidness of it. He used, over his bread and milk, to deliver solemn and serious aphorisms, translated from the vernacular into the English, that made his Mamma jump and vow that Tod's must go Home next hot weather.

Just when Tod's was in the bloom of his power, the Supreme Legislature were hacking out a Bill for the Sub-Montane Tracts, a revision of the then Act, smaller than the Punjab Land Bill but affecting a few hundred thousand people none the less. The Legal Member had built, and bolstered, and embroidered, and amended that Bill, till it looked beautiful on paper. Then the Council began to settle what they called the 'minor details.' As if any Englishman legislating for natives knows enough to know which are the minor and which are the major points, from the native point of view, of any measure! That Bill was a triumph of 'safeguarding the interests of the tenant.' One clause provided that land should not be leased on longer terms than five years at a stretch; because, if the landlord had a tenant bound down for, say, twenty years, he would squeeze the very life out of him. The notion was to keep up a stream of independent cultivators in the Sub-Montane Tracts; and ethnologically and politically the notion was correct. The only drawback was that it was altogether wrong. A native's life in India implies the life of his son. Wherefore, you cannot legislate for one generation at a time. You must consider the next from the native point of view. 'Curiously enough, the native now and then, and in Northern India more particularly, hates being overprotected against himself. There was a Naga-village once, where they lived on dead and buried Commissariat mules. . . . But that is another story.

For many reasons, to be explained later, the people concerned objected to the Bill. The Native Member in Council knew as much about Punjab as he knew about Charing Cross. He had said in Calcutta that 'the Bill was entirely in accord with the desires of that large and important class, the cultivators,' and so on, and so on. The Legal Member's knowledge of natives was limited to English-speaking Durbaris, and his own red chaprassi, the Sub-Montane Tracts concerned no one in particular, the Deputy Commissioners were a good deal too driven to make representations, and the measure was one which dealt with small landholders only. Nevertheless, the Legal Member prayed that it might be correct, for he was a nervously conscientious man. He did not know that no man can tell what natives think unless he mixes with them with the varnish off. And not always then. But he did the best he knew. And the measure came up to the Supreme Council for the final touches, while Tod's patrolled the Burra Simla Bazar in his morning rides, and played with the monkey belonging to Ditta Mull, the bunmia, and listened, as a child listens, to all the stray talk about this new freak of the Lord Sabib's.

One day there was a dinner-party, at the house of Tod's Mamma, and the Legal Member came. Tod's was in bed, but he kept awake till he heard the bursts of laughter from the men over the coffee. Then he paddled out in his little red flannel dressing-gown and his night-suit and took refuge by the side of his father, knowing that he would not be sent back. 'See the miseries of having a family!' said Tod's father, giving Tod's three prunes, some water in a glass that had been used for claret, and telling him to sit still. Tod's sucked the prunes slowly, knowing that he would have to go when they were finished, and sipped the pink water like a man of the world, as he listened to the conversation. Presently, the Legal Member, talking 'shop' to the Head of a Department, mentioned his Bill by its full name--'The Sub-Montane Tracts Ryotwary Revised Enactment.' Tod's caught the one native word and lifting up his small voice said--

'Oh, I know all about that! Has it been murramuted yet, Councillor Sabib?'

'How much?' said the Legal Member.

'Murramuted---mended---Put theek, you know---made nice to please Ditta Mull!'

The Legal Member left his place and moved up next to Tod's.

'What do you know about ryotwari, little man?' he said.

'I'm not a little man, I'm Tod's, and I know all about it. Ditta Mull, and Choga Lall, and Amir Nath, and---oh, lakhs of my friends tell me about it in the bazars when I talk to them.'

'Oh, they do---do they? What do they say, Tod's?'

Tod's tucked his feet under his red flannel dressing-gown and said---'I must finik.'

The Legal Member waited patiently. Then Tod's with infinite compassion---

'You don't speak my talk, do you, Councillor Sabib?'

'No; I am sorry to say I do not,' said the Legal Member.

'Very well,' said Tod's, 'I must finik in English.'

He spent a minute putting his ideas in order, and began very slowly, translating in his mind from the vernacular to English, as many Anglo-Indian children do. You must remember that the Legal Member helped him on by questions when he halted, for Tod's was not equal to the sustained flight of oratory that follows.

'Ditta Mull says, "This thing is the talk of a child, and was made up by fools." But I don't think you are a fool, Councillor Sabib,' said Tod's hastily. 'You caught my goat. This is what Ditta Mull says---"I am not a fool, and why should the Sirkar say I am a child? I can see if the land is good and if the landlord is good. If I am a fool, the sin is upon my own head. For five years I take my ground for which I have saved money, and a wife I take too, and a little son is born." Ditta Mull has one daughter now, but he says he will have a son, soon. And he says, "At the end of five years, by this new bundobust, I must go. If I do not go, I must get fresh seals and takkus-stamps on the papers, perhaps in the middle of the harvest, and to go to the law-courts once in wisdom, but to go twice is "Jebannum." That is quite true,' explained Tod's gravely. 'All my friends say so. And Ditta Mull says, "Always fresh takkus and paying money to wakils and chaprassis and law-courts every five years, or else the landlord makes me go. Why do I want to go? Am I a fool? If I am a fool and do not know, after forty years, good land when I see it, let me die! But if the new bundobust says for fifteen years, that it is good and wise. My little son is a man, and I am burnt, and he takes the ground or another ground, paying only once for the takkus-stamps on the papers, and his little son is born, and at the end of fifteen years is a man too. But what profit is there in five years and fresh papers? Nothing but dikk, trouble, dikk. We are not young men who take these lands, but old ones---not farmers, but tradesmen with a little money---and for fifteen years we shall have peace. Nor are we children that the Sirkar should treat us so'"

Here Tod's stopped short, for the whole table were listening. The Legal Member said to Tod's, 'Is that all?'

'All I can remember,' said Tod's. 'But you should see Ditta Mull's big monkey. It's just like a Councillor Sabib.'

'Tod's! Go to bed,' said his father..

Tod's gathered up his dressing-gown tail and departed.

'The Legal Member brought his hand down on the table with a crash---'By Jove!' said the Legal Member, 'I believe the boy is right. The short tenure is the weak point.'

He left early, thinking over what Tods had said. Now, it was obviously impossible for the Legal Member to play with a bunnid's monkey, by way of getting understanding; but he did better. He made inquiries, always bearing in mind the fact that the real native---not the hybrid, University-trained mule---is as timid as a colt, and, little by little, he coaxed some of the men whom the measure concerned most intimately to give in their views, which squared very closely with Tods' evidence.

So the Bill was amended in that clause; and the Legal Member was filled with an uneasy suspicion that Native Members represent very little except the Orders they carry on their bosoms. But he put the thought from him as illiberal. He was a most Liberal man.

After a time, the news spread through the bazars that Tods had got the Bill recast in the tenure-clause, and if Tods' Mamma had not interfered, Tods would have made himself sick on the baskets of fruit and pistachio nuts and Cabuli grapes and almonds that crowded the verandah. Till he went Home, Tods ranked some few degrees before the Viceroy in popular estimation. But for the little life of him Tods could not understand why.

In the Legal Member's private-paper-box still lies the rough draft of the Sub-Montane Tracts Ryotwary Revised Enactment; and, opposite the twenty-second clause, pencilled in blue chalk, and signed by the Legal Member, are the words 'Tods' Amendment.' ---Rudyard Kipling.

THE MADRAS CITY CIVIL COURT BILL, 1892.

A Bill to establish an additional Civil Court for the City of Madras.

Whereas it is expedient to establish an additional Civil Court for the City of Madras; It is hereby enacted as follows:---

1. (1) This Act may be called the Madras City Civil Court Act, 1892; and

(2) It shall come into force at once.

2. In this Act, unless there is something repugnant in the subject or context,---

(1) "City Court" means the Court established under the next following section:

(2) "City of Madras" means the area within the local limits for the time being of the ordinary original civil jurisdiction of the High Court:

(3) "High Court" means the High Court of Judicature at Madras: and

(4) "Small Cause Court" means the Court of Small Causes of Madras.

3. The Local Government may, by notification in the official Gazette, establish a Court, to be called the Madras City Civil Court, with jurisdiction to receive, try and dispose of all suits and other proceedings of a civil nature not exceeding two thousand five hundred rupees in value and arising within the City of Madras, except suits or proceedings which are cognizable---

(a) by the High Court as a Court of Admiralty or Vice-Admiralty or as a Colonial Court of Admiralty, or as a Court having testamentary, intestate or matrimonial jurisdiction, or

(b) by the Court for the relief of insolvent debtors, or

(c) by the Small Cause Court.

4. The Local Government may, by notification in the official Gazette, appoint so many persons as it may think fit to be Judges of the City Court; and may, for any misconduct, by a like notification, suspend or remove any Judge so appointed.

5. (1) Every person appointed a Judge of the City Court shall be, by virtue of his office, a Judge of the Small Cause Court with respect to cases cognizable by that Court.

(2) Every such Judge shall be liable to perform any duties of a Judge of the Small Cause Court which the Chief Justice of the High Court may require him to perform.

6. When the City Court consists of more than one Judge,---

(a) each of the Judges may exercise all or any of the powers conferred on the Court by this Act or any other law for the time being in force;

(b) the Local Government may appoint any one of the Judges to be the principal Judge; and

(c) the principal Judge may, from time to time, make such arrangements as he may think fit for the distribution of the business of the Court among the various Judges thereof.

7. (1.) The Judge of the City Court, or, when the Court consists of more than one Judge, the principal Judge, may from time to time, with the sanction of the Local Government, appoint as many clerks, bailiffs and other ministerial officers as may be necessary for the administration of justice by the Court, and for the exercise and performance of the powers and duties conferred and imposed on it by this Act or any other law for the time being in force.

(2) The officers so appointed shall exercise such powers and discharge such duties of a ministerial nature, as the said Judge or principal Judge may from time to time direct.

(3) The said Judge or principal Judge may, subject to the control of the High Court,---

(a) suspend or remove any officer so appointed, or

(b) fine any such officer who is guilty of misconduct or neglect in the performance of the duties of his office.

(4) Any fine imposed on an officer under subsection (3) may be deducted from his salary.

(8) All questions which arise in suits or other proceedings under this Act in the City Court shall be dealt with and determined according to the law for the time being administered by the High Court in the exercise of its ordinary original civil jurisdiction.

9. When the subject-matter of any suit or other proceeding is land or a house or a garden, its value for the purposes of the jurisdiction conferred on the City Court by this Act shall, subject to the other provisions of this Act, be fixed in manner provided by the Court-fees Act, 1870, section 7, clause 5.

10. Fees chargeable for serving or executing processes issued by the City Court, or served or executed under its direction or control, shall be such as the High Court may prescribe with the approval of the Governor of Fort St. George in Council and the sanction of the Governor-General in Council.

11. The powers conferred by Chapter XXXVI of the Code of Civil Procedure on High Courts and District Courts as to the appointment of Receivers may be exercised by the City Court or any Judge thereof.

12. In clause (a) of section 31 of the Presidency Small Cause Courts Act, 1882, for the words "to the High Court" the words "to the Madras City Civil Court or the High Court of Judicature at Fort William or Bombay, as the case may be," shall be substituted.

13. Whenever any suit or proceeding in the City Court is settled by agreement of the parties before issues have been settled or any evidence recorded, half the amount of the institution fees paid by the plaintiff shall be repaid to him by the Court.

14. When, under section 13 of the Letters Patent for the High Court, dated the twenty-eighth day of December, 1865, of under section 25 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the High Court has removed for trial by itself any suit from the City Court, fees on the scale for the time being in force in the High Court as a Court of ordinary original civil jurisdiction shall be payable in that Court in respect of the suit and proceedings therein:

Provided that, in the levy of any such fees which, according to the practice of the Court, are credited to the Government, credit shall be given to the plaintiff in the suit for any fee which in the City Court he has already paid under the Court-fees Act, 1870, on the plaint.

15. (1) The Court authorized to hear appeals from the City Court shall be the High Court.

(2) The period of limitation for an appeal from a decree or order of the City Court shall be the same as that provided by law for a decree or order of the High Court in the exercise of its original jurisdiction.

16. Nothing in this Act contained shall affect the original civil jurisdiction of the High Court:

Provided that---

(1) if any suit or other proceeding is instituted in the High Court which, in the opinion of the Judge who tries the same (whose opinion shall be final), ought to have been instituted in the City Court, no costs shall be allowed to a successful plaintiff, and a successful defendant shall be allowed his costs as between attorney and client;

(2) in any suit or other proceeding pending at any time in the High Court, any Judge of such Court may at any stage thereof make an order transferring the same to the City Court if in his opinion such suit or proceeding is within the jurisdiction of that Court and should be tried therein;

(3) in any suit or other proceeding so transferred, the Court-fees Act, 1870, shall apply, credit being given for any fees levied in the High Court.

17. The City Court shall use a seal of such form and dimensions as may be for the time being prescribed by the Local Government.

18. (1) The Judge of the City Court, or, when the Court consists of more than one Judge, the principal Judge, shall, at the commencement of each year, draw up a list of holidays and vacations to be observed in the Court, and shall submit the same for the approval of the Local Government.

(2) Such list, when it has received such approval, shall be published in the official Gazette, and the said holidays and vacations shall be observed accordingly.

19. Nothing in this Act shall be deemed to affect the provision contained in section 360A of the Code of Civil Procedure.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

THE UNION!

Brother freemen, hear a story,
Borne upon your native breeze,
Fresh and young, and old and hoary,
Sturdy as your greenwood trees.

Read it—note it—far extended
Over every land and sea,
How our Island races blended
In one matchless Unity.

How, from small beginnings springing,
Nationhood began to grow,
Saint and sinner something bringing
Weighty word or weighty blow:

Master builders, downward sending
Stones that show the master hand;
Thus began the never-ending
Oneness of our Native Land.

Bowmen, statesmen, heroes, martyrs,
Strong to do, and strong to die,
Standing on their hard-won charters
Built the noble fabric high.

And from John o' Groats to Dover,
And from many an Irish crag,
And on sea, the wide world over,
Waved the gallant Union Flag.

Loyally the workmen reared it.
For it shed their generous blood;
Well the despots knew and feared it—
Its far reaching brotherhood.

Rend this flag, split up this nation,
Of the latter make you four;
Dare the work of separation
With the foeman at your door!

Let our enemies divide us,
Tell our shame with tongue and pen,
In the world's great mart deride us,
Having found us less than men.

Romans in their country's danger
Knew no Party but the State;
Faction left they to the stranger,
Rome was one, and Rome was great.

Fair Columbia in her peril
Heard these words from o'er the sea—

“Break the Union”!—Hear the answer
“As we live it shall not be”!
And it was not—and it will not,
While our sons are brave and free.

Kindred words were fitly spoken—
“Freemen! like one unit stand”!
Italy rose to the token,
And the German Fatherland:
“One and all.”—The men were brothers,
Bound as in an iron band.

With good steel the words were written,
Angels bore them far and wide
Till within the realm of Britain,
Came the counsel—“Nay, Divide”!
Sentiment is great—yea greatest—
Trust your treasures to the tide.

Was it treason? damned treason?
No such charge shall shame my song!
Great the voice, ev'n in unreason,
Great and gifted—In the wrong.

In the wrong—all lands proclaim it,
Human instinct deep and strong,
Foes applaud—’Tis friends who blame it—
(Friends who sorrow as they name it)—
In the wrong, men—In the wrong.

Stand we then at post and station,
Foot by foot in firm array,
’Tis the life-blood of the nation
That demands our help to-day.

Men of Britain hear the story
Running on from age to age
Shining with resplendent glory
On the old historic page.

ON GUARD!

UNITE OR DIVIDE?

July 2, 1892.

When crafty Philip, King
Of Macedon, began
To forge the chains his Son designed
For universal man,

One grim device he had,
Wherever men were free—
“To conquer, first divide,” he said;
It was his master-key.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given, any other being unnecessary and likely to cause confusion.

Athens and Sparta fell,
Swords snapped, wise words were vain,
Science and Art lay in the dust,
Nor ever rose again.

Shall this be Britain's fate?
Shall her flag, too, be furled—
Her once proud name be written small,
A byword to the world?

Her fearless lion heart,
Her sturdy common sense,
Her precedent—shall all be lost
In specious eloquence?

If so, divide! Old Time
No surer means hath known
To level in one future doom
The Cottage and the Throne.

Such were the thoughts that sped,
As though on wings of flame,
When first the Separation faith
Had voice, and form, and name.

Silent the nation stood,
Perplexed, bewildered, slow,
Striving for gleams of honest light,
Fighting for that as true men fight,
Hoping that black was not yet white,
Nor fire a term for snow.

On guard the nation stood,
And pondered as she read
How he—her Old Man Eloquent—
Dealt with her deathless dead.

Recasting records old
As though no pen had writ,
In sober truth from then till now,
Of the great deeds of Pitt.

Disowned those pregnant deeds,
That massive, well-knit work,
Owned in its day by Wilberforce,
Endorsed by Edmund Burke.

Old laws, well tried, must go,
New laws, untried, prevail,
Blood-red the danger signal stood,
But Party must not fail.

Fine words would pierce all gloom,
Darkness so seen be light.
The very cry "Divide!" "Divide!"
Explained, becomes "Unite!"

"Your faith is new," 'twas said;
Sharply the answer came—
"Not new at all—We always held
And always said the same."

"You did?—'In eighty-five?—
And 'Six?—Then 'tis no dream?
Stood you the same in both those years?"
Reply:—"Yes, just the same,
We seemed—so-so; but take our word,
We were content to—seem."

At length the nation spoke,
Sophists were nowhere then:
Her scorn aroused her sleeping sons—
Not Party now, but Men.

Hold up the Union Jack!
The Potent Mandate ran,
And hold it in the ancient way—
United as one man.

Poor in her gifts of speech,
This Britain in her need
Never hath lacked the eloquence
Of stern, unflinching deed.

When danger's night is dark,
And Rhetoric is dumb,
Then British hearts can higher beat,
Then Britain's hour has come.

No hour for weaving words,
No time for well-trained pen:
An hour to test the nation's best—
The manhood of her men.

The hearts that do not flinch,
The firm, unfailing knees,
The spirit, as of old, to face
The battle and the breeze.

To such the summons comes
Once more in accents clear
From realms beyond the Sophist's reach,
From purer atmosphere.

A gift the nation brings
Choicest in all her store—
Alike to daughter as to son
The gift of Duty to be done
She leaves at every door.

No time to pause. To hesitate
Might noble work retard.
To-day the nation speaks her will,
And sternly stands On Guard.
He who would serve these Islands Three Stand he to-day for Unity!

WEEKLYANA.

THE gingerbread nut which damaged Mr. Gladstone's eye has not only become historical, but has become a sacred relic of the Liberal Prophet with which generations yet unborn will be conjured. It has been bought for a considerable sum by a local Gladstonian of Cheshire who intends to have it mounted in gold and gems.

MR. Frederick Dresser, Charlton Hall, near Chester, writes to the Times as follows:—

"Friends of Mr. Gladstone will be glad to know that the lady who threw the gingerbread at him in Chester is one of his most ardent supporters. Far from intending to insult him, she only attempted to give some outward expression of her frenzied admiration. I could give you her name and address, but she is so utterly overwhelmed with the consequences of her reckless zeal that it would be cruel to add to her suffering."

XAVIER DE MONTEPIN, feuilletonist of the Petit Journal, is the most prolific novelist in France and the one who makes most money. It was his constant contributions that advanced the circulation of that paper to a million. Nor was the journal ungrateful which has made its feuilletonist wealthy. Writing from the age of twenty, De Montepin has produced considerably over four hundred novels, and the old man hopes to produce as many more. He turns out sixteen hundred words a day, and never misses a day. Lope de Vega must in his grave turn his face, in discomfiture.

AMERICA is good at inventing religions as at turning out mechanical novelties. We read:—

"Virginia has a new religion established among the negroes under the name of the 'No Meat Eaters.' The head of it is one Nathaniel Brown, who says, that the Lord told him in a vision to gather his people and lead them to the promised land, which, he says, is Barkley, Va, where, he says, they shall live for ever if they eat no meat. Their religious services are thus described by an eyewitness. At regular intervals they would break out into a howling sort of hymn, accompanying their shouting with grotesque dancing and jumping about the room. As the speech proceeded, the people became more and more excited, until, with perspiration rolling down their faces, they were dancing, singing, jumping and shouting like a mob of maniacs. This was continued for over an hour until nearly all had fallen from exhaustion. Brown tells them that after 300 years on earth they shall be translated to heaven."

Brown is a far better prophet than Smith. And there is more divinity in this nigger Brownism than in Mormonism. The mythology and miracles of the two are at par.

SIR Edwin Arnold has another feather to his cap. He has become what in Indian parlance would be called a high mansabdar of Japan. In the Empire of the Rising Sun he has just received the decoration of the Order of the Rising Sun—an honour hitherto confined to natives. There are just four kinds of distinction in that state. The first or lowest is a military order. The second, to which alone ladies are admissible, is the "Sacred Mirror." The third or penultimate distinction is the Order of the "Rising Sun." The highest is the Order of the "Chrysanthemum."

It is interesting to note that at the celebration of the Tercentenary of the Dublin University last month, the University of Bombay was represented by Sir Raymond West, the University of Calcutta by Sir Alfred Croft, the University of Madras by Mr. Kernan, and the University of the Punjab by the Hon'ble W. H. Rattigan (Vice Chancellor).

We congratulate our friend Dr. K. D. Ghose on the brilliant success of his son Arabinda, now a student in England. He had already passed the Indian Civil Service competition, and now news comes that he has just obtained first class honours in the Cambridge Classical Tripos. This is the first occasion on which the academical distinction so highly prized by the British, has fallen to a Black Man and a Baboo.

Woman with feminine curiosity has been inquiring into the details of the Sultan's household, particularly of his womankind. We are told that the harem costs Turkey annually £3,000,000. Woman says "it is a perfect nest of intrigue and scandal, of envy, hatred, malice, and all uncharitableness."

Nonsense! A good deal of simplicity and nature characterises life in the harem. There is more intrigue and scandal and the rest of it at a ball and even at many a prayer-meeting than in a month in even the Seraglio at Cairo or Constantinople.

THE Indian Mirror is fortunate in its Burdwan correspondent. Instead of trying to strike sensation out of the desperate dullness of Burdwan life, he looks out for inspiration in the historic scenes near him. Referring to the bank of the Banka river, with its remnants of old tombs and Musjids, the writer says:—

"It is apparent that in the days of Mahomedan ascendancy, the town was more towards the Banka side than it is at present. Towards the southern extremity of the town amidst a thousand ruins of Mahomedan buildings in a lovely spot, a remnant of an old architecture is pointed out as the Surunga of Sundar, the hero of Vidya Sundar. Whether the incidents, related by Mukunda Ram and Bharat Chunder, were based on some reality or that they took up the plot of Bararochi, and developed it according to their own sweet will, or that the incidents did actually happen more than eighteen hundred years ago in some other portion of India, we will not stop here to discuss. But the spot pointed out as the tunnel. (Suranga) of Sundar is certainly no such thing at all. It is, to all appearances, the inside of a Mahomedan tomb. There is an entire tomb by its side with a Nim tree above where the visitor is called on to throw some coin to propitiate the Pir presiding over the spot. One geological fact is to be noticed about the place. The land seems to have sunk down a great deal from its former level. The ruins around testify to the wealth and prosperity of the Mahomedans. The Kapur Kahattriyas must have settled northward, and ruins of their buildings are generally seen about the old Choke. There are, however, mosques to be seen here and there, towards the northern side of the town and even at Keshubgunge. But they do not seem to a cursory observer to be as old as those on the bank of the Banka.

The writer ought to fish out the sharp gentleman who invented the Sundar hole. It must have been in Tej Chunder Bahadoor's time, we suspect. The writer says:—

"The Burdwan Rajahs from Abu Rai downwards have been remarkable for their bravery and large-heartedness. They have left their impress upon the town in the shape of many works of public utility. The splendid tanks with their raised embankments attract the eye, and rivet the attention of a traveller. There is a solemn grandeur about them. Standing on the side of Krishna Sagar, I was thinking of the memorandum of Rajaji Suresh Suckhur Roy on the water scarcity of Bengal. What amount of human labour and what amount of gold and how much time the splendid tank must have cost the Rajah who had it excavated. Passing northward the wild grandeur of Romnar Bag attracts the eye. A fair collection of tigers and deers are to be seen at Dilkhosha, the grounds of which are being laid out after the most approved European style. Near the Dilkhosha there is a spot surrounded by a ditch full of water. It is called the island. Full of thick jungles it is said to be the favourite abode of snakes, jackals and birds. It is rather safe to contemplate the wild scenery from a distance. But one bent on sight-seeing should go a little further, pass through the Keshubgunge Chati on to Nawabpore, and there see for himself the lonely spot on which stand in the form of a square, a hundred and eight separate temples with an image of Siva in each. A Rani of the Raj family had them constructed."

This, we believe, is the cluster of white pagodas seen from the train as it issues out of the Burdwan Station and runs up towards the junction.

SIR E. W. Watkin is an indifferent politician but a good engineer. He is always worthy of attention in his speciality. He writes to the Times:—

"One great thing they (the Government) could settle—a question more important to Ireland, as it seems to me, than a dozen Home Rule Bills—a question which can be discussed quite apart from Home Rule controversies—I mean the restoration of prosperity and progress by great, but simple, public works—the leading works being—(1) a ship canal of capacious dimensions between the west and east of Ireland, and (2) a tunnel from the north of Ireland to the south of Scotland. The former would place Ireland on the shortest sea-road to all the great West, and to the East via the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the latter would make Ireland and Scotland one country. Surveys and discussions to which I and others have for years been parties have demonstrated the feasibility of both projects, and the most liberal estimate for both does not exceed 20,000,000*l.*, which at 3 per cent. ninety-nine years' terminable security would amount to a burden of 600,000*l.* a year for ninety-nine years, or about a fifth of the cost of keeping a hostile force in Ireland.

The discussion of these projects might in some measure effect a healthy diversion of the public mind of Ireland, though of course the professional agitators would put every obstacle in the way. The tunnel would make for "Union."

We read:—

"A most eccentric person died recently in Berlin at the age of seventy-three. He began, a Berlin correspondent says, on his eighteenth birthday, and kept up till his seventieth year, a book which showed that during fifty-two years he had noted the smoking of 628,713 cigars, of which he had received 43,692 as presents, while for the remaining 585,021 he had paid 2,086*l.* 12*s.* 3*d.*, which shows that his tastes were at any rate not unduly extravagant. During the same period he had had eighty-five pairs of trousers made, costing altogether 92*l.* 3*s.* 3*d.*, seventy-four coats and waistcoats for 158*l.* 3*s.* 2*d.*, sixty-two pairs of boots for 66*l.* 2*s.* 2*d.* He wore out 298 shirts and 'fronts', and 326 collars, costing altogether 57*l.* 3*s.* 4*d.* In tram fares he spent 85*l.* 13*s.* 2*d.* In fifteen years, according to his book-keeping, he had drunk 28,786 glasses of Bavarian beer, of which, however, 21,261 were only small ones. For this beer and 36,081 glasses of cognac and other spirits, he spent 1,070*l.* He gave 'tips' amounting to 261*l.* His book-keeping stopped when he completed his seventieth year, and at the end of this quaint volume are the words, 'Omnia tentavi, multa perpexi, nihil perfecti.'

Poor soul!

IN Berlin, a discharged labourer shot in their office the Director of Public Gardens and his assistant, dangerously wounding both. The reason is unknown.

WHAT an outcry was raised when it was proposed to tax the bicycles and tricycles in this city. At the re-assembling of the French Chamber, we read, M. Francois Deloncle means to propose a tax on them at 10*frs.* each. It is expected to yield 3,000,000*frs.* annually, 12,000 of which is intended for a National Accident Fund.

M. WILSON, the son-in-law of the late ex-President Grévy, and M. Leroux, president of M. Wilson's Election Committee, were tried for corrupt practices at the municipal elections in May last, when M. Wilson was elected Mayor of Loches, found guilty and sentenced to pay a fine of 1,000 frs. each. M. Wilson has given notice of appeal.

THE Russian Holy Synod has adopted a vigorous policy of suppression of Catholicism in Poland. Religious instruction in the Polish elementary schools has been prohibited. The number of dioceses is to be reduced, the bishopric of Lusk and Zytonietritz—the last remaining Catholic episcopal see in Ruthenia—is to be done away with. The Pope requested the intervention of France which has been making strong representations at St. Petersburg but the Synod is as strongly averse from making any concession to Catholics. The Holy Synod which controls the religious affairs of the empire, is determined to continue its anti-Papal propaganda in Poland, and to maintain the absolute supremacy of the Orthodox faith at the holy places of Palestine.

THE Russian Government has voted an extra credit of 21,800 roubles for the colonization of the valley of the Kush river, the scene of the battle between the Afghans and Russians in 1885, and which at the supplementary demarcation of the North-West frontier of Afghanistan was allotted to Russia. The plan, according to the promoter of the scheme, General Kuropotkin, is to settle 218 families of Russian agriculturists, who will be free of all taxes and all obligations, including military service, for the next ten years, and will receive 100 roubles a family from the Governor-General of Transcaspia, as well as other privileges.

IN 1891, the Scottish salmon sold at Billingsgate is valued at 138,389 $\frac{1}{2}$., the total sold in the London and other markets is believed to be 276,778 $\frac{1}{2}$.. Considering that the fish is a costly delicacy in England, these figures are difficult of comprehension. They make the people out to be enormous ichthyophagists.

A PARSI had been passing off in England as an Indian prince. He paid for purchases with false cheques, and otherwise swindled. Bombay, which probably knows his identity and must be anxiously interested in his career, has learnt that he has been arrested by the Police.

IT is reported in the English papers that Mr. Gladstone is the owner of the largest lead pencil in the world, the gift of a pencil maker at Keswick, which he uses for a walking stick. It is thirty-nine inches in length. In place of the customary rubber cap, it has a gold cap.

THE Advocate says :—

"M. Asgar Hussain, of Taj Mahal fame, and a millionaire, has been fined annas 4 and his coachman annas 8 in that the latter gave a whip to a Thail-wala for his carelessly plying his hand cart. The Jubilee Paper says the fine on the Moulvi is unjust, because the Moulvi did not order his coachman to use the whip."

If a millionaire is to be fined, it is preposterous to fine him in annas. The man himself might well feel himself affronted. It is like putting Mr. Gladstone down on any programme of arrangements for a speech of ten minutes.

THE Advocate reports that "Eighty Vernacular newspapers of any importance published in the United Provinces and the Punjab contained in last week 150 columns of matter on Hon. Mr. Dadabhai Nowroji, M. P. Many comic papers have given cartoons by mistake representing Mr. Maclean as his opponent."

WE read :—

"An old way of poisoning criminals used to be to compel them to swallow large quantities of bull's blood, and it is interesting to note how this acted as a means of causing death. Bull's blood (says the Lancet) is not a poison at all in the ordinary sense of the word, but when it enters the stomach it forms a coagulum, and instead of the organ being filled with liquid, which might be ejected by vomiting, it is filled with a solid mass. This mass presses upwards upon the heart and displaces it."

NOTES & LEADERETTES

with

OUR OWN NEWS.

THE Speech from the Throne was read in Parliament in the afternoon of the 8th. It simply announced that no business being left unfinished by the last Session, it was unnecessary to continue the sitting of the Houses at an unusual period of the year, and hoped that at the re-assembling at the customary season, Parliament would follow in the wake of useful and beneficent legislation of the previous session.

The same evening the Lords voted the reply to the Queen's Speech. In the discussion the Duke of Devonshire demanded an assurance that the Liberals would take no steps for the evacuation of Egypt without first consulting Parliament. Lord Herschell is reported in the London press to have said that the Liberals would continue the foreign policy of Lord Salisbury. According to a later telegram in the Indian Daily News this is due to misreporting. What Lord Herschell said was that he hoped that the same reticence that has been observed in Parliament during the Conservative administration in regard to foreign affairs at critical junctures would be followed in the coming time.

The Premier prophesied that the House of Lords would be the centre of the struggle against Home Rule.

In the House of Commons, Mr. Asquith, seconded by Mr. Burt, moved an amendment to the Address. It only called for a vote of want of confidence in the Conservative Government. It was ultimately carried, on the 11th, by a majority of forty, in a full House—the fullest since the Home Rule debate in 1886. Three hundred and fifty members were for and three hundred and ten against the amendment. The division was taken amid a scene of unprecedented excitement—amid waving of hats and cries of "down with coercion!"

In the debate on the amendment, Mr. Goschen said he refused to believe that Mr. Gladstone was determined to hurry on a Home Rule measure, and announced that should a Home Rule Bill be brought forward, the Unionists would oppose it to the bitter end. On the other hand, Mr. Justin McCarthy demanded an assurance that the Home Rule Bill would be acceptable to the Irish and placed in the forefront of legislation, and that immediate effect be given to such a measure by governing Ireland in the meantime in the Home Rule spirit. He concluded with the threat that without what he demanded for them, the Irish members would not support Mr. Gladstone. On behalf of the Parnellites Mr. Redmond said they would support the amendment but oppose Mr. Gladstone, unless he satisfied their demands to the fullest.

Mr. Gladstone gave the assurance so repeatedly demanded. In his speech, he denied that the Government had succeeded in their Irish policy, and intimated that the first duty of the Liberals would be to repeal the coercing measures now in force in Ireland. He reiterated the Newcastle programme as regards Home reforms, but said that, nevertheless, Home Rule would be the first business of the new Government. He was unable to give details of the Bill now, the principles of which, he said, were known and were based upon fully upholding Imperial supremacy and the effectual transfer to Ireland of the management of her own affairs. As regards the position of the Irish members at Westminster, he said it was impossible to decide till a responsible Government deals with the question. He hinted that the rejection or mutilation of a Home Rule Bill by the House of Lords would impede their position.

Mr. Balfour said that the retention of the Irish members at Westminster meant that Great Britain would always be at the mercy of the Irish vote. He generally condemned Home Rule, which, he said, would prevent other necessary and much-needed reforms, and added that the country would soon be weary of Irish Nationalist dictation.

Mr. Gladstone's speech did not reassure the Parnellite members. Mr. J. E. Redmond, member for Waterford city, and Mr. W. Redmond, member for East Clare, said that they regretted that Mr. Gladstone had in his speech withheld all mention of his Irish programme and given no definite promise as regards the reinstating of evicted tenants or the release of Irish political prisoners. They renewed their threat to withdraw the Parnellite vote unless their demands were satisfied to the fullest.

MR. Dadabhai Naoroji has taken his seat. He made his affirmation, without being sworn in. He spoke on the amendment. He said that his election was a unique event in the history of India. The influence of Great Britain in India, he said, was beneficent, and the readiness of Parliament to listen to Indian grievances had secured the loyal attachment of India to the throne.

The official recounting raised the majority of his votes at the election by two to five.

SIR Charles Dilke has taken Egypt under his protection, and given notice that he would at the next session of Parliament bring forward a motion to call attention to the declaration made by successive administrations regarding that country, and to move an address to the Queen, praying for the resumption of the negotiations carried on in 1887 for the neutralization of Egypt under conditions enabling her Majesty's Government to secure the permanence thereof.

SIR John Edgar has retired from the Service. It was known when he last left India on leave, that he was not to return. The Bengal Government notice the retirement thus in the gazette:—

"The 6th August 1892.—The Lieutenant-Governor announces with deep regret that Sir John Edgar has resigned the Civil Service. The loss caused by this event is the greater, because it follows so closely after the deaths of Sir Henry Harrison, Mr. Boxwell, and Mr. Worsely, and no body of officers, however able, can fail to feel their strength impaired by the loss of so many men of such exceptional ability and character within so short a time. His Honour deems it proper to put on record a brief statement of the past services of this distinguished officer.

Sir John Edgar arrived in India in 1862, and spent from 1863 to 1872 as Assistant and Deputy Commissioner in the district of Cachar. The intimate knowledge which he there gained of the Tea Coolie Emigration question, and of the treatment of the savages on the North-East Frontier, has been of material assistance to the Government in subsequent years. When the Lushai disturbances of 1870 broke out, he was engaged in a political tour among those tribes, and was exposed to great danger, but he returned safely to Cachar and became the Chief Political Officer with the Lushai Expedition of 1871. For his service in this capacity he received the decoration of the C. S. I. From Cachar he was transferred to Darjeeling, where he was Deputy Commissioner for five years, and used his opportunities to acquire that knowledge which has made him a recognized authority in matters relating to Buddhist literature and religion, as well as to the affairs of Tibet. Between 1878 and 1884 he served as Magistrate and Collector in Shahabad and Champaran, and as Commissioner in the Patna, Chota Nagpur, Dacca, Chittagong and Presidency Divisions, thereby acquiring an extensive and varied acquaintance with all parts of Bengal. As President of the Excise Commission in Bengal he laid the foundation of the important changes which have since taken place in the working of that Department. In 1884 he became one of the Secretaries, and in 1887 Chief Secretary to the Government of Bengal, in which capacity he has been the trusted adviser of two Lieutenant-Governors. In 1889 he was honoured by the Knighthood of the Order of the Indian Empire.

When Sir Charles Elliott became Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, his want of acquaintance with the personnel of the official staff, and with the past history of all current business, would have been a serious impediment to progress had he not found in Sir John Edgar a friend and a confidant whose judgment was never at fault, whose advice was always candid and far-seeing, and whose exertions to assist his Chief were unwearied. If the Administration of Bengal during the first year of Sir Charles Elliott's tenure of office maintained or advanced its old high reputation, it was chiefly due to the co-operation and counsel of Sir John Edgar.

H. J. S. COTTON,
Chief Secy. to the Govt. of Bengal."

So our rebuke to Government on the baldness of their obituary notice of Sir Henry Harrison, and the niggardliness of the tribute paid by them to the memory of so distinguished an officer has not, we see, gone for nothing. We congratulate them on the improvement in their literature. The foregoing notification is as it should be. It is a just tribute gracefully delivered. Sir Charles Elliott is unstinted in acknowledgment of his obligations to the late Chief Secretary.

THE retirement of Sir John Ware Edgar causes no disturbance in the Bengal Secretariat, Mr. Cotton being confirmed as Chief Secretary and Mr. Risley as Secretary in the Financial and Municipal Department. This is a matter of course. Both are officers of ability—the senior one of considerable experience, likewise, in various departments, while the junior one is a savant—and with better mutual understanding would make the Secretariat strong.

WE congratulate the ruling class on its recovering courage, however slowly. The Government of India has presented a "big cannon" to the Hon'ble Rana Sir Shanker Buksh, K.C.I.E. This is no doubt a special and high honor to a mere landlord, and we are not surprised to learn that in token of his joy the Rana gave a party to his friends. This present is not only a departure from the legislation of the Arms Act, but is in direct conflict with the policy which, since the misconduct of the Sepoy Army in 1857, withholds the artillery from the native soldiery. It is also in strange contrast with the recent refusal to enroll native volunteers. The British are reconciled to the Hindustanis, and are prepared to trust the sons of the barons who, in 1857, for many months, kept them out of Oudh. The Bengalis alone are now formidable.

WE are glad to find that the appeal of some of our contemporaries and our humble selves to our countrymen to come to the help of Mauritius, has not been utterly vain. Some of our Princes and nobles responded at once, specially Nawab Ahsan-ullah Bahadur of Dacca and the young Maharaja of Benares. Since then, in the Western Presidency, the Maharaja of Bhownugger gave Rs. 500 to the Mauritius Relief Fund. If our Chiefs and nobility more generally understood, as leaders of a nation calling itself civilized, their duty towards suffering humanity throughout the globe, the aggregate contribution of India towards the relief of Mauritius might be a large figure and might go far to set up the poor little island again on its legs.

The Government of India discourages the practice, which has grown of late, of stamping advertisements on Government currency notes. It warns the public that when a note so disfigured is presented for encashment at a Currency office or Treasury, the holder may be put to inconvenience by payment being delayed while enquiries are made or by his being directed to present the note at the Currency office of issue.

GANJA is prohibited in the Indian Army. Officers Commanding Native Regiments are reminded by the General Officer Commanding Burma District, "that ganja is absolutely prohibited by the Excise Act 1881. All ranks are forbidden to have in possession, or to smoke, or to otherwise consume ganja." Any man so found guilty will be Court-martialed for disobedience of orders under the 70th Indian Article of War.

OLD Sir William Moore has come forward as a champion of the Contagious Diseases Act. His contribution in the Lancet of July 23 is nothing if not curious. His is a one-sided argument; ignoring every other consideration he is all for the military interest. The soldiers must be saved at any cost. But no one of our countrymen who remembers the working of the measure, will ever vote for its revival. It was a reign of terror among all classes of prostitutes when the C. D. Act was in force in India. The police and the medical examiners made a good harvest out of it in various ways. In Calcutta, Dr. Payne's creatures fattened on it. It was an engine of oppression to those classes of prostitutes who had not even any imaginary relation with soldiers. Soldiers and sailors, and indeed Christians in general, are not, in Bengal at least, allowed to mix with native women of the town of any respectability. It is only with the lowest scum of the order that they can associate. And yet all Norton Street and Covent Garden were dragooned in the name of the health of the British soldier! The law was a mighty instrument of extortion and persecution in the hands of bad men, and produced no desired effect, but only mischief. The oppression was so great that in any European country the result would have been disastrous.

THE Lancet of June 25, in noticing the "Leprosy Repression Act" of the Cape of Good Hope, writes of the neglect of the British Government to enact laws for the repression of leprosy in India thus:—

"Many people are always eager to show with what calm, philosophical resignation they can regard the dangers and sorrows which, leaving them untouched, fall heavily upon their neighbours. Shall we be reproached for such an expression of opinion as this when to-day in British India lepers are allowed to act as salesmen in the Bazaars and to move about just as they please in the crowded thoroughfares of Indian cities?"

Our unsophisticated reason, not to say instinct, led us to regard leprosy as a contagious disease, but we were relieved by the assurances of many authorities to the contrary. There is division in the Faculty. Certainly medical men are not unanimous in their opinion. Still people have a natural objection to lepers handling provisions in markets and bazaars, and there ought to be provision in the Police and Municipal Acts against the nuisance. Both in the colony of the Cape of Good Hope and New South Wales, there is a provision for the segregation of lepers, but in India where there are more lepers there is no enactment to keep out of sight the varied forms of such a loathsome disease.

JAPAN is a most interesting land, and everything relating to it has a special significance to us, whose forefathers gave the Japanese religion, taught them arts and sciences, and altogether made them a civilized people. But though the Japanese received their first light from China, which itself borrowed the lamp from India, they contributed their own oil and produced a glorious illumination. To all intents and purposes the civilization of the Western coast of the Pacific is original. The Chinese and the Japanese evolved each a system of art distinct from the other. Each has its special points. Of late years, Japanese art has attracted attention in Europe, from connoisseurs and artists as well as collectors. The following account will be read with interest in India :—

"A meeting of the Japan Society was held on July 14, in the hall of the Society of Arts, when a paper on 'The Naturalistic Art of Japan' was read by Mr. Gowland, F. C. S., formerly of the Imperial Mint, Osaka. The chair was taken by Professor William Anderson. The lecturer said that the chief schools, or styles, by which the advance and development of Japanese pictorial art have been effected are four in number—the Chinese, including the Buddhist school, dating from the fifth or sixth century; the Yamato-Tosa, dating from the beginning of the eleventh century; the Kano, dating from the middle of the fifteenth century; and the Shijo, dating from the middle of the eighteenth century. There were no traces existing in Japan of indigenous pictorial art. The earliest paintings in the country were either Korean or Chinese. According to traditional records, Korean and Chinese painters came to Japan from time to time during the fifth and sixth centuries, but up to the ninth century, the time of Kanaoka, the first great artist of native birth of whose work any specimens exist, Japanese art was surrounded by haze and uncertainty. In the fourteenth century they had the advent of a famous painter of the Chinese and Buddhist school, Cho Densu, and from this period names and dates were more certain. After the death of Kanaoka in the tenth century the Japanese began to establish a truly Japanese school of painting, but it was not until the beginning of the eleventh century that the Yamato-Tosa School was founded by the Court noble and painter, Kasuga Motomitsu. This school represented the national feelings and spirit of the Japanese more fully than the Chinese school. The Kano was the third great school, and was originated by Kano Masanobu (born A. D. 1424, died A. D. 1520), and established by Montonbu (born A. D. 1479, died A. D. 1559). The paintings of this school were in two styles, the first in black and white, characterised by a few bold sweeping strokes, the action of living objects and the features of a landscape being thus indicated without much detail. The second style was one of brilliant colouring and more careful drawing. The name Shijo, given to the Naturalistic School, was taken from the name of the street in which the studio of Okyo, the founder of the school, was situated. It differed from other schools in its first principles, its motives, and its technique. Okyo was born A. D. 1733 and died A. D. 1795, and he was the first artist to make a really honest attempt to copy natural objects. In landscapes the painters of this school preferred to paint the scenery of their own country rather than the idealised and artificial landscapes of China. In its technique use of the old heavy body colours was discontinued and delicate tones and washes adopted. In black and white pictures deep black was avoided, and harmonious effects in light shades of grey combined with washes of brown were most successfully produced. All pigments were, in fact, delicately used."

Who will collect the traces of our ancient art, from past literature and extant specimens, and group them into schools in chronological order, and give us a history of the indigenous schools of painting?

THE Hindoo Patriot has an "our own correspondent" who, writing on the 5th instant, gives original news of a place unknown to the political geography of India. It appears that at the termination of the Sutna festivities, a few of the guests visited what the writer calls "the interesting model State of Dumraon,"

"where they were entertained in a right hospitable manner by the popular Dewan, Rai Jai Prakash Lal Bahadur, C.S.I. The Dewan is a gentleman of great culture, and under his able administration, the State may be pronounced second to none of the Native States of India."

We wonder where these festive gentry had been. Had they been beguiled to a Phantom Island and been the guests of a spectre Dewan? At any rate, no such Minister of a Native State as mentioned in the Hindoo Patriot is known to the Foreign Office; any more than such a Companion of the Star of India of anything like the same name is known to the Secretary of the Order.

Not content with announcing the miracle wrought by the extraordinary "Dewan of great culture and under his able administration," this impartial and intelligent witness adds the proof, saying—

"The Maharaja has three spacious garden houses, very magnificently furnished, for the accommodation of his guests and visitors. All these changes have been introduced by the popular Dewan, whose many acts of courtesy are always appreciated by those who have the honor of being the guests of the Raj."

—a fact very creditable to the gratitude of these guests. Hence, we suppose, the myth of the State of Dumraon which "may be pronounced second to none of the Native States of India," that is, presumably above Cashmere and Travancore and Baroda and Gwalior and Hyderabad. For all that, it might require a strong electric lamp to find this model Native State in the Surveyor-General's latest map, and even with this help the searcher might fail to make the discovery.

For the stirring events of the model State during the last seven months, our contemporary's correspondent goes as far back as February when Sir Comer Petheram, Col. Jarrett and Colonel Hamilton came there. We are not told their mission and they did nothing in particular, but hearing that a tiger had committed depredations in a village they went out in search of him. The writer seems familiar with him, calling him by the pet name of "master stripes" without granting him the honor of capital letters. Here is another proof of the able administration of the model State. We are told that before the arrival of these "swells,"

"His Highness the Maharaja had purchased a large tract of ground, including the village of Deregaon, and especially reserved it for hunting purposes."

And another :—

"A Shikar party composed wholly of native Shikarees was recently organized, and they set off in search of stripes, they eventually captured one and brought triumphantly to Dumraon. The brute is now caged in the Maharaja's garden, and is carefully looked after. He is exhibited to all visitors, and is a sight well worth seeing. He would certainly be an acquisition to any Zoological Garden."

After that, it will not be long before "master" is deposited in the "zoo"—to constitute a crowning proof of the exemplary administration of the State of Dumraon.

The Maharaja of Dumraon is a respectable old Reis and his factotum Jai Prakash Lal is a successful manager who has kept his master straight and content, the tenantry loyal, and the British, official and non-official, effusively satisfied. Such foolish puffs can only tend to make their objects the laughing stock of society.

TURNING to the other departments of the Hindoo Patriot, we come upon the long extracts with which whole pages of the broad-sheet are filled. In the same number is an article purporting to be a review of Boulger's Life of Lord William Bentinck in Sir William Hunter's Series from the Saturday Review. Dipping into it we stumble on strange names and news. Thus :—

"The Raja of Coorg was a tyrant and profligate, combining the cruelty of Dominion with the licentiousness of Nero."

Dominion no doubt was a nasty brute from whose example his Rajaship of Coorg ought to have kept himself clear.

We wonder whether the Patriot office keeps a "reader." At any rate, the following result of "composing" from printed matter is far from creditable :—

"When two Rajas, refractory or incapable, had thus been taking in hand, when the murder of our Agent at Jaipur, Mr. Blake, had been avenged and the affairs of that Rajput State had been placed under a Resident aided by a council of Regency, and when the King of Oudh had been told in the plainest language that persistence in evil courses would infallibly led to his deposition, the Governor-General found ample opportunity to carry out those internal measures of reform which entitle him to an honourable place in Sir William Hunter's Series."

"Batta or bhatha, as Mr. Brulger tells us, means extra allowance."

The patience of our contemporary's readers is surely commendable.

REIS & RAYYET.

Saturday, August 13, 1892.

THE VAKIL RAJ IN BENGAL.

SINCE the "Vakil Raj in India" was heard of, this wonderful and mysterious kingdom has greatly increased in power, importance, and influence. Its capital has been fixed in Bengal and all its flourishing dependencies and estates have also been established in the said Province. Material changes have taken place in its administration, the scope of its utility has much enlarged, and its foundation has once for all been finally deep-rooted in this land. My observations will chiefly be confined to the province of Bengal of which I have personal knowledge, and if some of my remarks have a general application it will be unintentional. Three things appear to have been the principal causes of this improvement: (1) the Congress (2) the scheme of Local Self-Government and, last but not least, (3) the aggravation of law—the cumulative weight of a legislation which they neither appreciate nor understand, which now-a-days presses upon the people.

Our whole public and private lives have been circled by laws, local or imperial. We cannot sit walk, sleep or eat without law. We were a law-abiding people, but now we live, and move and have our being in law. The very air we breathe is full of law, domestic and foreign. We are a landed people. We have great landlords to be sure, yet in our blessed country the possession of landed rights is by no means a monopoly. From the rayyet up to the Maharaja and the Nawab, all in Bengal have connection with landed property, in some form or other. They have, in consequence, to do a good deal with hundreds of legislative provisions, otherwise it is not possible for them to keep their Zemindaris, Patnis, Darpatnis, Sepatnis, farms, and so forth. The more landed a man, the more he is law-enmeshed. Most of the princely Zemindari houses, both Hindu and Mahomedan, have unhappily disappeared. Because the Zemindars would not care to keep pace with the times and learn the laws, they were deceived by their own dishonest men, as also by the unscrupulous Government amla who were in power in those days. Now we see the descendants of these amla wealthy and well-to-do Zemindars, and the scions of those princely houses hard up for the necessities of life.

A wrong Government policy combined with the influx of law has linked the wants and the necessities of the people with the pleaders so closely, that it has become quite impossible for the former, whatever their grade or position might be, to do without the latter. Besides the Zemindar and the rayyet, every other citizen, whether trader, artificer, dancer or musician, requires, in successfully pursuing his respective avocations and in profiting well in them, the advice, assistance, or at least the sympathy of the pleader. An influential pleader is the centre of all power and the fountain-head of all good and evil (if he is inclined towards the latter). A pleader is not only a legal adviser and advocate but also an arbitrator (in all matters of importance), a money-lender, a loan-broker, a match-maker, a house-keeper, a political adviser, a Zemindari manager, an agent at head-quarters, a land-holder, a peace-maker, a peace-broker, a mischief-maker, mosaheb, and what not besides.

The great attraction these gentlemen have for our rich men and the unlimited influence they exercise over them, are simply astounding. Each Maharaja or Nawab, in fact almost every Zemindar, has a leading or good pleader at his elbow, who virtually guides him not only in all his legal matters but also in most of his private affairs, for which latter service his fee or reward, whatever you may call it, is unlimited, being governed by no rules of court—no law. These rich men are simply puppets in the hands of their pleaders, having no self-confidence and power of decision of their own. They cannot give a subscription, cannot see a high official, cannot patronize an institution, cannot borrow money, cannot engage a musician or a theatrical company on the occasion of their sons' marriage without consulting their pleader. All these transactions open new channels of influence and income to the legal adviser which can be better imagined than explained. For their public, legal, and private services, most of these vakils draw salaries ranging from Rs. 50 to 500 a month. It has often been seen that our wealthy Zemindars (if pressure be brought upon them), can remain without many luxuries—they can do without valuable music boxes, greyhounds, race horses, rich and expensive wines, charming and beautiful dancing girls—but they cannot do without a pleader. We cannot approach our rich men generally but through the gate of the influence or recommendation of a pleader. Government officials are not unoften in need of his assistance in getting something for public purposes out of a Raja or a Maharaja. Thus each rich man has a pleader for his guide, whose influence over him and his household is simply a charm. One of such magnates is enough to make a pleader rich, and this is the reason why we constantly hear that such and such a Vakil Babu has made so many lakhs in the District A, B, or C. Otherwise, in these hard days the bar is not so lucrative at very Mofussil station as to allow pleaders to count their lakhs and lakhs within a comparatively short time. Rewards and presents from the high and the low are innumerable and in varieties; there is nothing useful or palatable which is not presented to a pleader by his clients and which is not most thankfully accepted. So they occasionally get princely rewards and presents from their Raja clients, seasonable fishes from the fisherman, and the best vegetables and fruits, ghee and rice from the Reis and the Rayyet. These are neither bribes nor perquisites nor blackmail, but merely presents by way of homage to ability, and in acknowledgment of good service done, and what honourable and sensible man can reasonably refuse them when voluntarily offered? If you have only property you must require money to maintain your rights. It may be you have to fight in the law Courts the Maharaja of Durbhanga or even the Secretary of State. You must have money enough at command—by thousands. No fear! You have only to select your pleader, and he will not only give you advice but lend you money as much as is needed (on pretty high interest), and if he cannot, another professional brother of his will advance the requisite amount on the security of your estate. In Eastern Bengal, Zemindaris are changing hands and a reference to the registers of the Registry office will show that the vendees and mortgagees of most of the valuable properties are pleaders. Professional moneylenders, for the most part, have lost occupation. The few leading bankers only still manage to maintain their ground and their services are required only when a very large amount has to be found which a pleader or a syndic of pleaders is unable to supply. Every matter of importance, every transaction, whether it relate to death or marriage or any other domestic occurrence, comes within the Vakil's knowledge, and therefore he is the best witness too in such matters. Who can give better evidence, I mean true and professional evidence, than a man of law who is never misled or does not "fink" under cross-examination? In some cases I have seen that his evidence also brings him a round sum in the shape of fees, which the court allows. Such, in fact, is the faith of the people, and especially of our rich folk, in the members of this honourable profession that they cannot do anything without their aid.

A SKETCH OF THE HISTORY OF THE PRESS IN INDIA.

By DR. SAMBHU C. MOOKERJEE.

The Press as we enjoy it, is not only a very modern but also a European institution. Yet Asia as the Hive of the nations and the mother of civilization may well claim priority in this as in other arts that contribute to, and indeed constitute, civilization.

The real obligations of Europe to Asia gave the latter a fictitious credit, and the tendency of many writers has been to trace all European arts and appliances to the East without positive evidence; but some arts, it may be presumed, were derived from Asia, though the evidence of the fact may be wanting.

Indeed, not a few of the inventions on which modern Europe prides herself were, unquestionably, Eastern in their source: originally received by her from Asia, her elder and earlier civilized sister, though since improved and best and most earnestly utilized by the younger, more restless and energetic.

Sir W. Jones, in his Discourse on the Hindus, says that they have boasted of three inventions,—the game of chess, the decimal scale, and the mode of instructing by apologues. In the absence of any authority, Dr. Horace Hayman Wilson doubts of the boast. And Wilson had far and away a more extensive acquaintance with the Hindus and their literature—the men as they are as well as the writings of their forefathers and the records of the race—than the accomplished Judge himself who unlocked to the world the gates of Sanskrit lore. And his rejection of the charge of boasting against one virtually exonerates both. If my evidence—in respect of my people—is worth anything, I unhesitatingly assert that the Indians do not merit the reproach of international gasconading. The vapourings of idle writers and speakers do not represent national sentiment. Even these writers and speakers with their ultra-Aryanism have learnt their trick from foreigners. I am talking of the normal Hindoo—the nation in the mass. Of my countrymen in general I assert nothing which is not capable of proof. Indeed, I am surprised that any one with the least pretension to know the Hindoos should make such a grave mistake, not to say, blunder. The Hindoos are proud enough, but they are too proud to be vain. Boasting is out of the question with them. They do not recognise other nations. In the belief of the Hindus, they are the salt of the earth, and the rest are all barbarians.

I need scarcely say that it is a false and foolish notion. But it comes natural to all early civilised and powerful nations. The Hindus and Chinese share it with the Greeks and Romans. To the Hindus it has been a sovereign resource, preserving them from inevitable demoralization through long ages of degradation and disgrace.

They might boast of these as of many other things, such as the gamut and musical science, and astronomy. Between them and their neighbours the Chinese, half the rudiments of Civilization came into the world.

Thus the Chess is clearly an ancient Indian game. Dr. Forbes and Dr. Vander Linde have settled that point. Paper money,* similarly, belongs to China and Japan. It was introduced in India by Sultan Mahommed Tughlak, in 1330. Fertile as was the brain of that mighty if crack-brained Emperor in all sorts of schemes, whether for raising funds or for other objects, he appears to have acted upon some information of its success in China. It had been in vogue there before, as his own Ambassador to that Empire afterwards testified. The existence of this curious fiscal device in China before it was introduced in any other country, has been proved by two unimpeachable witnesses, one Christian and the other Mussulman, Marco Polo and Ibn Batuta, the most famous travellers of their time. In China only of all countries in the East, has it had any degree of success. In Persia, as in Hindustan, it miserably failed. To this day it is regarded in the rest of the Continent with mysterious wonder as a peculiar Chinese trick of the diabolical kind. Sir Alex. Burnes† indeed mentions a tradition in Sind on the Beluch frontier of a Hindu having made money of paper, that is, I take it, having made paper coins (to speak necessarily in somewhat Hibernian language,) and passed them off as silver currency. His end was worthy of such a hero. Having been caught in uttering, to effect his escape he quietly sank in the earth. But almost invariably the ingenuity is attributed to the Chinese. Some of you, gentlemen, may have heard the Indian legend of the ingenuity of a Chinese traveller in India taking up his residence at one of the great cities and passing counterfeit coins of paper exactly resembling silver money, the trick being exposed by a clever man (Indian, I believe,) by sprinkling water on them when presented in payment of goods. Such is the myth into which the tradition of the fiscal miracle of paper currency in China had shaped itself in other lands.

The Chinese, in fact, have been the greatest inventors. They manufactured silk, paper, porcelain, varnishes, bells and perhaps glass also, before other nations. Although, like other Asiatics, they received artillery and guns from the Portuguese, they were thoroughly acquainted with gunpowder, and their fireworks still surpass those of the Europeans.

Nor has their originality passed without acknowledgment. They have had the good fortune of not only being the pioneers in knowledge and arts but also of being recognized as the pioneers. The great Cham of European learning, Voltaire, was the foremost in admiring their ancient civilization and acknowledging their priority in the sciences and arts. Indeed, they had the singular fortune of arousing a fictitious enthusiasm. From simple appreciation to extravagant over-rate was but a step in that used up, blasé Eighteenth Century, which, having drained civilization to the dregs and found it bitter, had begun to rest its hopes for the future of the human race on simplicity and barbarism. A time arrived when, as if by conspiracy of the learned, distant nations were ennobled at the expense of Europe. India, Indo-China and Japan were in special favour. It was well that the Chinese did not read French, or else they might have been spoiled by a perusal of the Universal History and the Philosophical Dictionary of the Philosopher of Ferney.

The Chinese have likewise received the credit of practising printing before Europeans. And not without reason. Modern research has fully confirmed the information with which the earlier missionaries, merchants and travellers startled the Western world. There is no doubt that they were familiar with printing by engraving many centuries before the German invention of the thirteenth century. And they early applied it to letters, not only to literature in general but also to that department of it which is now-a-days specially understood by the term "the Press." As far back as 890 of the Christian era, the books of Kungtse were put to press, though the printing was not completed till 920. Then the Pekin Gazette is probably the earliest newspaper in the world. The assertion of Chinese priority in journalism made by travellers and merchants, was long disbelieved until Mr. Davis' full account of the Chinese Moniteur appeared in one of the early volumes of the Transactions of the Royal Asiatic Society of Great Britain. But alas! their priority in the field availed the Chinese little. Less than twenty years ago, Sir Rutherford Alcock, than whom there could be no better authority, published an article in a London magazine in which he speaks of this venerable Pekin Gazette thus:—"It is the sole representative in China of the newspaper press of other countries."—Alcock, in Fraser, March 1873, p. 341.

THE ALLAHABAD HIGH COURT.

A JUDGE'S OBITER DICTUM.

ON Monday, July 25, Mr. Justice Mahmud made an order in the first case that appeared on his list, No. 134 of 1890, to the effect that the case should be put before him when notices had been served. He then asked Mr. Howard, who appeared for the appellants, if he knew how the case had come to be put on his list. Receiving a reply in the negative his lordship made inquiry of the Registrar and then made the following order:—

"This case has come up before me by reason of the report of Kali Prasad who describes himself as F. A. Munsarim, dated the 23rd July, 1892, and this case was without my permission put upon my day's list for to-day, namely, the 25th July, 1892, to be heard, as that printed list showed between 11 A. M. and 4 P. M. for to-day.

I have made anxious inquiries to ascertain why this case was placed before me without my permission, and also why Mr. Percy Gray, the Registrar of this Court, in his official capacity allowed a printed list, such as the one before me, to be placed upon my list without my permission. So far as this case itself is concerned I have had the advantage of hearing Mr. Howard, Senior, who appears for the appellants, and at his request I have directed that the case be put before me as soon as the notices upon the opposite parties have been served.

* See Professor Cowell's Paper in the Journal of the Asiatic Society for 1860, which summarises and brings to a focus the information on this interesting subject. The original authorities to which I have had access are Marco Polo (Yule's edition), Ibn Batuta (Lee's English translation of the abridgment, and the Paris edition of the full text with French translation,) and the Persian histories of India.

† Sir Alexander Burnes' Cabool: A Personal Narrative and a Journey to, and Residence in that City, in the years 1836, 7, and 8. Second Edition. John Murray, 1843, p. 18.

But the learned counsel, Mr. Howard, Senior, has expressly stated to me that he was totally unaware of the legal authority by which this case was laid before me upon my day's list, and that it was simply because of the print which is now before me and ~~called~~ the day's list he would have no legal information at all. Now Mr. Percy Gray, the Registrar of the Court, informed me that this day's list, namely, the one now before me, was not prepared either by him or by Sir John Edge, the learned Chief Justice of this Court, but that in accordance with the procedure required by Rule No 64 of the Rules of Court this was done. That rule runs as follows:—"The Assistant Registrar shall, subject to any orders of the Chief Justice, prepare or cause to be prepared for each bench for each day on which the Bench sits, a list of cases which may be heard by such bench on such day. Such list is in these rules referred to as the day's list and shall state the hour for the sitting of the bench."

I was one of those who, being a member of this Court, gave my full consent to this rule being passed, but as a matter of fact so far as I understand the English tongue, when I gave my consent to the phrase in this rule, namely, "any order of the Chief Justice," I did not then mean by the words "any order" anything other than a legal order; nor could I ever credit any Chief Justice of this Court with any feelings other than those which are understood as matters of courtesy, which is due from one Judge to another, namely, the courtesy of asking a colleague whether he does or does not desire to sit upon any particular day or at any particular hour with reference to any particular case in consequence of a printed sheet of paper called the day's list or the cause list, upon which as Mr. Percy Gray, the Registrar of the Court, informs me, neither is the signature of the learned Chief Justice nor of the Registrar nor of the Assistant Registrar, but beyond that I have no information.

The matter standing thus, I have been driven to the necessity of delivering this obiter dictum to explain how the law stands.

The law stands upon a very simple basis, so long as nobody misunderstands it, and so far as the chartered High Courts are concerned it is important not to misunderstand it.

Now it was impossible that there could exist any Court in these Provinces which could be denominated as the High Court of these Provinces, but for the Act called "An Act for establishing High Courts of Judicature in India," namely, statute 24 and 25 Victoria, Cap 104, which is denominated as the Charter Act, enabling Her Majesty to establish High Courts of Judicature in India. It is enough to refer to the first section of that statute to enable everyone who knows the rules of interpretation to understand that it is an enabling Act as distinguished from a declaratory enactment.

Then there is in this enactment a provision in respect of the salaries of the Judges of the High Court, namely, section 6 of that enactment, leaving alone the provision of section 2 of that same enactment as to the constitution of "The High Court of Judicature at Fort William in Bengal and at the Presidencies of Madras and Bombay respectively," and the section goes on to say "that such Court shall consist of a Chief Justice and as many Judges not exceeding fifteen as Her Majesty may from time to time think fit and appoint." Then follow rules as to the persons whose qualifications will entitle them to be eligible for such office.

Now this enactment related only to the Presidency of Fort William in Bengal in the first instance, but by section 16 of that same enactment Parliament with the consent of the House of Commons, the House of Lords and Her Majesty passed the following section: "It shall be lawful for Her Majesty if at any time hereafter Her Majesty see fit so to do by Letters Patent under the Great Seal of the United Kingdom to erect and establish a High Court of Judicature in and for any portion of the territories within Her Majesty's dominions in India, not included within the limits of the local jurisdiction of another High Court, to consist of a Chief Justice and of such number of other Judges with such qualifications as are required in persons to be appointed to the High Courts established at the Presidencies hereinbefore mentioned, as Her Majesty from time to time may think fit to appoint, and it shall be lawful for Her Majesty by such Letters Patent to confer on such Court any jurisdiction, power and authority as under this Act is authorised to be conferred on, or will become vested in, the High Court to be established in any Presidency hereinbefore mentioned, and, subject to the directions of such Letters Patent having reference to the High Court established in any such Presidency, and to the Chief Justice and other Judges of such Court and to the Governor-General or Governor of the Presidency in which such High Court is established, shall as far as circumstances may permit be applicable to the High Court established in the said territories and to the Chief Justice and other Justices thereof and to the person administering the Government of the said territories."

Now I may say, in passing, as a matter of law that I am not within the meaning of the statute "the person administering the Government of the said territories." But I am equally anxious to point out that the Chief Justice of any High Court in India is also devoid of the category of being "a person administering the Government of the said territories."

I wish now to follow out the legal aspect of this obiter dictum. It was because of the power and authority which the constitution of England conferred upon Her Majesty by reason of section 16 of statute 24 and 25 Victoria, that this very Court was established. I will come to this matter presently. But in the meantime it is important to state that this very enactment 24 and 25 Victoria, Cap. 104, whilst laying down such rules is very specific in drawing a strong line of distinction between those who are not Her Majesty's Judges and those who are.

The law describes the Chief Justice of any High Court to be nothing other than a colleague of other Judges of the High Court. His position is therefore no more than that of being a Judge of the Court to which he belongs, beyond one or two matters mentioned in the enactment itself. One is that under section 7 of the enactment 24 and 25 Victoria it is necessary to fill up a vacancy when it occurs in the office of the Chief Justice of any High Court for which the provision is made in that section, and that it is not necessary to fill up a vacancy caused by the retirement or death, or for any other reason of a Puisne Judge. This matter and this distinction was explained by me in the judgment which I delivered in the Full Bench case of Lal Singh vs. Ghan Sham Singh (I. L. R., All., 625) when the question of the propriety and legal efficiency of the constitution of this Court was concerned and was ably argued by the late lamented Pundit Ajudhia Nath.

Now I have to consider a most serious question for purposes of the proper working of this Court, and that question is this: Does the learned Chief Justice of this Court or any other Chartered High Court possess any authority to establish his own rules as to the working of his colleagues?

Now in this connection it is important to read out another section of this enactment, namely, section 14, which runs thus:—"The Chief Justice of each High Court shall from time to time determine what Judge in each case shall sit alone and what Judges of the Court, whether with or without the Chief Justice, shall constitute the several Division Courts as aforesaid."

Much doubt and difficulty has arisen as to the interpretation of this clause of the statute and I will presently endeavour to explain.

The Court then adjourned.

On Tuesday, Mr. Justice Mahmud, on taking his seat on the bench, resumed as follows:—

The obiter dictum which I delivered yesterday in regard to the office report in first appeal No. 134 of 1890 was intentionally not completed by me yesterday. But the case which was before me had the order which it bears, namely, that "At the request of Mr. Howard, Senior, who appears for the appellant let this case be put up before me as soon as the notices are served." This order dated 25th July, 1892, does not require me to finish my obiter dictum of yesterday and I direct that this order should be at once obeyed by the office. Further, I direct that as soon as notices have been served, if they can be served before the end of the tenth of the Mohurrum, that this case be laid before me for such orders as I may pass thereon. But even if the notices have not been received I directed that this case may be laid upon my day's list on the 9th of August, 1892, when I understand according to all calculations the Ashr-i-Mohurrum will be over.

This order I desire to be communicated to the Registrar forthwith, and also for him to obtain the orders of the learned Chief Justice and to give me official notice as to such orders.

Further, I am driven to the necessity of saying here that I have no conscientious objections to conduct any of the business of one of Her Majesty's Judges during the Mohurrum, nor do I entertain any superstitions in regard to the tenth of the Mohurrum at all similar in this respect to the Good Friday of the Christians.

I decline to hold that in regard to matters of holidays of any particular creed or nation any such requisition should be made necessary, namely, such as is required by the notice which has been hung up in the Court, and Mr. Percy Gray in his official capacity as Registrar of this Court dated the 19th July, 1892.

I desire, not with reference to any declaration as to my religious prejudices or as to superstitions, if I have any, that by dint of the authority which I possess as one of Her Majesty's Judges and as a matter of social propriety, as I understand it among gentlemen of my race and creed, I decline the power of any one in this court whether the learned Chief Justice (for whom I entertain high respect) or the Registrar, or the Deputy Registrar or the Assistant Registrar to force me to sit during the Ashr-i-Mohurrum in this court without my being first consulted. I intend to remain in Allahabad during the whole of this Ashr-i-Mohurrum and I shall during this period be available for any emergent work that may arise during that period and which may be required by my own sense of duty under the letters patent with which Her Majesty has honoured me as a puisne Judge of this Court, and which I have loyally accepted.

Let this file together with the Mohurrum notification dated 19th July, 1892, be submitted to me by the Registrar as soon as the Court closes for the Mohurrum.

Mr. Amir-ud-din asked that the appeal No. 400 of 1890, in which he represented the respondents might be allowed to stand over till the close of the Mohurrum. Mr. Abdul Raoof, who appeared for the opposite party had consented to this.

Mr. Justice Mahmud—The difficulty is you have to make a declaration.

Mr. Amir-ud-din—We are to make nothing of the sort: we have determined.

Mr. Justice Mahmud—Have you any conscientious scruples?

Mr. Amir-ud-din—Our conscience has nothing to do with it. We have the right that this holiday should be allowed without any conditions, and if it is not allowed without any conditions, of course—

Mr. Justice Mahmud—Why should I not say now. You have to make a declaration.

Mr. Amir-ud-din—We are not to make a declaration.

Mr. Justice Mahmud—That is your look out. I have made mine now.

His lordship then dictated the following order:—

Mr. Amir-ud-din, who appears for the respondents in this appeal, has stated that without making any declaration as to conscientious scruples in regard to the Mohurrum holidays, and without intending to make any such declaration in regard to himself personally, he has obtained the consent of Mr Abdul Raoof, for the appellant, that this case may not be taken up till after the 10th of the Mohurrum as published approved by the Government.

Mr. Amir-ud-din said that the Government printed list gave sanction up to the 12th or 13th of the Mohurrum, that is to the 6th of August. He did not mean to come on a day sanctioned and approved as a holiday by Government.

Mr. Mahmud continuing said: Mr. Abdul Raoof expressly consents to this motion. I order accordingly.

Mr. Justice Mahmud then adjourned the sitting. He said:— I will not take up any case for to-day because I want to finish the English business of the Court, which I denominate as Registrar's files, now upon my table in my chambers in the Court house. I therefore adjourn the hearing of all the cases on my day's cause list to-day, which was prepared without my being consulted. I, therefore, rise for the day and the bench reader will inform the learned gentlemen of the bar that none of the cases in which they are engaged shall be called upon for hearing in my bench to-day.

The following is the notification relating to the Mohurrum holidays referred to by Mr. Justice Mahmud:—

1. The Court will be closed for the last four days of the Mohurrum.

2. The Court so far as applications of all kinds except emergent applications to admit to bail are concerned, will be closed during the other six days of the Mohurrum.

3. Upon the application in writing of any Mahomedan Advocate, Attorney or Vakil presented on or before the 26th of July 1892 setting out a list of the cases in the Court in which he is concerned, and stating that he has conscientious objections to conducting business in Court during the Mohurrum, the cases mentioned in the list will not be taken during the Mohurrum.

4. Cases in which any Mahomedan party is not represented by an Advocate, Attorney or Vakil will not be taken in the Court during the ten days of the Mohurrum.

THE CHIEF JUSTICE ON COURT HOLIDAYS.

The following important deliverance was made in the Allahabad High Court, on Saturday July 30, by the Chief Justice, Sir John Edge, sitting with Mr. Justice Blair:—

This is a second appeal which was presented in this Court apparently through one Mr. M. A. Rushid, who signed the memorandum of appeal as counsel for the appellants. It was admitted by our brother Tyrrel, and by him directed to be placed before a Bench, under section 551 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It has accordingly been put on the list for to-day and has been called on. The appellants do not appear, neither does Mr. M. A. Rushid. Whether Mr. M. A. Rushid received a fee for attending to this case we do not know; that may subsequently be a question between him and his clients. As this is one of the days of the Mohurrum which are observed by Shia Mahomedans, Mr. M. A. Rushid, if he is a Shia Mahomedan, and has conscientious objections to doing work in Court on this day, or, indeed, if he is of any other class of Mahomedans and has conscientious objections to doing work in Court on this day of the Mohurrum, which is not the tenth day, had the opportunity of filing an application in this Court, stating the cases in which he was engaged, and further stating that he had conscientious objections to appearing in Court during the Mohurrum. If he had taken that course this case would not have been placed on to-day's list, and would not have been called on for disposal. This Court made certain regulations before the occurrence of the Mohurrum this year by which any cases in which any Mahomedan gentleman who had conscientious objections to appearing in Court during the Mohurrum was engaged, should, on application by him, stating that such objections existed, be kept out of the list. It is obvious that this Court cannot be closed for the disposal of business at the wish or suggestion of advocates, vakils or others whose only objection to do work at this time is the objection which probably most people have at this time of the year, and not an objection founded on conscientious scruples. It would appear from the report of an oral application lately made that a case should stand out of the list during the Mohurrum, that the gentleman who made that application was under a mistake as to the application of the list of gazetted holidays, gazetted under the orders of this Court. How it is possible that that gentleman could have been under that misapprehension it is difficult to understand, as, recently, when he attended, with a deputation, before the judges of this Court, it was explained to him that those gazetted holidays were gazetted under section 15 of Act XII. of 1887, under which this Court has jurisdiction, subject to the orders of the Governor-General in Council, to prepare a list of days to be observed in each year as close holidays in the Civil Courts subordinate to it. That section relates only to the Courts subordinate to the High Courts, and does not relate to the High Courts, as was pointed out to the gentleman in question, so that the fact is that in the list of gazetted holidays for the Civil Courts which has been published, not by the Government, but by this Court, acting under the powers conferred upon it by section 15 of Act XII of 1887, the 10 days' holidays allowed by it for the Mohurrum apply only to the Courts subordinate to this Court, and to those Courts, of course, only on their civil side. The vacations of this Court are not gazetted in that list, as is perfectly well known to every one practising in this Court. We mention this in order that other persons may not be under a similar misconception as to the Courts to which gazetted holidays, gazetted under the authority of this Court, apply. The Court regretted that owing to the deplorable condition of the files of pending cases it could not grant the whole of the Mohurrum as holidays in this Court. It was compelled by a sense of public duty to make arrangements for carrying on the work of the Court during six days of the Mohurrum, and for the discharge of the duties for the performance of which the Judges receive their salaries. We cannot, of course, say, as Mr. M. A. Rushid is not personally known to either of us, whether he is a Shia, and had good reason for abstaining from being present in Court to-day. He is not here. No one appearing to support this appeal, it is dismissed.

ACT NO. VI OF 1892.

An Act to amend the Indian Limitation Act, 1877, and the Code of Civil Procedure.

Whereas it is expedient to amend the Indian Limitation Act, 1877, and the Code of Civil Procedure; It is hereby enacted as follows:

1. After section 5 of the Indian Limitation Act, 1877, the following section shall be added, namely:

"5A. Whenever it is shown to the satisfaction of the Court that an appeal or an application for a review of judgment was presented after the expiration of the period of limitation prescribed for such appeal or application owing to the appellant or applicant having been misled by any order, or practice, or judgment of the High Court of the Presidency, Province or District, such appeal or application, if otherwise in accordance with law, shall for all purposes be deemed by all Courts to have been presented within the period of limitation prescribed therefor."

2. To Chapter XXII of the Code of Civil Procedure the following section shall be added, namely:

"375A. Nothing in this Chapter shall apply to any application or other proceeding in any suit subsequent to the decree.

"Explanation.—An application to the Appellate Court pending an appeal is not an application subsequent to the decree appealed from within the meaning of this section."

3. After section 582 of the said Code the following section shall be added, namely:

"582A. If a memorandum of appeal or application for a review of judgment has been presented within the proper period of limitation, but is written upon paper insufficiently stamped and the insufficiency of the stamp was caused by a mistake on the part of the appellant or applicant as to the amount of the requisite stamp, the memorandum of appeal or application shall have the same effect and be as valid as if it had been properly stamped: Provided that such appeal or application shall be rejected unless the appellant or applicant supplies the requisite stamp within a reasonable time after the discovery of the mistake to be fixed by the Court."

4. To section 647 of the said Code the following shall be added, namely:

"Explanation.—This section does not apply to applications for the execution of decrees, which are proceedings in suits."

5. The provisions of this Act shall apply to every appeal and review of judgment heard after the passing hereof, notwithstanding that the judgment appealed from or under review may have been passed, or the petition of appeal or application for review presented, before the passing of this Act.

Holloway's Pills and Ointment.—Influenza, Coughs and Colds.—In diseases of the throat and chest, so prevalent in our changeable climate, nothing so speedily relieves, or so certainly cures, as these inestimable remedies. These disorders are too often neglected at their commencement, or are injudiciously treated, resulting in either case in disastrous consequences. Whatever the condition of the patient, Holloway's remedies will restore if recovery be possible; they will retard the alarming symptoms till the blood is purified and nature consummates the cure, gradually restoring strength and vital nervous power. By persevering in the use of Holloway's preparations, tone is conferred on the stomach and frame generally. Thousands of persons have testified that by the use of these remedies alone they have been restored to health after every other means had failed.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

IN AUGUST.

THE echo of a whispered word,
A fleeting cadence low and sweet,
Fresh as the songs the streams repeat,
Faint as the croon of nestling bird.

A deeper azure in the sky,
Fields gleaming gay with green and gold,
Closed wings that droning half unfold,
As summer passes slowly by.

A breath of sadness scarcely caught,
A minor note to swell the strain,
A blossom bowed by falling rain,
Gold strands with silver subtly wrought.

O, rare unfathomed August days,
Rich with the glories of the past,
What will you bring us forth at last?
What lurks beneath your hovering haze?

MAY LENNOX.

LOVE OVER ALL.

BY MARY AINGE DE VERE.

RICHES are naught. A jewel crown
May be undone, and gold will melt,
But an ended pain is long, long felt.

Kisses are sweet, but prayers are best;
Only the lips to a kiss are given,
While the soul goes, with its prayer, to Heaven.

Dreams are shadows, yet sometimes come
Like blessed curtains that drop upon
The scorching light of a noonday sun.

Hopes betray us, but Faith is sure,
Nor asks for an answer. She smiles and waits
A patient child at the heavenly gate.

Love over all! A jewel crown,
A pain that stays, and a prayer, a kiss,
Dreams, hope, faith, patience, are met in this.

IN HIDDEN WAYS.

BY C. H. CRANDALL.

STRANGE is it that the sweetest thing
Forever is the shyest;
The sweeter song, the swifter wing,
Ere thou the singer spyest.

The more the fragrance in the rose,
The more it hides a-blushing;
And when with love a maiden glows,
The more her face is flushing.

In depths of night, in gloomy mine,
In wildwood streams—in stories
Of lowly lives, unsung—there shine
The world's divinest glories.

As low arbutus blossoms rest
In modesty unbidden,
So man and nature hide their best,
And God himself is hidden.

LINES TO TRAVANCORE.

Oh Kerala! the garden of this world,
One grove of palms—a leafy dome, the shrine
Of vernal flow'rs, the temple of the gods,
My home—my sweet abode!—embraced within
The many-fountained bosom of the deep,
Crowned with the glitt'ring hills—fair Cybele!
Thou!—dowried with the clouds that on the wings
Of Zephyr sendest forth to quench the thirst
Of nations; but for thee, this earth had known
No rain,—no joy,—nor all the grace she wears:
It was lone Nature's ardent soul that wooed
Thy beauty here, thou!—Daughter of the seas,
Great Mistress of the seasons,—ever good!

WEEKLYANA.

H. H. BHAGWATSINHAJI, the Thakore Sahib of Gondal, received the honorary degree of D. C. L. at the Oxford Convocation on the 23rd June. This is the first honor of the kind obtained by an Indian.

THE Press has been gratified at the recent election to the Vice-presidency of the United States:—

“Mr. Whitelaw Reid, elected to the Vice-Presidency of the United States, for which he was nominated on Saturday, June 11th, began his journalistic career in 1856, as editor of the Yenix News, and in 1866 was librarian to the House of Representatives. The Vice-President of the Great Republic, in the case of the death of the President during his term of office, becomes the Chief Magistrate.”

Apropos of journalist-statesmen, we read:—

“In August, 1871, Louis Adolphe Thiers accepted the title President of the French Republic. The son of a ‘dicker’ at Marseilles, and educated as a ‘Coursier,’ or ‘Sizar,’ at the college of his native city, Thiers came to Paris when he was twenty-eight, with a few francs in his pocket; lodged in a garret, and began his journalistic labours as an art critic on the ‘Constitutionnel,’ and afterwards, in conjunction with Armand Carrel and Mignet, he founded the famous Liberal paper the ‘Nationel.’ He gave up journalism after ten years’ hard work to become a statesman, just as Mr. Whitelaw Reid has done; and if the French journalist was the historian of the Revolution, the Consulate, and the Empire, the American journalist, who has become the Vice-President of the United States, has written a 'History of Ohio during the War.'

THE Ven'ble F. R. Michell, Archdeacon of Calcutta, retired from the service from the 12th August 1892.

THE Rangoon College has been affiliated to the Calcutta University in Law.

SEVEN subjects of the Ulwar State are in confinement for the murder of Kunj Lal and will be tried before a special court presided over by British officers. The Council of Regency weakly applied to the Government of India for their assistance and Mr. H. F. Evans, Judge of Shahjahanpur, and Major Thornton, Officiating Resident of Jeypur, have been lent for the occasion.

THIS is how the wealth of England goes!

"A hunting-horn at a sale in London fetched 6,300 guineas. It was an ordinary cow's horn beautifully enamelled, the subjects depicted being hunting scenes. It was about 350 years old. A letter of Henry VIII. sold for £19, and a ticket of admission to the trial of Warren Hastings realized £2."

£2 for an old ticket of admission to a celebrated trial! Why, holy relics do not sell at this rate. But an enamelled cow's horn for 6,300 guineas!—it must be a bovine plutocrat who paid that preposterous price for the bagatelle!

THE Lucknow Advocate of the 5th August says:—

"The trustees of the King's (Nawab Naser-ud-din Hyder) Hospital have taken the large tract of land lying on the back of the Lunatic Asylum for building a Leper House at a cost of Rs. 20,000. The House will be maintained by the King's Hospital."

Of what country was this King Nawab Naser-ud-din Hyder sovereign?

ANOTHER questionable paragraph:—

"This being the 2nd Mohorrum after the death of Wajid Ali Shah, ex-King of Oudh, we can understand the marks of decay. In his lifetime Lucknow used to get at least a lakh of rupees from him during Mohorrum."

If the Government did not pay the lac and more, we wonder where the poor deposed king got all that money from.

Under the circumstances a lac or anything like it seems a preposterous figure. His Majesty never expended a lac on the Mohorrum which was celebrated under his eye at his Palace at Garden Reach. Would he send a lac and more to Lucknow to be looted out of sight without the possibility of enjoying the sight of the scramble? Was not the Hosseinabad endowment enough for the city?

HERE is a living king:—

"The Magistrate of Azamgurr has notified that if boys below 8 years of age are found playing on any public road, their guardians will be criminally prosecuted."

But under what law? And what of the street Arabs?

FROM a long time past, Najibabad had been torn by disputes between the Jains and Vaishnavas, till at length in November last Sahu Bhagwandas and Umrao Singh, two leading bankers of the place, succeeded in reconciling them and invited and brought them together to attend a marriage between the two families. Bhagwandas Sahu resolved to commemorate the doubly joyful event by endowing Rs. 7,000 to some religious purposes. He was since induced by the good Tehsildar, Thakur Jagannath Singh, to devote the funds to the establishment of a school. The sum, however, was obviously inadequate. Happily now arose a feud between Hindus and Mahomedans, and this likewise was suppressed by the leaders of both the communities and in commemoration of the latter event another sum of Rs. 8,000 was subscribed in aid of the contemplated school. With this Rs. 15,000 at command, the school was started under the name of the Bullock School after the Collector. Mr. Bullock is a truly sympathetic officer who not only takes a great interest in the school, but also earnestly assisted the sects to make up their differences.

THE Mandalay Herald notices the falling off in the ecldt of the Moharram in Upper Burma. The lions of the spectacle—the tastas or taboots as they are variously called—have become reduced to limping jackals. As for the "tigers," says our contemporary:—

"The 'tigers' have been very tame this year, and were not of the man-eating species we remember to have seen in the days when the taboots were worth looking at."

THE same journal, we see, continues its crusade against the pariah dogs. Give a dog a bad name and hang him! Pariahs are pariahs, whether canine or human, and of course liable to be sat upon. The Herald gives an instance of the ferocity of the Mandalayan pariahs:

"Early on Tuesday (Aug. 2) morning a pig was attacked on 82nd street by about half-a-dozen of these canine pests, and had it not been for some gharry-wallahs lifting the pig up out of the reach of the brutes, the poor animal would have been worried to death."

On the strength of this the Municipality is invoked for relief. It was surely cowardly of the six to attack a poor little pig. It would seem as if these dogs had been brought up at Eton or Harrow. But there are pariahs and pariahs. If they have their Bully Dawsons, they have also their Sir Philip Sidneys. They are badly in need of literary friends. O for a Dr. John Brown for the poor Pariahs!

A FEW weeks ago, the Pall Mall Gazette produced a group of starving rayyets in the Southern Presidency, accompanied by a sensational account of the situation from a Madura missionary. The letter-press was immediately challenged and its statements have been disproved. To complete the exposure, it has now too turned out that the picture is from a photograph as old as 1877, in which year it was taken by Mr. Nicholas, a Madras artist.

DR. Keeley's "gold cure for inebriety," which has made such a name in England, is no better than it should be. To begin with, it is no gold cure at all, nor golden. At a meeting of specialists (the Society for the Study of Inebriety),

"Dr. Norman Kerer said an eminent English analyst had examined this 'gold cure,' which was found to consist of water 61.31 per cent.; sugar, 6.00; mineral salts, principally lime, probably from herbs; and 27.55 per cent. of pure alcohol! The decoction was described as 'double chloride of gold cure' and was dispensed in two bottles costing together nine dollars. It contained neither gold nor chlorides. Dr. J. E. Usher, of Melbourne, Australia, then described a visit he paid to Dr. Keeley's institution for the reception of patients at Dwight, Illinois, and, according to his statements, the alleged 'cure' is no cure at all and is calculated to do more harm than good."

And no wonder, considering that this formidable quack doctor poisoned patients suffering from the effects of long-continued habitual intemperance with doses of alcohol. Nevertheless, the "gold cure" is no misnomer as regards the first word of the designation. It is really a gold cure to the doctor. Dr. Usher saw marks of prosperity in the Illinois establishment.

THE Morning Post's Fyzabad news-letter of the 8th August contains the following:—

"To-day is the last day of the Jula-ka-mela, or swinging festival, which is held in Ajudhia during the second half of the Hindu month Sawan. Every devout Hindu is expected to put up a swing for the special enjoyment of one of the numerous deities of the Hindu Pantheon. Those dedicated to Mahadeo are the most expensive, and this year a swing put up by one of the Bundelkund chiefs takes the cake. It is made of pure gold and is estimated to have cost Rs. 15,000. There are other swings made of gold costing from Rs. 1,000 to Rs. 10,000, and several of silver valued at from Rs. 10 to Rs. 500."

That is of course the Jhulan Jatra of Bengal! Here it is dedicated to Krishna, the popular incarnation of Vishnu. But is Siva the presiding deity of the occasion in Oudh? The Advocate ought to enlighten us. We have never seen the grim Destroyer with his capacious stomach swinging like the slim jolly god of Brindaban.

The writer adds a characteristic incident:—

"A Hindu tradesman, married a year ago, made a vow that if his first-born child was a son, he would dedicate a silver swing to Mahadeo. A son was born, and in fulfilment of his vow he brought the promised swing, which cost him Rs. 20. Mahadeo was comfortably placed on a velvet cushion and the swing began, but unfortunately, one of the suspending chains broke and the god was ruthlessly thrown on the ground. Horror of horrors! The poor tradesman was in an awful dilemma."

Then there is a laboured description of how the family priest was sent for, as if that reverend gentleman could have been out of reach while the important function of Mahadeo's swinging was going on, how he decided that his penitent tradesman must perform a distant pilgrimage by way of penance, the journey to be preceded by feeding a hundred Brahmans and to be followed by the feeding of a hundred Byragis only. This latter must be a mistake.

THE Indus is in high flood, but has not overflowed its banks or burst the Kashmore bund. The stream, after reaching within seventy yards of the trainage works of last year, has veered off to a channel four miles east of the bund.

A SEVERE cholera epidemic is reported from Teheran.

THE Rampur murder business is not yet quite over. Another supposed murderer of General Azim-ud-din Khan, by name Jamal-ud-din Khan has been arrested in Jodhpur territory.

ON the recommendation of the Local and Supreme Governments in India, the Secretary of State has granted one year's extension of service to Mr. F. E. Elliot, District and Sessions Judge of Allahabad. In Bengal, Sir Charles Elliott has set his face against such prolongation.

SIR Auckland Colvin's time will be up on the 21st November, but he continues in office till the end of the month when he makes over charge to Sir Charles Crosthwaite and leaves India on the 1st December. He visits Egypt on his way home.

THE military authorities are for removing the cantonment from Dina-pur to a site adjoining Bankipur.

NOTES & LEADERETTES

with OUR OWN NEWS.

THERE is an end of the great Political Mission to Afghanistan headed by the illustrious Commander-in-Chief of India. It was determined before starting.

The Amir has replied to the offer of the India Government of a Mission to Afghanistan. He has great pleasure and satisfaction in accepting the proposal. In fact he had long wished for a deputation of British officers in his territory. The selection of Lord Roberts at the head of the Mission is peculiarly gratifying. But for the internal disturbances in his kingdom, he would at once have fixed the time and place of meeting. The Hazaras must be put down first. In any case, the Amir will again communicate with the Viceroy, whether the rebellion is stamped out or prolonged.

The Hazaras are not the only difficulty of the Amir. The insurgent Uzbeks in the neighbourhood of Maimana have, after their Tartar fashion, left in a body the Afghan territory and, crossing the boundary, have fallen back far within the Russian dominions. The Hazaras are as proud as ever, not having seen any reverses yet. The long talked of attack on the Oroozghanwalas has not yet been delivered. To add to the Amir's difficulties, the Firozkohi Char Aymaks, of the tract east of Kala Nao, between the Safed Koh and the Band-i-Turkestan mountains, are raiding into Sar-i-pool, a district east of Maimana.

IN the Black Mountains, the appearance of Hashim Ali, the exiled Hassanzai Chief, causes anxiety, even though he has received scant support. Accordingly, Major General Sir William Lockhart has been ordered to Oghi, to settle the difficulty and will shortly leave Simla.

Nearer home, the Waziris are showing signs of unrest. Near Fort Mir Ali Khel a patrol of the 5 Bombay Cavalry returning from Gul Kach was, on the 30th July, attacked by a party of Waziris armed with Martini rifles. On the following day also a party of about sixty Waziris stopped a small patrol of the Zhob Levy. Two of the Levy were wounded. After two of the Waziris were wounded the others decamped.

THERE is now no doubt about the reported Russian collision with the Afghans on the Alichoor Pamir. Our Government have received confirmatory intelligence from Gilgit. The particulars are still uncertain, though both the Chinese Envoy and Mr. Macartney, in charge of the British Consulate of Kashgar since Captain Younghusbands departure, have arrived at Gilgit. It is said that the new Chief of the petty State of Hunza will be installed on the 15th September by Dr. Robertson, in presence of the Chinese envoy.

INFORMATION has reached Simla that all Hindu residents in Russian Turkestan, many of whom are bankers, have been ordered out of Russian territory within six months. The reason is not given.

AT a meeting of the Central Mahomedan Association held the other day at Calcutta, it was resolved to send a congratulatory letter to Mr. Dadabhai Naoroji on his election as a member of Parliament and another letter of thanks to the electors of Finsbury for electing him. This is the first time that a Fireworshipper has been so honoured from the camp of the Believers. After the attitude hitherto maintained by the Mahomedans throughout the Empire against the Congress and its leaders, this welcoming of one of the earliest Presidents of the Congress is noteworthy.

THE Madras City Civil Court Bill was passed by the Viceroy's Legislative Council at Simla at its sitting of Thursday, the 11th August 1892. It received the assent of the Governor-General the following day and was published the day after in the Gazette of India as the Madras City Civil Court Act (VII of) 1892, coming into operation the same day, the 13th August 1892. The measure is intended, in the words of the Home Member in charge of the Bill, "to establish what may be briefly described as a District Munsif's Court in the city of Madras, and to transfer to it the cognizance of ordinary suits, not of the nature of small causes and not exceeding in value Rs. 2,500, which is the pecuniary limit of a District Munsif's jurisdiction in the Madras Presidency."

On the whole, we think, it is a move in the right direction. It is several years since we ourselves advocated a District Court for Calcutta. The expensive justice in the High Court in its Ordinary Original Civil Jurisdiction is telling severely on the public. A wise rule cannot shut its eyes to the ruin caused in the name of Justice, specially in partition suits. Oftentimes there is little to divide after the close of a case. The proceedings are tortuous to a degree. The attempt to curtail only enhances the costs, which have to be met by the sale of the divided property. The men may not always be to blame. The law must be held chiefly responsible. It is a bad law which can ruin the parties resorting to it.

THE representative of a historic ruling house has just passed away. On the night of the 5th, died at the age of nearly 90 years, from natural exhaustion, Maharaja Manavikrama Tamuri, Bahadur, K.C.S.I., the Zamorin Raja of Calicut. He had been ailing for the last few months, and aware that the end was nigh, he paid all his debts and provided for his priests and holy men and his gods. Then he sent for the members of his family, and bestowed on them estates, effects and money, not forgetting to exhort them all to live in peace and amity with one another and the world. Then, he summoned his Minister and settled on him a valuable landed property, over and above a previous similar gift. Finally, immediately before his demise, he paid up all his establishments, and gave a month's salary in advance to each employé. This is dying like a Prince—is it not?

Readers of Indian history will remember that the Portuguese under Da Gama first landed in India at Calicut and had audience of the then powerful sovereign, the Zamorin.

ACCORDING to the Commissioner, "there has been in Jorhat lately a regular epidemic of bad language; it is impossible to pass along the streets without hearing the vilest and most disgusting epithets used." Captain Gordon "thinks this should be put down and as fines do not seem to stop the nuisance," he sentenced a man who had abused another as "Sala," it seems at a private residence, to 14 days' rigorous imprisonment. We shall be glad to learn that the punishment has had the desired effect, and that the streets and houses of Jorhat are free from indecent language. We badly want such a Magistrate for Calcutta. At any rate, the Police should direct their attention in putting down the language of street boys and indecent disfiguring of walls in the native town. Sir Charles Elliott heads the purity movement of Bhai Pratap Chunder Mozoundar, for the moral training of our youths. He gave more than one entertainment to our boys in the interest of that movement. The next step is surely and more properly to purify the streets of "the vilest and most disgusting epithets."

THE Indian Spectator of Bombay shows a grasp of English politics second to that of no publicist in India, native or British, and which contrasts vividly with the uninstructed Liberalism and random remarks of the Native Press in general. Our contemporary's notices of the Finsbury election and the return of the Black Man are as justly conceived as brilliantly expressed. The number for the 24th July opens with a string of admirable paragraphs replete with acute remarks and valuable truths. The I. S. is not content, like our other contemporaries, to exhaust itself, in advance, in wild triumph at Mr. Naoroji's success but tries to draw the moral of the event.

After noticing the whole hog radicalism of desperation of the address to his electors with which Mr. Naoroji wooed Finsbury, the I. S. dwells on the phenomenal consensus of approbation which that address has experienced from the native politicians of India. The organs of all denominations and parties have vied with one another in applauding confession of faith which must have staggered many a sound old Liberal within the sound of Bu-bells. Well may our contemporary ask:—

"Is it not wonderful to see advocates of stagnation and monopoly going in raptures over Mr. Dadabhai's Finsbury address? They could afford to do it, good easy men; for it is not here that the shoe pinches. Mr. Dadabhai's radical principles are not to be enforced in their entirety in dealing with a Home Rule Bill for India. We have no such political bugbear to frighten us. All vested interests are safe so far."

Just so!

The mystery of success at Finsbury is the same as at any other place. There is no mystery in it, in fact. Perseverance levels down mountains. Brave Naoroji was determined to succeed and, though he repeatedly failed, he succeeded at last.

Our contemporary pays a discriminating tribute to the friends of India and of truth who stood by the Black Man. First and foremost are Miss Nightingale and Mrs. Josephine Butler, and as for the Liberal Leaders, there is

"Mr. Gladstone authorizing his Private Secretary to say how pleased he is at Mr. Dadabhai's improved prospects. Then, we have the hearty Sir Charles Russell, the earnest Lord Ripon, the coy hard-headed Lord Rosebery, the honest warm-hearted Lord Aberdeen, the circumspect and sincere Lord Reay."

The last five acted simply as friends, independently of party wire-pulling. The party itself had through long years behaved with such ineffable baseness towards poor Naoroji that his friend has not the heart to pay the management even a conventional compliment.

"It would be falsifying History to say that the Managers rallied round their Indian candidate, at last, out of love for him or for India. They wanted the seat, not the man, and cared not what became of the latter, backed up though he had been with all the pledges and promises that a Party could make. In the nick of time, however, they saw that only one man could wrest the seat for them; and they set themselves loyally to win through the man whom they had thought it quite within their rights to discard, to humiliate and to oppose."

Nor does our contemporary spare our own countrymen. They did not come to the struggling man's assistance, any more than his British fellow-Liberals.

"Only a few brief weeks before his victory we were all discussing the dead certainty of his defeat. The event, infinitely more valuable in its moral than its political aspect, is worthy of national rejoicings. But it has its dark side, too. It strikes one dumb with the force of the hideous truism, nothing succeeds like success."

Cutting as that concluding sarcasm is, it is fully merited, by one and all of us. And yet not quite so merited, after all. There never was any absence in his fellow-countrymen of an earnest desire for Mr. Naoroji's success. Only the expectation was wanting. And there are ample reasons for that. Repeatedly as after each repulse Mr. Naoroji attacked Finsbury, his chances of success seemed to whittle away to nothing. And when did they ever improve? Never! perhaps. It may almost be doubted whether he has won at all. A winning by three or at most five votes after the disappointment of years, has very much the appearance of a fluke, which scarcely entitles the lucky man to crow over rivals and rebuke friends.

But of course, this, or t'other, is neither here nor there. There is a serious moral in the event, in the contrast between our easy pessimism and quick exhaustion and Naoroji's sublime faith and untiring perseverance and its well-merited reward, and our contemporary does well to remind our countrymen of it.

THE Anglo-Indian Press has thoroughly vindicated its patriotism by the interest it has shown in the issues of the political struggle in Great Britain. The papers were all full of the elections. Speculations on the elections and discussions on the merits and prospects of the several parties met us at every turn. The feeling in the distance is quite as strong as at home. We have as great partizans among us as any within the bounds of Land's End and John O'Groat's. The Mandalay Herald, in its exasperation at the progress of democracy and Home Rule, bursts forth into Latin. O Tempora! O Mores! is the heading of its opening leader of the 23rd July. Enthusiasm drives our contemporary into lapses of memory in its English quotations. Here is a stream of eloquence in a couple of sentences:—

"The speeches of the several candidates, and of their supporters as also of their opponents, are, in many instances, samples of dashing rhetoric, in others, of envenomed vituperation, and in every case they exhibit to the full the skill of the orators in using language to mystify their audiences and very successfully to conceal their thoughts, but the palm for saying things that might mean anything, or nothing, and for serving up clap-traps in enticing and unrecognizable garbs and guises, must be given to the Octogenarian Leader of the Liberal Party, whom his famous political rival epigrammatically described as an 'unsophisticated rhetorician inebriated with the exuberance of his own verbosity,' but the Grand Old Man, as his admirers call him (a title which the most bigotted of his opponents are also forced to concede him) has even transcended his best efforts. When he was fishing for the Irish vote at the outset of the present electioneering campaign, he announced with such a flourish of trumpets as he alone can achieve, that he would devote the rest of his life to that 'distressful counthree' and, the average Pat, not being an actuary and accountant, and to whom the mathematical evolutions of the processes termed 'probabilities' are as sealed books, immediately swallowed the bait, but to the unimpassioned observer of this political strife, who has both the leisure and the desire to analyse its worth, the high sounding promise of Mr. Gladstone resolves itself into very little indeed: it is not the heroic act of self-denial and devotion he would have the world consider it, and which he could have claimed for it had he been, say a couple of score years less aged, but, in the place of seeing a young statesman who has only just won his spurs pledging himself to a life-long fidelity to some particular cause or some party creed, we have an ancient Tyro, who has long since passed the span of life allotted to ordinary mortals, making his avowals with the gush and enthusiasm of a juvenile suitor, and find too that his blandishments have been but too successful with lazy, illogical, discontented, and restless Ireland, who, if she had only the faculty of thinking out problems for herself, would ere this have been convinced of the hollowness of all the Venerable Leader's promises and that his fulsome assurances of affectionate regard and paternal solicitude were but the airy accessories of his own invention to be utilized for the purpose of wafting the barque of his Party into the comfortable haven that St. Stephen's offers."

Including these two, just eight such formidable sentences make one long article of full two columns.

The writer is scarcely conscious of what havoc his torrent of rhetoric commits, "achieving a flourish of trumpets," and so forth. "Epigrammatic" is, we are afraid, not a happy epithet for the quotation, whether as it is or as it should be. We make this latter distinction because our Burma contemporary has not only mangled a brilliant passage but actually made nonsense of it. Disraeli would scarcely have complimented his rival as an "unsophisticated" man, or rhetorician for that matter. He would have had less objection to the affirmative form of the word. Even with our contemporary's own text, so depreciatory of the Liberal leader, that word does not at all agree. The adjective used by the late Earl of Beaconsfield was "heedless." His description of the Grand Old Man was one of the finest things in the line ever heard in either House. Perhaps there is nothing like it in the whole range of oratory, ancient and modern. Most of the Great Parliamentarians are skilful in polite vituperation; there is no rising without it almost; but the late Earl of Beaconsfield shone above them all. Harry Brougham was grim and crushing, Dan O'Connell simply savage and mangling. More to the taste of a highly cultivated audience was Viscount Melbourne's razor-like despatch, but it was caviare to the general who, as they saw no gash, realised no execution. Disraeli was at once popular and fine. He was a master in the art of Parliamentary abuse. A master without serving articles of apprenticeship. For he showed his aptitude from the first. His unfinished maiden speech in the House of Commons attacked the giants of the day and hit them hard—the very reason why it was not listened to and not allowed to be finished. It is wellknown how, after a brief season of voluntary obscurity, he prospered by his brilliant invectives against the Conservative Premier, Sir Robert Peel. Even in later life, when he spoke as a responsible statesman or a parliamentary leader, he had neither abandoned his old style nor lost his former cunning. Once he descended to savagery, when he characterized the late Lord Halifax, then Secretary of State for India, as "an orator whom Providence had denied the gift of articulate speech," a most unmanly allusion to the Minister's natural stammer—which recalls O'Connell's chastisement of young Disraeli in a speech at a public meeting, which he wound up with calling the then aspirant for political honours "the lineal descendant and heir-at-law of the impenitent thief who died on the cross. But the description of the G. O. M. is not open to any such reproach. Whether in literature or morals or manners, it is faultless. The victim himself could not help admiring it. Lord Beaconsfield characterised Mr. Gladstone as "a heedless rhetorician inebriated with the exuberance of his own verbosity."

THE Maharaja of Tipperah having dismissed his minister Baboo Umakanta Das, of the Subordinate Executive Service, formerly Assistant to the Political Agent of that State, it is said that he will be appointed to Alipore, the 24-Parganas Head-Quarters, in the room of Baboo Shamadhab Mookerjee, who has been permanently transferred to the charge of the Sealdah Magistracy. During Khan Bahadoor Moulvi Abdul Jubber's officiating charge of the Superintendence of Stamps and Stationery, Baboo Umakanta will preside at the Alipore Police Court.

This is a great lift for a comparative junior. But some special balm of the administrative Gilead was perhaps required for comfort to Baboo Das under the rather ignominious determination of his proud career as king de facto of Tipperah. The people of Tipperah themselves would probably raise him to any elevation to keep him out of their country. For our part, we shall always be glad to see his undoubted merits recognised and utilised in their proper sphere. Whatever may be the geographical situation of that tract in the administrative globe, such light as his ought certainly not to be hidden under the Tipperah bushel. But whether the destination to which he has been removed is fit and proper, is the question. Perhaps it is scarcely fair to the favorite of Government to draw him out of the Eastern jungles and set him up at the Head-Quarters of the Metropolitan District directly under the fierce light that beats upon the Magistracy at the capital. Babu Das is an officer of devotion, however. He has before experienced equal transitions and has always managed to satisfy his British masters, if not all superior officials. He will do so again. Only the public may have ground for complaint. It is at least a hazardous experiment to install on the bench of a British criminal Court a man presumably demoralised by long exercise of despotic authority. Our friend himself will not find his seat on the bench at Alipore as pleasant as that on the political's easy-chair at Agartala, or on Beer Chunder Deb Barman.

There is nothing extraordinary in this sort of transfer. To put the square man in the round hole is a hallowed institution in this country. The Empire has been won by filibusters and commercial agents and tradesmen and shady characters and consolidated by bad bargains of sorts employed at random. And there is always apparently a superstitious objection to any departure.

RAJA Rampal Singh, the wellknown Talukdar of Kalakankar, in the Partabgar District, made his own appointment of a village accountant (Patwari) in a village on his estate. This was quite according to law and custom and we may add reason too. But what was the Deputy Commissioner—the District Ruler—for if landlords took the powers in their own hands and filled the village vacancies? Accordingly, he sent his own man for the office and rebuked the Raja for his impertinence. The redoubtable Talukdar was, however, the last person to be bullied out of his legal rights. He quietly appealed to the Commissioner. But that functionary, in accordance with bureaucratic etiquette, supported his subordinate. Not content with that, the Saheb Commissioner Bahadoor—the Lord of the Division—with consummate diplomacy, dammed the possible currents of sympathy from the public in the appellant's favour by charging him with oppression of his tenantry. In due course the case came before the great Sudder Board of Revenue. We say the great Sudder Board advisedly. People living in permanently settled provinces in the down country have no idea of the importance of the Board in the Ryotwari Upper India. There it is the Ma-Bap of the landlords—the earthly Providence of the landed interest. The Lower Provinces department of the same name is not for a moment to be thought of in connection with it. The N.-W. P. Board is an unique institution with unbounded power for good and evil. Luckily, it is presided over just now by a just as well as able officer, Mr. J. R. Reid, Senior Member. On the 18th ultimo, he set aside the Deputy Commissioner's order and admitted the Raja's right to appoint the accountant (Patwari) of the village on his estate, according to the provisions of the Act in force. The Board's order has given much relief to the whole landholding class.

WHICH is the greater, grander, or higher—a monument or a Prince? If the latter, as most people we suppose will answer, then the Bengali must try to console himself as best he might, in his position of inferiority. He is no better than a monument—a huge fribbler—a sham and humbug—and must bow to the Prince.

A MERRY land is Burma, where language is given not to conceal one's thoughts. There a spade is a spade, without any ado in search of long-winded euphemistic substitute. Criticising the President of the Rangoon Municipality in regard to the proposal for increasing the Secretary's pay, the Rangoon Gazette calls Major Temple "the Prince of Liars."

OUR authority is the Morning Post of the 12th August. We have not the honour of receiving the Rangoon Gazette in exchange. And now, it may be easily imagined, we do not care for the honour.

BABU Kedarnath Mookerjee, the late Head Clerk of the Political Agent with the King of Oudh, who was under suspension for the last 2 or 3 years, has been dismissed from the service of Government.

WE are known to be thoroughly well-disposed towards the Southern and Western Press. Indeed, we lose no opportunity, according to our resources, of presenting to our people nearer home and to our publicists by way of examples to them, the good points of the more distant publications. But we have an unfortunate habit of "chaffing," sparing neither friend nor foe, though Heaven knows we never mean ill or ought but well. This way we have alienated our weaker friends. The Madras Standard has had its revenges upon us in its issue of the 15th instant, in a paragraph which, if it do not show a wilful failure of good faith exhibits an extraordinary degree of crass imperspicacity. Says the Madras Standard :—

"There is a general movement writes the Reis and Rayyet among the Local Administrations against municipal management. This is not visible in the Bengal Legislative Council only. The Madras Government lately appointed a Chairman to the Municipal Board of Calicut, to the annoyance of the forward party in Malabar. They have now passed the following order: 'As M. R. Ry. M. Tillinayakam Pillai Avergal's duties in connection with the Revenue and Magisterial administration of the two important Taluks of Madura and Tirumangalam render it necessary that he should be relieved at the earliest possible date of the office of the Chairman, Municipal Council of Madura, and as no fitting Municipal Councillor can be found to take up the appointment, the Government considers it desirable to appoint a paid Chairman, but before passing final orders on the matter, the Municipal Council will be requested to submit as soon as possible any remarks it may have to offer on the proposal.' Fancy 'a forward party in Malabar' passing an order about the Municipal Chairman of Madura. It may interest our contemporary to know that Madura has nothing to do with Malabar except that they begin with the same letter."

What I have we said that a party in Macedon has passed an order against the Municipal Chairman of Monmouth? We are not so far gone yet. As yet we receive only an occasional issue of our contemporary. If the Standard overpower us hereafter with its full blaze from day to day, we may arrive at that state of imbecility. It is impertinent in a writer who does not understand the plainest English to impute ignorance to his betters. The Eurasians down South must be hard pressed to allow such an organ to represent them.

THE new Cabinet consist of

Mr. Gladstone, Prime Minister, First Lord of the Treasury and Lord Privy Seal.

Lord Herschell, Lord High Chancellor.

Earl Kimberley, Lord President of the Council and Secretary of State for India.

Sir W. Harcourt, Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Earl Rosebery, Foreign Secretary.

Mr. Campbell Bannerman, Secretary of State for War.

Lord Ripon, Secretary of State for the Colonies.

Mr. Asquith, Home Secretary.

Earl Spencer, First Lord of the Admiralty.

Mr. Arnold Morley, Postmaster-General.

Mr. Mundella, Secretary to the Board of Trade.

Mr. H. H. Fowler, Secretary to the Local Government Board.

Mr. John Morley, Chief Secretary for Ireland.

Mr. Acland, Vice-President of the Council of Education.

Sir G. Trevelyan, Secretary of State for Scotland.

The appointment which has met with universal approval, both in England and the Continent, is that of Lord Rosebery. The English Liberal Press regret the weakness of the Radical element in the Ministry. Conservative papers are pleased that Mr. Gladstone has mainly adhered to his old traditions and chosen tried colleagues. The Times mysteriously avers that the new Ministers lack independence of character.

THE other changes in the ministry are

Lord Houghton, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.
Mr. G. W. E. Russell, Under-Secretary of State for India.
Mr. S. Buxton, Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies.
Mr. Herbert Gladstone, Under-Secretary, Home Department.
Sir U. Kay Shuttleworth, Secretary to the Admiralty.
Mr. Burt, Political Secretary to the Board of Trade.
Sir B. W. Foster, Political Secretary, Local Government Board.
Mr. McArthur, Third Junior Lord of the Treasury.
Lord Sandhurst, Under-Secretary of State for War.

PARTIES have changed in the House of Commons. The Irish Members, however, remain with the Opposition, as also Messrs. Burns and Hardie.

MR. Keir Hardie's motion made on the 18th for an Autumn Session was dropped, the Speaker informing that it was contrary to usage to discuss a motion in the absence of ministers at Osborne.

MINISTERS' writs for re-election were moved and Parliament prorogued. Mr. John Morley is the only minister whose re-election at Newcastle-on-Tyne is opposed.

THE showers of honors by the out-going have been followed by those by the in-coming ministry. The latest creations are :—

Sir John Pender is created a Knight Grand Cross of St. Michael and St. George. Colonel Charles Hotted Smith, a Knight Commander, and Mr. Christopher T. Gardner, British Consul at Hankow, a Companion of the same Order. Sir Henry Brougham Loch is created a Knight Grand Cross of the Bath, and Mr. Horace George Walpole, a Knight Commander of the Bath. The Earl of Zetland is made a Marquis and Lord Cranbrook an Earl. Eight Peers have been created, including Sir Archibald Campbell, of Blythswood. Five Privy Councillors have been appointed including Sir W. M. Ridely, Mr. Jesse Collings, Mr. A. Staveley Hill and Professor Huxley. Twelve Baronets have been created, including Mr. Edward Lawson, the Provost of Glasgow, and the following members of Parliament: Mr. Dixon Hartland, Mr. F. Seager Hunt, Mr. T. Lea and Mr. Mark Stewart. Eight Knights have been created, including Messrs. Ashmead Bartlett and Blundel Maple.

Lord Willoughby de Eresby has been created an Earl.

Mr. Douglas Straight has been Knighted.

THE Duke of Devonshire was privately married, on the 16th, to the Dowager Duchess of Manchester. Two days after, the Duke of Manchester, who had been confined to bed for some time, died. He was only 39 years of age and had succeeded to the title in March 1890. The next Duke is William Angus Drogo Montagu, a minor of the age of 15 years.

CHOLERA has appeared in Galicia and is spreading in St. Petersburg.

THERE was a meeting, on the 14th, in the Phoenix Park, Dublin, of fifteen thousand, to demand the amnesty of all the Irish Politicals sentenced for dynamite outrages. The speakers Mr. Redmond and others censured Mr. Gladstone for not yet having given any promise in that behalf.

THE EXCHANGE DIFFICULTY.

WE are afraid we have displeased many of our friends, specially in the European community, by our apparent indifference to the Exchange Question. We have not been really indifferent; it is impossible to be indifferent on a matter which so intimately affects every one—a matter of money in hard coin—mine, your, everybody's, the whole country's money. It were death to neglect such a matter. We were not neglectful but simply observant with anxious eagerness. We respected the subject too much to plunge headlong into the discussion. It was a technical subject and a confessedly difficult one.

We abstained from joining in the discussion for fear of making confusion worse confounded. It was a subject on which no man had a right to dogmatise—on which experts pronounced with bated breath, and we are far from being experts. What earthly use, unless in the way of prejudicing, would it be of, for us, to mingle our farthing rushlight with the general illumination attempted? The very gravity of the interests involved enjoined on us the utmost caution. With our Oriental habit of dependence on the Rulers, we were looking forward to the Government to pronounce on the subject from the vantage ground of impartiality and full information. Meanwhile, we confess, we were consoled amid all the evils of a depreciated currency that the Indian peasantry was gaining by the exchange difficulty.

The time has come, however, when it is impossible to keep quiet. The Government is even more cautious than Reis and Rayyet, as it has need to be, doubtless. The people are forced to cry out. As for the rayyets, their prosperity cannot be a legitimate object of desire when it clashes with the good of the whole community and the general interest of the state.

We are in a lamentable predicament. We stand before an awful state of things. We are on the slope of an Avernus and we have been beguiled down it without perceiving, until we are in hailing distance of the lowest depths of the valley—the pit of ruin.

The exchange on London which before the Mutinies was 2 shillings per Rupee showed signs of fluctuation against the latter after those events. As early as 1861, there was an appreciable loss to India on account of the first Railways from the depreciation of the Rupee—a loss which had to be made good from other sources. For many years, however, the figure remained much about the same, so no notice was taken of it. But of late years, there has been a progressive depreciation of silver which has enormously increased our payments to England on account of not only the Railways but of all our Home Charges. Nor is there any end to this depreciation. Those Charges cost India at the exchange of 1s. 4d. 25½ crores. At the present rate of 1s. 2½d. we shall have to pay over 31 crores. So

At 1s. Ex. 38¼ crores.

At 8d. Ex. 51 "

A fearful prospect! It means an ever-increasing burden of taxation without a recompense—a burden we cannot possibly bear. The scheme proposed by the Indian Currency Association is the only one yet that offers a means of relief. By going on a gold basis we shall be saved from the ruin that must result from such an increased taxation. No one doubts now that, when the Americans cease their purchases of silver at the end of this year, which now seems certain, and India is left to bear the entire burden of the accumulated silver, we shall see a fall to 8d. or lower! We trust our readers, native and European, will show their anxiety on the subject

INDIAN CURRENCY ASSOCIATION.

THERE will be a General Meeting of the Indian Currency Association in the Town Hall, Calcutta, at 5-30 P. M., on Thursday 25th August, 1892. Business to consider, and if approved to pass, the report of the Central Committee.

JAS. L. MACKAY,
President.

by largely attending the meeting of the Currency Association, which takes place in the Town Hall on Thursday. Those who will not bestir themselves now must not grumble later on if all the evils of a fearful increase of taxation fall on them.

THE MOHURRUM FESTIVAL.

FROM the accounts that have been published during the last few days, we are glad to find that no disturbance of any sort took place in any town in India, during the Mohurram.

We are informed that the Shias of Bhagulpore had also applied to be allowed to take out an Alam with Mashak and Tir, but as it was an innovation and as the Sunnis strongly objected, the Magistrate rejected their application.

It appeared strange to outsiders why the Sunnis everywhere should make such energetic and persistent objections to the Mashak and Tir when there was a promise not to utter the Tabarra while carrying the Alam in procession, and we made enquiries on the point. A correspondent has sent us the following extract from a petition filed by the Shias in the Court of the Magistrate of Chupra on the 13th June last asking to be permitted to take out the Alam with Mashak and Tir :—

"In the battle of Kerbella Hazrat Abbas was the Alambardar, i. e., the standard-bearer of the Army of Imam Hosain. Strict guard was kept over a rivulet at Kerbella, and not a drop of water was, by the hostile army, for 3 days, allowed to reach the lips of the followers and children of Imam Hosain. Hazrat Abbas determined to bring water at any cost from among the Sunnis, went with his Alam (which consisted of a pole carrying an ellipsoid and overhung with a white cloth,—so banners in ancient times used to be,—and this banner according to the belief of the Shias was the one which used to be carried with the army of the Prophet) and a Mashak or water skin (used to fetch water), towards the stream, and when returning towards his camp with the Mashak full of water and Alam, Hazrat Abbas was severely wounded, and the Alam; and the Mashak was pierced with arrows, and the cloth of the banner was besmeared with his blood."

From the above the feeling of the Shias towards the Sunnis is evident, namely, that the Shias believe and declare that the hostile army who butchered the Prophet's grandson Imam Hosain and his children and followers with the greatest cruelty and heartlessness, on the plains of Kerbella, was composed of Sunnis. This the Sunnis stoutly deny, as they too entirely and strongly condemn the inhuman conduct of those who killed Imam Hosain and his people at Kerbella. The Sunnis therefore protest against the Shias indulging in any expression of their religious belief in a manner that is sure to be exceedingly offensive to the Sunnis.

The difficulty is, that the Shias firmly believe that it is a great virtue to abuse and curse the first three Caliphs and the leaders of the Sunni sect; and this is as strongly resented by the Sunnis throughout the Mahomedan world who form by far the largest majority among the Mahomedan population in comparison to the Shias who are only a fraction in number.

We suspect that the rising of the Hazaras in Afghanistan has been caused by some such dispute between the Shias and Sunnis. We believe the Shias uttered the Tabarra at some place, and offended the religious feelings of the Sunnis, and this coming to the notice of the Amir, he inflicted such heavy and indiscriminate punishment upon the Shia Kazalbashes, that the whole Shia community rose in a body against him in rebellion. And who knows how this rebellion may end?

It was after deep and patient consideration of the very bitter and acrimonious feeling which exists between the Shias and Sunnis, that the Shah of Persia, himself a Shiah and the majority of whose subjects are Shias, issued a proclamation, some years ago, throughout his dominions, strictly enjoining the Shias not to utter the Tabarra, or in any way to offend the religious feelings of the Sunnis.

While on the subject of the Mohurram, we are glad to find that the Persian merchants of Calcutta have been celebrating the annual ceremony for several generations in the most magnificent and orderly manner, and at enormous expense. During the ten days of the festival, all visitors to the Imambarahs of Haji Mirza Abdool Kareem Shirazi and the late Aga Karbalai Mahomed are not only served with sherbet, tea, coffee and tobacco, but a limited number of them are also sumptuously fed with Pillao, &c. This hospitality is not more a characteristic of Hindu than of all Mahomedan festivals, which are always appropriated to open-handed charity. On these occasions the universal practice, among both sects, is to feed both rich and poor, without distinction of creed or race. These native festivals are redletter seasons to the denizens of the kintals, the sleepers in the maidan, the street Arabs, and all the other children of want of sorts. For then they are welcome guests and are regaled with delicacies.

In this connection we ought not to forget that during the ten days of the Mohurram hundreds of persons are daily fed with Pillao, &c., at the King of Oudh's Imambarah at Garden Reach. Since the death of the king, the chief credit of the arrangements there belongs to Prince Jahan Kadr, who is every year entrusted by Government with the supervision of those arrangements along with two other Princes. The final orders of Government for completing the endowment of that Imambarah have not yet been out, and a large item in the expenditure will, we have no doubt, be allotted to the feeding of people.

Similarly, in Haji Mahomed Mohsin's Imambarah at Hooghly, hundreds and thousands of men are daily fed during the Mohurram.

Even after the ten days of the Mohurram, several Persian gentlemen hold evening Mujlis at their residences at the rate of ten days each, at which preachers and readers are employed to preach and read, and the visitors, both Shias and Sunnis, are served with tea, coffee, sherbet and tobacco. The first ten days were occupied in this sort of quiet gathering in the house of Mirza Mahomed Bakar Sherazi, (one of our Honorary Presidency Magistrates), the eldest son of Haji Mirza Abdool Kareem.

We have gone to some length in giving an account of this affair, as it concerns a very important section of the general community, and as it may interest many of our readers other than Mahomedans, who have but a hazy idea of the differences between the Shias and Sunnis.

THE VAKIL RAJ IN BENGAL.

ALMOST the whole management of Local Self-Government in its various forms—educational, medical and municipal, &c.,—is in the hands of the Vakil.

They are usually the Chairmen and Vice-Chairmen of the mofussil municipalities, Education and Hospital Committees and Local Boards respectively. If in some places this is not the case, the majority is always on their sides or in their hands. The whole executive power of these bodies centres in them and they can do just as they like with the people. Their orders must be obeyed, their pleasure must be sought, their whims respected, otherwise no citizen can comfortably and peacefully live in a town or within a municipality. If unfortunately any man happens to occasion annoyance to any of them, he is surely undone. He is cruelly persecuted. The first attack is made generally on his privy or lane or the platform of his house or by increasing his tax. This is all done through the underlings. Such examples are in scores in every municipality, not excepting the very suburbs of Calcutta. The election is entirely in their hands both as regards the District Boards and the municipalities. Who can employ so many free agents to canvass for votes or to bring pressure upon the voters? Threats and temptations are freely resorted to. Regarding District Boards also, the Zemindars are all in their hands, and so they can easily manage to get their nominees elected. So they are in every way the masters de facto of the town corporations, as also of the District Boards in a great measure where the official Chairman cares very little to interfere. In what way these powers are exercised, whether for good or for evil, I will not say, but leave the task to the zealous supporters of Local Self Government. Suffice it to say that the pleaders have the supreme power over the towns, and none dare oppose them in their business, even though it lead to high-handed proceedings.

In almost every local newspaper, either vernacular or English, a pleader's finger can be directly traced. Either he or his brother or some one else of his kith and kin is the proprietor, part proprietor, editor, manager, or at least a contributor, and so the powerful local Press is in their hands and they can use it against any one and every one whenever they like to do so. If the paper belongs to some rich man, which is seldom the case, even then its guidance is in the hands of the pleaders or their friends. For every object, fair, selfish, or revengeful, this paper is freely used. If necessary, a Zemindar is relentlessly attacked to tone him down. If an officer proves himself obnoxious, the fire is at once opened upon him through the columns of the newspaper and kept on until he is smashed or brought to his senses as to how he should behave with this powerful fraternity.

All landlords and land-holders' associations, and everything belonging to them, in fact all political, social, and semi-political associations, are under Vakil management and control, and big magnates are allowed to preside over them only when the use of their purse, names and titles is required. In most cases, these lawyers pay all the expenses of such movements, not always willingly, and sometimes they subsidise some pleaders for this sort of work. The pleaders can drive people of every class to such meetings like a herd of helpless dumb cattle, under numerous pretences or threats. During the Congress agitation, I hear, people who were in need of borrowing money to save their properties, were told plainly that unless they joined the Congress they would not get money. What wonder that so many submitted? Necessity knows no blushing. Some persons were obliged to change their political opinions in order to save their family from starvation. In some cases, the rate of interest was reduced in the borrowers' favor, for their political subserviency. This Raj is creating quite a social confusion, discrediting the established etiquette, and overhauling all ranks and conditions. It fixes its own hall-mark on men, in ignorance or wantonness, in pursuit of its own policy, and that mark is bound to be respected. Disreputable men and shady characters are treated with a strange consideration and those who cared for peace are obliged to treat them in the same fashion for the sake of the pleaders.

The political opinions of our big Rajas and Nawabs and gentry are always moulded by the pleaders. Each Reis belongs to the political creed of his pleader. He obeys him in the same way that a boy always obeys his teacher or guardian.

In some chief towns of Bengal, palatial buildings, once the property of a wealthy Zemindar, are now occupied by pleaders, or on their sites they have built large houses. The descendants of the old families now dance attendance at the darbars of these big Hoozoors who know how to treat them in their misfortune.

Most of the local scandals originate from the company of the Vakils or are freely discussed therein. Every one has a freedom of speech in the houses of these champions of manliness and independence. Nothing is sinful or improper if it arises from that celestial quarter—a tone of amiability and propriety is always given to it by their very touch. The Bar libraries and home circles of these gentlemen are alike the great shrines of wisdom where every subject is talked upon with a freedom peculiarly their own—where the character of nobles and Government officers are daily dissected, where sarcastic remarks and depreciatory observations are freely indulged in against any one and every one who have given any offence to that body, whether rightly or wrongly.

There is great unity among the members of this learned profession when they have to fight an outsider, though in their own internal quarrels the house is often divided. A painful but very instructive illustration was seen the other day in the Dacca Bribery case, which led to many ugly disclosures and the proceedings of which cannot be read without a blush by any member of a respectable profession. That case has at least given an insight into the private life of some of them and their capacity and power for offensive and defensive purposes.

There are no doubt a good many very learned, good, honest and patriotic persons in the Bar; none can deny the fact. But unfortunately their number is decreasing. Now-a-days we see rather a progressive increase of the black sheep in this learned and respectable fold, and this fact is not unknown to the better men among them. But the incomprehensible etiquette and inconceivable policy of the profession is such that these blacks are not discarded by the leaders. Their existence thus permitted, they prosper under the indirect or presumed patronage of their betters, to the great misfortune of the people of Bengal and to the detriment of public good generally.

THE HARDSHIP OF THE LATRINE TAX.

TO THE EDITOR.

As the Bengal municipal law is about to be amended, I take this opportunity to draw the attention of the proper authorities to the inconsistency of the latrine tax on certain classes of holdings. As the law at present stands, there is absolutely no class of holdings within the municipal limits which is exempt from its operation. Holdings without latrines are taxed as well as gardens, tanks, arable lands, places of public worship, public burial and burning grounds. The opinion of the Advocate General on the subject (vide Collier's Act, note under section 321) is as follows:—

"It appears that all houses and lands which have no latrines, pay, as well as those which have them and that all holdings including tanks, gardens also pay it."

Mr. Collier says "It appears then that there are absolutely no classes of holdings which are exempted from latrine tax and that it is, therefore, leviable not only on arable lands but also on those holdings which are exempted from house-rate under section 92, viz., holdings used exclusively as places of public worship or duly registered as public burial or burning grounds."

Admitting that the Municipality has to maintain an establishment for the cleansing of latrines within its jurisdiction, surely those who do not get the least benefit or have no occasion to avail themselves of its service in any way, ought not, in justice and equity to be burdened with the rate. Then again the minimum tax is Rs. 3 and maximum Rs. 480, per annum. Supposing a cultivator has one bigha of arable land within the Municipal limits with an annual rental of one Rupee, he will have to pay Rs. 3 as latrine tax. The injustice and hardship are quite apparent and some kind of alteration of the provisions of the law seems necessary. I therefore invite you Mr. Editor to take up the subject for discussion and ask other gentlemen for their valuable suggestions reserving my own for a future occasion.

THE MAHOMEDAN BARRISTERS vs. THE HIGH COURT AND THE "PIONEER."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "PIONEER."

SIR,—It is impossible that the leading article in your issue of the 2nd instant, regarding the attitude of the Mahomedan barristers in connection with the Mohurrum holidays, should be allowed to pass unchallenged. That article is so full of inaccuracies on points of fact that it is not a matter for wonder that you have been led to form erroneous conclusions in reference to matters which constitute the grounds of your criticisms. That article starts with the insinuation that the obiter dictum of Mr. Justice Mahmud was the cause of the absence of the Mahomedan barristers from the Court. That insinuation is totally destitute of foundation. The Mahomedans knew nothing of Mr. Justice Mahmud's views regarding the Mohurrum holidays until the obiter dictum was delivered. The absence of the Mahomedan barristers from Court was entirely due to their sense of what was the right thing for them to do during the Mohurrum holidays, and to nothing else. You are wrong when you say that "the most orthodox Mahomedan does not look upon all the days of the Mohurrum as rigorously sacred," but it is perfectly immaterial whether you are right or wrong on the subject when you admit that "in this, as in other religions, some no doubt take a stricter view of the obligations of a holiday than others." I will, therefore, abstain from dwelling further upon the religious aspect of the question. I must, however, state that meetings or congregations are held at several places, where legends, commemorative of the events which constitute an important epoch in the history of the Mahomedan faith are read and listened to with avidity, and a participation in the ceremonies performed at such meetings is considered to be of immense spiritual value to the members of the congregation, Soonees and Shias alike. Such congregations are held not only during the day but also at night; and not in one, but in several places. There are other rites performed during the Mohurrum which are too numerous to be mentioned in detail here. The man who cares for the spiritual benefits to be obtained from a strict discharge of the obligations peculiar to the Mohurrum will never stoop to do anything which is likely to interfere with the performance of the ceremonies binding upon his conscience, and this was the view taken by the Mahomedans of their obligations in connection with the Mohurrum holidays. The orthodoxy of the Mahomedan who "does not look upon all the days of the Mohurrum as rigorously sacred" must be an orthodoxy of a peculiar nature. That all the days of the Mohurrum are rigorously sacred, is a proposition the truth of which no Mahomedan, whatever the extent of his orthodoxy, will venture to deny. There may be some days of Mohurrum more sacred than others, but that is a matter of comparison, not affecting the general proposition that all the days of the Mohurrum are unquestionably sacred.

You say that "in the Bombay High Court only one day of the Mohurrum is observed as a holiday." But why travel so far as Bombay in order to search for a precedent? Why not look round nearer home? Look, for instance, at the practice of the Judicial Commissioner in Oudh. There, 13 days have been allowed for the Mohurrum vacation this year, viz., 25th July to 6th August. In the Punjab they allow 10 days Mohurrum holiday. The circumstances of Bombay are altogether different. It would not do to cite the example of Bombay as a rule for the guidance of the Mahomedan residents of these provinces. But the notice issued on the 9th July put even the Bombay example into the shade. The notice did not allow a single day for the Mohurrum holiday, although the contingency justifying the adoption of the practice prevailing in Bombay had not, according to your own view of the matter, yet arisen. The notice is transcribed below for the convenience of reference. Notice.—"It is notified that on the last four days of the Mohurrum festival, civil work will not be taken up, by the High Court. On all other days of the festival, shown as close holidays in the printed list, both civil and criminal work will be taken up, and on the last four days of the festival criminal work only will be taken up. Corresponding dates in the English calendar will depend on the day on which the moon is visible." This notice has been studiously kept in the background by those who have criticised the conduct of the Mahomedan barristers. That notice did not, as stated above, allow even a single day to be observed as a Mohurrum holiday; meetings of the Mahomedan barristers, &c., were therefore held to consider the terms of the notice, and to take such steps as might be considered necessary in order to vindicate their liberty of conscience, which had been rashly assailed by the High Court. The High Court could easily have avoided the necessity for the issue of the notice if it had chosen to do so. The Mohurrum could have been included in the long vacation. There was an interval of only five days between the end of the Gazetted holidays and the commencement of the long vacation. The High Court might have been closed and opened a few days earlier than under the existing arrangements. The Court preferred to stop the Mohurrum holiday, and left the long vacation as it stood. The Mahomedans addressed a letter to the Registrar, protesting against the hardship of not a single day being allowed to them as a close holiday. The letter was laid before the English Meeting on the 18th July, and the signatories were asked to attend the High Court the following day (19th) at 10.30 A. M. "when the matter will be discussed." They appeared accordingly—all the Mahomedan barristers and the only vakil in the station were there. The Judges were holding an English Meeting. The discussion of the matter now commenced, and in the course of the discussion one Judge asked whether the Mahomedan barristers expected the Judges to believe that they were the only Mahomedans who had conscientious scruples. Another Judge suggested that they desired the High Court to be closed in order to go to the Subordinate Courts to conduct cases there, and an attempt was made to improve upon the suggestion by asking a question of one of them whether he had not conducted cases in the Subordinate Courts during the Mohurrum in previous years; they forget that all the Subordinate Courts are always closed at the same time with the High Court for the Mohurrum vacation. This incident of the discussion will give some faint idea of the refined politeness shown by some of the Judges to the Mahomedans during the interview—a politeness which is sure to be remembered by them with a lively sense of gratitude. The conclusion eventually arrived at was that the Mahomedans must forego their Mohurrum holiday, or observe the Mohurrum and pay the penalty involved in transferring their briefs to others, or run the risk of having their cases dismissed for default. It was represented to the Judges that the object of the signatories was not to make terms for themselves but to take care of the interests of the litigants in the High Court; that the barristers could hand over their briefs and stay at home if they liked during the Mohurrum holidays, whether the High Court was closed or not; that they were not prepared to give any written guarantee of conscientious scruples; that they had been in the habit of getting the Mohurrum holiday without any condition; and that they did not see why the practice which had been in force for a long series of years should be departed from this year. The Mahomedans left the Judges' chambers after repeating more than once the most positive expression of their determination to file no written guarantee of conscientious scruples. Why the clause regarding conscientious objections was introduced into the notice which was issued subsequently to the interview between the Mahomedans and the Judges, it is difficult to understand. The notice of 9th July made no provision for any case. How came the notification of the 19th July to make a "provision for every case?" The explanation is to be found in the circumstance that the notification was issued after the barristers had had an interview with the Judges. As I have given the text of the earlier notice above, I think it necessary to copy the later notification, bearing date the 19th July, here.

"Notice.—1. The Court will be closed for the last four days of the Mohurrum.

2. The Court, so far as applications of all kinds, except emergent applications to admit to bail, are concerned, will be closed during the other six days of Mohurrum.

3. Upon application in writing of any Mahomedan advocate, attorney, or vakil, presented on or before the 26th July, 1892, setting out a list of the cases in the Court in which he is concerned, and stating that he has conscientious objections to conducting business in Court during the Mohurrum, the cases mentioned in such list will not be taken during the Mohurrum.

4. Cases in which any Mahomedan party is not represented by an advocate, attorney, or vakil will not be taken in the court during the ten days of the Mohurram."

The preceding notification, which has supplied you with materials for praising the High Court and condemning the Mahomedan barristers, announced that "the Court will be closed for the last four days of the Mohurram." A copy of this notice was specially sent to each of the Mahomedans who had joined in remonstrating against the discontinuance of the practice of closing the High Court for the Mohurram holidays. The Mahomedans had not since been furnished with any notice superseding the notification dated the 19th July. What the Court meant by the phrase "the last four days of the Mohurram" is evident from the notice of the 9th July, which explicitly refers to the days "shown as close holidays in the printed list." The last four days of the Mohurram, according to the printed list, corresponded with the 3rd, 4th, 5th and 6th August. Several cases of Mahomedan barristers were ordered to be put up for hearing on the 5th and 6th August, notwithstanding the assurance given by the notification that the Court should be closed on those dates.

The remark made in the judgment of the 30th July published in your edition of the 2nd instant "that the Court cannot be closed for the disposal of business at the wish or suggestion of advocates, vakils, or others, whose only objection to do work at this time is the objection which probably most people have at this time of the year, and not an objection on conscientious scruples," is hardly just or fair, or even relevant. The advocate or vakil who expects that the Court will be closed for business at the mere expression of his wish or suggestion must be an idiot, and not deserving the appellation of advocate or vakil. The Mahomedan barristers entertained no such expectation; they had already worked during the most unfavourable season of the year, compared to which the Mohurram is a remarkably pleasant month. The Mahomedans desired the Court to be closed, not because they had a wish to see it closed on account of the weather, but because the period during which they desired the Court to be closed was the Mohurram holiday, because the Court had always been closed for the Mohurram during previous years, and because the Mahomedans had been led to believe up to the date of the first notice (9th July) that the practice of closing the Court during the days shown as close holidays in the printed list would not be departed from, especially as no other close holiday entered in the printed list had been disallowed by the Court at any previous time. That the High Court should be constrained to have recourse to arguments of the nature above noticed in order to defend its action, is a circumstance much to be regretted. It is perfectly immaterial for the purposes of the controversy that the printed lists of holidays were prepared for the Subordinate Courts. The High Court used to be closed for a long series of years without any printed list, and it should have been closed this year also.

The case of the Mahomedans is made much stronger by the absence of printed lists for the High Court holidays. If a man in the Subordinate Court wants a holiday he has to prove his right or title, if it is denied, by the production of the printed list. He proves his title by the evidence of the express grant furnished by the entries made in the printed lists. But the man who wants a holiday in the High Court need not produce any documentary evidence of his right. His case is one of a lost grant—a case of prescription title. The High Court might curtail the holidays in the Subordinate Courts. The printed list is the charter of the Subordinate Court holidays, renewable each year; but the holidays in the High Court cannot be curtailed with any pretence of fairness or justice. But it is idle to deny that the printed list of holidays prepared for the Subordinate Courts is a list of holidays to be observed in the High Court. The draft list of holidays is shown to one or two Mahomedan barristers each year, to see whether the Gazetted Mahomedan holidays are correctly entered therein, before the list is sent on to be printed. They take the trouble to examine the draft with care, because they know that if they make a mistake they and their co-religionists in the office and elsewhere will have to suffer. But the statement that the printed list of holidays for the Subordinate Courts furnishes a rule for the guidance of the High Court in granting holidays to the people connected with the court, is confirmed and supported by the very notice which has put an end to the Mohurram holiday this year. The particular passage in the notice I refer to is as follows:—

"It is notified that on the last four days of the Mohurram festival, civil work will not be taken up by the High Court. On all other days of the festival shown on the printed list, both civil and criminal work will be taken up," &c., &c.

If the printed list is not a guide, why refer to it at all? A further confirmation of the statement will be found in the judgment delivered in the second appeal filed by Mr. M. A. Rashid, and dismissed for default on the 30th July. The passage in the judgment bearing upon the particular point under discussion runs thus: "The Court regretted that, owing to the deplorable condition of the files of pending cases, it could not grant the whole of the Mohurram as holiday in this court." If the judgment did not mean the whole of the Mohurram as shown in the printed list I am at a loss to understand what the phrase quoted meant. The same judgment takes an exception to the statement that the Mohurram holidays have been sanctioned by Government. But that statement is apparently confirmed by the observation made in the judgment itself. The passage containing the observation is in these terms:—

Under section 15 Act 12 of 1887 the High Court "has jurisdiction, subject to the orders of the Governor-General in Council, to prepare a list of days to be observed in each year as close holidays in the Civil Courts subordinate to it."

Now what does the phrase "subject to the orders of the Governor-General in Council" mean? The printed list is not a legal list until it is confirmed by order of the Governor-General in Council. It is in the power of the Governor-General to sanction or to refuse to sanction the holidays; the statement, therefore, that the Mohurram holidays have been sanctioned by Government, appears to be correct.

The second appeal filed by Mr. M. A. Rashid was dismissed for default on the 30th July, which was one of Mohurram days. Mr. Rashid is one of those who refused to accept holiday on the terms proposed by the High Court. Mr. Rashid had, I believe, made arrangements for his appeal to be argued in his absence, but somehow the arrangements were not carried out, and the consequence was that his appeal was dismissed for default. Mr. Rashid's appeal is the first case of a Mahomedan barrister dismissed for default during the Mohurram. Cases in which Mahomedan barristers appeared had been put up for hearing regularly during the Mohurram holidays, and not a single case had been found in which sufficient provision had not been made for the protection of the interests of his client by the Mahomedan barrister engaged by him. M. Rashid's case is the only exception. The order dismissing Mr. Rashid's appeal is ultra vires. The Court has no power to dispose of civil cases on a day which is a close holiday, without the consent of the parties concerned. "The Court regretted," as has already been observed in connection with another point, "that owing to the deplorable condition of the files of pending cases it could not grant the whole of the Mohurram as holiday in the Court," and you said in the course of a leading article in your issue of the 28th July that "in the interests of public business the Court is to be kept open during part of Mohurram," and a little further on in the same article you added that "the plain and evident intention of the Court was that part of the Mohurram holiday should be foregone, for the purpose of making up lee-way." Now when was the discovery of the deplorable condition of the files made? Was it made for the first time on the 9th July, the date of the first notice which was issued in reference to the Mohurram holidays? Or was it not well known before that date that the arrears had been steadily accumulating for a long time past? Was it not known long before the last Christmas vacation that the files of pending cases were not in a satisfactory state? If it was, why did not the Court direct part of the Christmas holidays "to be foregone, for the purpose of making up lee-way?" Why was the Court closed for a whole week for the Easter vacation last year, and for more than one day this year, when the printed list showed Good Friday to be the only close holiday recognised by the Courts? Why were not the Christians put upon the terms similar to those which have been imposed upon the Mahomedans, before the former were allowed to avail themselves of the Christmas holidays? Why of all the gazetted holidays should the Mohurram have been pitched upon as the only holiday, part of which should be foregone for the purpose of making up lee-way? If the pressure of work in the High Court was too great, why was not the practice of allowing vacation for an extra month to the Judge who had done judicial work during the vacation in the previous year put a stop to? If the files of pending cases are in a deplorable condition, who is to set the example of the self-denial necessary to improve the state of the files? The Bench or the Bar? But why touch the gazetted holidays of short duration at all? Why not cut a large portion off the long vacation? Let me put the sincerity of the professions for the interests of public business to the test, by suggesting the expediency of curtailing the long vacation by 4 or 6 weeks. A month, or a month-and-a-half ought materially to promote the processes of making up lee-way.

I am unable to follow you when you say that "if the Mahomedans of the High Court refuse special treatment on the ground of their religion they ipso facto destroy any claim for special treatment at all." But what special treatment did the Mahomedans refuse? Did the notice of the 9th July offer any terms of special treatment? None whatever, and that notice was the chief cause of their complaint. The subsequent notification demanded a written warranty of conscientious scruples—a demand which was deemed to be so unprecedented that the Mahomedans, after the most serious and anxious consideration that they could bestow upon the point, could not persuade themselves to comply with the demand.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

DATES AND DATES.

"Fable has not been a favorite form of composition with modern poets."

—The Athenæum; 14 February 1874.

[On the appearance of Fables in Song. By Robert, Lord Lytton, author of "Poems by Owen Meredith," in 1874, the book was attacked as an anachronism. Even the more fair-minded critics, while acknowledging the parts and accomplishments of the author and his progress from the Owen Meredithian stage, contended that it was a mistake to attempt to revive the Fable. The noble bard was accused of intending to rival Æsop—a gratuitous assumption which was contradicted by the difference of his treatment from that of the Father-Fabulist. This little fable of "Dates and Dates" was Lord Lytton's genial reply to the critics. It is thoroughly effective. Certainly, no one of the genus irritable has shown such command of temper under provocation. Tennyson himself, early in his career, took savage revenge in rhymes which have been withdrawn. Traces of the Poet's passion may still be discerned in his authorized works in subdued tones in the little pieces "The Spiteful Letter," "Literary Squabbles," and, above all, in the scornful address to the enemy in Hendecasyllabics, beginning—

O you chorus of indolent reviewers,
Irresponsible, indolent reviewers.

—EDITOR, Reis and Kayyet.]

I.

DATES! how we schoolboys loved them! Dates,
Not such as those Kenealy hates;
Nor dates of chronologic things,
Laws, battles, and the deaths of kings;
O'er which, alas! with aching brains,
Our masters made us spend such pains!
But those the grocers' shops supply,
Whose golden skins, if somewhat dry,
Have in them hearts still full of honey;
On which we spent our pocket-money.

II.

Not one of all our youthful band
But long'd to see the mystic land,
Of whose enchantments manifold
Our loved Arabian stories told,
Where grew, 'twas said, in sunburnt strength
The golden fruit which here, at length,
The commerce of the East and West
Had, for our special sakes, comprest
In clammy pennyworths of joy.

III.

One, I remember well—a boy
Somewhat the eldest of us all,
Whom we pert youngsters used to call
Cato the Censor (heaven save him!)
Jack was the name his parents gave him,
A worthy lad, without a vice,
And conscientiously precise.

'Twas for the Navy, as we knew
When first he join'd our merry crew,
That Jack was destined. That career
Begins in boyhood. One sad year,
With sighs of boyish envy, we Bid Jack good-bye. He went to sea.
The man-of-war on which he found
His sea-legs was for Egypt bound.
And when the ship's cook went ashore,
Jack, mindful of the joys of yore,
Besought the cook to bring him back
A good supply of dates.

IV.

Poor Jack!

Conceive with what dismay'd surprise,
Fresh dates, as plump as plums he eyes,
When back the ship's cook came with these,
Dewy and dripping from the trees.

V.

"What are these things?" in wrath began
The shock'd Catonian midshipman.
"I ask'd for dates. These are not dates.
Dates should be dry as candied cates,
And press'd, and squeez'd, and closely pack'd
In compass small, with care exact.
These fruits are fresh. Such freshness suits
Mere common/ordinary fruits,
Cherries and currants. But things rare,
Old, famous, and remote, should bear
Upon their outward form the sign
And impress of their origin.
In short," he added, waxing hot,
"Dates should be all that these are not."

VI.

Thus Jack, who judged of things by rule,
From reminiscences of school,
Wrote to his friends, disconsolate,
That not a single genuine date
Was left in Egypt. "Sad!" he said,
"The age of genuine dates is dead."

MORAL.

"Revere the ancients and their art!"
Revere them? Ay, with all my heart.
What they have done will ne'er again
Be done so well. But why disdain
All fruit that's fresh from living trees,
Even tho' inferior far to these
Choice classic dainties, time hath prest
And pack'd with care, since even their best
Time-ripen'd sweets were raw one day?
With grateful hearts (we fain would say)
Due honour to the ancients give:
But to us moderns leave to live.

THE King and Queen of Portugal have arrived at Colombo from Lisbon.

JUSTICE Mr. Telang has been appointed Vice-Chancellor of the Bombay University. The right man in the right place, beyond all others.

THE young Chief of Gondal in the Bombay Presidency has set an example to the Princes and aristocracy of India. He has not been entirely fortunate in Europe, but he never lost sight of his aim—the quest of science. His life and pursuits are proclaimed by the numerous titles he has earned—titles far more interesting and creditable than the decorations of any quasi-feudal order of knighthood. To us, we confess, it is immensely gratifying to find the Reis of an Indian Principality figuring in the English newspapers in the following connection and guise:—

"In the recent Examinations of the University of Edinburgh, His Highness the Thakore Saheb of Gondal, G. C. I. E., D. C. L., LL. D., Ahmed Miiza, and D. A. Turkhud have received the degree of M. B. and C. M."

Nothing could be better than such a beginning.. Go on and prosper, and make prosper I we say.

SO much for the Thakoor Saheb. Lucky man! his noble consort bravely keeps him in countenance. The Thakoorani Saheba has had her share of glorification, according to her sphere and opportunities.

The Queen-Empress has conferred upon Rani Saheba Nund Kunverbai of Gondal the insignia of the Crown of the Indian Empire.

HERE is a record of the movements of the Indian students in England:—

The following were called to the Bar on June 29th: Inner Temple.—Abdul Majid Khan; Phillip R. Valladares; Syed Mahdi Hassan, B. A., Cambridge; Maheji Pestonji Modi. Middle Temple.—Muhammad Shafi, Middle Temple International Law Scholar; Mahtabuddin Ahmed, Calcutta University; B. J. Mozoomdar; Mahommed Zahoor, St. Xavier's College, Calcutta; Syed Hassan Imam; Peary Chand Dutt; Mahomed Ahmed Uddin, B. A., L. L. B., Cambridge; Ali Hosain Khan; and Abdul Hakim Khan. Gray's Inn.—Prabh Dial, B. A., Cambridge; W. Burton, University of Madras.

The Benchers of Gray's Inn have awarded to M. Manmohan Lal Agarvala the Bacon Scholarship of £45 per annum, tenable for two years, and also a second prize of ten guineas.

Miss Cornelia Sorabji, B. A. (Bombay), who has studied at Somerville Hall, Oxford, was allowed by a special decree of Convocation to appear in the B. C. L. Examination, which is the highest Law Examination of the University of Oxford. Miss Sorabji passed in Honours, and the examiners expressed surprise at her having, in two years, prepared for this very difficult examination.

Mr. S. B. Mitra has passed the M. B. Examination of the University of London.

In the Primary Examination of the Society of Apothecaries Part II., Rukhmabai (Royal Free Hospital) passed in Anatomy and Physiology, and C. Bassan (Middlesex Hospital) part I. in Materia Medica, Botany and Pharmacy, and Part II. in Physiology.

Subhan Ali (Lahore Medical School, Punjab), has passed the Second Examination of the Conjoint Board in Anatomy and Physiology.

Arrivals.—Mr. Hukissen Das Badra from the Punjab.

Departures.—Mr. Syed Mahdi Hasan and Mr. Hari Singh Gour, for the Central Provinces; Mr. M. Shafi and Mr. Parbh Dayal, for the Punjab; Mr. Syed Emam Hassan and Mr. M. Zahoor, for Behar; Mr. M. P. Modi, for Bombay.

THE N.-W. Provinces Government have ordered an inquiry into the dispersion of the Hurdwar fair. An agent of the British Indian Association attends it. He lately telegraphed to Sir Auckland Colvin against the appointment of Babu Narain Singh, Deputy Magistrate, as one of the officers charged with the inquiry, that officer having been one of those who had broken up the Fair and dispersed the poor pilgrims. The Lieutenant-Governor has promptly ordered that if Narain Singh had been concerned, some other officer should be appointed in his place.

A TELEGRAM from Bunn states that three men, who were buried in the Emerald mine on the 4th ultimo, were rescued alive on the 22nd, after being deprived of food for seventeen days.

It is reported that a few days ago a tailor of Calicut took ill with the cholera, and in a fit of delirium went and threw himself into a well. He was hauled out, but died a few minutes after.

Upon this the Tribune adds:

"We remember three instances in Lahore last year in which cholera patients threw themselves into wells."

It is the extreme torture of thirst and of the burning sensation in the body that drives the patient to plunge into water. Nothing allays either this thirst or this burning, even for a moment, except iced-water and ice. There ought to be provision for ice in every municipality and every market town, specially during the cholera season.

WE read:—

"The correspondent of the Central News, to whose remarkable energy we owe the interesting details of recent events in Morocco, turns out to be a young American journalist, Mr. Stephen Bonsall, who was for some time connected with the New York Herald. He performed the journey from Fez to Tangier in three days, being in the saddle for eighteen hours out of each twenty-four, and resting only during the heat at mid-day. On arrival in London he interviewed Mr. Barrington, Lord Salisbury's Secretary, to whom he gave full information of the events that had taken place in Morocco. He states that during the attack on the Mission at Fez he himself was six times fired at. He lodged a remonstrance with the Sultan, who offered compensation of 5,000 dollars. He refused this, but accepted a jewelled sword of honour."

MR. Labouchere writes in Truth:—

"Sir Charles Euan-Smith in his Mission to Morocco has been accompanied by a conjurer, who has greatly astonished the natives in an entertainment given before the Sultan and his Court. This is at once cheaper and more humane than the old methods of impressing the untutored savage with a due sense of the might and resources of Britain, and I am now in hopes that the next time our Jingo friends desire to teach a lesson to an African potentate, they will place Mr. Maskelyne in command of the expedition instead of Lord Wolseley."

THE recent British Mission to Morocco under Sir Euan-Smith as been far from fortunate. At one time the British consulate, when the Mission were staying in it, was surrounded by an infuriated mob of fanatics. At that hour of peril how were the party within employed? Why, Lady Smith amused herself by photographing the angry crowd, and practising with her repeating rifle. Her niece, Miss Kerrison, wrote a formal application to Sir Euan-Smith (the Elchi) to be allowed to take part in the defence of the Mission, should it be attacked in force. At this juncture the War Minister of the Sultan and the other Vizers rushed into the Mission, and was astonished at the peace and quiet and perfect composure which reigned throughout, apparently also in the minds of all its inmates. The old Arab hero exclaimed, "Allah burn the devil, [whatever that may mean] what soldiers these Englishwomen make."

A SOCIETY paper says:—

"Shabby, ill-fitting gloves have always been a characteristic of Mr. Gladstone's dress. Mr. Lucy speaks of 'one of those convenient gloves which he affects, in respect of which it does not matter whether you put the right one on the left hand, or the left one on the right. The fit and general appearance are much the same, and a good deal of trouble and forethought are spared.'"

SAYS "Pen" in the Times of India:—

"Whatever may be the fault of the present elections as regards the monotony of party denunciations, they are at any rate conducted on principles of great probity. No one takes bribes—perhaps because no one gives bribes; and no one gives bribes because apparently no one dares. But how different from the good old days, as exemplified in the history of Bridgwater, which appeared three or four years ago. This is how they did things in the ancient and loyal borough of Bridgwater:—

At one election a voter was heard to boast of his selling his pig to a candidate for a hundred guineas, and his being allowed to eat it himself; while another sold his parrot for the same sum, and the candidate never claimed his purchase. A writer in the Spectator tells of a local Blacksmith who charged fifty guineas for shoeing a horse belonging to one of the candidates, but the other candidate wanting two shoes for his horse, the honest blacksmith charged him one hundred guineas, and, of course, gave him his vote.

Those were indeed golden days for which the electors of to-day must sigh and sigh in vain. In the year 1835, the constituency of Bridgwater numbered about four hundred voters, and the election cost between £20,000 and £30,000."

THE Vakil Raj is not confined to this country. It extends to the very heart of St. Stephen's old Chapel:—

"From an analysis of the professions and occupations of the members of the new House of Commons made by Mr. Lewis Appleton, Westminster, it appears that the class most largely represented is the legal profession. There are 164 lawyers in the new House. Of these, 143 are barristers and 21 solicitors. Trade and commerce is represented by 156 members. While the capitalists have 156 representatives, there are only 15 workmen in the House. There are 53 naval and military officers, and in addition there are 52 officers of the auxiliary forces. There are no fewer than 35 newspaper proprietors and press men in the new House. The medical profession is represented by 16 members and 9 University Professors are members of Parliament. In the last House there were 24 brewers and distillers. The number has now been reduced to 18."

It is satisfactory to know that Beer is going down. The number of newspaper owners and press men given represents, we suspect, a fraction of the members connected with the Press, more or less.

WE read :—

"The Vienna newspapers report that an unusual phenomenon occurred on Aug. 2 at Trieste, an enormous waterspout being observed in the harbour between the Giuseppino Mole and the lighthouse. An omnibus passing along the quay at the time was lifted in the air and overturned, seven passengers being injured. Several tramway waggons were also thrown off the line, and some buildings were injured. The phenomenon, which resembled an immense dark grey pillar of cloud, lasted ten minutes, and made the atmosphere so dark that it was found necessary to resort to artificial light in the houses in the vicinity."

SIR George Dibbs, the Premier of New South Wales, was once cast in a civil libel suit for over £7,000. Considering the judgment unjust and the sum extortionate, he wanted to evade the mulct if possible. So he declined to pay and went to prison instead, being advised that if he served his twelve months he would not have to pay the £7,000. As ill luck would have it, the judges, in his case, held this to be bad law, and Sir George had after all to pay when he came out. His prison by way of protest went for nothing.

THE Marquis de Veragua, a descendant of the discoverer of America, will preside over the opening of the World's Fair at Chicago, from his residence at Madrid. He is too old and infirm to make the journey. The arrangement, therefore, is that he will press an electric button fixed in his apartments and the current set in motion, traversing the Atlantic by submarine cable, will start the machinery at the Exhibition.

In a suit for divorce, an English wife obtained a decree nisi against her husband for cruelty and adultery, but omitted to have the decree made absolute. Two years after, she took another mate. That husband died, and seven months after she resumed marital connection with her first and discarded husband. They again fell out and the wife, to rid herself of her cruel and adulterous lesser half, sought the protection of the court on the decree nisi, by applying to have it made absolute. The Queen's Proctor was satisfied as to the bona fides of the petitioner in contracting the second marriage with her husband, on his representation that the contract of marriage still subsisted in the absence of the decree absolute. Mr. Justice Barnes too inclined to the same view and granted the petitioner's application.

Is not the wife open to a charge of bigamy in taking a new husband during the continuance of the decree nisi?

THE Carbolic Smoke Ball Company advertised themselves by offering a reward of £100 to any one who could show that he or she had caught influenza, or any kind of cold, after having bought and used their "carbolic smoke balls." A literary lady, named Carlill, caught the bait, paid half-a-guinea for the nostrum, used it as in the directions accompanying and caught the influenza. She was not, however, to be befooled. She claimed the £100, which of course was refused. She went to court. Mr. Justice Hawkins decided in her favour. The matter being taken to the Court of Appeal, that judiciary confirmed the order of the lower court.

This is a warning against false advertisements. Yet the papers are flooded with such.

In a note on the prize distribution on the 12th August, at the local Government High School, the Moulmain Advertiser says :—

"Some objection has been taken to the half salaam and half military salute that the boys had to make on presenting themselves for their prizes. Both the salaam and the salute were out of place; we were not present and cannot say whether we are correctly informed, but it seems to us a pity to depart from the usual Burmese custom of 'shikoing' with bare feet. It seems to us a grave error in teaching Burmans the English language to instil into them English customs that will in after life be as unpleasant to them as it will be intolerable to their English masters."

THE Dewan Bahadur R. Raghunath Rao assisted at the marriage of a Hindu widow at Mylapore, but did not dine with the married couple. The Indian Spectator with knowing quaintness calls that a great But. The Brahman Reformer explains :—

"In social reforms, as well as in religious reforms, eating and drinking form no important elements. That they are important is an idea for which India is indebted to Europe. . . . I fully believe that my nondining with Iyengars would not cause the slightest harm to the progress of events for bettering Hindu sociology or religion, which I expect to happen by my preachings. Indeed, drinking and eating with all was never advocated by me or by my friend Rau Bahadur Ranade. . . . I have found from experience that the dinings with remarriage parties have not improved matters a bit, and that they might have very probably hindered the progress of improvements."

BABOO JOYGOBIND LAW has offered to the Hon'ble H. H. Risley Rs. 15,000 to provide for the construction of a Laboratory in connection with the new Reptile-house in the Zoological Garden, Calcutta, "as it appears to him that the scheme is one of universal importance and of special interest to his countrymen, as promising to advance scientific knowledge, with a view to discovery of a remedy for the deadly poison." The sum is intended "to provide a building and fit it with the requisite appliances on a suitable scale." It seems he would have offered more if necessary. The Committee of Management of the Garden has thanked the Baboo for his "generous help to the garden."

A PRISONER in Duke Prison at Glasgow, under remit to the High Court, has volunteered a startling confession. It comes to this that he took part in two Irish agrarian murders, viz., that of Lord Leitrim and that of Lord Mountmorres. Lord Leitrim was assassinated on April 2nd, 1878, while driving with his clerk and another person about three miles from Milford, and not far from Manor Vaughan, his lordship's residence, county Derry. All three were attacked by a party of men and were shot dead. The criminals were never brought to justice, but a man who died in America some time since left circumstantial confession of having assisted in the crime. The Glasgow prisoner also confessed to complicity in the murder of Lord Mountmorres, who, on September 25, 1880, was found near his residence, Ebor Hall, county Galway, with six revolver bullets in his body. He was hired to assist in both crimes by the man who afterwards shot the informer Carey at the Cape.

OUR OWN NEWS.

ACCORDING to popular belief in India, the Gladstonian rulers chose a bad day for their start. On Saturday, the 20th August, the new ministers were formally installed in charge of their respective departments and entered upon their duties.

DURING the last week, the temperature on the Continent of Europe has been awful. Never was the heat so great. With the atmosphere the soil too has been parched up, and a cry for water has been heard in the more unfortunate tracts. No wonder that the very rehearsal of war has been saddened by casualties, with repeated cases of poor soldiers dropping down dead in the course of the manœuvres of the German and Italian Armies.

SO in the New World, on the Atlantic shores, In New York, on the 29th July, the temperature was 99 deg., 101 deg., and 102 deg., in the shade. On the 28th there were twenty-seven deaths from the heat, on the 29th—ninety-eight, on the 30th—ninety. The tram horses died in hundreds and the traffic was suspended. Many shops were closed on the 30th. In other cities deaths from the same cause were numerous too. The heat abated on the 31st.

THE secret is out. Her Majesty would not have that disagreeable man of Truth, Labouchere, stare at her in her own house, and so that independent and righteous statesman, the G. O. M., swallowed the humble pie and struck the man of his choice out of the cast of the Ministry. Mr. Labouchere's cobblers were in a rage and in public meeting at Northampton protested against the royal squeamishness.

Mr. Gladstone then, with his weakness for negotiation, sent an ambassador to Mr. Labouchere to soothe him and show him that it is all right, that his sacrifice is necessary in the country's interest, and that he should not only take it uncomplainingly but patriotically offer his life a voluntary sacrifice and cut his own throat. His Excellency the Ambassador said that in a monarchy the wishes of the monarch should be considered, and wound off with the suggestion that the antimonarchist should, like a good boy, smooth the Grand Old Man's path to power by himself writing to Mr. Gladstone that he did not care to join the Ministry. The man of Truth refused to write a lie, even to serve Mr. Gladstone and his friends. Such is Mr. Labouchere's account in his paper, in which elsewhere the Ministry is characterised as a mixture of the old gang of Rozencrantzes and Guildensterns.

Yesterday's telegram reports that Mr. Gladstone has addressed a letter to Mr. Labouchere in which he takes the entire responsibility of the latter's exclusion from the Ministry.

THE Times has taken up the cry of the Indian Currency Association. It is of opinion that a gold standard is the most complete remedy for the currency difficulty and that a bimetallic currency is inconsistent with England's sympathy with India.

In the same journal, Mr. William Fowler, in a letter to the editor, considers that the cessation of the free coinage of silver in India would be dangerous, and might be considered the first step in the direction of demonetisation.

Our Finance Minister, Sir David Barbour, in a letter to Sir W. Houldsworth, regards a common standard for England and India as essential, the best method for its attainment being the adoption of a double legal tender by international agreement.

Mr. Dadabhai Naoroji has not been silent on the subject. Writing to the Times, he objects to the Indian rayyet being squeezed either to compensate Indian officials or to establish a gold standard. He attributes the present currency difficulty to the heavy Home charges.

Sir Seymour King, in the same journal, suggests the sovereign remedy for all evils—a small Royal Commission of experts to examine the several schemes for a gold standard.

The Financial Times sees no permanent solution of the difficulty in the suspension of free coinage. That would, it thinks, only put off the crisis for a time.

MR. John Morley has been re-elected with 12,983 votes against his rival Mr. Ralli's 11,244. In Derby, Sir W. Harcourt scored a majority of about five thousand votes over the Conservative Atkinson.

THE new Government will inaugurate itself with fresh taxation. Speaking at Sheffield, on the 23rd, Mr. Mundella said that new taxation would possibly be necessary, but assured his hearers that it would not affect the industry of the country. There was no fear, he said, of Government abandoning free trade.

THE cotton warehouses in Lancashire are glutted, and many mills have stopped work.

THE week has been clouded by news of a shipping disaster. The British barque Roma, bound from Bombay to Hull, was wrecked off Algoa Bay and all the crew drowned.

THE Ministry of Finance has proposed an Income Tax for Russia. Incomes above 1,000 roubles (say 100/ or 1,000r) will be taxed. The other exemptions are the imperial family, the provincial and town councils, the assemblies of the nobles, archbishops, convents, scientific, scholastic, and benevolent institutions, the members of the foreign Diplomatic Body, and foreign consuls of foreign nationality, if they do not derive any portion of their income from real estate or industrial or commercial undertakings in Russia. Commencing at 1 per cent. on incomes between 1,000 and 2,000 roubles, the tax will increase at the rate of one-tenth per cent. on every additional 1,000 or fraction thereof.

ENDEAVOURS are being made in Russia to win back from the sea a foreign ship sunk near Balaklava during the Crimean War. The vessel is supposed to contain a considerable sum of money intended for payment of troops fighting the Russians.

WITH the completion of the second volume, the Epigraphia Indica, under the editorship of Dr. Burgess, will cease as an independent publication, but will be continued as an epigraphical supplement to the Indian Antiquary under its Editor Dr. E. Hultsch, Government Epigraphist, Madras.

IT is notified in the Calcutta Gazette that the Court of Wards having declined to retain charge of the Chanchra Raj Estate under their management, it will be released from the Court's control from the 1st September 1892.

IT is proposed to establish a toll station at Chetla on the boat canal leading from Kidderpur to Tolly's Nullah. Tolls will be levied at Chetla on boats which have not already paid toll at Kidderpur, Russa or Panspotta at the rates payable at Kidderpur. Boats entering the Docks will be considered to have entered the river Hooghly.

THE sensational trial of Sangam Lal, Pragwal, and eleven others, charged with having, at Daragunj on the 30th March last, caused hurt to sub-inspector Ram Kishen Singh and other police officers while in the execution of their duty, before Mr. F. E. Elliot, the District and Sessions Judge of Allahabad, began on Tuesday. The first investigation had been made by the Joint-Magistrate, who made light of the matter, but on a representation to the High Court he was directed to commit it. So he did. The prosecution called the Sub-inspector and a constable whose evidence was to the following effect:—Sangam Lal's house and batthak being searched on the 30th March by the city inspector and Ram Kishen Singh, two swords and some axes were found. While Babu Lal and other police officers were attacked in their cab (ekka) off to the Police station, they were set upon by Sangam Lal and others who wanted to recover their arms. Babu Lal was grievously hurt. When the report reached the Sub-inspector Ram Kishen Singh, he at once informed the District Superintendent of Police, and with a force proceeded to the batthak, where he found Sangam Lal sitting with some twenty-two men. Sangam Lal, being told that they had come to investigate the assault case, replied he would allow him no such thing and began to abuse the Sub-inspector. Suiting the action to the word, the redoubtable Pragwal came down from the batthak with all his following and assaulted the Sub-inspector and the police. He struck three blows at the Sub-inspector. This was too much of a good thing, so the long suffering Ram Kishen then drew his sword and knocked him on the head and severely mauled the Pragwal, who beat a hasty retreat, followed by his companions, who meanwhile had injured the constables and two hangers-on of the police. The case was investigated by Inspector Khwaja Mahomed Hussein. Sangam Lal was hiding with Captain Whitehead, of the South Wales Borderers, when he was arrested. Mr. Kumar Paramanand, the Government Pleader, prosecuted on behalf of the crown, and the accused were defended by Messrs. Doorga Charan, Moti Lal Nehru, and Madan Mohan Malaviya, vakils, Mr. Sharpe, District Superintendent of Police, watching the case for his department.

IN England there were several deaths lately from swallowing artificial teeth. The latest reported is of a constable who, on hearing the whistling of a comrade to secure a prisoner, came running and took hold of his arm and instantly fell to the ground and died before he could be conveyed to King's College Hospital. The post mortem examination disclosed the fact of the impact of a set of false teeth just above the larynx, producing suffocation and death. The teeth were of inferior make and somehow or other they loosened and produced the fatal result, most probably through his act of running. This is a warning to wearers of false teeth, especially to those who have in their artificial teeth ill-fitted plates with the constant danger of being easily displaced.

Mr. Frith was a famous artist, as fortunate as famous, having realized probably the highest price for a picture by any living artist. No body of course thought he could achieve anything like the same success in literature. But his "Reminiscences" was a hit and brought him a large profit. And no wonder. There is in it at least one anecdote of breathless interest which at the same time brings out in bold relief a singular character and mode of life which would float a good deal of common-place matter. Here is it:—

"This eccentric gentleman lived at Fonthill Abbey, a few miles from Bath. Every picture in the Abbey was a gem, and the gardens were unrivalled by any in England; but the owner was a recluse, and this palace of art was surrounded by a formidable wall seven miles in circuit, 12 feet high, and crowned by a chevaux-de-frise, and the gates were kept carefully closed. At last Mr. Frith's cousin, an ardent connoisseur in art, found them unguarded. He slipped in, and wandered about the enchanted domain till he met a man with a spud in his hand, presumably the head gardener. This personage politely showed him over fruit gardens, hot-houses, &c., then the house, with its pictures, bric-a-brac, spits of armour, and other glories, and ended by asking him to dinner. 'No! really, I couldn't think of taking such a liberty. I am sure Mr. Beckford would be offended.' 'No, he wouldn't. You must stop and dine with me. I am Mr. Beckford.' The dinner was magnificent, served on massive plate, the wines of the choicest vintage, rarer still Mr. Beckford's conversation. They talked till a fine Louis Quatorze clock struck eleven. Then Mr. Beckford rose and left the room. The guest waited for his return till he started to find the room in semi-darkness, and one of the solemn powdered footmen putting out the lights. 'Mr. Beckford has gone to bed,' said the man. The guest rose and followed the footman to the front door. That functionary opened it wide and said, 'Mr. Beckford ordered me to present his compliments to you, sir; and I am to say that, as you found your way into Fonthill Abbey without assistance, you may find your way out again as best you can; and he hopes you will take care to avoid the bloodhounds that are let loose in the gardens every night. I wish you good evening.' The guest spent the night in the branches of the first tree that promised a safe shelter, and it was not till the sun showed himself that he made his way, terror attending each step, through the gardens into the park, and so to Bath."

After that, who will not cry, after the reporters, "great sensation"? Beckford was a genuine original. He came of a good stock, as the son and heir of the famous Alderman Beckford of the last century, a contemporary of Wilkes and Junius and the Reverend poet Churchill and the Reverend politician Horne, who bullied the king in his palace into allowing him to answer his Majesty's reply to the deputation, and then with perfect coolness and fluency delivered a remarkable speech. Beckford II. was so little of a philanthropist or a patriot that he was a misanthrope. For all that, this plutocrat of the middle class was no Philistine, being a man of large and liberal culture and of refined and esthetic tastes. He wrote just one book to speak of, in one prodigious sitting of three days and nights, but that book still lives—no little matter considering the cartloads of prose fiction every year produced to be forgotten in a quarter. It is an Oriental romance called "Vathek." He was, in almost everything sui generis. He had a resemblance, perhaps, in some respects, to the founder of the Hope family. Thomas Hope too was an esthetic banker who surrounded himself with the rarest pictures and statues, medals, virtu, china, enamels, ancient furniture and drapery and jewellery. He, like Beckford, was a single-book author and his book was an Oriental romance. To complete the resemblance, Hope's "Anastasis" is of equal interest and fascination with Beckford's "Vathek."

THE Hindoo Patriot had hitherto been the Court Journal of the elder branch of the wellknown Pir Ali Tagores. It is now the loyal Bhat—Encomiast—of all and sundry who are or may, might, shall, should, will or would be somebodies. It has not only developed a new style of journalism but has invented quite a new species of literary composition. Both the style and the species are simple. The former consists in laying the butter on thick with a ladle. The speciality of the latter is to pile up to agony the titles of the object of the attentions, or, in the event of his having no more than one title, to repeat it ad nauseam. That surely must be confessed to be an original substitute for the wit and eloquence of compliments. Here is a sample of the method from the Hindoo Patriot of Aug. 23:—

"Maharaj Kumar Benoy Krishna is now the lessee of the Gungamundla pargana belonging to his family. The Maharaj Kumar had fitting preparations made for the reception of Sir Charles Elliott in Comillah, when His Honor visited the district the other day. His Honor inspected the Maharaj Kumar's charitable dispensary and was much pleased with what he saw. The Maharaj Kumar has subscribed Rs. 2,500 to the fund of the permanent memorial in honour of Sir Charles Elliott's visit, and other subscriptions are pouring in."

The paragraphical arrangement does injustice to the genius of the writer. The condensed typography squeezes out all the flavour of the morceau. Analysing it, we discover that the precious paragraph consists of sentences nearly each of which begins with the same respectable personal noun with full title, and certainly every one of which contains the said respectable one in all titular glory. Thus—Maharaj Kumar Benoy Krishna is now.....

(The) Maharaj Kumar had fitting.....
(H. H. ins... the) Maharaj Kumar's charitable dispensary.....
(The) Maharaj Kumar has subscribed Rs. 2,500.....

In fine,

The Maharaj Kumar, Maharaj Kumar, Maharaj Kumar, Maharaj Kumar. Such is the formula of the literary beadsman.—Nothing like Maha Raj Kumar.

AN Urdu biography of the Prophet Mahomed, published by the Rev. Mr. Williams, Missionary of Rewari, near Delhi, containing most disrespectful language towards the said Prophet, has caused great agitation among the Mahomedans of the Imperial city. They met in large numbers, said to be 2,000, at the Futtehpouri Mosque, and resolved to send up a strong representation against the Missionary, to the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab. Not content, however, with simply forwarding a memorial, a representative deputation of the Punjab Mahomedans proceeded to Simla, to protest against the publication of the Missionary in question. The deputation has had an interview with Sir Dennis Fitzpatrick, who has promised to consider the matter. The Mahomedans state that they refrained from taking the matter into Courts, on account of the popular excitement, which the reading of the passages complained of in Court would arouse.

The Mahomedans are extremely touchy in matters like these, and as a body strongly resent the use of irreverent language towards their Prophet. We have every hope that Sir Dennis will pass such orders as may allay the agitated feeling of the Mahomedans.

It would almost seem as if, in his well-meant advances to the school-boyhood of Calcutta, Sir Charles Elliott was playing into the hands of the tribe of wealthy outcastes called Pir Ali. The Lieutenant-Governor gave more than one party to the students and professors of the Colleges at which a sprinkling of other gentlemen too were invited. The boys made the most of the occasions and of the hospitality of the host. Sir Charles Elliott addressed the young men present in the following manner:—

"You, my young friends, have been invited to attend these readings and recitations in order that you may spend a pleasant hour and get some benefit therefrom. Lady Elliott and myself take a warm interest in your welfare, and I may say the Government does the same. We shall always watch your career, and take pleasure in your advancement. It is not only your literary progress that interests me, but also the advancement of your moral character. This matter has been taken in hand by that worthy Society (the Society for Higher Training), of which Mr. Risely is the President, and my friend the Vice-Chancellor, a member of the Committee. I hope this gathering will result in a series of similar meetings called by the leaders of your own society, as the garden parties here were followed by a similar party given by my friend Maharaja Sir Jotendra Mohan Tagore. These occasions, I hope, will encourage you to pursue your studies with zeal, and to select a worthy career afterwards."

Of course, the good Governor has no idea of what all this leads to, or how the people in their heart of hearts regard it.

WE learn that in fashionable circles in London, no sort of food is now in better esteem for the complexion than oatmeal and oranges. Ladies desiring to acquire and preserve a good complexion, are subduing their carnivorous propensities. The diet of many of them is simplicity itself. Already, some are living almost entirely on oranges—the next thing to ambrosia. Here is their bill of fare. Half a dozen for breakfast, with a cup of coffee, a dozen for lunch, with a glass of milk and a saucer of oatmeal, finishing with a dozen more for supper, with a crust of bread and tea. This, we suppose, is the ostensible fare. For this, though possibly sylphs may live by it, will scarcely support human life.

In India, too, this fruit is employed for improving the complexion; but our wiser people do not starve themselves on it. They eat the orange and rub the peel on the skin for assimilating the hue! For science, both methods, British and Indian, are at par.

THERE was another meeting at Sobhabazar on sea-voyages by Hindus. We hope to notice it next time.

REIS & RAYYET.

THE EXCHANGE DIFFICULTY.

THE Indian Currency Association had a very successful meeting on Thursday evening at the Town Hall, under the lead of its Chairman, the Hon'ble J. L. Mackay. There was a large attendance of respectable Europeans of the mercantile, trading, planting, land-owning, official, and professional classes. The natives are not of active habits, and for such a forbidding abstruse subject if they have any sympathy they are content to show it by their signature. Accordingly, while they have signed the Association's Memorial by hundreds and thousands, they attended its meeting by tens. Those tens, however, contained many of the flower of the community. In spite of national peculiarity and the dryasdustiness of the subject, we have reason to believe there would have been a far larger native audience but for a misunderstanding. It was, to begin with, understood that the meeting was to be a close one, confined to the members of the Association, and, moreover, that it was to be a formal meeting, just to receive and adopt the report, without any feature of general interest. No doubt the advertisement in the newspapers, including Reis and Rayyet, justified this view. There was in it no room for expecting to hear such speaking as really enlivened the meeting. There was certainly no invitation to the public at large. Thus, it was those alone who were in the secret who could go to the Town Hall with a light heart, while others were kept back from what, they feared, might be regarded as intrusion. We believe that, limited as is the European population of the city, it would have mustered in still greater force if this unfortunate misimpression had not so largely prevailed throughout the whole community, of all races, creeds and classes.

The meeting was opened by the Chairman with one of his lucid addresses. Though a Scotchman with an idea, Mr. Mackay has none of the disagreeable peculiarities of a hobby sowar. On Thursday at any rate, he was far from a bore.

He commenced with securing the good will of the audience, who were put in the best humour by his assurance that there was no voluminous technical discussion in store for them. His previous speeches had not only exhausted the subject, but also answered objections taken. It remained for him to fight some new arrivals in the field, and notice some fresh proposals. This he did in his usual straightforward and thorough style. He shirked no difficulty, ignored no danger, misrepresented no point. We have never seen more fair-minded a disputant or more honorable an agitator—if that word of evil suggestion may at all apply to him. Even in recounting the support the movement has obtained, he scrupulously eschewed exaggeration.

The Maharaja of Bettiah seconded the Chairman's motion for the adoption of the report, which was unanimously carried.

Mr. J. A. Anderson (Anderson Wright & Co.) in a neat speech, took up the handful of respectable firms who are making a good thing out of the depreciation and the planters and millers who, in their short-sightedness, have no sympathy to spare for the distress of their fellows. They will all come round yet, he suggested, or at any rate the necessary change will be effected in spite of Lombard Street itself, when all India is roused. Before taking his seat, he vividly presented the hastening doom of the country from the currency anomaly under which it is labouring.

Babu Jadu Lal Mullick, the wellknown native millionaire, made an excellent speech. Speaking with all the moderation and the authority which belongs to one with his stake in the country, he gave his full support to the movement to come to a solution of the difficulty. He showed how the brunt of the taxation falls on the natives.

Mr. W. J. M. McCaw, in moving a vote of thanks to the Chairman, paid an eloquent tribute to Mr. Mackay, recounting his services to the Association and the cause—services which were simply invaluable. Mr. David Lyall, C.S.I., seconded the vote in a few well-chosen terms.

After all, the real venue of the Currency Controversy is not India. However much breath may be expended in this country,—whatever engagements may take place here, the decisive battle will be fought in England. Accordingly, the friends of the movements will note with satisfaction that the Indian Currency Association is steadily gaining ground at Home. It has acquired a great alliance this week. If the Standard and the Economist have early declared against it, it has found the support of the Times. This is sufficient compensation—more than sufficient, perhaps. The Standard is the leading member of the Conservative Press and withal a good journal. Happily, in consequence of the political change brought about by the result of the late General Election, it has ceased to be the mouth-piece of the Ministry. The other journal has always stood on its own bottom. Established and conducted by a remarkable hatter, who afterwards rose to be Parliamentary Secretary to the Treasury and finally the first Financial Member of the Viceregal Council, and since his departure for India and, by that way, for that undiscovered country from whose bourne no traveller returneth, continued and conducted by his accomplished and acute son-in-law, the Economist has been the principal organ of the great banking interest. But, we believe, since the death of Mr. Bagehot it does not command anything like its old influence. Even before that sad event, the note of discontent had been heard and several competitors had appeared to contest the supremacy of the financial oracle. So much the better for the Indian Currency Association. And better still that the great Times—great for a' that, and a' that—now declares in its favour.

The Association has already borne fruit. It has forced this long neglected question to the fore front. This is obvious from the men of light and leading who have in this very week contributed to the discussion.

Not the least interesting of the contributions made comes from a member of Parliament who does not pretend to be an economist in especial. We refer to Sir Seymour King. He calls for a Royal Commission of experts on the different proposals and schemes.

That is at once adroit and modest of the most junior Knight, who knows that the world knows that his sympathies are virtually pledged to the European servants of Government in India, who are suffering wofully from the fall of the Rupee, and who have clutched the Indian Currency Association as the only plank that offers a prospect of safety.

Be that as it may, the proposition is a good one and deserves to be pressed upon Government and Parliament.

THE MOHARRAM.

IN our issue of the 30th July, we gave, at some length, an account of the application which the Shias of Chupra had made to the Magistrate of that District. They solicited permission to take out in their Moharram procession a standard (Alam), and a water skin (Mashah) pierced through by an arrow (Tir), as emblems of the circumstances of the death of the Martyr-Saint, Hasan, the grandson of the Prophet. This the Magistrate disallowed on the ground that it would be an innovation. The Magistrate's order runs thus:—

"I have heard Mr. R. P. Ghose, Barrister-at-Law, in support of this petition, and he has filed a large number of papers, which he considers relevant to this case; they refer for the most part to the question, whether in other towns the Alam may be taken out or not, and to the general and abstract question as to the propriety of its use. All this is entirely beside the point. It is perfectly clear that taking the Alam in procession is an innovation here, and that whether rightly or wrongly it is likely to cause a serious breach of the peace. My duty as Magistrate of the District is to prevent such a breach of the peace, and I therefore reject this petition, support Mr. McIntosh's order of the 17th September last, and hereby warn the petitioner and his friends, that if after this intimation, they persist in taking out the Alam as proposed, either as part of the Moharram, or in procession on some other date, they will be liable to prosecution under sections 298 and 504 of the Indian Penal Code."

Thereupon the Shias moved the High Court to reverse the order of the Magistrate. The Criminal Bench of that Court issued a rule calling for the papers. Considering the importance of the question to the Mahomedan community, it was not surprising that the decision of the Court was awaited on both sides with eager interest not unmixed with some anxiety. The High Court has at length spoken. Yesterday the matter came before the Criminal Bench, and was finally disposed of. We give the report of the proceedings below:—

"The rule obtained by Mr. Gregory, vakil, on behalf of Nawab Lateefuddowlah, calling upon Mr. Bourdillon, Magistrate of Sarun, to show cause why his order, dated the 13th June, prohibiting the petitioner from taking out Alams (flags) during or after the Moharram procession on pain of prosecution, under sections 298 and 504 of the Penal Code, came on for hearing yesterday. Babu Saligram Sing appeared on behalf of the appellant and Mr. Kilby for the Crown. The learned vakil, in opening the case, stated that his client belonged to the Shia sect of the Mahomedan community which observed the rites of the Moharram festival. On the 25th August last year, the petitioner applied to the then Magistrate of the District for permission to take out Alams. On the following day, the Magistrate said he would hold an enquiry into the matter, and on the 14th September, he rejected the application, prohibiting him to take out Alams. On the 16th, the petitioner again applied to have that order cancelled, but the application was refused. Since that time, petitioner had applied from time to time to have the previous order revoked. In this year, he put in another petition before Mr. Bourdillon who, without rejecting it, in so many words, passed an order on its back to the effect, that as the permission prayed for was an innovation, and as it was likely to break the public peace, the petitioner should be warned that if he or his friends should, at any time, persist in taking out the Alams, he would be prosecuted under sections 298 and 504, I. P. C. The vakil submitted that this order was entirely illegal. The petitioner had applied to the Magistrate for protection, and he, without affording that which he was asked for, passed a prohibitory order without enquiring whether there was any ground for it or not. He would, therefore, ask their Lordships to set aside the order.

After some discussion, their Lordships passed the following order:—

Pigot, J.—We are bound to deal with this rule, and we think it was one of those matters, in which as little should be said, perhaps, as is possible, consistent with the discharge of a judicial duty. Upon the best consideration we can give to the matter, we cannot say that the language of the Magistrate's written answer to the petition of the applicant was an order at all, or that it purported to be an order. We think that there is really nothing more to be said. It is not a judicial order or a judicial act with which we can interfere. We have come to that conclusion after the best consideration of the matter. Nothing more remains for us now than to discharge the rule."

EARLY IN THE CENTURY.

THE current number of the Calcutta Review contains a curious paper headed "Passages from the Autobiography of a Bengalee Gentleman of Sixty Years Ago." The Statesman in its notice of the new number of the magazine has given a very disparaging account of this particular contribution. This was scarcely deserved. The Calcutta Review has never been distinguished for the equality of its contents, and admitting that the article in question is not a brilliant production, we frequently see inferior things admitted. In point of fact, this article is by no means so worthless as the Statesman's scribe thinks. That writer by his opinion only discovers his insular incapacity for sympathy with what does not touch him or his. This article in the Review recalls the olden days and long forgotten occurrences. It revives before us a dead Indian world, and gives interesting information respecting the ways of the magnates of that period and the personal relations between the British Chiefs and natives. Such information is not to be gathered from the standard histories, or, for that matter, the non-standard ones, so that the most learned of us still need to learn. The critic does not care for these things. Perhaps he would have been more reconciled to the article had its writer thrown in a plentiful profusion of tropes into his composition. He complains of the writing as bald. The writing is not bad, but the critic evidently has not quite shaken off his schoolboy taste for fine writing, in which no doubt the article is deficient, and it is all the better for it. Consisting as the article does of a string of short extracts from the diary of a little Bengali boy kept in English, at a time when that language was a rare accomplishment among our countrymen, it is difficult to see how the style could be improved. We are far from insinuating that the article is above criticism. But our contemporary misses the true remark, in an irrelevant attack on the style of a composition which were awkward and absurd with a more conscious endeavour at elegance. Indeed, its publication makes against the critic. Had it been so worthless it would scarcely have appeared in the Calcutta Review and been admitted to it by so able an editor as Mr. Furrell. Talking of style, there is not such a master of style in the Indian Press as Mr. Furrell. Surely, no writing objectionable on the score of style could have passed through his hands except to drop into the Balaam-box.

The value of the paper lies in its facts and suggestions. These are undoubtedly fair game for the critic. But our contemporary's writer was not up to that criticism. Nor was he willing to receive in good part the light which the Calcutta Reviewer does really present, specially to griffs like his critic. There are a few mistakes which are discreditable to the writer—a veteran ex-official and member of the Asiatic Society as he is—as well as the periodical and its veteran editor. The first blunder is about the time of the founding of the Hindu College, the first public school in Bengal for the education of native youth in Western knowledge. The writer in the Calcutta Review would give it an earlier start than it is entitled to. He makes other blunders too. We better quote him:—

"In 1818, when in the Upper Provinces in attendance on the Governor-General, Dewan Ram Suiker wrote to his eldest son in Calcutta to get Sree Narayan enrolled in the Hindoo College, which had been established, some years before, under the auspices of the Government through the exertions of the Hindu community, headed by the Raja of Burdwan and aided by Sir Edward Hyde East, Chief Justice, Mr. H. H. Wilson, Mr. David Hare and others, and of which he was a subscribing member."

Here is a cento of blunders compressed in a single sentence! It is doubtful whether the late Boden Professor of Oxford was associated with Sir Edward Hyde East, Mr. David Hare and others in establishing the Hindoo College. This is the first time we see Horace Hayman Wilson's name among the founders.

About the date of the Hindoo College the writer is completely and almost confessedly at sea. He indicates it by a vague suggestion which shoots wide off the mark. In 1818—we are told—the College had been established some years before. What is the arithmetical value of "some?" How many years are understood by the phrase "some years?" It does not mean two or three years. It certainly means more than a few years. "Some years before" implies, we take it, at the least five or six years. Taking it moderately at five, the Hindoo College, according to the reviewer, was established in or about 1813—a preposterous suggestion. It was in the middle of November of that year that Sir Edward Hyde East first took his seat on the bench of the Supreme Court. If the writer's "some years" means four years, it was founded in 1814. Under no possible laxity in the use of language, can "some years" mean less than three years. If such is his meaning, the College was started in 1815. In that year, however, the very idea of it had not been broached. The proposition was made in the following year (1816), and although there were no orators in those days to impede work, it took sometime to raise funds and make the preliminary arrangements. The men were in earnest and proceeded to work with extraordinary celerity, so that by the beginning of next year they were ready.

The College was opened on Monday, the 20th January 1817, at Gora Chand Bysack's house in Garanhatta,—the house in Chitpore Road long and still occupied by another educational institution of mark founded and conducted by native energy—the Oriental Seminary. But the College was barely opened on that day. It was shunted from place to place for want of proper accommodation, and it took at least two years to bring it into tolerably full operation.

The Hindoo College was the first and the greatest agency for the modern civilization of the Hindus of Bengal. The date of such an institution is so important in the chronology of our national life that we have taken all this trouble to set our Calcutta Reviewer right. Nor is he the only writer who has confounded it. Mr. Kerr, formerly of the Bengal Education Service, and once a popular Principal of the College, in his elaborate work on Public Instruction in Bengal, in giving its history, writes:—"The Hindoo College was founded in 1816." The late Baboo Kissory Chand Mittra, himself a distinguished alumnus of the College, in his Paper read at the Nineteenth Hare Anniversary, 1861, on the Hindoo College and its Founder, gives the same date. He is, however, contradicted by his elder brother, the late Peary Chand Mittra, in his Biographical Sketch of David Hare, published in 1877, in which the same date is given that we give.

THE OMNIVOROUS BUDDHISTS AND CHRISTIANS.

THE Mandalay Herald desires the Municipal Board to note that

"Rats, cleaned ready for cooking, are now being sold in the Fish Market, Ziygue Bazar. Perhaps the Inspector will favor us with the selling price so that we may insert the same in our Bazar Price List."

And what wonder at rats in the Land of Nyappi, and in a part of the globe where the Dorian is the fruit of fruits? Our contemporary seems quite a Hindu. Has the ubiquitous Baboo penetrated to the last capital of the Alompras and has got himself installed in the editorial chair of the Herald? Be that as it may, with such nice notions no man has any business in India beyond the Ganges.

We suppose our Mandalay man is long enough in Burma to be familiar with the delicacies of Burmese cuisine and the pickles and sauces and wonderful relishes of the banks of the Irrawadi. If he does not indulge in them himself he may allow others to indulge themselves. Why, then, this straining at a gnat?

On what principle, as a Christian man, does our contemporary object to the rat? Objection to the mole we could understand, but the rat is a decent, sweet-smelling, little quadruped. A Hindu cannot touch the favorite of that elephant-headed God of Success who has precedence in worship of all Olympus; but what does a Christian care? If precedent be wanted, it will be remembered that the rats of the Paris sewers supplied the game for the tables of the restaurants during the siege. Then, there are rats and rats. We have in our neighbourhood a colony of grain-fed rats bred in the granary of the old stables of the Dutt Family—noble fat animals, looking more like small pigs than rodenta. They are fine game, in both senses. They must be excellent eating, we suspect. And they are easy to capture, we know. For the lordly little fellows, weighty and rich in fat as they are, have not the activity of the sneaking ignoble classes of their race, and move at a measured pace. Our feline friends, of Bengal Bengali, and humanized, not to say Hinduized, by feeding at the Brahman's table, are naturally afraid of meeting their majestic natural enemy. One Tommy Atkins of our feline camp had the other day the daring to attack, and the pluck to kill, a muscipular minor so large and plump that Professor Wood-Mason himself might mistake it for a specimen of a newly-discovered enormous species of the mus order. But our Tommy is too much of a Bhakat or far too civilised to eat his victim without the ceremony of cooking, and left the carcass in our bed-room, thus compelling us to accord to it the rites of a—Parsi funeral. Those who are not particular in their feed may well think it a pity that so much fine meat should go to waste.

The Jews and Mussulmans are forbidden not only many animals but whole tribes and extensive classes of animals; such as the web-footed beasts and fowls, the scaleless fishes. John the Baptist's food was locusts and wild honey. That is orthodox bill of fare according to both the Mosaic and the Mahometan dispensation. But none but Prophets, Saints and Hermits can stand such nourishment. Fortunately, the two sects are better provided, specially the Jews. Even the regimen prescribed by the Law for the Moslems is liberal and amply sufficient for all the needs and yearnings of the flesh, so far at least as solids are concerned. Still there are many restrictions. The Faithful must not think of any unclean animal. Ducks and the whole web-footed tribe are not for them. Alligators, turtles, crabs, frogs, snakes, and hundreds of the same characteristics, are forbidden. The camel is pure eating, but hippophagism is an unsettled point in Orthodoxy. Even the permitted meats are not permitted unless the necessary conditions are fulfilled. Christians, we believe, have no diatetic code, no alimentary index purgatorius. Of course, people live according to custom, but some are prepared for utilising almost anything for their table. The late Captain Burton, the traveller, was wont gaily to relate his feat in cannibalism. That was a grim joke of Dick's, but these travellers have stomach for anything. Even a traveller in civilised Mahomedan countries, Sir Alexander Burnes, we find voluntarily inviting himself to a feast of crocodile-steaks. Here is his own account:—

"Near the ferry of Bara we found the fishermen actively engaged in sharing amongst themselves an immense alligator (seesar) which they had just caught. The monster had been cut up into joints and bits, some of which they were about to eat, assuring us that the steaks were delicious. I asked if these animals did not eat men, but the fishermen boldly got rid of this objection by assuring me that alligators and crocodiles lived entirely on fish! Having partaken of frog, horse, shark, and camel, I resolved to add a new item to my list of gastronomic experiences, and to try my hand at crocodile-steaks; but I found the food to be poor, close-grained, dry, and deficient in flavour, and I was very soon satisfied. Probably the art of cooking crocodiles may be yet in its infancy."

NATIVE VOLUNTEERS.

GOVERNMENT OF INDIA.

MILITARY DEPARTMENT.

Simla, the 20th June 1892.

To the Secretary to the Government of Bengal,

General Department.

SIR,—In February last memorials were addressed to the Viceroy and Governor-General of India by a number of native gentlemen, students, and professional persons in Bengal, asking that sanction might be given to their being formed into a corps of volunteers as a Second or Bengal Battalion of the Presidency Volunteer Rifle Battalion. As there was no particular person to whom these memorials could be returned for transmission to the Government of Bengal, they were, in accordance with the rules on the subject, forwarded to you for the opinion of the Hon'ble the Lieutenant-Governor.

2. The memorialists state that they are animated by a true and genuine devotion to the Crown and love for their country; that they long to be permitted to bear arms in the service of their Queen and country, and feel it to be a solemn duty to the Crown and Government under which their native land has so long had a career of peace, security, and prosperity; that their self-respect would be enhanced; and that, if it were possible, their loyalty would be deepened by being permitted the privilege enjoyed by all other sections of Her Majesty's subjects in India of fitting themselves to take part in and, if need be, to die in the defence of the Empire.

3. In your letter No. 1161 of the 19th April 1892, the Government of India are informed that the Lieutenant-Governor has given the subject his most careful consideration; but that, with every wish to recognise and respond to the loyal spirit which underlies the applications, His Honour cannot recommend that the Government of India should do "anything" which could be done under the present rules, according to which, although volunteer corps are, as a whole, European or Eurasian, still it is possible for a native of this country to be enlisted if any corps will admit him." The Lieutenant-Governor, after fully considering the question, advises that no change should take place in the attitude which the Government of India from 1861 to the present time have adopted towards applications for the formation of volunteer corps such as those which are now under consideration. The Governor-General in Council is not prepared to depart from the policy by which the Lieutenant-Governor, or to depart from the policy by which the Government of India has hitherto been dealing with this important question. A reference to the Acts by which the volunteer force has been regulated, and the Regulations issued under those Acts, shows unmistakably that the intention of the Legislature has from the first been that the ranks of the volunteer force should, with the exception in which reference will hereafter be made, be recruited from the European population of this country. Thus, the Act of 1857 under which the volunteer corps were first called into existence, specially provides that members of the corps shall be subject to the "Articles of War for the European officers and soldiers of the East India Company," a statement which renders it evident that the classes of persons to be organised as volunteers were those to whom the European, and not the Native Articles of War, were applicable.

Soon after the passing of the above Act, an important declaration with reference to the eligibility of persons not of European origin for enrolment as volunteers was made by the Governor-General in Council, Lord Canning. These statements run as follow:—

"That the Governor-General in Council has no objection to the admission of Parsis, or of any other Native Indian subjects of the Queen, into volunteer corps, but that he does not think it advisable that separate corps, or even companies consisting solely of natives, should be formed.

"That the object of the Governor General in Council in aiding the formation of volunteer corps in India has been the same as that of Her Majesty's Government in England, namely, to provide an efficient supplement to an Army which, as in the case with the English Army, cannot, in the event of its being called into active service, be largely and effectively recruited at very short notice. But that the same difficulty of increase does not exist in the case of the Native Army of India. The supply of recruits for that Army will always be practically unlimited, and that, therefore, Native volunteer corps are not required, either as an addition to it, or as a substitute for it.

"That, nevertheless, if any natives, whether Parsis or others, should desire to take their place amongst the European members of a volunteer corps, understanding sufficiently the English language, adopting the uniform of the corps, and being willing and able to share in its duties, the Governor-General in Council would be glad to see them enrolled in it."

This declaration has, from the time when it was made, guided the policy of the Government of India in dealing with applications such as that now before it.

Act XX of 1869, by which the Act of 1857 was replaced, was framed upon the assumption that the force to which it applied was substantially a European force, and in the Regulation, framed under this Act the volunteer corps are specifically described as a European force, and are required to take precedence on parade accordingly. Similar provisions are to be found in the Indian Army Regulations, in which it is distinctly laid down that volunteer corps will consist of Europeans, or those of European descent, and that "on all parades the Indian Volunteers, being a British force, rank next, after British troops."

5. The authorities referred to above must be held to govern the case now under discussion, and to establish that the conditions and Regulations subject to which the Indian Volunteer Force is maintained, contemplate its existence as a supplement to the British Army in India, upon the understanding, laid down by Lord Canning in 1861, that individual natives may be admitted to volunteer corps in cases where their enrolment is acceptable to the corps concerned, but that the establishment of Native volunteer corps, or Native volunteer companies in existing corps, is not within the intention and scope of the law or the Regulations at present in force under it. It would be impossible to grant the request of the memorialists, unless the Government of India were prepared to extend concession to all other applicants. A decision to this effect would involve a fundamental alteration in the character and composition of the volunteer force; and I am to say that, in the opinion of the Governor-General in Council, the time has not come for so signal a departure from the principles and policy hitherto accepted by the Government of India.

6. I am to request that when explaining to the memorialists the reasons why the Government of India finds it impossible to accede to their prayer, you will convey to them the acknowledgments of His Excellency in Council for the loyal sentiments which they have expressed, and his regret that, for the reasons which I have given, it should be impossible to meet their wishes.

I am, &c.,
(Sd.) E. H. H. COLLEN,
Secretary to the Government of India.

THE EXCHANGE DIFFICULTY.

THE PETITION TO THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

To the Honourable the Commons of Great Britain and Ireland in Parliament Assembled.

The Petition of the Indian Currency Association, comprising all classes of the inhabitants of the Indian Empire,
HUMBLY SHewETH,

That your petitioners suffer severe and increasing loss and distress in consequence of the present condition of the Indian Currency system, and that some remedy is urgently required.

That the condition of the system and its results to the people of India are described in the subjoined paragraphs of this memorial:

1. In 1835, by a law passed by the Government of India, gold was demonetised and the silver rupee established as the monetary standard of value. From 1835 until 1872 the rupee exchanged with but slight variation for about two shillings, and so trifling indeed was the variation that in the official accounts, for all purposes, the rupee was invariably reckoned as equivalent to two shillings.

2. During all this period silver was freely in use for currency, and as a standard of value, by all the European nations but England; and it is undoubtedly the truth that the maintenance of the par of exchange during this period, and even during the large production of gold following the discoveries of that metal in California and Australia, was due, firstly to the free use of silver as current full legal tender money by the European nations, and secondly to its unrestricted coinage by them.

3. At the end of 1871 Germany demonetised silver and established a gold standard. To prevent an overwhelming influx of the demonetised German silver France restricted the coinage of silver and every other nation speedily adopted the same course. Many of the European nations have adopted gold as the standard of value, as Germany did; and, though some have retained silver as full legal tender, they have either greatly restricted or absolutely ceased the coinage of the metal. Those who have retained silver as the standard have no active circulation of metallic money, whether gold or silver, the currency consisting of inconvertible notes.

4. The result of this ejection of silver from use as currency is seen in the fall in the price of silver. From 60 pence per ounce the price has now fallen to between 39 and 40 pence, a decline of about 35 per cent., and the exchange value of the rupee has similarly declined from 24 pence to 15.25 pence, a fall over 36 per cent.

5. This heavy fall has been a cause of great concern to all interested in the maintenance of stability in the ratio of value between gold and silver, and the subject has been repeatedly discussed in view to the application of a remedy.

6. On every occasion the discussions have been fruitless because England declined to join in the concerted action which alone could provide a remedy.

7. An International Monetary Conference was held in 1867, with the object of increasing the number of countries comprised in the Latin Union and establishing an international monetary system on the basis of the free coinage of both gold and silver. England refused to adhere to the Union on any terms but the abolition of the double standard and the adoption of gold as the single standard. No practical results, therefore, followed this Conference.

8. Another International Monetary Conference was held in 1878, on the proposal of the United States, its object being to maintain the employment of silver, with that of gold, as a standard. England was represented in this Conference only on the condition that she was not to be bound by its decisions, because she was determined not to permit the adoption of silver as a standard in her currency.

9. A third International Monetary Conference was convened by France and the United States in 1881 to concert measures for the full use of silver as a standard of value in conjunction with gold. England was represented at this Conference also, but declined to promise more than that Her Majesty's Government would recommend to the Bank of England that one-fifth of the reserve held against the note circulation of the Issue Department of the Bank should consist of silver. This proposal was insufficient in itself, and it was also doubtful whether the Bank would consent to carry it into effect. The Conference therefore adjourned to meet the following year, but never met again.

10. In 1876, the question was discussed with no practical result by a Select Committee of your Honourable House.

11. It was again further discussed in 1885, by a similar Select Committee on the depression of Trade and Industry, and finally the question was considered by a Royal Commission in 1886. The members of that Commission were unanimously agreed that a Double Standard was practicable, but were equally divided as to the necessity of its adoption. They were further unanimously of opinion that, in the circumstances, the Government of India should be left free to adjust matters in the way that seemed to it best. No action was taken on their report.

12. Meanwhile the price of silver has fallen still further, and the exchange value of the rupee is at present only 15½ pence, and it is probable that, if left to itself, it will fall further and more heavily. It has been repeatedly prophesied by eminent economists that the rupee could not fall below 20 pence, then that it could not fall below 18 pence, then that it could not fall below 16 pence. All these prophesies have been signally falsified, and, from the best information available, it is clearly useless to prophesy that there is any limit approaching its present value below which the price of silver cannot fall. There appears to be no reason, when silver is abandoned as regards its principal function—to serve as a material for currency—why the rupee should not fall to a shilling and still lower.

13. The consequences of this persistent depreciation of the metal which still remains the standard of value for the Indian Empire, and of the violent fluctuations which are constantly, indeed daily, occurring in the exchange value of the rupee, have been of the gravest kind.

14. The loss to the Government in paying its sterling obligations in England may be reckoned at eight hundred millions of rupees, or eighty million pounds sterling at par of exchange, since the commencement of the depression, and at the present rate of exchange the loss is upwards of eighty millions of rupees, or eight million pounds sterling, at par of exchange, annually. Each fall of a penny in the exchange value of the rupee aggravates this heavy burden by the addition of more than ten millions of rupees, or one million sterling at par.

15. It is evident that the payment of sums of from eighty to one hundred millions of rupees annually, on account of exchange, is a burden which would tax the financial resources of the most flourishing country in the world. The Government must find the money, and, to find it, additional taxation must be levied of a grievous and harassing character.

16. The people of India are content to pay to the State in taxation all the money that is required for the due and orderly administration of the Empire, for its defence from foreign enemies, for the maintenance of internal peace and tranquillity, and for the progressive development of communications, public works, and the general resources of the country.

17. But the taxation of eighty millions of rupees now annually taken from the people of India is applied to none of these objects: it serves no useful purpose; and it is wrong from the people merely because the Government of India has not been permitted to regulate the currency system of the Empire with reference to the interests of the country.

18. If the currency had been so regulated there would either have been no necessity for such heavy taxation, or, if the money had been raised, it would have been applied to the reduction of debt, the more rapid extension of railways, of irrigation works, or other permanently useful objects.

19. While all classes of the people suffer from the imposition on them of a load of taxation, the receipts from which are not applied to any useful or necessary purpose, each class suffers in its own particular way from the condition of the currency.

20. The trading community are harassed by the uncertainty and the fluctuations of exchange to such an extent that legitimate trade is often replaced by speculative and gambling transactions; the importer is at a loss how to meet his engagements when exchange falls day by day; and the exporter is no gainer, for each fall in exchange is followed by an equivalent fall in the gold price of the commodities he exports.

21. It may be said indeed that, but for the fortunate accident that the Suez Canal was opened just as the depreciation commenced, enabling Indian goods to be taken expeditiously and cheaply to Europe, and but for the development of railway communications which has enabled goods to be taken expeditiously and cheaply to the seaports, the trade of India would have been paralysed by those fluctuations and this depreciation, and the Empire would now have been in hopeless financial disorder and embarrassment.

22. The investment of English capital in the development of the material resources of the Empire is discouraged; for, both as regards the remittance of interest and the final transfer of invested profits and economies, the continuous fall in exchange imparts to the investment of capital in this country a speculative character and a risk which the capitalist is naturally unwilling to face.

23. The credit of the State is heavily injured by the depreciation in value of the rupee securities of the Government of India held in England, and the uncertainty in the amount of interest in gold which may be obtained by their holders. English capitalists are naturally as reluctant to invest their money in these securities as they are to invest it in India.

24. To the European officers of the Government, civil and military, and to all Europeans on rupee incomes, the depreciation of the standard has brought severe distress.

25. To the European who has retired, whether from the service or from business, and whose pension or income is paid in rupees, the continued depreciation has brought the greatest hardship.

26. It may be said generally that the retention of the silver standard, while it has been rejected by the Western nations, has been productive of nothing but evil to every class of the population in India, the only persons who may have benefited from time to time being those who have speculated for the fall.

27. It is not urged that the silver standard is unsuitable to India. If the silver standard were adopted by other nations, its retention in India would be desirable. But it is entirely undesirable to retain the silver standard in a great empire such as this whose annual revenues amount to nine hundred millions of rupees, while its foreign trade amounts to nearly two thousand millions of rupees when the standard has been rejected and repudiated by most of the nations of the world. For it must be borne in mind that a considerable proportion of the revenues is raised to meet obligations incurred in England, a country with a gold standard, and much the largest part of the trade is conducted with England and other countries with a gold standard.

28. The people of India have long desired a re-establishment of the gold standard. Proposals for the introduction of that metal, as the standard of value, were pressed upon the Government of India as far back as 1859, and from that time onwards were repeated with persistence by the Chambers of Commerce and other public bodies for about fourteen years. Since 1873 the Government of India has repeatedly urged the acceptance of the double standard (gold and silver) by international arrangement, in view to its introduction into India.

29. None of these proposals were accepted, Her Majesty's Government having consistently declined, first to permit the introduction of a gold standard, and afterwards to aid in the international arrangements required for the effective introduction and maintenance of the double standard.

30. The result is that India is still compelled to retain as her monetary standard a metal which during the last twenty years has been rapidly and continuously losing the characters that should attach to a standard of value, and which now possesses them no longer in any degree. Indeed, silver is now hardly more fit than tin or copper to be a standard and measure of value, and it is unjust to the inhabitants of this Empire that its retention in that character should be insisted on.

Your petitioners, therefore, humbly pray that, in view of the considerations set forth above, Your Honourable House will be pleased to direct the application of a remedy for their grievances by the introduction of a speedy reform in the Indian Currency system.

Your petitioners represent that the introduction of the double standard can only be effected by international arrangement, but that international concert has hitherto been found impossible, that another international conference is now about to meet; that it is of the most vital importance to the interests of the Government and people of this Empire that an agreement should be arrived at; and that, therefore, every effort should be used on behalf of India to secure its success. If, however, the Conference should fail, like its predecessors, to arrive at a satisfactory solution of the questions referred to it, your petitioners pray that the Government of India may be fully empowered to take such measures as may to it seem fit for the adoption of the only remaining effectual remedy, namely, a gold standard; and your petitioners, having regard to the probability that the Conference will, like its predecessors, reach no practical issue, and that the price of silver will then be still more and incalculably depressed, further pray that the grant of power to the Government of India may be made now in view to its exercise without delay after the termination of the Conference.

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray, &c., &c.

Holloway's Ointment and Pills.—Shortness of Breath, Coughs, and Colds.—Thousands of testimonials can be produced to prove the power possessed by these corrective remedies in cases of asthma, incipient consumption and all disorders of the chest and lungs. The Ointment, well rubbed upon the chest and back, penetrating the skin, is absorbed and carried directly to the lungs, where, in immediate contact with the whole mass of circulating blood, it neutralises or expels those impurities, which are the foundation of consumption, asthma, bronchitis, pneumonia, and similar complaints. On the appearance of the first consumptive symptoms the back and chest of the patient should be fomented with warm brine, dried with a coarse cloth, and Holloway's Ointment then well rubbed in. Its absorption will subdue advancing symptoms, and baffle this formidable foe.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

A KNIGHT OF RHINELAND.

CROWNING the steep his castle stood,
Where Nature, with her deftest skill,
Had traced the windings of the flood,
And cleft the vale, and built the hill.

Above she spread her softest skies,
Around she breathed her purest air,
Bestowing freely what the wise
Might seek with fasting and with prayer.

On slopes where most the south wind blew
That subtle alchemist, the vine,
Distilled from sunshine, cloud, and dew,
Rare juices with the amber's shine.

Westward, great hills a curtain drew
Before the sun, whose sinking beam
Touched all their pinnacles, and threw
Their lucid shadows to the stream.

But elsewhere, from his battlement,
For leagues he saw the champaign spread,
Verdure, with spires and roofs besprent,
Till Rhine flashed out, a silver thread.

Ah! if the poet's dream were true
That Nature, in such language, can Find suasive utterance, and imbue
With her own soul the soul of man;

Peace in the hills' repose impart,
Love on the fragrant winds dispense,
And breathe in sunshine through the heart
The gracious sky's beneficence;

Then had this Knight, so fraught with her,
Lived large of heart and free of hand,
And stood, as Nature's almoner,
A fount of blessings in the land.

But, sooth, if he her scholar were,
His inspirations' well might flow
From wasting floods and deserts bare,
Fierce hurricanes and polar snow.

His sway was as the eagle's sway,
He, from his eyrie, round him saw
A vassal race, and he and they Held might for right, and will for law.

The abject eye, the servile stoop,
Told how the children of the soil
Had lost all memory of the hope
That sweetens thrift and lightens toil.

Stored in his cellars with his wine
Were weary peasants' sighs and tears,
The curses breathed above the vine,
The pinings of the hopeless years.

The traveller through that land so fair,
Who marked those towers against the sky,
Crouched o'er his steed, put up a prayer,
A whispered prayer, and hurried by.

On a peaked hill, a league away,
A lordlier castle rose to sight;
Its turrets caught the earliest day
And latest kept the evening light.

Fair part it was of that fair scene,
But to the Knight a hateful spot;
A rival's prosperous state had been
In bowers of Paradise a blot.

Nor vain his hate; a night there came
When din of arms the stillness broke;
When towers went crashing down in flame,
And all the stars were veiled in smoke.

And morning lit a dreary waste
Of shattered wall and ruined roof,
Lawn, bow'r, and vineyard all defaced,
As if the fiend had stamped his hoof.

The Knight laughed low to see the sky
At rift and broken arch look through,
And marked with well-contented eye
The blackened rafters bar the blue.

And so he lived;—and when he died
His spirit flourished in his line,
And still were dreaded far and wide
The robber-chieftains of the Rhine;

While o'er them, pleading all in vain,
Hung the soft beauty of the sky;
Vines clothed the hill, and corn the plain,
And the great stream flowed stately by.

—Blackwood, May, 1874.

Holloway's Pills are securities of health to all nations, of whatever clime. They have given hope, relief, and comfort to millions. In irritation and debility, generated by excesses of any kind, or in general prostration of the system, their effect is rapidly soothing, renovating, and restorative. They rapidly drive from the system the morbid cause of ailment, and renew in the frame its pristine animation, health, and vigour. They greatly increase the appetite, give tone to the stomach, assist the digestion, and impart elasticity to the spirits; their essence enters the circulation and, carried through its course, exerts its cleansing power over every organ. In the lungs they affect most striking changes, converting the impure venous into pure arterial blood, by which the whole frame is recruited.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given; any other being unnecessary and likely to cause confusion.

WEEKLYANA.

THE following has been circulated throughout the Anglo-Indian Press with much glee as if it were crushing :—

"The Madras Mail writes :—The Bombay papers devote no less than seven columns to the report of the proceedings at the meeting held in Bombay the other day to congratulate Mr. Dadabhai Naoroji on his election as a Member of Parliament. One speaker remarked that the action taken by the Central Finsbury electors had drawn 'the people of the Indian Empire' nearer to England and nearer to the throne than ever they were drawn before. 'This is rather high falutin stuff, for 'the people of the Indian Empire,' as a whole, have probably not the slightest idea that Mr. Dadabhai Naoroji has been elected, nor do they probably even know of the existence of that gentleman."

That is the remark of rage at the success of the Black Man. If the Bombay speaker's utterance was not high falutin exactly, it was certainly effusive, and effusiveness was natural to the occasion. As for the sneer at Mr. Naoroji being unknown to the people of India, if by people is meant the lowest masses, how many of the people of England in that sense know of the leading politicians of the land? There are thousands who do not know of Queen Victoria.

THE full answer to those who are still gnashing their teeth at the election of a native of India will come by and bye, when Mr. Naoroji has been sometime in the House. Meanwhile, the prospect is foreshadowed in the reception already accorded to his maiden speech. The London Correspondent of the Indian Daily News, writing of the debate on the Address in the new House, says :—

"One feature of the debate on Tuesday night was the maiden speech of Mr. Naoroji, the first native Indian member ever returned to the House of Commons, and who has, by reason of the very small margin of votes which secured his return (his majority now turns out to have been five, and not three) and by reason of the difficulty which the English tongue finds in pronouncing his unfamiliar name, become known in the lobby as 'Mr. Narrow-majority.' His speech, which was delivered with an easy fluency, which took the House by surprise, so accustomed did he seem to the art of public speaking, did not address itself at all to the current topics of British politics, but confined itself to a grateful and somewhat gushing expression of almost wondering thanks that he should have been selected to fill a place in the Parliament of the Empire. He produced a distinctly good impression upon the House, and is expected to be of great service to it when subjects affecting the interests of our Indian fellow-subjects come up for consideration."

Not a doubt of that. But more than that, he will be of distinct service in purely English questions.

THE interest of the public has been centred during the week in Hyderabad. On Monday, the case of Nawab Mehdi Hassan against Mr. S. M. Mitra for defamation was regularly opened in the Residency court before Mr. Bosanquet, C. S. The public attendance was unprecedented. Special arrangements had been made for seating visitors, nevertheless many people had to stand both in the room and in the verandahs and outside.

Mr. Inverarity, of Bombay, instructed by Mr. Forbes, pleader, appeared for Nawab Mehdi Hassan, Mr. Eardley Norton, Madras, instructed by Mr. Edgelow, Solicitor, of Bombay, and Moulvi Karamet Hassan, Barrister-at-law, Law Lecturer at the Aligarh College, appeared for Mr. S. M. Mitra.

Mr. Inverarity opened with a statement and some remarks about the defamatory nature of what is now known as the "Scandal Pamphlet." He then examined nine witnesses, eight belonging to the Record Press. Connor, a native Christian, and Manager of the Record Press, said he had printed 300 copies of the pamphlet for fifty haldi rupees, of which Mr. Mitra paid him Rs. 30 by cheque in advance. He only knew the contents of the pamphlet after it was printed, as he was ill in hospital, and had deputed his friend, Fisher, to print it. He gave Mr. Mitra six copies on Sunday evening.

Fisher, a native Christian, proof-reader of the Residency Press, said, he distributed MS. to compositors in the Record Press and corrected the first proof, Mr. Mitra correcting the rest. The other seven witnesses said that they printed 300 pamphlets in the Record Press on Sunday the 13th March, which was also the Holi festival day. The witnesses contradicted each other on some important points.

Mr. Eardley Norton reserved their cross-examination till he had heard from the complainant his story. Nawab Mehdi Hassan entered the witness-box in the afternoon. Examined by his counsel, he said that he first met his wife Gertrude Donnelly in 1872, when she was fourteen years old. Her father objected to the marriage. After her father's death he corresponded with Gertrude and married her in 1873, according to Islamite rites. She had told him she was a Mahomedan. The marriage contract was here put in as an exhibit. It was in Mehdi Hassan's handwriting, with some corrections by Gertrude about her age and the spelling of her name. Mehdi's family is Sunni, but his father became Shia, and Mehdi is also Shia of the Akbari sect. His "wife" has always been received as his married wife. He always believed her to be his lawful wife. As far as Mehdi knew, Gertrude was never a prostitute. Her being a prostitute had never even been suggested to Mehdi before he read the pamphlet. She lived as a Mahomedan about ten years and observed purdah. She had always been an affectionate and faithful wife. Mehdi never prostituted his wife by young Salar Jung. He denied all the allegations of the pamphlet. Gertrude had led a pure life since her marriage, and also before marriage. About a year or two after their coming here, Gertrude began mixing in society.

Nawab Mehdi Hassan, in reply to Mr. Norton's questions, said that the Hyderabad Government permitted him to utilise the Government officers to make an enquiry. He did not think that enquiry has been reduced to writing except the statement of witnesses for publication. Colonel Ludlow, Inspector-General of the Nizam's Police, had made some enquiries through Inspector Stevenson. Mehdi did not know if Colonel Ludlow made enquiries in Northern India. Nawab Asman Jah did not communicate with Colonel Ludlow except about Stevenson's services. All official papers between Asman Jah and Colonel Ludlow had to pass through him, as Home Secretary.

Here Mr. Eardley Norton dictated the following sentence to Mehdi Hassan. "Smith and his wife have quarrelled. His interest is opposed to that of the lady's." This being written by Mehdi Hassan was put in as an exhibit by Mr. Norton. All sorts of speculation are rife as to what this strange exhibit means.

On Tuesday, Mr. Norton resumed his cross-examination of Nawab Mehdi Hassan, who remained under it the whole day. He said he offered a reward of Rs. 5,000—through Hurmosji, the Government Solicitor, for tracing the author of the pamphlet. He did not think it advisable to publish the reward. In addition to Hurmosji, Messrs. Roughton and Byrne, of Bombay, were his solicitors. They are also the Nizam's Government solicitors.

Mr. Norton read the following passages from a letter of Yusuf Zaman to Nawab Mehdi Hassan :

"The scandal has spread far and wide. She must be a bold woman if she still persists in moving in high circles. Who is the fool who advised you to press for a commission to investigate the scandal without any preparation? Her previous conduct in Nenpara and Lucknow was no secret from you or her. Many persons are still living who knew her intimately; and as you raised your head above the common level she acquired greater notoriety. I am sure I have seen her photo. in Hindustani dress, but I cannot tell you in whose possession. That secret treasure could be surely (?) It is not in my hand or I would send it to you to destroy it. It is true that 20 years have passed away; but she did not pass those days in oblivion. Your enemies must certainly be behind the bush in ambush, to spring upon you when you were least prepared."

The name of Yusuf Zaman is mentioned in the pamphlet. Some photos of Mrs. Mehdi Hassan in native dress were then produced by Mr. Norton. One of them deponent admitted to be his wife's, saying that for ten years after marriage she was in seclusion and wore native clothes. He confessed that the Resident, Mr. Plowden, had asked him about his alleged marriage, but he refused to proceed to details, unless he got the Resident's permission to disclose such official communication.

After some discussion between Mr. Norton and Mr. Inverarity, the Magistrate telegraphed to the Resident at Bolarum whether he had any objection to Nawab Mehdi Hassan's disclosing the official communication. Mehdi Hassan denied that Mr. Morton Frewen, who introduced him and his wife in London society, on hearing that Gertrude was not his married wife, wanted to horsewhip Mehdi for cheating him.

Witness denied having seen articles in the now defunct Record about his alleged marriage.

At 3 P.M., when the Court assembled after tiffin, Mr. Norton applied for a process for Nawab Sarwar Jung to attend the next day.

Though no reply was yet received from the Resident Mr. Plowden, Mehdi Hassan voluntarily said that he had shown a printed copy of his marriage document to the Resident. Mehdi Hassan admitted that his wife's sister, Mrs. Hodges, was a woman of ill-fame, but said Gertrude, his wife, was pure. He denied Gertrude's having been kept by Hyder Hussain, Ladlay Sahib, &c. He also denied that Miss Thoburn, sister of Bishop Thoburn, or the Reverend Rajab Ali had tried to persuade her to lead a good life in Lucknow in 1872. Mehdi Hassan admitted having kept Gertrude before their marriage in a house of his alone; and that he and his three intimate friends used to go there every day, but not at night. He said Gertrude's living under his protection before marriage in this way did not seem strange to him. The Court closed after 5 P. M.

ON the 1st instant, the cross-examination by Mr. Norton continued, Nawab Mehdi Hassan being in the witness box the whole day.

He deposed that he wrote to the Minister to get copies of Nawab Sarwar Jang's letters on reading the article and telegrams in the Indian Daily News. In explanation, he said he always thought the Indian Daily News was Sarwar Jang's organ, and therefore he relied upon it about the pamphlet case matters. His petition for permission to prosecute Sarwar Jang had gone to the Nizam, but no reply had been received. Sir Asman Jah always gave him evasive replies to his petition.

The extracts from the Indian Daily News, quoted by deponent in his petition, were read out.

Nawab Mehdi Hassan admitted that Mr. Stevenson, of the Nizam's Police, Finglass and one native Christian schoolmaster, named Norton, were helping him in the inquiry. He said Mitra confessed to Superintendent Stevenson that he had published the pamphlet. He had offered Mitra Rs. 5,000 or more if necessary, to give the real author's name. Raja Murli Monohar's private secretary, Vasudeva Row, B.A., had asked Rs. 1,000 to give evidence against Mitra, and Rs. 5,000 to incriminate Syed Ali Bilgrami. Deponent said that in Police Superintendent Stevenson's opinion, the prime movers were Sarwar Jang and Syed Ali Bilgrami, with Sir Khurshed Jah at the back. He also considered Colonel Dobbs an active mover, and a minor mover was the Reverend Rajab Ali, but he did not think that the Club clerk Amraya was a mover. Nawab Mehdi Hassan did not know that Sarwar Jang had stated to the Minister that Gertrude Donnelly and her sisters were notorious prostitutes in Lucknow.

The Nawab has retained Messrs. Jackson and Woodroffe of Calcutta; he was not sure if he had retained Sir G. P. Evans also. He retained them through Mr. Saunders. He has engaged Messrs. Jardine, Inverarity and Lang of Bombay, and also Messrs. Roughton and Byrne, Hormasji, Forbes, Fitzpatrick, &c. all from his own purse.

Here Mr. Eardley Norton introduced a great sensation in court, asking Nawab Mehdi Hassan plain and plump whether he was an agent for procuring women for young Salar Jung's lust. The astonishment of all may be imagined at the audacity of counsel. Mehdi, of course, was most affected. He denied the far from soft impeachment.

Mr. Norton was fully prepared for the boldest mendacity. He now read out a letter from Mehdi Hassan to young Salar Jung inviting him to come to Mehdi Hassan's house.

Mehdi Hassan said in that letter that "his bedroom was ready," and that "his room was far separate from the lady's." It was also written that "all arrangements were made" (the word arrangements was underlined in the letter.)

How this Nawab Saheb looked at the discovery that his private correspondence had fallen into the hands of the enemy, may be better imagined than described.

Mehdi Hassan admitted the letter to be his, and made desperate attempts to explain it away. He swore that he never meant anything improper.

Mr. Norton said he would prove it.

Mehdi Hassan admitted having attempted to arrest Mr. Mitra by telegraphing to Mr. Crawford, and writing to Police Commissioner Akbar Jang, but said that he did so in his private capacity.

Mr. Norton here said he would postpone further cross-examination till Sarwar Jang was examined, but Mr. Inverarity declined to re-examine till the whole cross-examination was over.

ON the 2nd, Mehdi Hassan, without permission from the Court, while he was in the witness box, gave his turban to Mr. Gribble to put on the table. Mr. Gribble put the turban on the table; but the Magistrate ordered Mehdi Hassan to wear his turban.

Mr. Mitra's counsel, Moulvi Karamet Hassan, put a question on Mahomedan law which quite puzzled the Hyderabad ex-Chief Justice. Mehdi Hassan showed considerable ignorance of Mahomedan law, and could not cite any authority.

As soon as the Magistrate sat, Raja Murli Manohar's private secretary Vasudeva Row, addressing the Magistrate, said that he had heard that yesterday Nawab Mehdi Hassan had attacked his character, and he therefore offered to give his evidence, and craved permission to enter the witness box.

The Magistrate said he could not help him that way, unless Mr. Inverarity or Mr. Norton called him as a witness, but neither of these gentlemen would call Vasudeva as a witness.

Mehdi Hassan voluntarily entering the box, said that his previous statement that he did not write about his wife's precedence in State entertainments was wrong. He admitted having written to the then Resident, Mr. Cordery, about his wife's precedence, and Mr. Cordery granted it. Mehdi here read a telegram that his wife was at Gaziabad on the way to Hyderabad.

The Minister's private secretary, Fardoonji, was then examined. He admitted having heard disagreeable rumours about Mehdi's wife in 1888; and that he had a discussion with the Minister about it. But he refused to answer almost all the questions put, on the plea of privileged communications.

Thereupon, Mr. Eardley Norton requested the Court to serve a process upon Sir Asman Jah, the Minister, to give evidence as a witness for the defence.

The Nizam's private secretary, Syed Hussain Belgrami, and Mustaq Hossein will also, it is surmised, be summoned as witnesses. Sarwar Jang was not present to-day, no process having apparently yet reached him.

Shujat Ali, the Rai Rayan's manager, Zuki Ali of the Court of Wards, Ameer Mirza, without any occupation, Mahomet Hussain, Director of Agriculture, and Sadulla, a renegade school teacher or usher, were examined. Shujat Ali and Ameer Mirza were present at Mehdi's marriage; Mahomet Hussain believed Mehdi and Gertrude Donnelly to be man and wife and always received them as such. Sadulla, the husband of the woman murdered in the notorious city murder case, deposed that he had helped Mitra in translating the pamphlet into English from Urdu. He said the original Urdu manuscript was in the Reverend Rajib Ali's handwriting, and the addresses were written in his presence by Amraya, the clerk of the Hyderabad Club and supposed to be Colonel Dobbs' man. He admitted changing his religion like a coat, he having from a Mahomedan become a Methodist and then a Roman Catholic. As a Roman Catholic he now gets twenty rupees per month as a teacher in the Roman Catholic school.

The case will be resumed on Monday. The summons on Sir Asman Jah as a witness for Mr. Mitra has frightened the intriguers.

BABOO Joygobind Law will disburse his own donation to the Zoo. He is gazetted a member of the Committee of Management of the Gardens.

THE Lieutenant-Governor left for the summer retreat on Thursday. He reaches Darjeeling this day, having halted one day at Jalpaiguri.

BY a new rule, the holder of a junior scholarship is left, with the sanction of the Director of Public Instruction, to hold it at any one of the affiliated colleges or at any Government Medical School of his choice.

LORD Cross goes out of office with an Extra Knight Grand Commander'ship of the Star of India.

OUR OWN NEWS.

THE ravages of cholera in Europe continue. Already one hundred and fifty thousand deaths are reported from Russia. In Hamburg, the number of fatal cases has come up to one thousand. The hospitals there are full of the diseased and the dead. As many as four hundred corpses are said to be lying unburied in one shed, the corridors of hospitals being entirely blocked with the dead and their clothing. In the French capital too the malady has made its appearance, attacking several nurses in hospitals. In England, the excitement of the general elections has been followed by the panic of cholera. There have been deaths from that disease at Dundee, at South Shields and at Islington. Orders have been issued on owners of ships and steamers to detain on board filthy and destitute aliens till they can furnish exact details as to their destination, which they generally cannot. The theory is that the cholera is an importation from Hamburg. The panic has crossed the Atlantic. In the New World, they too are guarding the ports against the invasion of cholera. A twenty days' quarantine and longer, if necessary, has been imposed on vessels carrying immigrants, practically stopping immigration. The panic has affected the New York Stock Market.

A CONSERVATIVE heifer attacked Mr. Gladstone in his own Park at Hawarden, and knocked him down. The Premier was, however, unhurt. He took refuge behind a tree. The brute had, however, to pay for its folly. It was shot before it could do any harm beyond severely shaking its victim.

IN New Zealand, they have passed a law allowing female suffrage.

OWING to an explosion, over one hundred miners have been buried alive at Bridgend.

THE Australian merchants Redfern and Alexander have suspended payment with a liability of a quarter of a million sterling.

THE London and General Bank has failed. Its paid up capital is £8,00,000.

THERE was a rumour that the questions of the Arabic Examinations had leaked out from the custody of the Head Moulvi of the Calcutta Medressah, and that Dr. Hoernle was holding an enquiry. How has the enquiry ended or what orders have been passed by the Director of Public Instruction?

To what extent bitter feelings could be excited between the Shias and Sunnis, and what amount of mischief could be committed by the utterance of the Tabarra by the Shias, and why the Shah of Persia, himself a Shia, has considered it advisable and desirable to issue a proclamation throughout his dominions interdicting its use will be evident to all non-Mahomedan communities, from the following paragraph:—

"Telegrams received from the Frontier report more fighting on the 21st between Shias and Sunnis at Killa Miraskur. The Sunnis burned fifteen Shia villages and twenty two were killed on both sides."

The general community of the Lower Provinces ought to be thankful to Sir Charles Elliott for the suppression, with a strong hand, of all causes for such bitter ebullition of feeling between the two sects, in several places, where it had recently manifested itself. Justice Pigot's decision in the Chupra case will also shew that the judiciary are not inclined to interfere in the arrangements which the executive consider necessary for the preservation of the public peace.

We trust that the combined action of the executive and the judiciary will succeed once for all in putting a stop to similar attempts to break the peace in future.

It seems from a News-Letter dated Chupra, August 29, appearing in the Indian Daily News of August 31, that the Magistrate of the District had recommended the Municipal Commissioners to introduce section 337 of the Bengal Municipal Act with a view to prohibit the sale of perishable provisions on the roadside, and nowhere but in the new municipal market. A resolution to that effect was moved and seconded but not carried. The correspondent says:—

"For want of votes it was negatived, the native members arguing that there was no necessity existing to disturb the present arrangements, and to continue to allow the dealers in vegetables and fish to sell from house to house in the town, and that it would be inconvenient to purda nashin women to make their daily purchases of vegetables from the market."

The Commissioners were certainly right in not passing the resolution. Such a step in the interest of a new market cannot but be a constant and daily hardship on the community at large and sure to end in failure—a rule more honored in the breach than the observance. The Commissioners proved themselves wise and practical men and no mere theorists. They might as well decline to take up the matter, inasmuch as the law sought to be enforced did not apply. Section 337 runs thus:—

"The Commissioners at a meeting may order that, within such limits as they may fix, no land shall be used as a market for the sale of meat, fish, butter, ghee, fruits, vegetables, and similar provisions, otherwise than under a license to be granted by the Commissioners."

Is this provision open to the construction that the Commissioners of a Bengal municipality are competent to compel itinerant vendors of articles of food to give up their trade? It is hard to believe that one solitary vendor can make a market of any and every place. The municipal law itself does not pretend to lay down such a rule. Section 336, Part X. Regulation of Markets, enacts:—

"No place shall be deemed to be 'a Municipal market' within the meaning of the last preceding section, and no place shall be deemed to be a market to which the following sections of this Part apply, unless at least thirty shops, stalls or standings are erected therein for the sale of goods."

The prohibition of section 337 to use a place as a market cannot possibly apply to peripatetic dealers of perishable goods. Other sections and laws must be brought into requisition to stop the sale of unwholesome food. That kind of food is equally to be condemned whether sold at the municipal market or anywhere else. The article sold and not the place where it is sold ought to be the chief object of the sanitarian. When the article is allowable, then comes the question of eligibility of the place of sale.

ON Tuesday, at the Suburban Police Court at Alipur, a princeling of the Oudh Family was accused of a truly princely prank. The victim was a venerable looking man of 85 years, by profession a confectioner, named Ahmad Hossein. He was sleeping in his open verandah in perfect confidence under Her Majesty's protection, without a thought of princes or princelings. On awaking, he felt himself distinctly light in the upper story. He shook his head and recognised a sense of disburdenment, but was at a loss to discern the cause. He handled the top of his head and found it the same as before. Then he mused in mute astonishment, when on a sudden mechanically handling his beard he touched his chin without feeling his beard. Horror of horrors! Was it possible that there was no covering to his old wrinkled face beyond the bare skin? that he had lost during the night his magnificent hisute appendage of eighty-five long years? He repeatedly searched with his palms and fingers but felt only some stunted stumps—that was all. He hurried to his glass. But that true witness so far from relieving his anxiety, revealed to him the whole extent of his disaster. The treasure of his life—his pride in this world and his hope in the next—was gone or reduced to a mockery. Who could be the thief—the heartless man—that filched from him his good beard, robbing him of that which not enriches the robber, and makes him poor indeed. He was about to rush out in quest when a thought struck him. How could he, a respectable hoary-headed man, appear in public in his nakedness? With what face could he meet his neighbours? Indeed, he would not be recognised! A great beard, like a great book, may be a great evil, as the great Akbar the Great insisted, when, at the instance of the Hinduis in the Harem, he wanted the Mahomedans to go clean shaved. (Vide the celebrated Muntakhabat Twarikh of Maklana Abdul Kader of Badaon, commonly known as the Tarikh-i-Badaoni) But it was unquestionably a great thing. If not necessarily a thing of beauty and a joy for ever, it is a prominent landmark in the continent of the male human form divine. It is the most important feature for fixing the person. A change in mere costume confuses identity—how much more the absence of a copious beard! What dire calamity to the man of sweets to the sweet ungrudging payers of cash to be precluded from complaining and appealing to the sympathy of his neighbours! So, before venturing out, he proceeded to disguise his enforced dis-guise—to cover the shame of his new condition. Then in the apparition of an Egyptian Habarah rather than an Indian Burka (as these are differentiated side by side in two columns of the same page in Hughes' great book on Mahomedanism), the poor man sallied forth in quest of the enemy. The appearance of an old male in that wonderful plight, with his whole face carefully hid, except the eyes, created a sensation in the neighbourhood and attracted all the little urchins. What with the interrogatories of the amazed inhabitants and the persecution of the street Arabs, he was scarcely allowed to make known his own business. In despair, he went straight to the criminal court, where, of course, another scene took place. The Magistrate granted summons.

The reporters of the morning press speak of the laughter which was excited in court. It may be fun to others but to the sufferer it is very far from a joke. It is a serious matter—an irreparable calamity.

Any man who has successfully cultivated a fine mustache or stylish mutton chops or a noble beard, will understand that. Samson was not the only man whose strength lay in his hair. In many cases, the hair is the best part of the man. Certainly, people without number have owed their success in life to a lucky bush or tuft on the head-piece.

THE Hindoo Patriot is doing a service by publishing some of the minutes of the Hurdwar Mela Inquiry, unfortunately without date. They disclose nothing out of the common. The brutal harshness with which the poor pilgrims were "chucked" out of the holy site, was of the usual character of Police oppression in India. It is difficult for Government, perhaps, to help what seems to pertain to national failing. But whenever such revelations chance to crop up, the little men dressed in brief authority who abuse it, should be severely dealt with.

REIS & RAYYET.

Saturday, September 3, 1892.

THE MAHOMEDANS AND THE GRAND OLD MAN.

THE London Daily News publishes a communication from a Turk of Constantinople, from which it would appear that the approaching advent of Mr. Gladstone to power was causing lively satisfaction at that capital. The Mussulmans other than the official classes have, it is said, always considered that illustrious English statesman as defender of the oppressed of all creeds and nationalities. Unable to manifest their feeling in open meeting, the Turkish Reform Party have circulated in Constantinople and in the principal towns of the Turkish Empire, a Proclamation dated the 15th July, in which they say: "Like their co-religionists of India, the Mussulmans of Turkey hail with sincere pleasure the victory of the Grand Old Man. Turks, Arabs, and others, are they not equally oppressed, exploited, and down-trodden by the same band of official brigands? Mr. Gladstone has never been the enemy of any nation; if he declared sixteen years ago, that the Turks must be turned out of Europe bag and baggage, he was merely alluding to the despicable and voracious bureaucrats of Turkey. The Ottoman patriots feel grateful to Mr. Gladstone for having thundered against the corruption, the abuses, the crimes, and the organised massacres which have brought about the dismemberment of the Ottoman Empire. The Ottomans would feel grateful to Mr. Gladstone, whom they hail as their best friend, if by his policy he were to contribute to free them from the criminal oligarchy which has deprived them of the primary rights of man, by the restitution of the Constitution of 1876, and by applying the principle of Home Rule to several of our provinces, like Crete, Armenia, Albania, and Arabia, where the local wants make it indispensable."

We quote the above proclamation at full length, because it begins with a declaration that the Mahomedans of India hail the advent of the Grand Old Man with great pleasure. That is a ludicrously false statement, and we wonder how it came to be made. These Turks are very ill informed touching the affairs of India. If anybody in India advised them to the above effect, they have been sadly betrayed. The least observant cannot fail to perceive the obvious truth, which is different. It is astonishing to notice the views which, by implication, the authors of the Proclamation attribute to the followers of Islam in this country. We do not see, and have never heard, that the Mahomedans of India are so much delighted at the defeat of the Conservative ministry and the triumph of the Liberals; or that they profess such an amount of love for Mr. Gladstone personally after the enunciation of his famous "bag and baggage" policy, as to gloat over his success; or that they are longing like the Irish majority for the introduction of Home Rule in India; or that they are so much dissatisfied with the Turkish Government, as the so-called Mahomedan correspondent of the Daily News seems evidently to be, that they wish its dismemberment or rather annihilation by the powerful disintegrating battery of Mr. Gladstone; or that they are discontented to such an extent with their present lot under the sway of Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen Empress as to wish that the Liberal ministry will allow the Russians to invade Afghanistan and ultimately to come to India and drive away the British and thereby effect a change in the Government.

Our experience lies rather the other way. From the opportunities we have had of judging of the feelings of the Mahomedans of India, we are led to believe, that they are highly grateful to the Conservative ministry and specially to the Marquis of Salisbury, for their unflagging zeal and notable skill and tact in maintaining, after the close of the Russo-Turkish War so disastrous to the Sultan, the integrity of Turkey, in spite of strong opposition at home and abroad, and thereby preventing its utter dissolution and with it the demolition of their beloved and revered holy cities of Arabia of which the Sultan is universally held to be the custodian. And Mahomedans and Hindus alike are exceedingly grateful to the late Cabinet for their firm policy, which to this day does not allow Russia to interfere with Afghanistan, an interference which means the ultimate invasion of India.

We suspect that the Turkish correspondent of the Daily News is a Russian in disguise, and the Turkish Reform Party, whoever they may be, are in the pay of Russia, and that the mendacious Proclamation has been started with the evident object of involving the Turkish Government in difficulties, not only with its own Mahomedan subjects but also with the whole Mahomedan world, by whom the Sultan is justly considered as the Defender of the Faith. That Russia expends a large sum in such reproductive intrigues, more than any other state, is well known. That a great part of the European press has long been in the pay of the Czar, was first openly stated more than a generation back in Mr. Danby Seymour's book, and is, we believe, a recognized fact.

THE HEDJAZ THE HOME OF THE CHOLERA.

THE sanitary condition of the holy places of Arabia has attracted much attention during recent years,—less, we suspect, out of anxiety for the safety of the poor, ill-conditioned pilgrims huddled together in foul sloops and wretched steamers and hurried across country to their destination to crowd it, than for the protection of Europe from the transportation of cholera from those notorious centres. The Europeans, in their nervous dread of this disease, are persuaded that its spread is generally due to pilgrim traffic to the holy cities of the Mahomedans, and that if these places are kept in a good sanitary condition they will avoid the scourge. They are convinced that the wave of epidemic comes from Asia or Africa and that the disease cannot arise de novo in a temperate climate, for there are at least some European cities whose sanitary condition is as bad as, or even worse than, that of the much-abused places of Mahomedan pilgrimage. That idea is a pure delusion; that conviction perfectly unwarranted by facts. Before the commencement of any epidemic of cholera, cases occur in places so distant from one another as to preclude the possibility of spreading infection from a pre-existing focus, and these individually form centres for its progress towards all directions. Such is the genesis of Epidemics not only in Lower Bengal but everywhere, notwithstanding the boasted sanitary condition of some of the best European cities. Fresh cases newly take place in a locality after a lapse of many months, forbidding the suggestion of incubation, and perhaps for a long time we shall not meet with any, if particular care is taken of the sanitary arrangements. We are, however, more concerned with the spread of the disease than its origin. It would be reasonable if equal concern were shewn for those cities of Europe whose sanitary condition is no better than that of the holy places of Arabia. What a pity that, instead of the cause of the epidemic being investigated, an alarm is raised of its invasion of Europe, and the poor Porte and its allies are made the whipping boy of the nations! At the Epidemiological Society of London, Inspector-General Lawson read a paper on "Cholera in ships at sea and its connection with manifestation of the same disease on land," pointing out that the cholera outbreak in certain coolie ships was due to other causes than infection carried from the ports whence the vessels started. In the emigrant vessels referred to, the first case occurred after the twentieth day, almost at the highest limit of the incubation period assigned by any medical authority. But a ship out on sea with latent cholera germs ought to have a much less period of incubation than while in harbour, for we cannot expect a better healthy surrounding than a sea. The mortality during the twenty-six days was trifling, and as the ships neared Mauritius it grew severe. Then he cited the Swanton and the New York carrying emigrants from Havre. The former after twenty-six days and the latter after sixteen days at sea had cholera. The Swanton had experienced a hot wind and the New York a cold one just before the attack. In the case of the latter vessel, the outbreak was ascribed to unpacking of clothes soiled by choleraic discharges in Germany and using them, but the same explanation cannot hold good for the former, which was then enjoying a warm weather from the desert blasts of Africa and required no additional clothing. Regarding the Crofton Hall which left Calcutta on the 3rd of June last and had to return soon after, it was, as usual, at first stated that the cholera had been shipped from Calcutta, but it was soon after found that those only who had eaten the pickled beef were affected. Again, there is just now an outbreak of cholera in Paris, and to what can it be ascribed? Were the cholera germs transported there too from India to cause a havoc in that centre of fashion? In this connection, it is also noteworthy that, while the Europeans are afraid of the Holy Land of Islam, so much so as to be prepared, at critical times, to put a stop to the annual Exodus from India, they never for a moment direct their attention to Christian pilgrimage to Jerusalem, a city by no means more healthy nor better kept than the holy cities of Arabia, according to the testimony of English medical men themselves.

We now come to the Hajj itself. That is the name by which is understood the pilgrimage of the Mahomedans to the shrines of Mecca and Medina in the Hedjaz the former being sacred as the birthplace of the Prophet, Mahommed, and for the ancient temple of the Arabian race, the Kaaba, and the latter as the city of the Prophet's refuge from the violent enmity of his native townsmen of Mecca, the scene of his triumphs and the success of his mission. There are two ways to reach the cities of Mecca and Medina from the Red Sea coast. The route most generally taken is from Jedda to Mecca and then to Medina, the pilgrims returning to Mecca and embarking at Jedda. The other is Yambu, and it holds the same relation to Medina as Jedda does to Mecca. There is a third route inland from Damascus through the desert. The accounts of these places are only available from Mahomedan visitors and European travellers, principally from the last, among whom are Ali Bey, Burckhardt, Burton, Irwin, Niebuhr, Seetzen and Wellsted. Last of all, there is the account of Dr. Abdur Razzak who accompanied the pilgrims in 1878-79. It would not be uninteresting to mention here a little of Burckhardt. He went there in 1814 and suffered severely from dysentery at Mecca and from fever at Medina and on his return to Egypt died from the former disease in 1817, though attended by Dr. Robert Richardson during his last illness at Cairo. He lived and died as a Mahomedan, and over his grave a full white turban is sculptured with the Arabic inscription, "Sheikh Ibrahim, the Moslem, the European traveller."

The annual number of pilgrims as roughly estimated at different times, varies from fifty thousand to a lac. During the Hajji Akbar which takes place on every 12th year, the number may even be doubled. In 1827 Ali Bey estimated it at 83,000, in 1814 Burckhardt at 70,000, in 1853 Burton at 50,000, in 1879 Abdur Bazzak at 60,000, and in 1880 Wilfrid Blunt at 93,000. Mr. John Ray in 1693 quotes an author who speaks of about 2,000,000 pilgrims. The Indian Mussulmans on their way to the Hajj, arriving at Yalumlum, a hill about one day's journey from Aden, bathe and put on two seamless cloths, one around the loins and another on the upper part of the body leaving the head bare. If any one covers the head by mistake he has to pay a penalty for it. Here they have to bind ehram (a piece of thread on the head as a vow to perform the Hajj rightfully) and utter "Allahumma Labbaik" (here I am, O God! in obedience to thy call,) and several other words to be frequently repeated afterwards. At Kamran they have to pass through a quarantine, and after a day's voyage they reach Jedda, the nearest seaport town of Mecca.

Jedda is about a mile long with 20,000 inhabitants and contains a large number of pilgrim lodgings, each room accommodating from ten to twenty people, so that the city is very much crowded. The sewage is carried by deepening passages into sinks to be chiefly absorbed in the soil. The water is supplied from tanks of rain water and from the springs of Hadda, a midway town between Jedda and Mecca, the latter being forty-five miles east of the former. Just outside Jedda, there is the supposed grave of Hawwa (Eve), where the pilgrims read the Fatiha (prayer for the dead). The road is hilly and barren, and it generally takes two nights to reach Mecca, the day being spent at Hadda.

Mecca is at the height of about 2,000 feet from the level of the sea, in a valley with hills on two sides of granite formation. The town is about three miles long with a population of more than 50,000. The number is doubled or trebled during the pilgrim season. With the exception of the main street, the others are from ten to twelve yards wide and are neglected and dirty. The stone built houses, with two to five stories in height and small rooms, afford imperfect accommodation to the population. Some Indian Mahomedans receive their countrymen free. The climate is dry and would be bracing but for the heat. The soil being arid, there is no vegetation, and fruits, &c. are brought from Taif two days' journey due east. A covered deep drain is attached to every house with which all the privies are connected, and this communicates with a pit opposite the house forming a cess pool. The water supply was formerly from rain and brackish spring wells as the famous Zemzem, but at present it is furnished by the aqueduct of Zobaida, named in A. H. 170 after the wife of Harun-al-Rashid. It is a stupendous work of solid masonry, carrying water from mountains east of Arafat by way of Muzdalifah and Mina to Mecca. It has been often out of repair and restored in A. H. 634, 726, 811, 821, and last in 969 by the wife of Suleiman by clearing the original springs of Hunain and Noman and channelling the rock about 2,000 yards to Mecca, and since with occasional repairs, the water has been abundant. It is distributed from five or six reservoirs to the different parts of the city, the largest of them being near the market place. From the stop attached to the mouth of the aqueduct water skins are filled by carriers for final distribution during certain hours of the day. The mosque of Kaaba in the centre of the town is very clean. Here the pilgrims turn round the mosque seven times and run within the hills of Safa and Marwa the same number of times. Before Mahomed's time, Jerusalem (Beit ul Mukaddas) was the Kaaba, but it was the Prophet's desire to read the prayers facing Beitullah as its erection by Abraham precedes the founding of the other temple. On the 9th day of the month of Zil Hej, it is incumbent on the pilgrims to attend the sermon on the hill of Arafat, where they are to proceed through Mina and Muzdalifah. Outside the last city, at about noon, they read the Fatiha in Dada Adam's masjid and go to Arafat. It was here that Father Adam first saw Eve after their expulsion from Paradise. The pilgrims come back in the evening to read their prayers at Muzdalifah and collect forty-nine stones and wash them. In Arafat there are three large tanks from which water is taken out, but washing is not allowed and each is guarded by a Turkish soldier with fixed bayonet though in a pilgrim's garb. These tanks derive their water from the aqueduct of Zobaida running round the hill. During Ali Bey's time there were fourteen of these. From Muzdalifah they return the following morning to Mina. After shaving they perform Korbani (sacrifice). This town is long and narrow, and the sanitary arrangements most unsatisfactory. The slaughtered animals, more than a hundred thousand, are thrown into trenches insufficient to receive them, and owing to severe heat speedy decomposition follows. From this noxious and offensive smell, vomiting, diarrhoea, dysentery and fever ensue. Burckhardt thus speaks of the sufferings of these poor pilgrims: "Poor Hadjys, worn out with disease and hunger are seen dragging their enfeebled bodies among the columns of El Kaaba, and when no longer able to stretch their hands to ask the passengers for charity they place a bowl to receive alms near the mat on which they lay themselves. When their last moments approach they cover themselves with their tattered garments, and often a whole day passes before it is discovered that they are dead." Since 1886, the condition of this town has vastly improved. In that year, the Nawab of Rampore, the late Kalb Ali Khan, supplied Mina with a large reservoir fed by a branch of the Zobaida aqueduct and every precaution is taken against pollution. Prompt measures are adopted for interment of slaughtered animals. The place is now more clean than before, with improved sewerage. This was the only city in the Hedjaz where disease and death were frequently met with, and it is very satisfactory that good sanitary arrangements are being made everywhere.

The feast of sacrifice is followed by the ceremony of the throwing those forty-nine stones against Satan into a plain close by. After a stay of three days, the pilgrims return to Mecca and again circumambulate seven times the Beitullah and also perform the running between Safa and Marwa. Now they are free to betake to their head-dress if they like. The pilgrims also perform Umrah, i.e., after binding ehram they go to Tanaim to read prayers, and returning back turn round the El Kaaba seven times and run as many times between Safa and Marwa. Their vow to perform Umrah can be taken at anytime. Afterwards they go to Medina, a twelve days' journey, stopping wherever they can find wells which are generally saline. El Medina is a vast plain containing about twenty thousand inhabitants. It is the best place as regards sanitary arrangements. There is abundant water from an underground aqueduct fed from Kubba, a place about two miles distant. In every quarter there is a reservoir with stop cocks. The public latrines are more plentiful than at Mecca, and on the whole as much sanitated as could be. The place itself is also cool, surrounded by numerous date palms. There it is a strict rule not to allow more than a limited number of persons at a time. It is incumbent on the pilgrims to remain there for eight days so as to read forty rekat of namaz and not more. After this they must make room for fresh arrivals. The pilgrims generally return to Mecca to take ship at Jedda or they go to Yambu or to Damascus.

We take from the Lancet the following analysis of Zemzem (Hagar's well) water, a small quantity of which every pilgrim drinks when at Mecca.

	1883.	1892.
Total solids	464.4	235.2
Chlorine	75.5	40.7
Nitrogen	13.84	4.55
Ammonia	358	140

The estimate is in grains per gallon. Even this analysis shows that the holy cities of Arabia have improved vastly during recent times.

The alarm of the spread of cholera from the Hedjaz towards Europe, after a sober consideration of facts, vanishes away. The Europeans generally charge the countries of Asia and specially India, with responsibility for almost all kinds of diseases that are prevalent in Europe, little thinking that, on the other hand, with their advanced civilization, they have introduced many dreadful diseases into these countries where they were unknown in former times. Passages from Mr. Darwin's Journal may be cited in our favour: "The Rev. J. Williams, in his interesting work says, that the first intercourse between natives and Europeans 'is invariably attended with the introduction of fever, dysentery, or some other disease which carries off numbers of the judgment was delivered in the cases, and that for the remaining halves the Subordinate Judge, after delivering judgment, wrote to the said Ata Ullah a postcard to the effect that he should come with the tobacco; that accordingly he (the said Ata Ullah) came to Gaya and went to the house of the Subordinate Judge on the 31st May last; that he was taken by the said Subordinate Judge to the inner apartment, where he handed over the said half-notes to him; that he, the said Ata Ullah, wanted his "hak" (commission) and claimed Rs. 800 out of the money; that the Subordinate Judge declined; whereupon, after some conversation, angry words were used and altercations and exchange of abusive words followed; that at the instance of the Subordinate Judge his chaprasi assaulted the man and his servant and turned him out in great disgrace."

A similar petition was presented at the same time by the same persons to the District and Sessions Judge of Gaya, and to the High Court, and in accordance with the instructions of the High Court, Baboo Troylokya Nath Mitter was called upon by the District Judge for a written explanation. This he furnished on the 24th June. Upon the 20th July the Registrar of the High Court forwarded to Government a copy of all the papers which had been received from the District Judge, and communicated the opinion of the Hon'ble Judges of the High Court that Baboo Troylokya Nath Mitter should be directed to institute criminal proceedings for defamation against Mohipat Lall and Mahomed Nawab. After some further correspondence with the High Court this course was adopted, and the Subordinate Judge, who was allowed leave for the purpose, was directed to prosecute. A prosecution was accordingly conducted before the District Magistrate of Gaya, and on the 12th September, after full enquiry the Magistrate acquitted the accused, on the ground that it was impossible to assume that they did not act honestly or with due care and attention. The Magistrate added that the question whether Baboo Troylokya Nath Mitter took a bribe was never a point in issue in the case, and that, beyond his denial, no evidence was produced to answer the question.

The Lieutenant-Governor then took into his consideration the form of the further investigation which should be undertaken, and eventually, on the 31st October 1891, decided to depute Mr. Kelleher, an officer of the rank of District and Sessions Judge, to make a careful investigation into all facts in any way bearing upon the statements made regarding the Subordinate Judge, and to report the result to the Government. Upon the 30th January 1892, Mr. Kelleher, after an elaborate and most exhaustive enquiry, submitted his report. A copy of Mr. Kelleher's report, with the appendices thereto, including all the evidence recorded, as well as of the previous papers on record, was on the 18th March forwarded to Baboo Troylokya Nath Mitter, with a remark that the Lieutenant-Governor had given his most careful consideration to the papers, and found that the charges made against him were of the gravest importance, and if he could not satisfactorily explain them they must result in his immediate removal from the service. Formal charges were drawn up, and the Subordinate Judge was informed that before passing orders on his case the Lieutenant-Governor would afford him the amplest opportunity of submitting such categorical explanations as he might think fit, but that in the meantime he could not be allowed to resume his appointment. Upon the 20th April the Subordinate Judge submitted his explanation, and on the 20th May a copy of it was forwarded to the High Court with a request that the Lieutenant-Governor might be favoured with the Court's recommendations as to the orders which should be passed in the case. Under date the 28th July the Hon'ble Judges reported that they had taken the papers into consideration and had arrived at conclusions unfavourable to Baboo Troylokya Nath Mitter, and were of opinion that he should not be allowed to continue in the service. Their lordships found that there was reliable evidence in support of the charge that the Sub-Judge accepted a bribe of Rs. 7,000, but they passed it over for technical reasons. They found, however, mainly on the admissions of the Sub-Judge himself, that he had improperly acquired leases of lands from persons who were suitors before him, and had otherwise misconducted himself grossly.

The Lieutenant-Governor entirely accepts the opinion of the High Court, and he considers that the conclusions at which the Judges have arrived sufficiently show that the conduct of the Subordinate Judge has been marked by deceit and subterfuge in a manner and to a degree which would render it impossible to retain him as a member of the Judicial Service. His Honour, going further, is of opinion that the charge of accepting a bribe has been morally proved; and he directs that Baboo Troylokya Nath Mitter be dismissed from the service of Government.

MR. RISLEY ON THE SEA-VOYAGE QUESTION.

The following is a full text of the Hon'ble H. H. Risley's speech on the sea-voyage question at a public meeting held the other day at the Sova Bazar Rajbari.

The Hon'ble H. H. Risley said:—

Although this is a meeting of Hindus assembled for a peculiarly

Hindu purpose, the Chairman has been good enough to permit me to say a few words in expression of my sympathy with the object of the meeting, and in support of its aims. In my opinion, the more Hindus go to England the better. A variety of causes, which I need not attempt to specify now, have brought about the remarkable result that the higher culture of the upper classes in this country rests upon the basis of English literature and history. To get the best out of a distinctively English culture, it is obviously essential to visit England itself. In all departments of knowledge, literary, scientific and political, residence in England, even if it be only for two or three years, can hardly fail to be of the greatest benefit to the Hindus educated on an English basis, and the gain of the individual will, in the long run, be the gain of the Society to which he belongs.

As regards the obstacles, which the Hindu system offers to these visits, I am not competent to speak. But I venture to tell you an experience of my own which throws some light upon the way the question is regarded by the Hindus of Western India, or at any rate, by some sections of them. Two years ago I happened to be present in Berlin at a meeting of the German Colonial Society, held to discuss the development of German East Africa—the country lying between Zanzibar and Lake Tanganyika. Some of you may possibly know that a large number of Germans have very magnificent ideas as to the future of their African colonies, and expect them to develop into an Empire comparable to India. Any way, the meeting I was at, was a very large one, and some of the most influential men of the colonial party were present. It will perhaps surprise you to hear that the main question discussed with the utmost vigour—and very strong language on both sides was used—was what attitude ought the German Government to assume towards the Hindu merchants who settled in Bagamoyo, Dar-es-Salam, Pangani, and other places on the coast. According to the German officials, these Hindus were so numerous that the whole trade of the African coast was in their hands—both wholesale and retail—and the fate of the colony was said to depend upon the mode in which they were treated. One party wished to expel them, in a summary Russian fashion, because their loyalty to German interests could not be depended on, and the other wanted to retain and encourage them. The grounds of the controversy are immaterial for our present purpose. All I want to ask, is: If the Hindu traditions are as uncompromisingly opposed to sea-voyages as the Pandit, who just now spoke in Bengali, wants to make them out to be, how did these Hindu merchants come to be in East Africa at all? They could not have got there by land. It would seem then that in the Bombay Presidency the higher castes to whom the merchants who trade with East Africa certainly belong, do not take quite the same view of the Hindu traditions as some of the Pandits of Bengal. And the logic of facts which shows us a large and flourishing settlement of Hindus in East Africa, and constant intercourse between that country and Bombay, may perhaps in the end be trusted to get the better of the Pandits.

But gentlemen, is it prima facie likely that this narrow and pedantic construction of Hindu tradition can be correct? I do not believe it. So far as my studies of the Hindu religion and the Hindu social system have gone, nothing has struck me more than their extraordinary flexibility and adaptiveness. We were told the other day that Hinduism is declining. I do not agree in that view. I have served in several out-of-the-way districts and had occasion to look carefully into the spread of Hinduism. So far from losing ground, one could trace it year by year, or certainly decade by decade, observing by a process of impalpable but sure proselytising, whole tribes who until recent times had been beyond its pale. One answer at any rate to Mr. Monro's recent lecture might be given in the words of an English poet.

"Look west where whole new thousands are

In Vishnu-land what Avatar."

Are we now to be told that Hinduism, which is so comprehensive in its grasp and adapts itself so readily to the needs of such diverse bodies of men, is unable to solve this comparatively minor problem of the social consequences of a sea-voyage? One would have expected other things. Looking at the Hindu system from one point of view one is tempted to compare it to two august constitutions—the English constitution and the Roman-Catholic Church. It resembles the first in its adaptiveness, in its power of constantly changing to meet changed conditions of life, it resembles the second in its comprehensiveness. It has room in it for the Pantheistic Philosopher and for the latest wild convert from some form of fetichism. Can you say more for any system than that? Only I observe—and this evening's proceedings lend point to the observation—the Hindu religion seems to have no central authority—it has not yet set up a Pope. If it had, the difficulty we have just been discussing could hardly have arisen. You would not have had to appoint a committee to search the scriptures and report their views on sea-voyages. People would have gone to the Supreme authority and got their orders. As it is, authorities seem to differ, and one can only hope that the common sense of the community will evolve some reasonable solution.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

HORACE IN ENGLISH VERSE.

COUNTRY LIFE.

O blest is he, from business free,
Like the merry men of old ;
Who tills his land with his own stout hand,
And knows not the lust of gold.

No sailor he on the stormy sea,
No soldier, trumpet-stirred ;
And he shuns the town and the haughty frown
Of the courtiers fawning herd.

But he bids the vine with her tendrils twine
Around the poplar tall,
And he adds a graft, with a gardener's craft,
To the tree that climbs his wall.

Or a grazier keen, o'er the pastures green
He sees his oxen feed ;
Or he shears his flock, or he brews a stock
Of his rustic nectar, mead.

And when autumn at length, in his manly strength,
Has raised his fruit-crowned head,
He plucks the pear with its flavour rare,
And the grape with its clusters red.

With his knee on the sod he thanks his God
For His mercies and favours free ;
And he lays him along, while he lists the song
Of the thrush in the old oak-tree ;

While the waters glide with their rippling tide,
And the zephyrs softly creep
O'er the quivering leaves midst the murmuring trees,
And lull the sense to sleep.

But when thundering Jove, from his stores above,
Sends wintry snows and rain ;
And rock, and wood, and field, and flood,
Lie bound in his icy chain,

With many a hound, in the woods around,
He hunts the grisly boar ;
And ere daylight fade, his gleaming blade
Is red with the monster's gore.

When the sun has set he spreads his net,
And the partridge, fluttering, dies ;
He takes the hare in his crafty snare,
And the crane, a goodly prize.

'Mid joys like these what ills can tease,
Who could remember pain ?
He feels no wrong, and he laughs at the throng
Of cares that swell love's train.

If a loving wife—best staff of life—
Be his, and children dear,
The fire burns bright with its ruddy light
His homeward step to cheer.

At the cottage door, when his toil is o'er,
She stands with her smile so sweet,
And holds up her face with a modest grace,
His welcome kiss to meet ;

And his children glad swarm round their dad,
But the hungry man must dine ;
So she spreads the cloth and he sups his broth,
While she pours out her home-made wine.

ODE XVI. OF BOOK III.

AD MÆCENATEM.

GOLD, ITS STRENGTH AND ITS WEAKNESS.

Strong doors of oak and watch-dogs' snout
Might well secure the imprisoned maid,
Shut up within a brazen tower,
From the bold lover's midnight raid.

"Love laughs at locksmiths," though. 'Tis known
Stern guardians oft are bought—or sold ;
Ere morning dawns the bird has flown ;
Locks open to a key of gold.

Bright gold—a mighty power on earth—
Makes strongest armies fly like chaff ;
And e'en the man of noblest birth
Oft bows before the golden calf.

Strong gold—the mightiest power of all—
Cleaves a smooth way through toughest rocks ;
Through lust of gold great "Houses" fall,
By dealings rash in risky stocks.

Fast-growing wealth brings growing care,
With growing thirst for larger gains.
Lift not thy head too high in air,
Nor court ambition's gnawing pains.

The more a man denies himself
The more God gives him to enjoy ;
Mark, then, the man who worships self,
And give him a wide berth, my boy.

And ever your forefathers thank,
Nor strive to soar too high a pitch ;
The gentleman, though poor, takes rank
Long way beyond the vulgar rich.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given, any other being unnecessary and likely to cause confusion.

ODE XI. OF BOOK I.
AD LEUCONEN.

Seek not to know what tale of years
To you and me on earth is given, love;
'Twere better far to weep the tears
And smile the smiles sent us by heaven, love.

Whether the years be one or more
Of which we two shall be partakers, love,
Still will the wild wave lash the shore;
The rocks will still defy the breakers, love.

Be wise, decant your wine with care—
The bright is joy, the dregs are sorrow, love,—
Shake not the flask, the liquor's rare.
Use well the day, nor trust the morrow, love.

KNAPDALE.

WEEKLYANA.

LADY Lansdowne has returned to India and rejoined her lord at Simla.

AN unusual shipping disaster has occurred in the Hughli. The Anchor Line steamer Anglia from Calcutta capsized and sank in the Jellingham Channel, drowning thirty-two of the forty-seven crew and passengers, namely, European crew 37, Native crew 2, Passengers 2, distressed seaman 1, Pilot and Leadsman 2, Pilot (as passenger) 1, Pilots' servants 2. The Anglia was a steel screw steamer of 3,287 tons gross register and built in 1888. She had 300 horse-power engines, and was 340 feet long with 43 feet beam. She is a great loss to the underwriters. The Jellingham is a constantly changing Channel, situate near Mud Point, far south of James and Mary shoal.

The accident was sudden. It seems just as the Anglia was about to let go her anchor, she touched the ground. She first took a lunch port, and then canting to starboard turned over and sank.

A Fund for the relief of the sufferers has been opened. We earnestly hope native gentlemen will subscribe.

A MARWARI, Gocool Chand Chowbay, reported to the Waterloo Street thanna the loss of thirteen notes of Rs. 1,000 each and three hundis of the aggregate value of Rs. 8,100, and offered at the same time a reward of Rs. 500 to the finder. Soon after he left, in came a Bengali, Nitta Nundo Chuckerbutty, an assistant of Messrs. Thompson & Co., for delivery to the Police of the missing notes and hundis which he had picked up in Bentinck Street. The Marwari was communicated with. He came, claimed the notes and hundis as his, and departed with them after paying the promised reward of Rs. 500 to the Babu. Lucky Marwari and lucky Babu! Let them remember the Great Giver.

CAPTAIN Andrew Hearsey has started a Laidman business, the object of his attentions being a Mr. Greeven of the Civil Service, N.-W. P. He complained to the Lieutenant-Governor of the latter's conduct and received in reply the following letter from the Chief Secretary, dated Naini Tal, August 25th:—

"I am directed to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of 13 August on the subject of the conduct of Mr. Greeven in his official capacity. Mr. Greeven is Judge of the Small Cause Court, Mussoorie, and in his judicial capacity is immediately subordinate to the High Court, Allahabad. I am to request that you will in the first instance address yourself to the Registrar of the High Court if, in your opinion, the conduct of Mr. Greeven in his judicial capacity calls for the interference of the High Court."

CAPTAIN Hearsey lost no time in despatching the following rejoinder to the Lieutenant Governor:—

"I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your communication, dated Naini Tal, 25th August, and at the same time most respectfully to point out that I was unaware that the charge I made to you concerning the conduct of Mr. Greeven, C. S., Joint Magistrate of Mussoorie—assaulting a police constable in the bazaar—had anything to do with his judicial capacity. After my acquittal in the High Court in 1885 in the case of Laidman vs. Hearsey the then Lieutenant-Governor of the North-Western Provinces and Chief Commissioner of Oudh (Sir Alfred Lyall) wrote a false and insulting 'Secret Resolution' not only concerning myself, but likewise concerning the Chief Justice of the North-Western Provinces, circulating the same in an underhand manner to all the judicial subordinates of that Chief Justice, not only throughout the North-Western Provinces, but likewise throughout Oudh, thereby inducing a belief that all officials, both judicial and executive, notwithstanding the rank and functions they might be holding, must be subordinate in all those functions to His Honor the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-Western Provinces and Chief Commissioner of Oudh, and was, therefore, under the impression that the proper person to address under those circumstances would be that functionary—i. e., yourself. I shall feel much obliged by your kindly informing me if an assault such as reported in my former letter, viz., an assault by a covenanted Civilian, a Joint-Magistrate, not seated on the bench, but committed on the public road, in a bazaar, on a Government servant in the execution of his duty will be held by you to have been committed in a judicial capacity, and therefore not cognizable by you until brought to your notice by the Registrar of the High Court of the Provinces."

A WATERPOUT. According to a Vizianagram contemporary, a stupendous column of water was seen in the village of Annamaraju to ascend from a large tank in the neighbourhood, its upper extremity being lost in wreaths of mist. After a time, the column suddenly collapsed, the fall of water was so heavy that two peasants caught in it were stunned by the shock for a while.

SHAKESPEARE is the poet of the world and of all times—past, present and future. The literature on the Currency Difficulty could not be complete without a quotation from him. "A. B. M.," from the Bengal Club, thus supplies the omission in the Englishman:—

"The following lines from our myriad-minded Poet—if not strictly of economic value,—may still prove of some slight literary interest at the present moment:—

Or shall I think, in silver she's immured,
Being ten times undervalued to try'd gold?

—Merchant of Venice.

It would appear from this quotation that in Shakespeare's time the ratio of silver to gold was ten to one. I notice that the late Mr. George Yule in his very able paper on the Currency of India states the ratio in the reign of Elizabeth as being 10½ to 1. The ratio is now about 24 to 1. If the controversy now raging were to be decided by the 'Sortes Shakesperienses' in the same play later on, we shall find a comparison between the relative merits of gold and silver:—

What says the golden chest? Ha! let me see:

"Who chooseth me, shall gain what many men desire."

What many men desire!—That many may be meant

By the fool multitude, that choose by show,

Not learning more than the fond eye doth teach;

Which pries not to the interior, but like the martlet

Builds in the weather on the outward wall,

Even in the force and road of casualty.

I will not choose what many men desire,

Because I will not jump with common spirits

And rank me with the barbarous multitudes.

Why then to thee, thou Silver Treasure House;

Tell me once more what title thou dost bear:

"Who chooses me, shall get as much as he deserves;"

And well said too—

Did the prototype of the Currency Association exist in Shakespeare's time? And were these weighty words a covert protest against platform agitation? It would not require a very great twist to construe them into a lesson and a warning even in the present year of grace."

NATURE may be extravagant as well as foolish. Here is a case of frivolous waste. The Sadiq-ul-Akhbar of Bhawalpore reports: "Ahmad Rafi, a traveller, while on his journey from Katif to Bassarah saw in Ashra Muteer, a place two marches from Katif, a man with four eyes—two in their usual places and two above the eyebrows. This man can see with his four eyes. Even when his lower two eyes are shut up he can see with his upper two eyes. He is a man of horrible appearance." Two pairs of eyes, one above the other! Cui bono? A pair placed behind the head would have been more to the purpose.

Anyhow, Ahmad Rafi's man beats the Lord Siva of the mythologist's creation. If A. R. could import his man to India, he might, in conjunction with an astute Hindu, make a good thing out of his enterprize at the expense of superstition and credulity.

A NEW submarine boat has been tried during the last three months in the Detroit river, near Detroit, U. S. It is an egg-shaped oaken hull with pointed ends. The planks are of the thickness of three inches, and withstand the pressure of water at a depth of 100 ft. The boat is 40 feet long, the beam 9 feet, and the entire depth, from top of conning tower to bottom of hull, 16 feet. It is driven by a steam engine and an electric motor apparatus. Above the surface a couple of four-bladed screws is employed, and under water the electric engine. The speed is about nine miles an hour. The rudder is close fitting. No more than two men are required to work the boat. In one trial the two men employed remained below the water as long as 2 hours 45 minutes, breathing only the air contained in the hull at the time of submersion, amounting to 500 cubic feet. When it is required to sink the boat to a certain depth, water is pumped into the "water bottoms." This boat belongs to Mr. G. C. Baker.

We are told that the owner of a "curio" shop in London, evidently smarting under the Yankee trick of "passing away an hour in shop-viewing," now displays a placard in his window with the following inscription in large type :—

"NOTICE TO AMERICANS. THIS IS NOT A PUBLIC MUSEUM."

There has been no Yankee in the matter; the trick was British. The Americans in the placard too is a blind, on the principle of Indian domestic government, of correcting the daughter-in-law by admonishing the daughter.

We fear the good tradesmen of our West End will before long be compelled to publish a similar warning. There are some constant "shoppers" who simply abuse the courtesy of shopkeepers and shopmen, without ever caring to buy, even at the "half price sales."

PROFESSOR Max Müller has addressed the following letter to the Freie Blatt, a paper recently founded in Vienna to combat the anti-Semitic agitation :—

"I have repeatedly expressed disapproval of the anti-Semitic agitation. In all matters I am opposed to shallow generalisation. When one hears people express general opinions about Englishmen, Frenchmen, Germans, &c., one is always led to ask them—how many Englishmen have you seen or known? Perhaps twenty; and yet you judge of twenty millions! I have known many Jews, having been born at Dessau. Many of my best friends were Jews. Now it is true that there are black sheep among the Jews, but to judge and condemn the whole people by such is, it must be admitted, opposed to all rules of inductive logic. For a long time past I have preached to every German in England that he is individually responsible for the good name of the German nation. I should like to be able to preach the same to every Jew. Every single Jew is responsible for the good name of his race. If every single Jew would feel this, or if the community would let him feel it, there would be no more anti-Semitism. The practice of judging by the lump is the ruin of all science. The mischief it can work in Society, and in the State, is shown to us by the excesses committed by the Anti-Semites. I am an Anti anti-Semite, and shall remain so."

THE Hyderabad Scandal Pamphlet case was resumed on Monday. The Magistrate read out the Resident's letter leaving the question of privileged communication (raised by Mehdi Hassan the other day) entirely in the Magistrate's hands. Mr. Plowden's view (unlike that of Sir Dennis Fitzpatrick's in the diamond case) is said to have met with general approval.

The Magistrate ruled that Mehdi Hassan cannot claim privilege.

In the case of Furdonji's refusal also, the Magistrate held that the communication between Furdonji and the Minister was not a privileged communication, because the Nizam's Government is not a State and Furdonji is not a public servant within the meaning of the Evidence Act; the Evidence Act meant British Government and the British State. Furdonji still persisting in his refusal to answer questions, the Magistrate granted him 24 hours' time and warned him that if he still objected to answer Mr. Norton's questions, he would make himself liable to punishment.

Mr. Norton said if Furdonji answered all his questions he would not trouble Sir Asman Jah.

Furdonji was then cross-examined for about an hour as to matters he did not refuse revealing.

Ikbāl Ali, Joint Revenue Secretary, was then examined by Mr. Inverarity. He said he thought Mehdi and Gertrude to be man and wife. He never questioned them whether they were ever married.

Mr. Eardly Norton reserved cross-examination. Then two peons of the Record press were examined. Mr. Norton here asked for a summons for Yāsuf Uz Zaman as he wanted to confront him with Mehdi Hassan.

Mehdi Hassan was again cross-examined for an hour. He denied Yāsuf having kept Gertrude. He denied that the Lucknow Police Superintendent, Mr. Hutton, ever insisted on Gertrude taking a license as a prostitute. Mehdi did not try to save Gertrude from such shame, and never consulted Rafiuddin about the matter, and never kept Gertrude in different houses to prevent her from falling into the hands of the police.

Mr. Irwin, First Assistant to the Resident, had asked Mehdi Hassan to see Mr. Plowden. Mehdi had shown Mr. Plowden a printed copy of the marriage deed, and told him that he was married according to Mahomedan rites. Mehdi had also shown Mr. Plowden a copy of Sarwar Jung's letter to Raja Shabhan Ali Khan of Lucknow. Mehdi denied having any conversation with the Resident about any previous enquiry.

Mr. Eardley Norton then wanted to cross-examine Sadulla again, but he could not be found.

Mr. Inverarity promised to bring him to the Court to-morrow.

As there was no more work to be done, the Court rose at 2 P.M. and did not sit in the afternoon.

ON Tuesday, the proceedings commenced with the reading of an application from Faridoonji, the Private Secretary to the Minister, which stated that he had laid the whole matter before the Minister who considered it a very delicate political question to allow Faridoonji to disclose official matter. The Minister has therefore communicated with the Resident. Faridoonji prayed that before the Minister had heard Mr. Plowden's views his further cross-examination might be postponed and the Magistrate granted the application. Mr. Eardley Norton said he postponed cross-examining Faridoonji till the return of the Commission from Upper India. Sarwar Jung had informed Mr. Eardley Norton yesterday that the documents he was asked to produce were with the Nizam, so there was no necessity of Sarwar Jung's coming to the Court: Mr. Norton asked the Court to request the Nizam to send those documents together with the whole file of papers in connection with the enquiry into the Pamphlet case which are now also with the Nizam and Mr. Norton's instruction was that the Nizam, if requested, would gladly send them to court. The court agreed to request the Nizam to do so.

Sadulla was then cross-examined. He denied having read translations of passages from the pamphlet in Mushtaq Hussain's Urdu paper Musheer the previous day.

Mehdi Hassan appeared in court and was re-examined by Mr. Inverarity. Mehdi Hassan had suggested Colonel Ludlow as a proper person for enquiring; he knew nothing about the Government enquiry. His letter to the Minister was read and filed. It said Mitra had no malice against him, Mitra was only a tool, the real author being Sarwar Jung. Mitra was personally known to him and he had tried his best to get from Mitra the real author's name but failed. This witness said that Mitra's having sent a retainer to Mr. Inverarity convinced him that Mitra was being backed. Hormasji never told witness what he knew officially. Young Salar never passed a night in Mehdi's house. In his letter about keeping a bed room ready he had no idea of such a suggestion as Mr. Norton put. His wife was not a personal friend to young Salar Jung and by "lady's bedroom" he meant his wife's compartments consisting of four rooms.

Mr. Eardley Norton wanted to cross-examine Mehdi Hassan again, Mr. Inverarity objected, but it was allowed by the Court. Mehdi Hassan admitted having a conversation with the Minister about the Scandal Pamphlet and Hormasji having submitted to the Minister the result of the deposition of the Record press witnesses. Hormasji had supplied Mehdi Hassan with copies of those depositions with the Minister's permission. Some of his petitions to the Minister were written by Hormasji. Witness said he was no English scholar. Re-examined by Mr. Inverarity, he said before he told the Minister his marriage was never challenged.

Then Mr. Inverarity applied for a Commission to examine witnesses in Upper India, his chief witnesses being Mr. Evans of Allahabad, Mr. White, Principal of the Canning College, Lucknow, Doctor Hooper of Lucknow, and some Mahomedans about Lucknow. Mr. Eardley Norton also to save further adjournment, applied for a Commission to examine witnesses for the defence at the same time.

No charge has yet been framed against Mitra, but in case a charge is framed, the evidence taken on Commission will be utilised. The Commissions are returnable in six weeks. The case is adjourned till the 18th October next.

MOULVI Abdool Jubbar, Khan Bahadur, Deputy Magistrate in charge of the Alipore Suburban Police Court, now acting as Superintendent of Stamps and Stationery, has been granted an extension of service for one year commencing from October next. At the expiry of this period, the Government has intimated its intention of taking into consideration the question of granting the Moulvi a further extension.

NOTES & LEADERETTES

with OUR OWN NEWS.

CHOLERA is still decimating Hamburg. The daily mortality has reached two hundred. Great Britain is pronounced safe from its visitation and importation. It is admitted there was one death in a village near Macclesfield from cholera which was unimported. With the cooler weather on the Continent, the spread of the disease has been arrested. Eminent British doctors urge the cremation of dead cholera patients.

Following the United States, Canada has issued a decree prescribing twenty-one days' quarantine on all vessels carrying immigrants, except those from British and Scandinavian ports.

THERE is a split in the Irish Party. The Parnellites have issued a manifesto in which they charge the anti-Parnellites with yielding their independence, and urge the formation of an independent party and the prompt recognition of the National League.

THE Times has been informed from Shanghai that at Shensi three European Missionaries and some native Christians have been killed and their bodies mutilated.

THE Czar is said to be indignant at Colonel Yanoof's aggressive measures on the Pamirs and to have ordered him not to forget the peaceful character of his mission and to avoid conflicts with the Afghans and the Chinese and not to carry his explorations beyond the Mustagh Mountains. The Novosti suggests a fresh delimitation of the respective spheres of influence in those regions, Russia retaining the Eastern Pamir. It explains that Russia's sole object is to find an outlet to the Indian Ocean, and that she has therefore no intention of spending her efforts in the acquisition of the Pamirs which would not even give a strategic base against a well-defined Northern-Indian frontier. The Viedomosti is more outspoken. It says that Russia has no object in making concessions for increasing England's influence in a country not hers, thus lowering Russia's prestige among the Asiatic races.

In a News-letter from Bhagulpore, published in yesterday's Indian Daily News, under the head of "The Shias and the Alam," we find the following:—

"To prevent a breach of the peace, our Magistrate and Collector had issued an order forbidding the Shias from bringing out the Alam during the last Mohurram, and it was also duly notified that any violation of the order would subject each offender to six months' rigorous imprisonment and a thousand rupees fine, or in lieu of the fine, another six months' incarceration with hard labor. Well, the sect is now moving the Judge to call upon the Magistrate to shew cause why such an order was issued when it amounts to actual interference with their religious practice, and especially when, in Calcutta and Patna, the Alam procession is permitted by the Local authorities. I do not know what the result of this action will be; but I do know that had the Collector not taken timely action to prevent the Shia procession, there must have been much bloodshed and many lives lost, as the Sunnis who form the vast majority had determined to attack the Shias if they had but brought out the Alam."

That supports the position we from the first unhesitatingly held on this important but delicate subject. So at Bhagulpore, as everywhere else, the Sunnis resent most strongly, and are ready to resist by force, the attempts of the Shias to insult their religious feelings under the use of exercising a religious right. The matter is, however, quite different in Calcutta. Here the Shias have never even thought of uttering the Tabarra, and the Sunnis, being thoroughly satisfied with their good faith, have never raised any objection to the Alam procession, which has accordingly from time immemorial been allowed by the authorities. Indeed, for several reasons, including personal, which may be mentioned if need be, the unvarying moderation, for more than a whole generation, of the domiciled Persians who constitute the bulk of the Shia community of the metropolis, and whose Moharram processions are the grandest in town, is exceptional and almost unique. It is not always so at other places. At Patna, for instance, on the other hand, not many years ago, a serious breach of the peace was threatened, compelling the authorities to intervene. The bone of contention was the Tabarra—the damning by the Shias of the Holy Family and the revered names of Islam. A mutual understanding was however effected between the two sects, and the Shias completely satisfied the Sunnis that no Tabarra would be uttered by them while taking out their Alam—the flag of Hossein. The Sunnis thereupon withdrew their objection—and the procession was accordingly allowed. Similarly, if the Shias can persuade the Sunnis at Bhagulpore and other places to waive their objection, the Local officers will, we have no doubt, gladly grant the permission.

While on the subject of religious disputes between Shias and Sunnis, we are relieved to find from a telegram from Lahore, published in yesterday's Statesman, that "Afghan news shews that the fighting between the Sunnis and Shias of Tual has been amicably settled."

SOME weeks ago, we brought to the notice of the public as well as the Government and the authorities the election of a messenger—a Chuprassi—to the Nator Municipality—to the rage of the respectability of that ancient place. In due course, the election of Zameer Duffadar was Gazetted and he took his seat as a Municipal Commissioner, while still retaining his service under a local Raja. The effect has been, that at two successive meetings of the Municipality, almost all the Commissioners absented themselves, evidently unwilling to sit with a menial, and there being no quorum no business could be transacted. Cannot the Government devise a means by which the Commissioners may be spared this indignity?

AT a General Meeting of the Madras Municipality, a Municipal Commissioner—Mr. R. Balakistna Chetty—remarked, "I can only say that not only the Sanitary Department, but I can unhesitatingly say the whole Municipality is notoriously corrupt from the date the Civilian officers have ceased to preside over it." This precious Natkhati is a more fervent believer in the Indian Civil Service than any Covenanted European officer. Both the President of the Municipality, Colonel G. M. I. Moore, and the Health Officer resented the remark and prosecuted Mr. Chetty for defamation. At the hearing, the Municipal Commissioner, through his counsel, gave the assurance that there was nothing in his speech which was intended to cast any imputation on the probity of the prosecutors or in any way reflecting on their character, and expressed regret at the unpleasantness which had resulted. The President was satisfied but not the Health Officer. The first withdrew the prosecution but the second sticks to it.

THE Editor of the Satara paper, the Pratod, has been fined Rs. 500 for defaming Mr. Fagan, the Divisional Forest officer there. It seems the paper had described him as imperious and high-handed, and said that he had shot a native woman dead in order to warn off natives from Government forests, that his plea that the shot was accidental was false, and that the official enquiry and examination by Mr. Candy, the Collector, was a farce and a piece of race partiality, &c. The editor pleaded that the article was written in good faith and commented more on Mr. Candy's style of touring and working than on Mr. Fagan's character and conduct, and that, after all, it was really extracted from another paper. The Magistrate held that the article, read and digested as a whole, was clearly defamatory, inasmuch as the imputing high-handedness, murder, and falsehood to Mr. Fagan was calculated to harm and lower his high official and private reputation. Regarding the plea of the article being an extract from another paper, the Magistrate said that Mr. Fagan was libelled the same, if not more, than Mr. Candy, and that the publishing of extracts from other papers with embellishment and comments only aggravated the libel, by giving it fresh life and extended publicity.

THE Madura Union Club sued some of its members for subscriptions and refreshments supplied. The District Munsiff disallowed the claims. He held that "The Club being an institution of honour the rule is to appeal to the members' sentiments of honour. The posting of a man's name as a defaulter and his eventual expulsion from the Club are the highest punishment of the social code, and to bring a man up before a civil tribunal in addition to the social disgrace is the most refined form of torture, which is quite alien to the spirit and constitution of a Club."

Will not a member have a remedy in court if he was wrongly expelled from the club?

THE Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal has been pleased to allow an additional sum of Rs. 1,000 a month to Nawab Wala Kader Syud Hossain Ali Mirza Bahadur, the second son of the late Nawab Nazim of Bengal, generally known as the Majhla Sahib. After the Nawab Nazim had retired from his official position, and his eldest son, the present Nawab Bahadur of Murshedabad, succeeded him as the Head of the Nizam Family and the Premier Nobleman of the Lower Provinces, pensions were fixed by the Government of India for the different sons and daughters and other members of the family of the Nawab Nazim. In this distribution, the Majhla Sahib was given an annual sum of Rs. 25,000, while several of his younger brothers got Rs. 15,000 and the rest Rs. 10,000 each. The Majhla Sahib was selected to receive the highest pension in consideration of his occupying a high position in the Nizam Family, and having for several years worthily represented his noble father when the latter was living in England. In addition to this allowance, his mother, Nawab Shahoon Nissa Begum Sahebah, was in the receipt of Rs. 36,000. Majhla Sahib being the only child of this lady, he enjoyed the benefits of her pension in addition to his own; and the whole of this was spent in keeping up the dignity of his position and the support of his large and growing family. This lady departed this life in January last, and as her pension was only for the term of her natural life, the poor Majhla Sahib was suddenly deprived of the bulk of his income, and put to great difficulties in consequence. He was, however, advised to lay his hard case before the Lieutenant-Governor, and his representation was backed not only by Mr. Beames, the Commissioner of the Presidency Division, but also by the Nawab Bahadur. Sir Charles Elliott, after full deliberation and in consideration of the applicant's high character and personal qualities, as well as of the claims which the Nizam Family has upon the indulgence of the British Government, has allowed him an additional Rs. 12,000 per annum, from the lapsed pension of his late mother. This act of Sir Charles has given satisfaction to the entire Nizam Family, as also to the Mahomedan community in general, who look upon the accomplished Majhla Sahib as a fine specimen of Indian nobility and who were dolefully contemplating the prospect of his inability, with his own limited income, to keep up his dignity or, what is perhaps more important, continue his unostentatious considerate charity.

IN our impression of last week, we recorded the sudden eclipse of the light of God in the person of a member of the community of Islam. We refer to the grievous deprivation of an honest Mussulman by the wanton destruction, root and branch, of a grand octogenarian beard, the iconoclast being a princeling of Oudh at Garden Reach. Like a thief at dead of night, this scapegrace of the House of Saadat Khan stole into the premises of the unhappy old man as he lay in profound slumber, and quietly scraped off his long, pending, hairy covering of the chin. Awaking the following morning he found himself shorn of his best possession. In grief and indignation he repaired to the suburban criminal court for justice. The accused, we have since learnt, is the only son of Prince Kamar Kadr, the eldest son of the late King of Oudh. It is an uncommonly scandalous act for a Mahomedan to demolish a Mahomedan's beard. Even a non-Mahomedan tribunal could not but regard it a serious outrage. The case was to have come on yesterday at the Alipore Police Court. As counsel were sure to be engaged on one side at least, perhaps on both sides, it would not have been easily or quickly disposed of. The scandal would have been all the greater. We are, therefore, glad to learn that, through the intervention of a distinguished member of the Oudh Family, the matter has been amicably settled, and the young Princeling has been saved the unpleasant consequences of his unpardonable frolic.

THE Hindoo Patriot's sneer at the Indian Daily News for publishing, day after day, those useless long telegrams from Hyderabad reporting the proceedings of that Scandal Pamphlet Case, which is of no public importance and in which the public take no interest whatever, if it is not dictated by the fox in the patriotic heart who despises and condemns all the finest fruit maturing at leisure undisturbed on the higher branches, is of a piece with the wisdom for which it has latterly become noted and fully worthy of its present conduct. The Indian Daily News might well retort upon the editorial Maha Raj Kumar with, Don't you wish you may get it?—the telegraphic supply, to wit. Assuming the good faith of the solemn admonition to the olden paper, another line of reflection suggests itself.

It is impossible to put a limit to the possibilities of human imper-spacity. Otherwise, how can any man in his senses miss the interesting character of the outgoings in the Residency Magistracy of Hyderabad, to say nothing of the importance of a litigation in which a leading official—in fact one of the Nizam's ministers and formerly his Chief Justice—whose letter to the Times has just been summarized and telegraphed from London by Reuter—who in England moved in the highest society—whose wife—the impeached Pamphlet says whose woman, or at least quondam mistress—has had the honor of being presented to Her Majesty—prosecutes a sturdy journalist who is supposed to be the mouthpiece of great personages. A case in which the Prime Minister of the Deccan has been warned to hold himself in readiness to appear in the box and stand the searching catechism of the formidable Eardley Norton, and in which the Nizam's Highness himself may yet be invited to complete the proof of justifying circumstances. Apart from general considerations one might have expected the Hindoo Patriot as a Bengali to take interest in the fate of a brother Bengali as well as a brother penman, who is undergoing a fiery ordeal in a foreign land, far away from home and kindred and friends. Truly, have we fallen in evil days on evil tongues! For our part, we with the entire public—queer Litter-Day patriots excepted—are really thankful to the Indian Daily News for its enterprise in keeping us all informed in sufficient fulness of the progress of the case from day to day. Nor is the Indian Daily News alone partial to this case. All the other morning journals worthy of the name are endeavouring to satisfy the public curiosity about this most sensational affair. But the Indian Daily News has distanced them all. Such is the interest taken by the public in this matter that the Hyderabad telegrams are the first things that most people read in the morning. Accordingly that paper is in demand above all others.

SOME weeks back we remarked on the license of speech indulged in in Burma, adducing in proof what we had read in the Morning Post of Allahabad, namely, that the Rangoon Gazette in criticising the President of the Rangoon Municipality had called Major Temple "the Prince of Liars." The Mandalay Herald, of September 1, corrects the statement so far as to say that—"It is not the Rangoon Gazette but the Rangoon Times that is daggers drawn with the Ma—jor." We print the last word as we find it, not knowing what hidden meaning may lie in such typographic presentation.

SANDALWOOD has its home in Mysore. It is entirely a Government property there, and no sandal tree can be uprooted or cut down, even in a private place, except by Government agency. But the Jahgirdar of Yelandur and the Guru of the Sringeri Mat have absolute right in those grown within their jurisdiction. The maturation period is roughly stated to be from forty to sixty years. It is to be noted that sandalwood is never attacked by white ants on account of its oil, which is principally obtained from the roots. The trunks in small pieces are put up for sale about the months of November and December, in different Kothis erected for the purpose. Excepting Mysore, a small quantity is produced in the Madras Presidency and in the Bombay districts of North Canara and Dharwar.

IN France the ushers who are in attendance at churches during weddings, must have their "tip" from the groom. In case it does not come up to their expectations, they besiege the carriage in which the newly married couple are driving away. The other day one of them disturbed a stately wedding, whereupon the police were called in, with the result that a free fight just outside the church took place between the usher and two of the Paris Force. Bakshish is not a failing of the East only.

FOR some time past we have been hearing that the Hindoo noblemen of Hyderabad have not been receiving good treatment at the hands of the present Ministry in that State. It gives us therefore much pleasure to learn from a Southern Indian journal, that in the beginning of last month the Nizam paid a State visit to Maharaja Sheoraj Dharamwant Bahadur and his brother Raja Murli Monohar Bahadur Asafjahi. It was indeed a great honor, as His Highness is not in the habit of paying such visits except to his nearest relatives. The brother Rajas belong to one of the wealthiest and most eminent families of the Deccan, their ancestor having been deputed by the Emperor of Delhi to accompany the great Asaf Jah, the first Viceroy of the Province of the Deccan after its annexation to the Empire, and to help him in its administration. Whatever may be the treatment of these noblemen by individual officials, there can be no doubt that the Nizam has great regard for the family and kindness for them. Raja Murli Monohar is moreover an Honorary A. D. C. to His Highness. He is an educated and enlightened man who takes great interest in the progress of society, literature, arts, and industries, at home and abroad. During the Consent Bill agitation he early distinguished himself by a pamphlet on Hari Maitism.

THE Nizam is at present on another such visit—to Nawab Vikarul Omra Ikbalood Dowlah Bahadur, the Revenue Minister. The Nawab is the younger brother of Nawab Ameer-i-Kubeer Shumsool Omra Sir Khurshed Jah Bahadoor, K.C.I.E., and is married to one of the sisters of His Highness. His mother was also a daughter of a former Nizam, the grandfather of the present. The Nawab has built a magnificent palace on the top of a hillock in the suburbs of Hyderabad, at the cost of many lacs of rupees. It is said to be the only palace in India that has been built in a thorough European style, with European appliances of the highest order, artists from Italy and France having been engaged for many months to decorate, embellish and furnish it. Although the construction has been completed three or four years, and the Nawab had invited His Highness to pay him a visit there, the Nizam has only now found it convenient to comply with the request. He has been living there with some members of his family as the honored guest of the Nawab, since the 24th of August last. The palace is situated in a most salubrious spot, and the Nizam is said to be very much pleased with it. People think it not unlikely that Nawab Vikarul Omra will make a present of the Palace to the Nizam. He is bound to offer it, according to etiquette.

WE had marked for reproduction the following from the Indian Daily News of the 22nd August:—

"J. H.' writing in Sala's Journal gives some interesting reminiscences of a brilliant Anglo-Indian journalist of the past—John Lang. He says:—

A question often asked has been again repeated in the papers: 'Who wrote "Plot and Passion"?' The universal reply would be, 'Tom Taylor, of course.' And undoubtedly Tom Taylor has a right to claim its parentage, but I think it is equally beyond doubt that John Lang, the author of 'Too Clever by Half,' 'The Ex-Wife,' 'Yorke, You're Wanted,' and many other clever works of fiction, assisted Tom Taylor in the composition of the play very materially. I had the pleasure of an intimate acquaintanceship with John Lang in the last years of his life, and he often alluded to the part he had taken in the production of the play, which was much more than merely suggesting an incident or two. He was the last man in the world to try and filch from the fame of others. He was a native of Australia, I believe, but studied for the English Bar, where he rapidly distinguished himself. After filling various prominent legal positions, he went to Calcutta at the advice of a relative, also an eminent barrister, and there he quickly made his mark. There must be many elderly Anglo-Indians who remember him well, or at any rate the strange stories told of him. His literary bias led him to found the Mofussilite newspaper at Meerut, and few papers have ever possessed such a distinguished list of regular contributors. The military news was always of great value, for it came direct from head-quarters, even from the Commander-in-Chief himself. The political information bore the impress of Government House. The legal was inspired by the Judges. The whole menu was ably served by Lang himself, in a manner all his own.

When the celebrated 'Gorham case' was dragging its slow length along, and every one had grown weary of the ecclesiastical inquiry, an intimate friend of John Lang's, an eminent Indian official, was staying with him as a guest, and helping him con amore with the paper. One day he asked Lang what he was going to say about this case in the forthcoming issue of the Mofussilite. An hour afterwards, Lang sent his friend a piece of paper with 'D—n the Gorham case,' inscribed upon it, and nothing more; and this he insisted upon appearing in leaded type in a space by itself in the leader column. Not long afterwards, John Lang received a letter from the Governor-General of the period cordially endorsing the 'article' as being to his mind the best and most satisfactory leader he had ever read upon the wearisome subject.

[The above is not the usually accepted version, which is, that Lang asked a friend to write for the journal, who excused himself as not having a subject, but was open to suggestion. Lang probably in a spirit of mischief suggested the Gorham case, one of which the papers and the public were sick. The response was a note in reply—'The Gorham case. D—n the Gorham case.' This was published as the first leader much to the astonishment of the contributor and the amusement of the public.—ED., I. D. N.]

One incident in his life John Lang was always especially proud of, and that was his defence of Jotee Pershad, the Army contractor, who was arraigned for malversation of his accounts to a very paltry extent, even if true John Lang made a brilliant defence of many hour's duration, and Jotee Pershad conferred on Mr. Lang a present of a lakh of rupees, then nearer worth £10,000 than it would be now. Alack a day! It was said that several more lakhs were added to the first during the year which followed, for John Lang was never possessed of more than he required, and he was a sorry financier.

Lang was a fine classical scholar. Horace was his favourite author, and he seemed to know him line for line from beginning to end. As a Sanscrit scholar I doubt if he had his equal among Englishmen of his time in India. His writings, such as I have enumerated, were but a paper reflex of his abilities. His story of 'Yorke, You're Wanted,' while amusing everybody, worked a deal of good. It told of a friend sending his wife home and placing her in charge of Yorke, a brother officer, and of the miserable experiences the latter had of it with the wife and her two untrained and unmannerly children. There was a deal too much of this friendly service exacted in those days by one friend from another, and that which at first appeared a handsome compliment usually turned out an unsufferable nuisance. 'Yorke, You're wanted' helped to check this evil at any rate.

In the list of literary Anglo-Indians, John Lang will always hold an honoured place, and a still larger one in the hearts of those friends who yet survive him."

"J. H." we take it, is Mr. James Hutton, a most brilliant writer who had been to India at least twice to conduct Indian newspapers. On the first occasion he was connected with the Press Upper India, and was a journalist at Meerat itself.

Lang was a prolific penman, and wrote some clever stories, but he oftener published trash. More dreary writing we scarcely read than one or two novelettes which appeared in a series of fiction of one of the London publishers of cheap literature. His Wanderings in India, originally contributed to Dickens' Household Words, though disfigured by the prejudices of the day, is still pleasant reading, and ought to be better known. His forte lay in sketches of men and manners, narratives of personal experiences, and so on. He was one of the luckiest Indian newspaper-owners and editors. He founded the Mofussilite, with liberal assistance from influential friends no doubt but under the most adverse circumstances of the time—circumstances which he has himself left on record with his brilliant pen. And, though a bad financier as J. H. says, he managed and edited it into a notable success. But the paper made way by its enterprise and independence, its early intelligence, civil and military, and the contributions of officers and officials, as much as by the funny flippancies of his own pen. He had wit and humour and any amount of "cheek." His bold profanity on the Gorham case was a stroke of genius. Yet he lacked calibre as a journalist. His brilliancy was of a loose scrappy sort. In spite of his great success in the case of Jotee Persad, he could scarcely have been a learned writer. J. H.'s testimony to his Greek scholarship comes on us as a surprise. His papers in Household Words show his acquaintance with Bland's Anthology and no more. He is more at home in English poetry. But it is hard to believe that he knew the veriest rudiments of Sanskrit. His writings give abundant negative proof of his innocence. His Wanderings shows him not only without any sympathy for the religion and manners of the people of India but very much of a raw Qui Hye in regard to them.

THE American Bison threatens to be extinct. According to the Illustrated London News, within the last twenty-five years the race numbered roughly six millions. After the completion of the Union Pacific Railway, which divided their land, about four millions were in the north and the rest in the south. In ten years more, the northerners became limited to twenty, and of the southerners two hundred were carefully protected in the Yellowstone Park. It is supposed that five hundred more exist in British territory. A collection of the bones of these animals gave a pile of eight hundred feet long, eight feet wide and seven and half feet high. There is a trade on the bones, and they are shipped for conversion into bone ash for sugar-refining. The absolute extinction of the species may yet be prevented, for they can breed with success in confinement. These half breeds are not so ferocious and can be utilized for various purposes.

WE have never helped to keep the public mind in a ferment of anxieties and apprehensions with premature, not to say idle, speculations regarding our North-Western and Northern Frontiers. But we are at last face to face with facts. The military preparations cannot be ignored.

A rather considerable Field Force has been organised under the command of General Lockhart to concentrate at Darband on the first of next month, for the purpose of chastising the Trans-Indus clans who, in breach of their pledge given at Seri in May 1891, have harboured Hashim Ali Khan of Seri. The Press, with its proneness to distrust, more than hints that the real object is different, specially as orders have been given for the whole First Army Corps to be in readiness. It is truly said that so much powder and shot cannot be required for bringing those petty clans to their senses. It is, therefore, suspected that the real objective is Afghanistan or the Pamirs. We believe the suspicion is gratuitous. The Czar has by his pacific attitude relieved us of immediate anxiety with respect to Russia. Nor can our Government be in a hurry to go to war with the Ameer. But in these critical times it is necessary to strengthen ourselves in Afghanistan and indeed throughout the frontiers generally. In Abdur Rahman Khan's present unhappy temper, we cannot be said to be strong with him. There is no knowing that he is with us at all. On that point there ought to be no doubt. If necessary, he must be coerced into a good boy, or stamped out. There is no desire for war, and it may be to avoid it that the Government of India is showing that it is in earnest and is able to exact deference. These military preparations must have a salutary effect on all allies and dependents as well as foes on the frontiers. If after all, war could not be avoided, we should be all the better for our preparations.

DACOITY is raging in all parts of the country. In Kattywar the bud-mashes went so far as to loot the Police records. But the most serious news in the connection is that Thaggi—that dread old form of highway murder for robbery—has again raised its head. The Revival has taken place in Oudh, whence several genuine cases are reported.

THE CHOLERA IN CASHMERE.

THE Happy Valley labours under an unhappy liability to the visitation of the Cholera. Not to stray to the dim traditionary past, within the last half century Cashmere (or Kashmir as it is now-a-days spelt) has suffered from epidemics of this dire disease at least five times. The first outbreak occurred as long ago as the year 1843. There was a long respite after that. What was the cause or causes of the protracted immunity we do not know; it would be instructive to discover them. It is certain that nearly a quarter of a century elapsed before the poor inhabitants of Cashmere once more made the acquaintance of the Epidemic Cholera. Since then the visit of the scourge has been more frequent, with more regular intervals of about a decade, rather more or less. The next appearance was twelve years after, in 1879, and again in nine years more there was another, in 1888. Lastly, in less than half the last interval—in fact before three full years had scarcely passed away—there was yet another: we refer to the present—we hope we may call it the late epidemic of 1892. It is clear from this chronological series that the duration of immunity of this Alpine country is becoming small not by degrees but rather by leaps and bounds, until there has been two attacks of epidemic within four years. This surely is a serious state of things and it behoves the Maharaja's Government as well as the enlightened and benevolent Paramount Power which rules over the destinies of the whole Indian Continent, including the Native States, to make searching inquiry into the phenomenon. It is important to ascertain whether any general causes are at work inducing a progressive deterioration of the health of the Valley and its people.

Surgeon-Colonel R. Harvey, who had been deputed by the Government of India to Cashmere to investigate the subject, read in July last an interesting paper, at the British Medical Association, on the origin and spread of the Cholera Epidemic of 1888 at Srinagar, Cashmere, and the measures adopted to mitigate the sufferings of the poor. He expresses his disbelief in the air-borne theory of Cholera. So far so good. Unfortunately, he has not been able to free himself from the prejudices of the profession. He still clings to the notion of the transportation of epidemic by human commerce. If he does not tremble at the cholera in the (h)air, he suspects it in the clothes. Such is his explanation of the outbreak in Cashmere, and he points to the facilities offered since the opening of the Jhilm Valley Road. He forgets that this importation requires for its manifestation a suitable soil for the growth of the disease germs. Of course, he ignores the fact that Cholera can arise de novo, independent of introduction from without. According to him, a first introduction is essential before an outbreak. A changed sanitary condition, as the gradual deposition of filth, silting up the beds of rivers or tanks, or insufficient supply of water, &c., is not enough to generate a new kind of disease. At any rate, there must be a carrier of poison. Still a certain pre-existing cell, spirillum or bacillus is necessary. But there is another greater factor—evolution, at the bottom of all these for the progressive development of disease. It completely, though insidiously, changes the nature of the organism. In course of time, this gradual change is manifested, establishing a new form quite different from the pre-existing phenomenon. In regard to the Cholera, India has unfortunately got a bad name. Lower Bengal in especial is unalterably fixed in the Western imagination as the original home and still the constant habitat of the Cholera. The learned among the European doctors have strengthened the notion by identifying the ancient visuchika with the modern Cholera. That identification, however, will scarcely stand serious examination, notwithstanding the easy acceptance of ignorant Hindus. Dr. Mahendralal Sircar, in his Calcutta Journal of Medicine, has effectually combated this notion. The symptoms of visuchika and cholera are not alike. Fever, vomiting, and diarrhoea are the prominent symptoms of the one disease, whereas suppression of urine, rice water stool and collapse are the characteristics of the other. There are certain abnormalities common to both, but the points of contrast proclaim them quite distinct from each other. The differences are too many, too important, and too glaring for confounding one with another. It is as yet unknown whether visuchika has transformed itself gradually into modern Cholera, or whether the Cholera has been introduced into this country by foreigners. Supposing it to have been so brought over, suspicion lies more on China than any other country as the exporter. It has also been asserted that Cholera existed in Egypt long before it was known in India, and the land of the Pharaohs may have something to do with the outspread of this disease. At any rate, there is no data before us to conclude that India is the home of Cholera from the ancient times. Those who do not pretend to pursue the subject so far into the mist of ages are still content to assign India as the home of the disease in quite modern times. This is an unfortunate assumption. They hold that in times not far from our own—almost within the memory of the oldest inhabitant—the Cholera from its centre in Bengal travelled West to Europe and made the tour of the globe, scourging the nations in its track. There is no adequate warrant for this assertion which has become an article of creed with the faculty. The evidence offered is not only poor but conflicting. And we have every hope that before long this notion will be abandoned like many another equally cherished beliefs in the domain of medicine.

Dr. Harvey justly says that "the true method of dealing with cholera and all allied diseases is to make them impotent for evil by such sanitary measures as shall make it impossible for them to flourish if introduced." In support, he cites the instances of Fort William and other large cantonments in Upper India where cholera used to prevail vigorously before. Believing in the efficacy of quarantine, he doubts its practicability both on sea and on land and especially in the latter. A few years before, quarantine was the panacea of the hygienists, but they have to abandon it not only on account of the hardship it entails but for its absolute failure. They stuck fast to the sea quarantine to the last, but even at enormous expense this measure did not prove useful. If trade is to be carried on regularly, delay is dangerous and so quarantine cannot be insisted on to its full extent. For this reason, the Sanitary Conference at Venice failed and that at Paris succeeded after considerable difficulty. It is not far distant when quarantine must give way to local sanitary improvements. They took hold of the wrong view and with the usual obstinacy of scientific men are still spending time and money uselessly after their big hobby. The death-knell has been pronounced on quarantine.

From the struggle of contending theories, let us turn to the sphere of ascertained facts. With regard to the sanitary outlook in Cashmere, the capital, Srinagar, is one of the filthiest town imaginable. The Judicial Member of the Maharaja's Council and the Chief Medical Officer have condemned city and citizens in no measured terms in their reports. The latter officer states that "the Kashmiris are notoriously filthy and negligent of even personal cleanliness. They care not how impure is the water they drink and how dirty the house they live in. Srinagar is a badly built town, with no drainage and peopled by one of the most dirty races on the face of the earth. The result is that the soil is saturated with the filth of ages and surface-cleansing is partially impossible and partially neglected. Barustal-gus (filth at the door) is proverbially admitted to be a mark of affluence. Human ordure is scattered broadcast all over the town. From the roads and houses on the river bank drains carrying slush filth and sewage empty into the river, in which the washermen wash their unclean clothes, the dyers wash their dyes and the butchers entrails of animals. The consequence is that the water of the river, as it flows through the city is little better than liquid sewage." The Committee to investigate the epidemic of 1888 also endorse the same view: "The majority of the inhabitants use the public streets or lanes or the court-yards of their own houses for the purpose of nature. This has been going on from time immemorial and consequently the soil is contaminated to a degree by the accumulation of the filth. Private houses with some few exceptions have no privy, and even these few privies are seldom cleansed. Year after year this evil has been growing, as the removal of filth is a thing unknown." Such is the dismal picture portrayed of Srinagar by the officers of the State of Cashmere themselves, and it is high time that these evils should be put a stop to.

Dr. Harvey thinks that he has traced the importation of the epidemic of 1888 by the Maharaja's camp. The first case was at Domel on April 24, and the one at Srinagar occurred on the 6th of May. A boatman from Baramulla carried the infection and on the same day there were six deaths at that place.

The rest of the paper is devoted to the attempts made to mitigate the sufferings of the diseased and to prevent the spread of the epidemic. Then it recommends the following improvements.

(1). A survey of the city with a view to the prevention of floods, and the working out of a general plan of improvement to be carried into effect piecemeal whenever a great flood or fire or earthquake makes it possible to Hausmannise any particular quarter.

(2). The rebuilding of the burnt out quarter upon strictly sanitary lines, with wide main streets, and all lanes and alleys wide enough to permit the passage of conservancy carts.

(3). A systematic attempt to place the conservancy of Srinagar on a proper footing by the provision of public and private latrines, and an efficient system of scavenging.

(4). A supply of pure water distributed in pipes throughout the city, with hydrants at such short intervals as shall take away all temptation to use and all excuse for using any other water.

(5). The deepening of existing canals, and the provision of means for flushing them, so as to remove as much as possible all sources of impurity. In connection with this a scheme of surface drainage to carry off rain water.

(6). The prohibition of further burials within the city and the provision of new grave-yards outside.

(7). The provision of play-grounds and open spaces as lungs for the city.

(8). The relegation of cow-houses, tanneries, and slaughter-houses to the suburbs.

(9). The forbidding of the digging of holes—which are rapidly converted into middens to obtain earth for building purposes, and the filling up of the hundreds already existing.

THE HYDERABAD DEFAMATION CASE.

THE CASE FOR THE PROSECUTION.

In the Residency Bazaar Court, before Mr. O. V. Bosanquet, C.S., Second Assistant Resident and Magistrate, the first hearing came on Monday, the 29th August, of the case in which Nawab Mehdi Hassan Fattey Nawaz Jung charges Mr. S. M. Mitra with defamation in a pamphlet entitled "A Shocking Social Scandal" purporting to have been printed at Lucknow and to have been written by one "Bakir Hussain, Aminabad, Lucknow." The complainant is the Home Secretary of the Nizam's Government. The accused, showily dressed in Hyderabad fashion, with a gold and jewelled swordbelt, was a conspicuous figure beside his counsel, Mr. Eardley Norton, of the Madras Bar, instructed by Mr. Edgell, solicitor of the Bombay High Court. Mr. Inverarity, of the Bombay bar, instructed by Messrs. Forbes, Gribble and Fitzpatrick, local pleaders, appeared for the prosecution.

The Magistrate having taken his seat, Mr. Inverarity at once rose and opened the case. The defamation complained of, he said, was contained in a pamphlet, printed on the 13th of March last, by the order of the accused and published in April. It was of two kinds, as both Mr. and Mrs. Mehdi Hassan were attacked therein. Mr. Mehdi Hassan only prosecutes on the present occasion, leaving for another occasion the defamation on his wife. To sum up shortly the main defamatory allegations in that pamphlet are: (1) That Mr. and Mrs. Mehdi Hassan were never married; (2) that well knowing she was a loose woman he palmed her off as his wife; and (3) that sending his alleged wife to certain officials, and specially to the late Sir Salar Jung II., it was by her influence, thus obtained, that he became Home Secretary of the

Nizam's Government. Counsel would prove that all and each of these allegations were absolutely untrue. Mr. Mehdi Hassan made the acquaintance of his wife in her father's house before he was married; since then and before she led a perfectly pure and respectable life; that the marriage was perfectly a valid one, and, above all, that Mr. Mehdi Hassan has all along asserted and believed it to be so, and does so at the present moment. Among the first things to be noticed in the pamphlet is that it purports to be issued by a person who avowedly wishes to be responsible for his statements. He gives his name. Inured to the pleasures of the zonana, he has himself, he says, enjoyed this lady's favours; he declares himself to have been a pupil of the Canning College, and it was her position, he asserts, in Hyderabad society into which he was introduced when here on a visit that prompted him to write what he did. But all the circumstances so suggestive of truth are entirely false. The name is a fictitious one; no such person was ever known to Mr. Mehdi Hassan or his wife; no pupil of the name was ever at the Canning College, and no such person as a visitor to Hyderabad had been ever heard of in society there. All this is, of course, very material in the event of any attempt at justification, if good faith is to be proved. Mr. Inverarity here referred in some detail to the reasons alleged in the pamphlet itself for its publication, and laid emphasis on the fact that while apparently courting on the document the fullest inquiry, the most absolute and systematic precautions were taken for concealing not only the real authors, but even Mitra's connection with the defamation. The political character of this vile document will also be observed from the fact that it was written two years before it was published. The state of the political atmosphere did not favour its publication at that time. We get at this fact by undesigned and intrinsic evidence in the pamphlet itself. The real object of the attack was, of course, the Ministry of Sir Asman Jah, but the conspirators were evidently afraid then to use the weapon they had so carefully prepared. That this pamphlet was really written in 1890 is seen from p. 3, where the writer refers to the events of 1872 and 1873 as "eighteen years ago"—the period that is when some of the pupils mentioned were in fact as stated, at the Canning College. And if among these pupils there was no Mirza Bakir Hussain capable of writing this pamphlet, there was another person there, who in his person answers to the description Mirza Fakir Hussain gives of himself. This person openly mentioned elsewhere in the pamphlet as having also enjoyed this lady's favours is Mr. Syed Ali Belgrami; he, indeed, was at the Canning College in 1873, and went up for his degree and was plucked, and the events of his career otherwise correspond to the description of the fictitious Bakir Hussain. Under Section 105 of the Evidence Act, the onus of proving the fact that brings the defence within the exceptions in the Penal Code falls, of course, upon the accused. Most of the persons mentioned in the pamphlet are present and available in Hyderabad, and we will look to the accused to put all these persons in the witness box. When Syed Ali Belgrami comes into that box, if he ever dares to come there, I shall have some very ugly questions to ask him about this Bakir Hussain, and the similarity of that personage's experience to the events of his own life. The accused Mitra is, of course, only a fool in the hands of the real persons intriguing against the Nizam's Government behind him, hoping that through the Home Secretary they will injure and damage the entire Ministry. Another point is that no less than nine persons are alleged in the pamphlet to have been criminally intimate with Mrs. Mehdi Hassan. First, we have the writer himself and three others—the joint-stock company, of these, Mahomed Akbar Khan is in the Nizam's Police. We must see that the defence calls him. Another person is Rafi-ud-din, who is a brother or cousin of Nawab Sarwar Jung—another very important gentleman in this case, whose presence in the witness-box, on behalf of the accused, I look forward to with particular concern, as I hope to extract from him some interesting information regarding the authorship of this vile pamphlet. On p. 5 the names of three more persons are given, who either enjoyed this lady's favours, or are perfectly acquainted with all her antecedents. Among these are Sarwar Jung himself and Syed Hussain Belgrami and Syed Ali Belgrami, while the ninth person is Shuja-at-Ali. I have already alluded to the particulars so fictitiously circumstantial which place the defamation in the most malicious manner possible. It purports to be both written under the writer's own signature, who is only too willing to come forward to support his statements. Two of these nine persons wrote at once absolutely denying the allegations concerning them, and Syed Hassan and Shuja-at Ali will come here to entirely repudiate all connection with, and knowledge of, the circumstances mentioned concerning them in the pamphlet. As to the seven others, we will expect to see them here in the witness-box called on behalf of the defendant. No other evidence will do, if that mentioned in the pamphlet itself is deliberately withheld when the persons are present and their evidence available in Hyderabad. With reference to the truth of these allegations, I may again repeat that it is absolutely untrue that Mrs. Mehdi Hassan was other than a perfectly pure and respectable woman when my client offered to marry her; and after the marriage she has continued to live with him, wherever he was living, always as his honourable and faithful wife. I am reluctant even to suppose such a thing, but even if Mrs. Mehdi Hassan were such as she is alleged to have been, it would not affect the charge against Mitra, unless he can prove Mehdi Hassan's complaisance, and that he acted with the knowledge he is alleged to have acted with. Even if these allegations were true nothing but a feeling of loathing and disgust arise to see these things raked up after twenty years. Mrs. Mehdi Hassan's father was Captain Donnelly, a retired Warrant Officer from the Ordnance or Commissariat Department, who, like other respectable lads (?)—and might have done worse in his youth. His brother, more fortunate, was a Deputy Surgeon on the Madras side. Her mother was the daughter of Captain Mitchel. In 1872 she was living with her father at Lucknow, when Mehdi Hassan made their acquaintance, and where the affection between them began, which has happily continued unabated to the present day. The father objected to his daughter marrying Mehdi Hassan, and she returned with her father to the Punjab, where she lived with him up to the day of his death in 1873. After that event she corresponded with Mehdi Hassan again when she was living with her friend, Mrs. Evans, at Delhi. Mr. and Mrs. Evans are still living, and I shall probably apply for a commission to examine them. While living there the marriage was arranged for, and Miss Donnelly was brought to Lucknow by Mrs. Evans, where after Mehdi Hassan's return from Jubbulpur the ceremony was gone through. Two witnesses were present and signed the contract of marriage; another of the attesting witnesses arrived too late for the ceremony, but signed the contract. His relatives were naturally opposed to his marrying a person not of his own race, but Miss Donnelly became a Mahomedan before marriage, and for nine or ten years observed purdah. Later on, however, she has been attending Christian places of worship. This contract of marriage is signed by both Mr. Mehdi Hassan and his wife and attested, first by the witnesses of the marriage, and afterwards by three others, two of these Mehdi Hassan's uncles and the third a near relative. Of these attesting witnesses Inayat Ali is, unfortunately for us, dead, and yet the event is perhaps not so unfortunate, for as we can prove his signature, that fact itself, the death having occurred so many years ago, will go a long way to prove the genuineness of the document. Moreover, the marriage was never kept a secret. Within a week all his relatives were informed of it, and from the time of the marriage Mrs. Mehdi Hassan was recognised and visited by all the best Mahomedan families as his wife. Then we come to Hyderabad, where Mr. and Mrs. Mehdi Hassan have always lived in the full light of the public eye. It is impossible, therefore, that she could have carried on a career of infamy, and, if she did there can be no difficulty in calling the host of minor officials who were criminally intimate with her, and proving that Mehdi Hassan was her accomplice. There is another matter I would refer to, one of the allegations reflects on the character of a nobleman now dead, and it is stated that through her influence it was that Salar Jung advanced Mehdi Hassan to be Home Secretary; that they were seen together at all hours of the day and night. I need hardly go any further at present. If there is any attempt at justification, I shall of course claim to call witnesses in reply, for it is impossible at this stage to foresee what case the defendant is going to set up, or what witnesses he will call. The first that should be called are, of course, those named in the pamphlet. If not called, we shall have the natural inference from their absence, and if they come into the witness-box, we hope to have the falsehood of the statements in the pamphlet shown out of their own mouths. I may say again that we have made enquiries at the Canning College. It is alleged that three of the four persons who formed the "joint-stock company" for keeping Miss Donnelly went up for their degree and were plucked; the result, it is suggested, of their debauched conduct and neglect of their books; we have ascertained that no such person as Bakir Hussain was at the Canning College in those years; that Rafi-ud-din was there, but never went up for a degree, and therefore was not plucked; that Yusuf-ud-din did go for his degree and was plucked; and that Mahomed Akbar Khan was not a student at all, and of course, was not plucked. I do not expect to see him here, but if I do, we may learn something from the coincidence. Anyhow, it is curious, that Syed Ali Belgrami did go up for his degree that year and that he was plucked; that he is no fictitious person, but is now in Hyderabad. This, of course, does not enable us to proceed against him, but the fact is important. There is another person also whom we cannot prosecute; Nawab Sarwar Jung is not within the jurisdiction of this Court, but belongs to the Nizam's household, and his Highness has not given permission to do so as yet. I may say that the whole procedure adopted in regard to this pamphlet negatives good faith. The proper course would be, supposing the writer to be actuated by the motives alleged in the pamphlet, to report the matter to the Nizam, to the Minister, or to the Resident instead of posting large quantities of the pamphlet from Bombay to Hyderabad to every official and every Mess and Club and to other parts of India. The object was, of course, a political one—to ruin Mehdi Hassan, and through him to ruin the Nizam's Ministry. It was of course known that Mehdi Hassan was not at the time in Hyderabad, and we all know that if a lie has half an hour's start the truth seldom overtakes it, and most men are unfortunately only too ready to believe scandal, and evil of others. As to the accused, we know he is a mere tool well paid, as we shall show, to receive and endure the imprisonment to which he may be sentenced. I shall call evidence to prove that he was even prepared to sell the opposite party, his own friends, if he was paid his own price for it.

A ROAD FROM COOLPY TO CHANNEL CREEK.

Baboo Prasad Dutt of No. 1, Sickdarparah Lane, Calcutta, has circulated to those interested the following letter:—

I beg to submit the following facts for your consideration:

2. After years of fruitless endeavours for securing an easy means of communication with that vast tract of the country below Coolpy, in the subdivision of Diamond Harbour, 24-Pergunnahs,

Raja Peary Mohun the marginally noted grantees of Sagor Island* have at last succeeded in securing the following expression of opinion,

Messrs. Cally Coomar Mondol and Co. and my humble self, from the Government on the subject: "From the letter from the Board of Revenue cited in the preamble, it appears that the allegation of the petitioners that not a rupee of the cesses raised within the District is expended on Sagor Island, is substantially correct. So far, therefore, the petitioners seem to have a just ground of complaint against the District Road Committee of the 24-Pergunnahs. The Board of Revenue will be requested to impress upon the Committee the necessity of allowing the Sagor Island an adequate proportion of the grant for village roads, having regard to the other demands upon the District Road fund and to the claims of other parts of the District."

3. The District Board of the 24-Pergunnahs with the object of giving effect to the above cited Government Resolution have been since making an annual grant for the Sagor Island roads. The Chairman of the Board in reply to my enquiry was pleased to say as follows:—"Rs. 1,000 was provided for in the current year's budget for improvement of communications in Sagor Island, but as the amount has not been drawn by the grantees, it has again been entered in the budget for 1886-87, together with an additional sum of Rs. 475. The total amount thus available for expenditure in Sagor Island during the ensuing cess year is Rs. 1,475."

4. On this the District Engineer of the 24-Pergunnahs recommended certain allotments of the above sums for repairing village roads of the five grants in the Island, and the Chairman of the Board was pleased to ask my opinion on the subject.

5. Believing, as I do, that the question of public good is of much more importance than seeking the interests of our individual grants, I submitted to the Chairman the following proposal, namely, that out of the annual allotments for the improvement of communications in Sagor Island the question of the construction of a fair weather road in the main land from the top of Channel Creek river to Coolpy should have prior consideration, as the construction of this road, it is hoped, will provide a desirable, safe and continuous link to inland communication with the town. I also pointed out that although the grant was too small, it would be better expended if a commencement was made of this road, and it was gradually expended from future annual grants. I also submitted to him that if he thought it undesirable to commence a big project with so small a grant, either the annual allotments might be set apart as a separate fund for the construction of this road and when a respectable sum had accrued the work might be taken in hand, or it might be reserved to meet the payment of interest. From borrowed capital the work may be undertaken. I also expressed to him my belief that annual voluntary contributions equal to the amount of road cess payment can be had for the construction of this road from those who are interested in its construction, if the amount of the cess of the locality, which will be benefited by this road, be exclusively expended in the construction thereof. I further informed him that if the apportionment of the present grant in no way prejudiced the interest of the most important question about the construction of the proposed road I might then submit my views on the question put to me.

6. Mr. Forbes, the then Chairman of the District Board, with his wonted love for fairness, took up the subject in right earnest, and had a resolution passed, an extract from which, as has been communicated to me, is as follows:—

"The proposal of Babu Prasad Doss Dutt, one of the grantees of Sagor Island, for the construction of a fair weather road from the Coolpy Road to the northern part of Channel Creek was then brought forward for discussion; resolved that the construction of a road from Coolpy to Channel Creek being very desirable the Board will be prepared to undertake the work provided the grantees agree to subscribe one-half of the cost, and that on their concluding arrangements in this respect with the Board, provision be made in the budget for 1888-89 and 1889-90 to carry out the work."

7. For the purposes of ascertaining the views of the parties to be benefited by the proposed road as to the question of raising half the cost as required by the District Board, a meeting was held at the Diamond Harbour subdivisional office, but only four persons attended the same; however, it was resolved that those who will be benefited by this road should pay twice the amount of cesses which they pay and give up the land required for the road free of all charges.

8. The Chairman of the District Board has been pleased to inform me that an estimate and plan of the proposed road is now ready, and the cost of the road has been estimated at Rs. 31,520 including cost of the land to be acquired, Rs. 12,480. I was asked what plan I would propose to adopt for ascertaining the views of the Zemindars concerned as regards the land required for the road. I have also been informed that the Chairman is desirous of asking the Zemindars concerned to attend a meeting or circulate a letter on the subject of the land.

9. In my reply to the Chairman I have pointed out the difficulties of moffassil men to attend the meeting, and give a decisive opinion on the subject without mastering the full facts of the case. I therefore suggested that a history of the past proceedings should be conveyed by a circular letter to all the parties to be benefited by the road, asking them to communicate their views within a given time, and then to hold a meeting to discuss the question. I have not heard what steps have been taken on the subject.

10. I have also quite recently drawn the attention of the Chairman to the fact that the proposed road is intended to be commenced and terminated on the mainland, thus the residents of the northern portion of Sagor Island even cannot therefore expect to reap equal direct advantages with the residents of the mainland on whose lands it would be constructed, whilst the residents of my Dhoibat estate, being further separated by about 20 miles of dense jungle from the last inhabited quarter of the northern part of the island, can expect little or no advantage; nevertheless the grantees of Sagor Island have not only consented that the annual grants sanctioned for the village roads of Sagor Island should be transferred for the construction of this road in the mainland, but have also offered to pay in addition 5,812-9-6, the two years' cesses they pay for Sagor Island. This shows that they are not selfish in any way. I have, therefore, submitted that if the residents of the locality over which the road is to pass refuse to bear their portion of the just burden, and if the District Board do not take into consideration that the locality below Coolpy (which has not a single road, but is annually contributing at least on account of cesses Rs. 20,324-6-6 without receiving any return whatever) is justly entitled to this road which has been estimated to cost Rs. 31,520, with such contributions which may be got from the people and the provincial fund, then the question of the construction of this road must drop, and the sum at credit of the village roads in Sagor Island should be expended on legitimate purposes for which they are sanctioned.

11. I am now asked to ascertain the views of the parties who own lands on the line of the proposed road, or who would be benefited by its construction, and a list of the names of those gentlemen has been sent to me. I have, therefore, taken the liberty to address you on the subject.

12. Need I say that the proposed road will be of much benefit to the poor residents of the locality below Coolpy. It is unnecessary to dilate on this point. It will facilitate the opening out of bats and marts, thus bringing in direct returns to the Zemindars concerned and enhancing the income and the value of their properties. I say nothing regarding the luxury of doing good to the poor rayyets of this backward locality who have an undoubted claim for assistance in such a matter from their landlords. We all know that the fund at the disposal of the District Board is not adequate for the full requirements of the District, and if we were to insist on the actual fulfilment of the following behest of the Right Honorable the Secretary of State for India "that the benefit to be derived from the rates should be brought home to their (people's) doors—that these benefits should be palpable, direct, immediate," an ugly question for the general enhancement of the local cess arises. Sir Rivers Thompson, in his Tarkessur speech, clearly pointed this out. I therefore think it prudent to offer voluntary contributions and get the important and urgent works carried out quietly. May I request you to be good enough to express your views as to what contribution you will be pleased to make in aid of the construction of the proposed road regarding (a) free gift of all the lands within your zemindari that might be necessary for the construction of the road (b) and cash contribution.

13. I request you will be good enough to express your views within one month and send it to the care of the Vice-Chairman, District Board, 24-Pergunnahs, Alipur, to enable me to submit a report on this subject to the Chairman of the District Board for a final settlement of the question one way or the other. I may say that he will be very glad to call a meeting if the majority of the gentlemen to be benefited by the proposed road are disposed to attend the same.

Holloway's Ointment and Pills.—Indisputable Remedies.—In the use of these medicaments there need be no hesitation or doubt of their cooling, healing, and purifying properties. The Ointment stands univalled for the facility it displays in relieving, healing, and thoroughly curing the most inveterate sores and ulcers, and in cases of bad legs and bad breasts they act as a charm. The Pills are the most effectual remedy ever discovered for the cure of liver complaints, diseases most disastrous in their effects, deranging all the proper functions of the organs affected, inducing restlessness, melancholy, weariness, inability to sleep, and pain in the side, until the whole system is exhausted. These wonderful Pills, if taken according to the printed directions accompanying each box, strike at the root of the malady, stimulate the stomach and liver into a healthy action, and effect a complete cure.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

TRANSLATIONS FROM HEINE.

BY THEODORE MARTIN.

"Ich stand in dunkeln Träumen."

I STOOD on her picture gazing,
And backward my dark dreams ran,
And the dear, dear face before me
To live somehow began.

Her lips, around them gathered
A smile in some wondrous wise,
And tears as of yearning sadness
Stood glistening in her eyes.

And down my cheeks the tears, too,
Flowed on in unbidden stream;
And oh, that I've lost thee, darling,
Seems only a wildered dream.

"Warum sind die Rosen so blass?"

WHY are the roses so wan of hue,
Oh, say to me, darling, why?
And why, love, why is the violet blue,
In the green, green grass so shy?

The lark, why sings he so sad a chime,
As he soars in the sky o'erhead?
Why, why exhales from the fragrant thyme
An odour as of the dead?

Why wears the sun all the livelong day
A look of such chill and gloom?
Oh why is the earth so ashen-grey,
And desolate as a tomb?

And why so heart-sick and sad am I?
Oh say, love, why this should be!
Oh say, my heart's very darling, why
Hast thou forsaken me?

"Liebe, sollst mir heute sagen?"

SAY, love, art thou not a vision?
Speak, for I to know were fain,—
Such as summer hours Elysian
Breed within the poet's brain?

Nay, a mouth of such completeness,
Eyes of such bewitching flame,
Girl so garnered round with sweetness,
Never did a poet frame.

Vampires, basilisks, chimeras,
Dragons, monsters, all the dire
Creatures of the fable era,
Quicken in the poet's fire.

But thyself, so artful-artless,
Thy sweet face, thy tender eyes,
With their looks so fond, so heartless,
Never poet could devise.

LORELEY.

I CANNOT imagine what daunts me,
And makes me feel eerie and low:
A legend, it troubles, it haunts me,
A legend of long ago.

The air chills, day is declining,
And smoothly Rhine's waters run,
And the peaks of the mountains are shining
Aloft in the setting sun.

A maiden of wondrous seeming,
Most beautiful sits, see, there!
Her jewels in gold are gleaming,
She combs out her golden hair.

With a comb of red gold she parts it,
And still as she combs it, she sings;
As the melody falls on our hearts, it
With power as of magic stings.

With a spasm the boatman hears it,
Out there in his little skiff;
He sees not the reef, as he nears it,
He only looks up to the cliff.

The waters will sweep, I am thinking,
O'er skiff, ay, and boatman ere long;
And this is, when daylight is sinking,
What Loreley did with her song.

THE ELF-KING'S YOUNGEST DAUGHTER.

DOWN the merry streamlet dancing,
Through the flickering shadows glancing,
Foam about her white feet creaming,
All her wayward hair out-streaming,
Laughing on the laughing water,
Dances down the Elf-King's daughter—
Youngest daughter fair.

All the trees bend low toward her,
All the rocks are strong to guard her,
All the little grasses whisper,
And the low-toned breezes lisp her
Praises everywhere.

All around the warm air lingers
Lovingly, the while her fingers,

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given, any other being unnecessary and likely to cause confusion.

With a dainty upward gesture,
Seem to draw a shade for vesture
Of her loveliness.

Yet meseems she moves so purely,
Gliding on her path demurely,
Looking with clear eyes serenely,
She were clad not half so queenly
In a royal dress.

Now she's lightly onward sweeping,—
Now she stays half-glad, half-fearing,
O'er the ledge of granite peering,
Eyes the headlong torrent leaping—
Eyes far down the sullen boulders,
While the long locks round her shoulders
Gather tenderly.

Now with little laugh a-tremble,
Glad her shrinking to dissemble,
Flashing through the diamond shower
With her white feet launched below her,
And her hair drawn out above her,
Swift as lady to her lover
Down the fall goes she.

Now when quiet night has clouded
All the river board and stately,
Down the stream she rides sedately,
By her soft hair warmly shrouded,
Lulled by melody.

Down amid the dim trees greeting,
And the drowsy wheat's repeating,
Dreaming on the dreaming water
Floats the Elf-king's youngest daughter
To the dreaming sea.

WEEKLYANA.

THE Lancet urges legislative action to prevent boys from smoking. We say ditto.

WE read in the Hindoo Patriot of the 12th September,

"The Afghan, says the Indian proverb, holds the first rank in duplicity."

There is no such proverb, Indian or extra-Indian.

SOME honest, far from over-burdened wight has been calculating that—

"Should Queen Victoria live another year, she will have reigned longer than any English monarch, except George III. Fifty-six years was the length of Henry III's reign, and the Queen was crowned fifty-five years ago."

AT Tel-el Amarna, a literary collection has been found—a regular Babylonian Library 3,500 years old.

SIR Edwin Arnold has unearthed one of the noblest romances of the East, the "Story of Adzuma," on which he has written a four-act play in blank verse. He hopes to bring it out at Chicago during the World's Fair. Sir Edwin has written for the American Press a fervid and beautiful introduction to the "Story of Adzuma."

AN American publication offered a prize of 50 dols. for the most astounding fish story. Many MSS. were presented, of various lengths, but the prize was won by one F. T. Ranson, who had sent in the following story:—"Several days ago a friend and I went fishing in Silver Lake, but didn't catch anything."

THE Malabar and Travancore Spectator, in an article on Mr. Gladstone keeping out Mr. Labouchere from his ministry at royal dictation, passes in review the latter's recent career as a publicist and politician. Our contemporary notices the outspokenness of Truth, saying that that freedom of language would, if "Labby" were writing in Russia, soon procure him the knout in a Siberian dungeon. Then with a fine felicity of compliment our Malabar brother adds:—

"But the grand old monarchical constitution of England is also, if we may say so, to a great extent democratic, and Mr. Labouchere is allowed to live on and write. There are thousands who pin their faith on his democratic doctrines, and the rulers of England suffer such things to be."

WE learn that the Courier of Cochin having started a Scandal Column, there are in consequence flutterings in many local dovecots. One item runs:—"Ten elopements on the tapis; nine of them married people, and one unmarried." Thereupon, "This is rich," remarks the Malabar and Travancore Spectator. We should say, it was too much of a good thing. But our Malabar brother knows his own. Or rather, his neighbours. He asks the pertinent question, "How many wife's sisters in the case, we wonder, for, perhaps, to Cochin Benedicts the description of the Englishman by a German may be applied, to the effect that John Bull is a husband who always makes a mistake and marries the wrong sister."

REFERRING to the movement lately set on foot in Switzerland to prove that Count Mattei's so-called electro-homœopathy and his cancer cures are a delusion and a fraud, and the British Medical Journal's assertion since that an Investigation Committee has shown the system to be a failure or worse, the Malabar and Travancore Spectator calls upon Father Fr. Muller, of Mangalore, who has had a dispensary of the treatment for more than ten years, to declare his experience of the alleged fraud.

IT is reported that sixteen packages of gold, valued at Rs. 804,873 have just been despatched from Kolar Gold Fields to Bombay. Whatever may be the case with the Jhoot Muot Companies of Bengal, Mysore gold is not a myth.

IT is said that Mr. Sorabjee Ruttonjee, of Sorabjee and Co., has discovered pure alum in large quantities in a mountain known as Jurgoon, about twenty-eight miles east of Quetta, near some coal mines.

WE learn—

"Spaniards have invented a novel form of duel: Combatants being mounted on bicycles each armed with a knife, rush full tilt at each other. A collision thus arranged, appears to be tremendous."

That discovery is worthy of the nation which to this day patronizes bull-fights. Still for savage personal encounters in cold blood, the Americans do not yield even to the Spaniards.

IT is reported that Mrs. Annie Besant is about to publish another theosophical manual, this time dealing with Re-incarnation. Upon this the Bengal Times:—"We strongly suspect she is a subject of transmigration, and could almost hazard a guess of her form previous to her appearance as an atom of humanity." That is a brilliant guess in the Natural History of Creation.

WE learn—

"Numerous silkworms, which were brought to Gokak from Nilgiri and other mountains by Sultan Saheb Kotwal, at a heavy cost, are said to have been destroyed by an Englishman. He then went to Madras—so it is reported—and did similar mischief there, to a silk factory, which was also in its infancy."

There is so much method in these mischiefs, that one cannot help suspecting that this vandalism is pursued in the interest of some place or trade.

THE Bombay Small Cause Court has held that forward contracts for the sale or purchase of Government paper are merely wagering and gambling contracts, and therefore not enforceable by law.

THE Strand Magazine contains an account of an interview with the illustrious President, R. A., with illustrations. Sir Frederic Leighton early showed his genius in the direction of Art.

"His family went to Rome when he was ten years of age, and the boy began taking lessons from Signor Meli. When he was fourteen his father took some of his sketches to Hiram Powers, the American sculptor. 'And what is the verdict, Mr. Powers?' asked Mr. Leighton.

Shall I make him an artist?' The reply was: 'You can't help yourself, sir; nature has done it for you.' 'Will he be an eminent artist?' then asked Mr. Leighton. The answer was: 'Sir, your son can be as eminent as he pleases.'

THAT decided the choice of a profession. But it was not without great and unremitting exertion that the boy of genius grew to the accomplished painter. The habit remains. Even now, when he might well rest on his laurels, the great President works as hard as any struggling young artist.

"He always works wearing spectacles with divided glasses, the upper part being used for seeing his model at a distance and the lower for painting. He cannot work under any constraint, and has the greatest objection to being watched while he is painting. Sir Frederic is not a man of one work. He believes in keeping several going at once. 'I never give my whole attention to one picture at the same time,' says he; 'I invariably have six or seven canvases going, and I find it gives me all the rest I need to go from one to the other, working a little bit here and a little bit there. By this means the eye is constantly refreshed; I get through a good deal of work by this system.'

The late M. Dumas also had the same faculty of detachment in a wondrous degree. He kept supplying six journals regularly. How he could get a wink of sleep with a brain worked at such high pressure and a mind crowded with plots and "sensations"—with nastinesses and offences, contresens and crimes—is a wonder.

THIS paragraph is going the round:—

"We understand that the first Indian who visited England was a Parsi. One Mr. Framjee Rustamjee left the shores of Bombay in 1723, long before the great Raja Ram Mohun Roy was born. His object was to get redress to the injustice done to him by the agents of the East India Company in the matter of a factory which he owned at Bombay."

We know better than that writer. The first Indian who went to England was Kadir Bux Khansama—unless it was his uncle Hosnoo the Lascar. In fine, beyond question, the credit of pioneering belongs to Islam.

THE present representatives of the people are being analysed from different points of view. We have already given the respective strength of the different professions returned. As regards parliamentary experience, the new House of Commons is a set of greener horns than those of 1886, but not so raw a levy as the delegates in 1885. Thus, the number of new members this time is 217, (102 Liberals, 75 Conservatives, 11 Liberal Unionists, and 29 Nationalists, including 1 Parnellite), in 1886 the number of new members was only 140, while in 1885 it was no fewer than 330.

Taken as a whole, the new House of Commons is decidedly older than its predecessor. The ages range from 22—Mr. W. Allen (L) and Mr. T. B. Curran (N) were both born in 1870—to 90. Mr. Villiers is again the Father of the House at 90, and the other veterans are Mr. Isaac Holden (85) Mr. Gladstone (82), and Mr. C. Wright (82). All four are Liberals, but Mr. Villiers is a Unionist. There are 40 members whose ages range from 22 to 30 inclusive; 143 from 31 to 40; 197 from 41 to 50; 173 from 51 to 60; 78 from 61 to 70; and 4 from 81 to 90. In 1886 there were 44 between 20 to 30, and 16 whose ages were 71 and upwards.

100 Liberals are in favour of woman's suffrage; 112 Conservatives; 11 Liberal Unionists; and 19 Nationalists, including 3 Parnellites. Thus there is a grand total of 252, as against 337 in 1886.

Since 1886 most of the Liberals who then stood out for Local Option have been converted to the Direct Veto. In the new House are 263 Liberals favouring the Direct Veto, 16 Liberal Unionists, and 14 Conservatives. This gives a grand total of 293 as compared with 1886, when there were 172 supporters of the Direct Veto, and 111 of Local Option. Of the 14 Conservatives 10 are Irish. The other four are Messrs. A. J. Balfour, A. G. Murray, H. Seton-Karr, and Mr. J. Stewart. Mr. Curzon is pledged to Local Option and Sunday Closing. Not a single Nationalist seems pledged to the Direct Veto. Messrs. J. Austin, S. Evershed, H. E. Hoare, J. Stansfeld, and E. Whitbread—all Liberal brewers—approve the Direct Veto.

Pledged to the principle of the Eight Hours Bill for miners are 175 members:—143 Liberals, 17 Conservatives, 9 Liberal Unionists, and 6 Nationalists. A still greater number believe in the payment of members and of election expenses. The grand total under this head is 188, made up of 177 Liberals, 4 Conservatives, 2 Liberal Unionists, and 5 Nationalists.

THE following is going the round of the press throughout the globe as an editorial which recently appeared in a Western newspaper in the United States:—

"We begin the publication of the Rocky Mountain Cyclone with some phew difficulties in the way. The type phounder phrom whom we bought the outfit phor this printing ophis phailed to supply any ephs or cays, and it will be phor or phive weex bephore we get any. We have ordered the missing letters and will have to wait until they come. We don't lique the idea of this variety of spelling any better than our readers, mistax will happen in the best ov regulated phamilies, and if the ephs and the exes hold out we shall ceep (sound the c hard) the Cyclone whirling aphter a phasion till the sorts arrive. It is no joque to us; it is a serious aphair."

That is so rich that we strongly suspect it to be a specimen of contributory ingenuity of the press of the Union. There are other grounds which precipitate the suspicion into certitude. Neither the date nor the place of publication of the newspaper is given. Then, Cyclone is too grotesque a designation for even a journal on the slopes of the Rocky Mountains. Besides, the word is not American, or English, either. It was not in Webster nor Worcester. Again, the States have been overspread with a network of railways, and no newspaper in any part of the country need labour under such an embarrassment. Lastly, the neighbourhood of the Rocky Mountains has long ceased to be an inaccessible savage land.

There is a still more clinching ultimatum. This very paragraph had once before, many years since, made the grand tour, when we, with others of our contemporaries, reprinted it.

THE prospect of a new field of inquiry is opened in the following paragraph:—

"The American Professor Garner, who is going to Central Africa to study the 'language' of apes, has been in London, and was interviewed for The Pall Mall Gazette. He is taking a phonograph with him to record the sounds made. He will 'try and get some young monkeys,' and thoroughly domesticate them, and learn their language. He has demonstrated that they have speech just as much as we have, and has already mastered twenty words of their language. He secured a phonograph record of the Rhesus monkeys' talk in the New York Central Park, and when he tried it on a new batch, just arrived from Asia, 'the seven new monkeys answered quite vociferously.' He has learnt nine words of the Capuchin monkeys' language. That for food he has 'imitated with a little flute concern,' and on hearing it they give him food. The Professor is going on a novel and interesting mission, the results of which will be curiously awaited. Who knows but that the monkey may yet be educated up to the reading of newspapers, and to the election of members of a Simian Parliament?"

The adventure is worthy of the nation. A fellow-citizen of Edison's, Professor Garner goes out armed with a phonograph to report the speech of monkeys. The audacity of man is up to anything.

When the Professor returns after his successful mission to the Mountains of the Moon, he will sound a return to the times of primitive simplicity (to speak under, lunar influence, in confused and contradictory language), to —days of yore when time was young,

When birds conversed as well as sung.

It will be a jolly time, indeed, when Æsop's Fables will be history.

NOTES & LEADERETTES

with OUR OWN NEWS.

WE are not surprised to find it reported from Afghanistan that religious feeling is running high between the Sunnis and Shias. It is stated that, by an official edict, all Shias who die at Kandahar are to receive Sunni burial. Our readers are, we believe, aware by this time, of the cause of such bitterness and resentment of the Sunnis against the Shias. The Tubarra is at the bottom of all the mischief.

THE Chuprassi Commissioner of the Natore Municipality has, after all, resigned. It being brought to the notice of the Magistrate of the district that since the election of the messenger the majority of the Commissioners were absenting themselves from the meetings, and that, in consequence, the municipal work was at a stand-still, he used his influence with the employer of the Chuprassi and got the latter to resign. An accidental circumstance, if we mistake not, enhanced the weight of the official counsel.

WHAT an audacious thief he must be who stole a live elephant from the Dacca Kheddah the other day, and actually drove it to Comillah, and there sold it to a Zemindar. He was, however, caught, tried, convicted, and sentenced to two years' rigorous imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 50. We have heard of theft of buffaloes and horses, but this is the first time that we come across an elephantine enormity of the light-fingered gentry.

HERE is testimony in favour of opium by Dr. Lawrie, the Residency Surgeon of Hyderabad :—

"I came out to India twenty years ago with violent prejudices against opium, which it took a long time to uproot. If opium-eating is a vice, it is not to be compared in the harm it does with alcohol. Alcohol destroys the health and leads to crime; opium does neither the one nor the other. All men, and more especially all women, in health are much better without alcohol than with it; but I very much doubt if the same can be said in India about opium. On the contrary, an immense number of people in this country owe their health to opium, and would not only fall an easy prey to disease but would actually suffer in general health if they did not take it."

Few medical men have had a wider range of experience in different parts of India than Dr. Lawrie, and no one is entitled to speak more authoritatively in an inquiry into the effects of particular habits on the health of the people. His opinion on the influence of the opium-habit, therefore, is of the highest value. He confesses how he had shared the universal prejudice of the drinking races against the harmless drug, and how it took him long to shake himself free from it. So far from being a rank poison which should, on no account, be countenanced, he virtually acknowledges that opium is one of the most useful and beneficial articles and has, at least in this country, preserved the health of thousands. To the native of India this is no news, but Dr. Lawrie has shown considerable courage in avowing a truth so strange among Europeans. If truth is the object of the anti-Opiumites, this sort of testimony of men like Dr. Lawrie and Sir W. Moore will lead them to raise the siege against the Government of India.

MEDICAL men are divided in opinion as to the superiority of boiled over unboiled milk. With us Indians, it is the universal custom from time immemorial to drink milk boiled. But there are men of science who prefer to have it unboiled. They seem to think that boiling deprives the milk of its nutrient properties and makes it indigestible. They hold further that the bacilli of anthrax or tuberculosis, &c., are not destroyed in the boiling. Hence it is a needless operation. But the latest experiment conducted by Dr. Chamonin supports the native Indian view. He fed a number of kittens with boiled and an equal number with milk direct from animal. The former grew twice as fat and healthy as the latter; but a kitten left to its mother was the fattest and healthiest of them all, as the deficiencies supplied by the maternal instinct were beyond the resources of the laboratory. Then he examined the cause of the infant mortality in Paris, and traced it more to intestinal disease than to anything else, directly or indirectly. Carrying on his investigations further, he was happy to find that the simple precaution of boiling milk before feeding saved proportionately a large number of infants.

IT is scarcely to the credit of the great Indian journals that we should receive the earliest and most copious information about the East from Europe. The following picture of the Amir at Home is by a correspondent of a London paper :—

"The simplicity of his attire was in marked contrast to the gorgeously bejewelled raiment often displayed by the Indian Chiefs and Princes present at that historic meeting. His style of living is said to be equally plain, and, abandoning the almost universal Oriental custom of eating with the hands, he uses a knife and fork at table. Similarly, he has taken to smoking cigars, in place of the Eastern 'hookah' or water-pipe, a change which some connoisseurs in the use of tobacco will declare to be a mistake. Other indications of the tendencies of his mind are shown by the introduction of the electric light in Kabul, by the construction of new streets and a new palace, by the establishment of workshops fitted with expensive machinery imported from England for the manufacture of military material, and controlled by English engineers, and by many embellishments and improvements which he has wrought for his capital. Take him all in all, the Amir is not such a bad fellow as many apparently imagine him to be. It is at once his weakness and his advantage that he considers himself a very mighty potentate indeed. To his inordinately exalted opinion of himself rather to express ill-will is to be traced much of the friction which has occurred between him and the Indian Government. It would be much to the benefit of all concerned were he to carry out his desire of paying a visit to this country."

That description, although it proves that he is very far from an ogre, does not exalt the Amir in our opinion. It shows him a vain old boy. Abdur Rahman's residence in Russian cities and his intercourse with Europeans, seem to have done him both good and bad.

His starting workshops under Europeans for supply of military material is just the thing. We would even indulge him in the manufacture of wine or spirits out of the fine grape of his country, like old Ranjit Singh, if his heart yearned after the "water of life," though a gouty man had better avoid the alluring but forbidden draught. But what is this nonsense of electric light for in a land still groping in the stinking oily cherag stage of illumination? He may have his knife and fork, if he do not run the risk of cutting himself, but why cigars? And then, cigars to the abandonment of the hookkah is a distinct step backwards. But the electric light at Cabool! The conversion of the Bala Hissar into a University with Haraprasad Shastri for Professor of Political Philosophy and Diplomacy, would be a less romantic reform.

ONE of the largest meetings of the Great Eastern Hotel Wine and General Purveying Co., Ltd., was held on the 8th September. The attendance of share-holders in person was not large, only twenty being present, but the votes recorded were as many as ten thousand short by only 77. The meeting was specially convened to do away with the services of Messrs. Wilson, Calder & Co., and to authorize the Directors to propose new arrangements for the conduct of the Company's business in Great Britain. It was claimed on behalf of the Company that on account of the retirement and death of Mr. Alex. Calder, the senior partner of Wilson, Calder & Co., that firm, under the operation of clauses 124 to 126 of the Articles of Association, had ceased to exist and that the clauses were inoperative. Messrs. Wilson, on the other hand, contend that the death of their partner does not release the Purveying Company from their obligation to them, and gave notice that they would contest in court any such resolution carried at that meeting as illegal and invalid and not binding on them. Notwithstanding the protest, and in spite of a proposition to adjourn the meeting for eight weeks, a resolution was carried dispensing with the services of Messrs. Wilson, Calder & Co. Mr. Shirley Tremenearne, the Chairman of the meeting and the managing director of the Company, had anticipated the opposition and was forearmed with the votes of the absent share-holders. Mr. Tremenearne is equal to any combat that may follow.

Mr. A. M. Nash in a huff has "chucked" up the registrarship of the Calcutta University. In addition to his Rs. 400 monthly, he had claimed a sum of Rs. 1,200 for summing up the numbers in the last Arts examinations. The Syndicate having decided that the Registrar was not entitled to the extra remuneration for work which legitimately fell within his duty, Mr. Nash at once resigned. There was, however, Mr. W. Griffiths with a soul above Rupees, Annas, and Pies, who would drudge through any sums in addition without recompense beyond the arithmetic pleasure, and he was elected Registrar. The Fellows would do well to take extra care of their upper extremities.

IN noticing our article "The Hedjaz the Home of the Cholera," our contemporary of the Statesman takes exception to our remark as to the insanitary condition of Jerusalem. We did not speak without the book. We would refer our contemporary to a letter published in the Lancet of the 18th June 1892, in which Mr. Hingston Fox, of Finsbury Square, thus speaks of the place :— "The Christian pilgrimage to Jerusalem towards Easter time is not wholly unlike the Mahomedan in its sanitary aspect as I can testify; but the numbers are much smaller and the mortality far less." The eighth edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica, which contains more information than the ninth, at least with respect to Jerusalem, does not speak well of the Holy City of the Christians and the Jews. The old buildings which are still far too numerous are very much ill-ventilated, while most of them are in a ruinous state. The majority of the population live in these houses which are generally overcrowded, and the crowding is increasing at a rapid rate on account of the incoming Jews. The old method of water supply from rain-water preserved in cisterns, is yet followed. In the ninth edition, only the addition of a few hospitals, hotels and schools is mentioned. As for the statement that "the climate of Jerusalem is healthy in comparison with that of the plains beneath it," it must be accepted with some reservation. For the description following does not put it on a sound footing. "A fresh sea breeze blows throughout the day in the summer, and the average daily maximum temperature is 86°F. August is the hottest month, but in May the prevalence of dry east winds is specially trying. The autumn months are very unhealthy." As for the city of Mecca, Ali Bey, who preserved the thermometrical readings at different times, gives the maximum heat—in February—87°F and the minimum 67°5F. Medina is a cooler town in comparison either with Mecca or Jerusalem. According to Dr. Abdur Razzak, who is impartial in his report of the Hedjaz, the sanitary arrangements of this city would be creditable to any civilized country of the present day. Altogether, in a comparison between Mecca and Jerusalem, the latter falls short in many respects, especially in the water supply, which is one of the principal factors in the generation and the spread of any kind of disease.

THE situation in regard to Afghanistan remains unchanged. The Ameer has not yet sent a reply to the Government of India's second letter, acknowledging his answer to the offer to send a mission to him. It is daily expected. Meanwhile, the news that Lord Roberts was to head the deputation to Afghanistan had caused the greatest anxiety in political and military circles in England, although strangely enough there was no intimation from Reuter. We hope the Government was apprised, though we did not hear that the idea of sending the Commander-in-Chief has been abandoned. The anxiety "at Home" is perfectly just. There ought to be no more tempting of Fate. Lord Roberts is too valuable a "pillar of the state" to be risked in this way. He is worth whole dozens of Cavagnaris and Quintons.

In point of fact, the delay over the negotiations has saved us from incurring the risk. His Lordship's time is up and he will now be going home for retirement.

There are as yet no signs of Hashim Ali quietly surrendering himself or being surrendered.

The Mehtar of Chitral suddenly died on the 30th August—at the, in those blessed highlands, premature age of seventy odd years. His younger and favorite son Afzalool Moolk, who was present, at once seized the arsenal—containing 700 Sniders from the Government of India with ammunition—and all the cash and proclaimed himself the Mehtar. The eldest son, Nizamool-Moolk, was absent in his Government of Yassin. A war between the brothers is a matter of course. It is astutely thrown out in the Pioneer that the elder brother is no good, being an "inveterate schemer," while the lucky younger dog is the perfection of a native Chief as one who "has always had the warmest regard for such British officers as have visited Chitral." The policy of the Government of India may be divined.

REIS & RAYYET.

THE HYDERABAD "SCANDAL PAMPHLET" PROSECUTION.

WHATEVER opinion may be formed at the present day, or whatever verdict may be passed hereafter, on the management of affairs by the Prime Minister of Hyderabad, his administration is not likely to be forgotten. If it is not memorable for the doings of the Minister, it will be remembered at least for the notable, not to say notorious, doings which have taken place during the ministry. In this respect, certainly, it has been an eventful administration. It has overflowed with "sensation." Unlucky beyond most Premiers even in the Deccan, Sir Asman Jah's memory is associated with multitudinous scandals. His five years of office have witnessed no end of stirring incidents, mostly in the shape of legal and political or quasi-political proceedings, which have ranked almost as events. On the flight of the Boy Minister imposed on the Nizam by the will of Lord Ripon, suddenly recalled from Europe, to undertake the perilous responsibility of governing the great Mussulman State, he had no sooner stepped into office than he was confronted by the disclosures of the Deccan Mining Company,—in which Sirdar Abdul Huk acquired world-wide notoriety, having made fabulous wealth in a fabulous way, and spent it, we may add, in the fabulous way of an Indian Prince in London, so much so that people in England generally took him for His Highness the Nizam himself! That enormous scandal had scarcely abated when the Much Ado About Nothing of the Sowar Commission came to be played. On the heels of that inquiry occurred the notorious City Murder, in which a young Mahomedan scapegrace of respectable connections was implicated as having murdered a young Native Christian woman of parts and attractions and booked the dead body at the railway station as a parcel for despatch by train! That case is still dragging its slow length along, while the murderer is still at large. Next came the Salar Jung Debt Commission, which, it is believed, hastened the death of the young, amiable and good Munir-ul-Mulk, the second son of Salar Jung I. and the only prop of that illustrious family. In this connection may be mentioned what is locally known as the Bribery Case, in which a high official was accused of having received a heavy gratification from the ladies of the Salar Jung family to oil the wheels of Nizam justice. For the accused official himself appeared to be the Judge, inasmuch as the Hyderabad Government Resolution on the subject embodying the Minister's decision, was issued from the office, and under the name, of that official—the name printed in large type—the whole circumstances furnishing an illustration of the Oriental proverb—Khud Kuza, Khud Kuzagaro, Khud gil-e-Kuza, that is, himself the goglet, himself the goglet-maker, and himself the clay out of which the goglet is made. Of these several cases, the most important and of the most general interest was the first,—the Loot over the Hyderabad Mining Bubble, affecting as it did men at a distance—in Europe—and involving the characters of eminent Englishmen. The rest are of Hyderabad, Hyderabad. Scandalous as they are, the scandal is local, being confined to the City of the Nizam. If the dirt and slime have not been properly washed or have been wholly neglected, the reeking linen has been stowed away at home without being suffered to go abroad. Not so another case which occurred only last year. We refer to the unhappy dispute over an article with a respectable and loyal tradesman well known to the Nizam, which has become historic as the famous Diamond Case. These several matters comprise the first-class "sensation" pieces. A detailed and chronological enumeration of the incidents of minor notoriety would take up a long time and large space. But the following may be mentioned at random as the chief among them—the Roy Royan's case, the Anagundy case, the Gudhawal case, the Gorkunta and other Samasthan and Jagirdars' cases, the Sowcar case (in which Sowcar Balkrishna was fined a lac of rupees by the Nizam's High Court), the Treasury Frauds case and the Jewellery case. But in point of sensation the Pamphlet Defamation case has surpassed all the previous dramas. Already the sensation caused is unprecedented within living memory. On no previous occasion was the interest so general, or so stirring. Now all Hyderabad seems to be in a ferment. In the palaces of nobles, in all domestic circles, European and Native, in the public offices, clubs, playgrounds, shops and bazars—everywhere—the Pamphlet case is the chief topic of conversation, and not unfrequently of hot and excited discussion.

The causes of this intense, wide-spread and unprecedented sensation are not far to seek. The purda-keeping Indian is proverbially touchy in everything affecting the honor of his wife. He has exaggerated or superfine notions of delicacy in all matters concerning his female relations. But of all races, the Mahomedans, perhaps, are the most touchy on this point. His sensibility in this connection is of the keenest sort. As an instance in illustration of this may be cited Nawab Mehdi Hassan's own statement in Mr. Bosanquet's Court the other day. On being asked to mention the name of his aunt by the Defendant's counsel in cross-examination, he refused to answer the question, saying that it was against the custom of Mahomedan society to mention the names of one's female relations. Such being the case, it can easily be imagined how humiliating it is for a Mahomedan to be questioned, and to be obliged to answer all sorts of unpleasant and indelicate questions about one's wife in an open Court. As the investigation proceeded and the complainant's cross-examination with regard to Mrs. Mehdi Hassan by Defendant's counsel became more and more minute and searching, the sensation in the public mind grew more and more intense, till the entire Mahomedan community of Hyderabad was stirred beyond all description. The attendance in Court increased daily, and the Court room could not find accommodation for all, the doors had to be closed against many, but crowds of these surplus visitors, instead of returning home, chose to loiter about the precincts of the Court house till the end of the sitting, in the hope of getting crumbs of information by chance. The Nobles who would not attend Court personally through fear of compromising their dignity, deputed their Hurkuras and Akhbaris to report to them the day's proceedings. By special arrangement, the daily proceedings were translated into Urdu, with breathless expedition, and despatched to the Nizam and the Minister at night, without any consideration of the lateness of the hour, and both of them are said to have read those proceedings with equal avidity and interest.

Never before was a high official of the Hyderabad Government subjected to such humiliation, and never before was the Hyderabad Government scandalised in such a manner. The mind of the orthodox Hyderabadis is agitated with various feelings. He feels sympathy for Nawab Mehdi Hassan, as one Mahomedan would naturally feel for another in such a situation. He also feels—most keenly—for his Government, for, he believes that in Nawab Mehdi Hassan's humiliation, the Government is humiliated. And, therefore, he curses the hour when Nawab Mehdi Hassan instituted these proceedings. He thinks that Nawab Mehdi Hassan would have done better if he had treated the pamphlet with the "contempt of silence," as he had been advised to do by one of his best friends—himself a high official. He thinks it would have been better if Nawab Mehdi Hassan had resigned his post and left Hyderabad for ever. He thinks it would have been far better if Nawab Mehdi Hassan had left it to time—the great corrector of wrongs—to vindicate his character or to obliterate his own and his wife's personality from the mind of the public. Such are the feelings and such are the opinions of the genuine and orthodox Hyderabadis on this scandalous business.

The case has its political aspects also. They are of a more serious nature. But it is not yet time to look on that side of the picture.

THE MEDRESSAH MEETING.

A RATHER interesting meeting of Mahomedan gentlemen was held the other night at that ancient seat of Mahomedan learning, founded by Warren Hastings in 1781, the Calcutta Medressah. Although the chief business of the evening was a Lecture on the Moral Precepts of Islam, delivered by Moulvi Abdool Jabbar Khan Bahadur, the Suburban Police Magistrate, for the benefit of the rising generation of the Mahomedan community who have acquired an English education, yet the discussion which followed the Lecture, digressed into a direction which came home to the entire Mahomedan community. There was present a couple of unfledged Mahomedan Barristers fresh from England. Charmed with the society of English ladies, they seem to have discussed between them while in England the question of the purdah system and Female Emancipation in India, and determined to create a revolution in that connection, by the force of their arguments and with the help of stray passages from Sale's Koran, on their return to India. The meeting offered a very good opportunity for displaying their eloquence and knowledge of the religion and social customs of the Mahomedans of India, and they gladly availed themselves of it. They accordingly delivered an attack upon the purdah system—to the evident dissatisfaction of the audience. One gentleman offered to refute the barristers from Europe, from the Mahomedan scriptures, but the Chairman would not allow that meeting to be an arena for polemics. Nawab Abdool Luteef Bahadur was now asked by Mr. Rowe, (the Chairman,) to speak. In responding to the call, the Nawab made a remarkable speech, in the course of which he clearly showed how the Mahomedan boys in English seminaries, were, now-a-days, growing up without the slightest education in their own religious and moral books. This not from choice, but from the necessity of fulfilling the requirements of a hard University test, which allowed no time whatever to the boys to learn their own religious doctrines and moral precepts from original sources. The result was that whatever knowledge of religion or morals or social proprieties the Mahomedan youth acquired in the course of their College career, was derived from English books, such as Addison's Spectator, Bacon's Essays, Scott's Talisman, and the manual of geography published by a Missionary Society, or, at the best, from Sale's translation of the Koran. He was, therefore, not surprised to find young Mahomedan gentlemen fresh from England, give expression to ideas repugnant to the feelings of the Mahomedan community. We have no doubt that the Nawab's views will be echoed by the generality of Mahomedans. And what he said about his own people, applies in the main to Hindus as well. He has supplied matter for serious reflection for both denominations. The meeting having thus turned out a most interesting one not only to the Mahomedans but to the general community, we give below an abstract of its proceedings.

The First Anniversary Meeting of the Medressah Debating Club was held in the hall of the College on the 3rd September at 6-30 P. M. There was a large gathering of English-educated young Mahomedans. Several leading men of Mahomedan society with a few European and Hindu gentlemen were also present. Mr. F. J. Rowe, the Principal of the Medressah, was in the chair, and opened the proceedings by calling upon the Secretary of the Club to read the report. It appears from the report that the society was founded last year with the object of providing "a healthy and delightful mental recreation and opportunities to young men of the Mahomedan community of meeting every week to discuss literary, scientific and moral subjects (political and religious being scrupulously avoided), to acquire facility in writing and speaking the English language, and to obtain a greater command over it than they can possibly have by mere College training, which consists in getting through the curriculum of studies fixed by the University, and the last though not the least to strengthen the cause of unity and enhance social sympathy among themselves."

The report being read, the Chairman introduced Mr. C. R. Wilson, a Professor of the Presidency College, and requested him to give an introductory speech. Mr. Wilson delivered a short but impressive address. In an earnest manner and in lucid language, he said that the most valuable lessons which they could learn were those which they taught one another; these lessons were far more precious than those taught by their professors. After dwelling at some length on the moral and intellectual advantages conferred by discussion in a Debating Club, the speaker enforced the necessity for physical education, which he said should not be despised, as it formed the basis of their mental powers.

Moulvie Abdool Jubbar Khan Bahadur then delivered his promised Lecture on the Moral Precepts of Islam. The learned Khan Bahadur spoke with his usual fluency and force and altogether handled the subject in a way worthy of his position and learning. He quoted many original passages from the Holy Koran and the Traditions and commented on the same showing the relation between religion and morality. His conclusion was that religion was the fountain of morality, and that without religion morality had no firm basis to stand upon. He said that the Mahomedan religion was divided into two parts, suitable to all classes of men and conditions of life. The first related to religious devotions, while the second referred to moral duties and social affairs. When a person was convinced that there was an Almighty God, he would fear, love, and obey Him, and desire to know what he was to do to please his Lord. Consequently, the Prophets had communicated what things were pleasing to God, and what displeased Him. The speaker then referred to the vices strictly forbidden by the Mahomedan religion, chief among which were slandering, lying, drunkenness, gambling, the gratification of the passions in an improper manner, &c., and dwelt on the regularity of prayer, respect and obedience to parents, charity, feeding of poor relatives, orphans, &c., as highly recommended by the Koran. In conclusion, he stated that it had been said that in these days the students did not pay the respect due to their teachers. He did not see why boys of the present age should not follow the example of their ancestors, who were invariably submissive and respectful to their teachers. He did not mean that by being submissive they should lose their independence, but independence should not be confounded with insolence. They should all respect their teachers, who communicated to them those treasures of knowledge and moral precepts which alone were calculated to benefit them in this world and the next.

The President of the Club in a short speech proposed a vote of thanks to the learned lecturer as well as to Mr. Wilson, which was seconded by one of the members of the Club. The chairman then called upon several Mahomedan gentlemen to address the meeting. The first to respond to the Chairman was Mr. A. F. M. Abdur Rahman, Barrister-at-Law, who in an animated speech stated the past history of a similar Debating Club which had existed at the time of the late Mr. Blochmann under another name and of which he was a member, as he then was himself a student in that old Institution. Adverting to the Lecture of the evening, the speaker pressed upon his young friends to think over the excellent moral precepts of Islam, digest them and act accordingly. Lectures of that kind were calculated to bring about good results upon the minds of the Moslem youths. He exhorted the Mahomedan young folks to respect their parents and elders, to always speak the truth, to be scrupulously honest and straightforward and to avoid everything that was bad or vicious. He reminded them of the great duty that was awaiting them in the near future, that is to take the place of the elders of their community in the real battle of life. He then wished to make an observation on the Report of the Club.

He found that the chief object of the Club was to discuss literary and moral subjects, "political and religious subjects being scrupulously avoided." But it appears that subjects like "Female education in India" and the "Purdah System" were freely discussed during the year under review. The speaker said that Mr. Blochmann would never have allowed them as not coming within the legitimate scope of young Mahomedan students, and of whose object, origin and growth, the school boys could not be expected to possess sufficient knowledge. There used always to be a quarrel after their discussion. He thought these subjects fairly came under the ban of prohibition being "religious" and "political." Controversial subjects of the kind should be avoided and then the members would find their Club prosper and pay much better.

He was followed by Mr. Abdoor Rahim, a young Barrister, who in few words (which could not be distinctly heard) thanked the learned Lecturer for his able and interesting lecture, but observed that the moral and religious education of Mahomedan boys should be undertaken by their parents, and that female education should be properly attended to. He could not concur in the views expressed by Mr. Abdur Rahman regarding the Purdah system and Female Education, as he saw no objection to those subjects being discussed by the students.

The next to speak was Mr. Mahtabuddin Ahmad, only a few days ago enrolled as an Advocate of the Calcutta High Court. He was sorry he too could not agree with Mr. Abdur Rahman that the discussion of such subjects as Female Education and the Purdah system had better be left to the elders of the community, inasmuch as they were evidently religious and political questions, and did not come within the scope of a schoolboy debating club. He said that he had been wanting an opportunity like the present for giving out some of his views on Female Education. He observed that the condition of women in India was most deplorable and that, while in England, he and his friend Mr. Abdoor Rahim had thoroughly discussed the question, and had resolved upon effecting some reforms in this direction when they came out to India. He spoke in strong terms against the Purdah system, and tried to support his views by quoting certain passages from Sale's Koran. At this stage, he was asked by the Secretary of the Club to cut short his speech—and he sat down.

Then came the turn of Moulvie Shumsul Hoda, Pleader of the High Court. Before, however, he got up, Moulvie Badiul Alam stood up and said that he was ready then and there to refute the arguments and logic of the last speaker on the subject of the Purdah System, with proofs more authentic and substantial than what the last speaker could advance in support of his arguments. The Chairman here interposed observing that the present meeting was not intended for such discussions. After this Moulvie Shumsul Hoda tried to justify the action of the Members of the Club in discussing the Purdah System and Female Education, which he considered not political but social subjects. (Here he was reminded by a gentleman that they were religious.)

On the Moulvie's resuming his seat, the Chairman said that the proceedings of the evening would not be complete without a few observations from Nawab Abdool Lutef and called upon him to favor the meeting with a few words. In responding to this call, the Nawab, after thanking Mr. Rowe for the honor done to him, spoke as follows:—

The most grateful thanks of the general Mahomedan community were due to Moulvie Abdool Jubbar Khan Bahadur for the very able, instructive and useful lecture which he had that evening delivered to the large number of English-educated young men of the Mahomedan persuasion. By such lectures he, the speaker, expected that much benefit might be derived by the English educated Mahomedans in general and the student class in particular, in getting acquainted with their religious principles and in the formation of their moral character. He only wished with all his heart that lectures of such a valuable character were more often delivered for the benefit of the rising generation of the Mahomedans. He had a very good reason for expressing such a wish. It was well-known that now-a-days the University course of education exacted such hard work from the students, as to allow them no time at all to study their own religious books or learn the moral precepts of their own religion from original sources. The curriculum of the University course did not, for obvious reasons, embrace instruction in religious subjects. There was a time when Mahomedan parents considered it their duty to impart religious instruction to their children at home. But those times are gone. The pressure of the University and the prevailing system of education have absorbed all the faculties and the entire attention of the learning population. And the University tests are becoming more and more difficult every day, and additional subjects are being imposed upon the students almost every year.

The result is that unless a boy enters the English school at the age of 6 or 7 years and toils hard not only in school but also at home, and actually devotes the whole of his time to his school course, to the entire neglect of his religious education, he is unable to pass the Entrance test, to say nothing of the higher examinations.

In his earlier days, as he the speaker remembered, there were not a few Mahomedan families, most of them descended from historic ancestors, who were in opulent circumstances; but where are they? Many of them have entirely vanished, while others have dwindled into poverty and insignificance. Of the rest of the genteel part of Mahomedan society, the chief means of support of the majority consisted of emoluments from Government service and of the legal profession,—trade and commerce not being in their line. But owing to administrative and other changes of recent years, the Mahomedans were all but completely elbowed out of both these professions. The system of education completed what the change in administrative policy began. Regard for their classical literature and veneration for religion impelled the Mahomedan parents to make their children devote a portion of their time to the acquisition of Persian and Arabic and the principles of Islam, with the result that Mahomedan boys were unable to compete with their Hindoo schoolmates,—not thus handicapped,—and exhibited a very poor figure at the convocations of the University. The Mahomedan community were then blamed all round that they were too proud and did not care to keep up with the times, that their children devoted more time to the study of their own literature and religion, and culpably neglected their English studies. Mahomedan students found it extremely difficult to satisfy the requirements of their religion and of their society, and at the same time to qualify themselves for the public service and the professions.

The authorities were simply inexorable, and declined to show any indulgence to the Mahomedans, notwithstanding the repeated representations of the leaders of Mahomedan society, and went on laying down more and more difficult tests for competitive examinations, the passing of which alone, irrespective of all other considerations, could qualify Mahomedans for Government appointments.

The door of the public service as well as of the professions, was thus entirely closed to Mahomedan students, who, in deference to their social and religious requirements, did not devote their whole time to the study of subjects prescribed in the University course. Seeing this, and feeling most keenly, that they were being deprived of the only means of their subsistence, the Mahomedan parents were at last constrained to discontinue the practice of making their children give a portion of their time at home to acquisition of religious and moral instruction, and to insist upon their devoting the whole of their time to fulfil the requirements of the University course.

It will thus be evident, what opportunities young Mahomedans have of gaining moral education from their own religious sources. They are admitted into schools for teaching English, at the age of 6 or 7, and after a number of years' incessant hard labour, either obtain their degrees in the University here, or proceed to England to complete their education there, or study law in one of the Inns of Court, and thus at the age of 22 or 23 they enter public life in some capacity or other. Notwithstanding that these young men are brought up with little or no religious training whatever, it may be said to their credit that many of them exhibit great zeal and attachment for their religion. But in addition to the very imperfect knowledge imbibed from their surroundings at home, their chief acquaintance with the principles of Islam is derived from English authors whose tendency towards the Mahomedan religion was too well-known to be mentioned here.

The earliest notion respecting his Faith which the little Mahomedan boy learns in English schools, is from the saying attributed to Mahomed, namely, "If the mountain would not come to Mahomed, Mahomed would go to the mountain." That is probably the first lesson the little boys learn of the character of their Prophet. This, the speaker most vehemently denounced as the grossest libel imaginable—a palpable and absurd falsehood invented by some mischievous non-Mahomedan to ridicule the religion of Islam and its Prophet, as he was quite certain that no such incident ever occurred in the life of the Prophet. Then the Mahomedan boys are made to learn from their English books, that their Prophet was an "impostor," that "Islam was a false religion," that "it had been spread only by the force of the sword," and so forth. In almost every English book, the boys come across passages containing direct or indirect attacks upon the Mahomedan religion, and, having no distinct knowledge of the latter of their own, are led to believe that these representations are correct. Again, from time to time, books are prescribed as compulsory subjects of University examinations, containing the most abusive and outrageous allusions to Islam and its Founder. Those objectionable passages the Mahomedan boys are compelled to con over, to study, and even, maybe, to learn by heart, and the effect of such training in young lads may be more easily conceived than described. He, the speaker, said that ever since he has had the honor of being appointed a Fellow of the Calcutta University, he had, though single-handed, tried his best to bring to the notice of the University the objectionable books prescribed in the curriculum, and pointed out the particular passages against Islam, and moved the highest authorities to interfere in the matter. The result was that certain essays of Addison's in the Spectator, one of Walter Scott's novels, the Talisman, some passages in Bacon, &c., were, he was glad to say, expunged from the University course. He further said, that he regretted that he had not sufficient leisure at his disposal to go through all the Text books of the University, but whenever he got information of any such book, he took prompt steps to remove the evil. He thought that if the Boards of studies discharged their duty, they ought to take special care that books containing such objectionable passages should not be selected as Text books. It was with the greatest surprise that he had, not long ago, come to know that a "Manual of Geography" prepared and published by the "Christian Vernacular Education Society," had been made a Text book for the Entrance Examination for 1893 and that the said book was that very moment being taught in that noble Mahomedan seminary in the Hall of which he was then standing. That book contained the grossest libels and abominable falsehoods regarding the Prophet of the Mahomedans, their religion, their character and their women. He, the speaker, had made some enquiries, and found that there was not a single Mahomedan Fellow in that Board of studies which selected that book. A Mahomedan Fellow had brought the matter to the notice of the Board of Studies for History and Geography at one of its recent meetings, but the majority decided that as the book had been selected for the examinations of 1893 and 1894, it could not, under some byelaw or other, be now altered or discontinued under any circumstances. That book had thus continued to remain a Text book, and Mahomedan students had to learn by heart those passages from that book that dealt with their religion, their character and the degraded state of their women. He most emphatically protested against the Boards of studies patronizing such books published by Missionaries, whose avowed object has always been to convert the Mahomedans and Hindoos to Christianity. His surprise was all the greater to find that even the Principal of the Calcutta Medressah had allowed the introduction of that book in this Institution, when there was an alternative book, namely, Clarke's geography, in the Text book list. He, however, hoped that under the wise supervision of the present Principal, Mr. Rowe, who had always evinced the greatest interest in the wellbeing of Mahomedan youths, the complaints of the Mahomedan community would soon be removed. In conclusion, the speaker would make one more remark. Considering that the sources, from which young Mahomedans who had acquired an English education, derived their knowledge of their religion, their moral principles, and their usages and customs, were only such English books as the Manual of Geography just spoken of, Addison's Spectator, Bacon's Essays, Scott's Talisman, Sale's Koran, &c.; it was no matter for surprise if they gave expression to non-Mahomedan ideas and opinions regarding female education, the purdah system, female emancipation and so forth.

Before, however, resuming his seat, he, on behalf of the Mahomedan community, thanked Professor Wilson, of the Presidency College, for the interest he had taken in the cause of the Mahomedan students and for the able address with which he had entertained the meeting that evening.

Owing to the lateness of the hour, Mr. Rowe would not address the meeting at any length, but in a few chosen words briefly reviewed the excellent work done by the Club during the last year, and while expressing his great pleasure at the very interesting lecture delivered by the Khan Bahadur, remarked that although he had heard many lectures before in his life, he had never derived greater benefit from any of them than from the one he had heard that evening. He added that he was a warm friend of the Mahomedan community, and had a great respect for their religion; and that this was the first time, that he had come to know that an objectionable book on geography had been introduced into the Calcutta Medressah. In conclusion, he conveyed the thanks of the meeting to the Khan Bahadur for his excellent lecture and to Mr. Wilson for the very useful observations made by that gentleman on moral and physical education.

After a vote of thanks to the chair, the meeting dispersed at 9 P. M.

THE DOORGA PUJA HOLIDAYS.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—The Hindu community of Bengal and the keranis in particular owe you a debt immense of endless gratitude for the services you have rendered them in the matter of the curtailment of the Dooorga Puja holidays. In these days it is very difficult to find a man who is a real patriot and who really feels for the general body of the community. With the honorable exception of your worthy self there was none amongst us who cared to take up the cudgel to fight for the helpless keranis, when in 1890 they were attacked by the huge monster the Bengal Chamber of Commerce. The British Indian Association which is now a mere shadow of its past self proved a traitor. During this critical moment help came from an unexpected quarter. It was then you, Sir, who most willingly came forward to help with all your might the prostrate and crushed down keranis, and though you failed to rescue them from the iron grip of the all-powerful Chamber helped by the then setting sun of Belvedere, yet the poor keranis remember the right yeoman's service that you rendered them at the time and your sustained effort even now to rescue them from their terrible fate.

It is a great pity that our so-called leaders and pseudo patriots are most busy in calling meetings and making demonstrations in matters which affect the middle class population of Bengal the least, while they are perfectly indifferent to questions of most vital importance to the community. For instance, in the next Provincial Conference they do not think it their worth while even to put the Holiday question on the board for discussion, while that of "Sea Voyage" has been selected as a subject of sufficient importance. Admitting, for argument's sake, that the Joint Secretaries Baboos Surendra Nath Banerjee and Janakey Nath Ghosal (both of whom are England-returned) are not actuated by any consideration of self, I do not see the importance of this question. It is not a question at all. In fact, there is nothing in it to call for any discussion. What is required is merely action and nothing more. But apart from that consideration, is it not a matter affecting even less than the microscopic section of the community in comparison to the vast number of the people directly or indirectly affected by the curtailment of the holidays? There is nothing which debars our England returned youths from coming into society. They are all freely invited to take their dinners on social gatherings and festive occasions. The only difficulty is on the occasion of the marriage of their children. It requires only a little moral courage on the part of the agitators to make the first plunge, and then many will follow. But as is always the case with these so-called public spirited men, they are always loud in talk while loath to do the thing. They only want to show to the rulers that they are now getting reformed and therefore eligible for political privileges. It is only some inexperienced young men pressed by notoriety-hunters that are making all this fuss about nothing and thereby materially injuring the cause they profess to support. By their agitation they are simply inviting opposition. If they leave the matter alone and only try to bring about some marriages with the England-returned Babus or their children, all opposition will quietly die out, and they will gradually be merged into society. Of course, it requires a little tact, and, above all, a spirit of conciliation, on their part. If they live in society according to its rules, there will be no cause of complaint. They, however, prefer to defy society and live out of it as Sahebs, giving themselves the airs of the jackdaw in the fable, as if they are superior to the community they belong to. This, society naturally resents. I cite this only as an example to show how our so-called leaders are loud in their professions of patriotism and public good, while they really do nothing which does not promote their own private purposes. The question of the reconstitution of the Legislative Councils, for instance, they say, is put forth for the public good, but in fact for the purpose of promoting their own position. While thus they are really attempting to obtain seats for themselves in the councils of the Empire, as representing the great middle class and with the help of the very class, they are quite blind to their grievances. Alack the day when such selfish public men will be our rulers! These people are absolutely indifferent when the middle class population is aggrieved, they never care to move a finger to get their grievances redressed. For who form the backbone of the middle class population of Bengal? Is it not the clerks in the Government offices and in private employ? and have not their lives been rendered almost unbearable by the curtailment of these essential holidays? While our so-called leaders and pseudo-patriots in the capital will enjoy the Doorgotsab, the poor clerks must pine away their lives in their respective offices, away from their family and children, their religion gone, and deprived of all mirth during the universal national jubilation, and yet these are the people who expect that we shall respect them as our leaders.

The question of the Holidays has not at all been studied by these public men. Had they done so, they would assuredly have found that there are many points which require careful consideration. Allow me to explain one and that a most important one. It has been proved by an overwhelming majority of Smartha Pandits that the opinion of Mahamahopadhaya Mahesh Chandra Nayaratra is totally erroneous. It was an unpardonable offence on his part to have described the shasthi as not a day of religious necessity. The Pandit should be made to confess his error publicly and upon that confession the Government of India should be moved for the reconsideration of the order based upon a wrong issue, which again is based upon a still more erroneous opinion. In case the Pandit is so stubborn as to stick to his mistake, is it not incumbent upon our leaders to pay a little more attention to this subject, to become less apathetic to this call of duty and take the necessary steps to convince the Government of the necessity of granting holidays on the shasthi as an indispensable day of worship, equal in religious value to the Saptami, Ashtami, Navami and Dasami, and that a holiday on the Panchami day is necessary to enable the people to make the enormous preparations absolute for the Poojah which commences on the Shasthi? Failing in our representations here, I think it is incumbent upon the public bodies and our public men to move Parliament and appeal to the foot of the throne. But alas! where is that patriot who will do all this for the poor keranis, who and whose children fill the pockets of so many self-seekers in the garb of patriots to carry on their political agitation in the vain hope that it will ultimately do them or the country good.

A KERANI.

THE EXCHANGE DIFFICULTY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE Times.

SIR,—May I ask your insertion of the enclosed letter which I have just received from Sir David Barbour, and which I think is of sufficient public interest at the present time to justify my request?

I am, your obedient servant,
W. H. HOULDSWORTH.

Coodham, Kilmarnock, N. B., Aug 19.

"Simla, India, July 25, 1892.

"My dear Houldsworth,—It is nearly four years since we parted in London, and it occurs to me that you may like to know how the experience of the last four years, during which I have been in charge of the Indian finances, has affected my opinion on the currency question.

"On that point I can give you a very decided answer. I have no hesitation in saying that a common standard of value for England and India is absolutely essential to the well-being of this country, and that by far the best and safest method of attaining so desirable a result is, to the best of my judgment, the adoption of the system of double legal tender by international agreement.

"The continuance of the present state of things is ruinous to Indian interest; the fluctuations in exchange affect our foreign trade most injuriously; the theory that the evil effects of such fluctuations can be eliminated by the exchange banks is not supported by facts. For example, a merchant in Calcutta may simultaneously buy piecegoods in Manchester, sell them in India, and fix his exchange, but if exchange rises (say) 20 per cent. before the goods are paid for in India, the Indian purchaser finds that others can import the same goods 20 per cent. cheaper, and undersell him to that extent.

"In such case the Indian trader either suffers a ruinous loss, or he breaks his engagement and refuses to take delivery.

"I enclose copy of a petition by native traders in Kurrachee which shows how seriously they feel the evils from which we suffer. And I may say generally that merchants and bankers in India are very much disheartened and thoroughly dissatisfied.

"The extent to which their opinions have turned in favour of bimetalism is remarkable, though on the Bombay side there is a strong party in favour of maintaining the status quo, in consequence of the belief they entertain that a silver standard and a falling rupee give them an advantage over Lancashire.

"But, unfortunately, this conversion to belief in bimetalism is accompanied with a feeling of helplessness, as it is feared that the opposition of England will stand in the way of a satisfactory international agreement.

"On this account many men in India begin to contemplate the establishment of a gold standard, arguing, I believe, that the gold standard would either prove a remedy for the evils from which they suffer, or that it would produce a state of things which would force on international bimetalism.

"The effect on Indian finance of the want of a common standard with the rest of the Empire is deplorable. In the Estimates of the current year I had to provide for an additional charge of Rs. 1,700,000 on account of the fall in exchange; for next year I anticipate a further charge of Rs. 1,500,000.

"If there is a surplus, I am afraid to recommend the remission of a taxation, as a week may see the surplus disappear. If there is a deficit, I cannot propose a taxation, as a turn of the wheel may convert a deficit into a surplus.

"In public, as in private finance, such a state of things produces a certain amount of recklessness which is not favourable to economy. Whether we are economical or the reverse, the question of a surplus or a deficit depends, not on any action of ours, but rather on the course of exchange, and the course of exchange depends on we know not what.

"There are many thousands of miles of railway that might be made in India with great advantage to the country, which would at once return a moderate rate of interest on the capital and which would ultimately pay well. The fear of a fall in silver, however, stands in the way of their construction. If it was probable that these railways would return a large percentage of profit at once they would no doubt be constructed, whatever the Indian standard of value might be, but with the small, though certain, profit which Indian railways are likely to return for the first few years, the risk of investing capital in a country with a silver standard deters the prudent investor, while such railways have no attraction for the more speculative.

"Meanwhile English capital flows into fraudulent companies, and is lent to foreign States where bankruptcy is only a question of time.

It is an uphill fight which you have before you, but the principles of bimetalism have made great, though quiet, progress, and perhaps the reform may come more quickly than we now anticipate.

"It used to be said that the Europeans in India merely wanted 2s. for their rupee. It was an ungenerous taunt at the best of times, and it is certainly not true in the present day. Almost any ratio between gold and silver would be gladly accepted if it were only permanent and stable.

"I am, yours very truly,

"D. BARROUR.

"Sir Wm. H. Houldsworth, M. P."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "TIMES."

SIR,—Rumour has been busy in the City as to the intentions of the Government of India in view of the persistent fall in the price of silver and the consequent position on the Indian exchange.

This rumour specially refers to the proposal that the Government of India should refuse to coin freely for all comers, in order, I suppose, to limit the use of silver as money in India. Allow me to say that I think such a proceeding would be dangerous for several reasons.

In the first place, it would amount to a blow aimed at silver by those who use it most. It would be a sort of proclamation that silver would probably be discarded as standard money not merely in Europe but also in the silver-using East. People would, I think, take it to be the first step towards the demonetization of silver in India. It might not be so intended, but it would probably be so regarded by the suspicious and astute natives, who are a people easily alarmed. They now hoard silver. Might they not take to hoarding gold, even more than they now do, if a want of confidence in silver were shown by the rulers of their country? Such people would argue, we shall soon have gold as our standard of value. That change has been advocated by some and, having been freely discussed in the Press, any such action of Government would naturally be regarded as preparing the way. It would even be suggested that before long silver would cease to be legal tender, and every Native who has saved money in coin or ornaments would, I fear, be alarmed and disposed to get rid of silver in good time, so as not to be caught unawares.

In order to avoid the demonetization of the rupee, it has been suggested that, gold being the only standard, the rupee should still pass as legal tender money at some fixed ratio of value to gold. But the question arises, What is the ratio to be? Only 1s. 3d. the rupee would be too shocking, so 1s. 6d. has been suggested. But Native holders of rupees might fairly consider even that arrangement as a sort of robbery by Government. So far they are not suffering from cheap silver; for prices in silver have not risen much, if at all; but if the law should create a fixed depreciation of the rupee where now there is none, or none that can be clearly seen, prices stated in rupees must advance seriously in consequence of the change of standard.

Again, some large holders of rupees might demand gold in exchange for their silver at 1s. 6d., seeing that elsewhere the price of a rupee is less than 1s. 3d., and it is possible that such holders might be so numerous as to apply for an amount of gold which Government could not supply. Better the present position than one equivalent to bankruptcy created by the act of Government.

Gold might, however, be freely coined in India into sovereigns and half-sovereigns of the same weight and fineness as our own, such coins being legal tender here, but not in India. They would find their own value there, and would, it is said, be popular as gold was in England 100 years ago, when silver was our standard money.

Such a change would not endanger the value as money of the enormous mass of silver rupees now used in India and might not create any extraordinary demand for gold, as there are large gold hoards in that country. What we have to avoid is any hasty change that might involve consequences little anticipated by the currency doctors who write and speak so glibly on these intricate questions, and ignore difficulties.

Difficulties abound, as is plain to every one. All I ask is that much caution should be used in a matter which may have most serious political as well as economical aspects.

I remain yours faithfully,

Moor-hall, Harlow, Essex, Aug. 20.

WILLIAM FOWLER.

General Sir George Chesney writes to the Times (Aug. 23):—In your article to-day on the Indian currency question, and with reference to the proposal which has been made to close the Indian mints to the free coinage of silver, you say that the danger must not be overlooked of such a measure in the stimulus it would give to unlicensed private coinage. On the value of the rupee being thus artificially raised, it would become profitable to coin rupees of good metal with a counterfeit stamp. This is true, but I think that all persons practically conversant with the conditions of India will agree that such counterfeit coinage on any appreciable scale would be immediately detected, while any large importation of such counterfeit coins would involve the extravagant condition that the business should be undertaken by mercantile houses of standing, under the risk, indeed almost certainty, of eventual detection, with all the consequences involved. I venture to think that the chance of any failure of such a measure on this score may be altogether disregarded. The English shilling being now actually worth only about fivepence, a powerful stimulus has been given to the illicit coinage of counterfeit shillings, but of full weight and value, and it is probable that many such shillings have been got into circulation, but there is no reason to suppose that their number bears more than an insignificant proportion to the whole quantity of that part of the currency.

The measure proposed would certainly give an impetus to a class of crime artificially created by it, and would involve the establishment of a special preventive establishment. The same may be said of our customs duties. But the need for raising revenue is held to justify the creation of an incentive to the artificial crime of smuggling, and the desperate necessities of the Indian Government may surely be held to justify any possible evils to arise from petty illicit coinage of counterfeit rupees.

Until the world is converted to bimetalism, the only remedy open to the Indian Government in its present and increasing financial embarrassment is by closing its mints to free coinage to give a scarcity value to the rupee. And the remedy would be effectual, while, by conferring stability on the Indian exchanges, it would restore confidence to trade with India, and replace what is now commercial gambling of a most disastrous kind by sound and rational commercial business.

Under these circumstances, Mr. William Fowler writes to you to deprecate "hasty changes," and urges that "much caution should be used in a matter which may have most serious political as well as economical aspects." As if the India Office needed advice of this sort! Much caution is the one and only quality which so far that authority has exhibited in the matter. More than twelve years ago I brought to notice in the pages of the Fortnightly Review a proposal to put an end to fluctuation in the Indian exchanges and give stability to the rupee by partially closing the Indian mints. Ever since then the Indian currency question has been under consideration. The Indian authorities cannot therefore be charged with the exhibition of a tendency to "hasty change," while it will hardly be contended that the result of doing nothing for so long has not been to bring about "most serious political as well as economical aspects." Matters having come to their present pass, Mr. Fowler's advice recalls to mind the apology made by a French General for the failure of Bazaine to save his army from having to surrender, that if he had tried to break out of Metz that army would have suffered "a catastrophe."

Holloway's Pills.—In cases of chronic indigestion, disordered liver, and general debility, these pills are wonderfully effective. They indeed have so general and powerful an effect on the whole system that they clear away or ward off most of the ills that flesh is heir to. They cleanse the bowels, purify the blood, correct the bile, give tone to the stomach, excite a healthy appetite, produce sound sleep, and impart increased energy to both mind and body. The admirable properties of these far-famed Pills are too highly appreciated to require any encomium here, as they are resorted to by rich and poor of every nation. The cures they effect are not temporary or imperfect, but they bring about a marvellous and most beneficial change throughout the entire body, and enable it with renovated powers to resist the approach of all future attacks.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

THE WAR-CALDRON.

DOUBLE, double, toils and troubles !
Burns the fire, the caldron bubbles !
And, the hell-broth boiling over,
We its elements discover.
From the bottom springs to light
Brain of wily Muscovite,
And his hand, its gauntlet hid
In the skin of peaceful kid,
And his tongue of treachery
Cancered with a chronic lie,
And a flint-stone, shaped with art
To the semblance of a heart.
First stock, these, for broth of war
Cooked in kitchen of the Czar.
Double, double, toils and troubles !
Burns the fire, the caldron bubbles !
Hissed from out that seething pot,
Comes a whisper, "Trust him not !
Murd'rous is the Islamite !
SLAV, ERE SMITTEN, RISE AND SMITE !"

After pause, the same voice, "Lo !
Islamite ! the Christian foe
Plots thy death this very hour ;
STRIKE FOR LIFE, THEN ! CRUSH THE GIAOUR "

Double, double, toils and troubles !
Burns the fire, the caldron bubbles !
Straightway from its lips of bale
Burst all sounds of mortal wail—
Shriek of woman, infant's cry,
Strong man's shout of agony.
Welt'ring, then, upon a flood,
Mixed of lurid flame and blood,
Lo ! the doomed, the dead, the dying ;
Lo ! the chaser and the flying ;
Lo ! the headsman's grisly knife ;
Lo ! the shreds of comely life :
Awful eyes in dying stare ;
Hands lopped off in act of prayer ;
Limbless trunk, and trunkless head :
Beauty's flower dishonoured—
All adown the ghastly spate,
Whirled by murder, lust, and hate,
Drunk with venom from the tongue
That o'er the land Fear's poison flung.
Lo ! the whisp'rer's handiwork,
Wrought on Christian and on Turk ;
Lo th' ingredients, sleeping got,
By "Holy Russia" for the pot.

Double, double toils and troubles !
Burns the fire, the caldron bubbles !
Next appear—farrago odd—
Things of Mammon and of God ;
Certain drops from Truth's clear well,
Fouled with slime of nether Hell ;
"Facts" from correspondent's maw,
Cooked, but bloody, yet, and raw :
Metempsychosis clearly seen
In new Pythagorean Bean,
Kenn'd (from frailer optics hidden)
By microscopic eye of Liddon ;
Gall of placeman, ab agendo ;
Scream of doctrinaire, crescendo ;
True and tender British heart
Squeezed by demagogic art ;
Stomach of a goody-good,
Sickened with the smell of blood ;
"Liver of financing Jew ;
Pound of flesh for "Bond" long due ;
These, by Russia's charm of trouble,
Make the hell-broth boil and bubble.
Double, double, toils and troubles !
Burns the fire, the caldron bubbles !

Next a greedy Russian ear
Stretched all foreign sounds to hear ;
Smug Schouvaloff's juggling hand
Waving fervid William's wand ;
Damaged thorax of the latter,
Strained all Russian views to flatter,
With his goosequill polyglot,
Swell th' ingredients of the pot.
Double, double, toils and troubles !
Burns the fire, the caldron bubbles !

Cometh up, a seal'd book,
Bound in iron of doubtful look,
Labelled with the legend, "'Ware Bismark's schemes ! Within they are !"
Next a weathercock, that shows
How the Austrian weather goes—
How, when winds from Wien set west,
They take an eastward turn at Pesth.
Double, double, toils and troubles !
Burns the fire, the caldron bubbles !
And some shrivelled things appear—
Pluck of Servain volunteer ;
Palate without taste for fight ;
Mask of Russian dropped in flight ;
Turkish pæan sung to Allah—
Bitter pill for Russ to swallow !
Oil to lubricate his throttle,
Poured from diplomatic bottle ;

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given, any other being unnecessary and likely to cause confusion.

"Hobbles" to keep back the Turk
 From the finish of his work ;
 "Hatt" of Turk (who takes advice)—
 Wrapped in it, an ARMISTICE ;
 Ultimatum ex-post-facto ;
 Russian credit quite intact (Oh !).
 Quieter now the toil and trouble,
 Scarce the war-pot seems to bubble ;
 Diplomatic "pan" and "altar"
 Come in place of bloodier matter ;
 Now a Russian billet-doux,
 Which says to each, "All rests with you."
 "A friendly meeting might do good.
 It might. Who knows? I'm sick of blood ;"
 Then a British note, replying,
 "All the Powers with Russia vying
 In humanity's sweet work,
 Mean to harmonise the Turk.
 Therefore will we all at Pera
 (No great good in meeting nearer)
 Hold a concert. 'Twill be best ;
 For music soothes the savage breast.
 There, rehearsed, a little song
 To suit all voices, weak or strong—
 We'll teach our Turkish friend to chant it.
 Docile, he will do what's wanted.
 Thus affording guarantee
 Of future Turkish harmony."
 Double, double, toils and troubles !
 Europe's concert squeaks and bubbles.
 First that song of Ignatieff—
 "Set a knave to watch a thief ;"
 Chorus of the other Powers—
 "Suits your voice, too high for ours ;"
 Scroll of comic variations,
 In the styles of all the nations ;
 Turkish bouffe—"My constitution,"
 Quite beyond Turks' execution ;
 English song—"Yes, do ; but don't ;
 He must, yet needn't, if he won't ;"
 Then a spick and span new version
 Of the Russian hymn, "Coercion,"
 With some crotchets, dropped to win 'em,
 Then some quavers, then a minim,
 Writ on paper, torn by tricks
 From mangled deed of 'fifty-six ;
 Then a song which all can compass,
 Save the Turk, who makes a rumpus ;
 Last, the Turkish cavatina,
 Which split the Russian concertina.
 Double, double, toils and troubles !
 Burns the fire, the caldron bubbles !
 From its centre casting up
 Yankee cartridge, gun of Krupp ;
 Tons of Russian bounce and brag ;
 Half unfurled, the Prophet's flag ;
 Bulls and Bears, of every nation,
 Goring, roaring "Death ! Damnation !"
 Armies swarming 'cross the Pruth ;
 Not one little word of truth ;
 Then a lull, half hope, half fear,
 And, with eyeballs red and blear,
 Oozes forth sleek Ignatieff,
 Whisp'ring, "War to us is grief ;
 But from oath there's no recoiling ;
 Czar has sworn—his blood is boiling—
 His great name is compromised ;
 Then, our troops are mobilised ;
 We've borne the last that honour may,
 In vain, my Lord. Oh ! by the way,
 Perhaps, if set in different key,
 The beastly Turk might fail to see
 The motif of that little song,

And take and sing it? Can't be wrong
 To hoodwink kite in such a cause ;
 Well, sing he must, or lose his claws ;
 For, as I said, we're compromised,
 And, zounds ! your Lordship, mobilised."

Soon from out the caldron pour
 Fresh editions of the "score"—
 Of that simple little lay,
 Which, somehow, doesn't seem to pay :
 England's version, with compression ;
 Russia's, with far more "expression ;"
 Then some six, in one connected,
 Labelled "Protocol selected :"
 Tacked to it an English thing—
 Duet for Turk and Russ to sing—
 Words, "Sure fighting is but folly,
 Let's both disarm, and all be jolly ;"
 Last the Russian Ariel-song,
 With symphony for Tartar gong,
 "Come unto our icy land,
 Turk ! and kiss your Master's hand."
 Double, double, toils and troubles !
 Burns the fire, the caldron bubbles !
 This last fuze for Turkish bomb,
 Meets it in the caldron's womb :
 Europe, hushed in expectation,
 Waits the awful detonation ;
 Russia's waiting game is played ;
 Cozen'd world's last say is said :
 And now, since Turk is flesh and blond,
 Russia's charm proves firm and good.

NOTES & LEADERETTES

with
OUR OWN NEWS.

It is notified by the Foreign Secretary on behalf of the Governor-General in Council under the Foreign Jurisdiction and Extradition, Act, 1879 that :—

"(1) Every Assistant Superintendent and ex-officio Assistant Superintendent of the Tributary Mahals of Orissa for the time being may exercise the powers of a District Magistrate and of a Court of Session as described in the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1892.

(2) The Superintendent of the said Mahals for the time being shall exercise the powers of a Court of Session and High Court, as described in the said Code, in respect of all offences over which magisterial jurisdiction is exercised by any Assistant Superintendent or ex-officio Assistant Superintendent of the Mahals: provided that no Assistant Superintendent or ex-officio Assistant Superintendent shall commit an accused person for trial to the Superintendent acting as a Court of Session.

(3) The Superintendent for the time being shall exercise the powers of a High Court, as described in the said Code, in respect of all offences over which the jurisdiction of a Court of Session is exercised by an Assistant Superintendent or ex-officio Assistant Superintendent.

(4) In exercise of the jurisdiction of a Court of Session conferred on him by these orders, an Assistant Superintendent or ex-officio Assistant Superintendent may take cognizance of any offence as a Court of original criminal jurisdiction without the accused person being committed to him by a Magistrate, and shall, when so taking cognizance of any offence, follow the procedure laid down by the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882, for the trial of warrant-cases by Magistrates.

(5) A trial before an Assistant Superintendent or ex-officio Assistant Superintendent in the exercise of the jurisdiction of a Court of Session conferred on him by these orders may be without jury or the aid of assessors.

(6) These orders apply to all proceedings, except—

(a) proceedings against European British subjects, or persons jointly charged with European British subjects; and

(b) proceedings pending at the date of this notification, (5th September 1892) which should be carried on as if this notification had not been issued."

IN spite of the orders of the Bengal Government and the High Court, the apprehensions of a breach of the peace between the Shias and Sunnis at Bhagulpore do not seem to have come to an end, as the following in the Indian Daily News shows :—

"Our Bhagulpore correspondent informs us that almost all of those who have given evidence in favor of Shias, in the case now pending before the District Judge, have been severely handled by the Sunnis, who have vowed to lynch the former and every one who is on or will go over to their side. Indeed, the feeling between the two sects is so strained that even the rival Sunni akhbaras, armed with clubs, banded together (a thing unheard of) last Tuesday night, and paraded the streets as they do in Mohurram, ready to attack the Shias, if only they dared to bring out the alum. And still worse, this spirit of intense hatred has caught the boys of the local Madrassah, who, but for the timely action of Mr. Wincope Smith, the headmaster, might have wrecked the house of Moulvi Irtiza Hossain, a very wealthy Shia Zemindar, who was supposed to have engaged a dozen lattials for the purpose of thrashing the schoolboys who are Sunnis."

It is a great pity, that the Shias should have by a departure from time-honoured practice irritated their Sunni brethren. But on the other hand the Sunnis must be careful not to go beyond the law or take it in their own hands. The Shias must be protected from violence of sectarian rivals.

WHATEVER opinions may be held of the justice in the late Rampore State Trials, or of the regularity of the methods by which the accused were brought to book, there is no doubt about the wholesomeness of the whole general effect, and the complete success of the policy of the Government of the N. W. Provinces in a difficult situation. The little principality once more breathes freely. Rampore is peace. It was not so. Ever since the murder of General Azimooddeen Khan, and the transfer of the administration to a European officer, during the minority of the Chief, there was great consternation in society. Nobody's honour or life was safe. It was a Reign of Terror. Suspicion and anxiety filled every breast. Arrests were daily made. At the information of a malicious enemy any man might be hauled up for trial as a murderer. Thank God, all that is over now. Society has recovered its normal tone by a good deal. The seal has now been set on the return of civil peace by a social function which took place on the 2nd instant, when a respectable citizen of Rampore, Moulvie Mahomed Zuhoor-ul-Huck, entertained Major H. A. Vincent, the President of the Council of Regency, at an afternoon party. A number of the leading gentlemen of the state were present, and the President mixed with them on most cordial terms. This was the first occasion on which the European Administrator found an opportunity of mixing with the Mahomedan gentry of the town, at a social gathering.

Refreshments were served to the guests in the European style, and they were all very much pleased with the hospitality of the host and the affability of the President.

A MOST unseemly controversy has been raised by the Patriot and the Mirror on the extension of service granted to Moulvie Abdool Jubbar Khan Bahadoor. These journals only prove the worthlessness of the native Press. They do not even represent their countrymen unless they represent the worst Hindu prejudices. The public entertain a very high opinion of the ability, integrity and independence of the Moulvie. We know him to be strong enough to render most efficient service to Government for another five years in whatever capacity he may be placed, and we only wonder that the Bengal Government have allowed this distinguished member of the public service, an extension of only one instead of five years.

It causes us a good deal of surprise, and not a little pain, that the two Hindu journals should raise their voice against extension being granted to a most deserving Mahomedan gentleman, while they had not a word to say when announcing the grant of frequent extensions to several officers of the Hindu persuasion. If there were any truth or sincerity in the complaint on the score of such indulgence blocking up promotion, it would certainly be heard equally on such occasions.

WE learn from Hyderabad that the Nizam after staying several days at the Falaknoma Palace as the guest of Nawab Vikarul Omra Bahadur, has returned to his own. He was very much pleased with the Nawab's hospitality, and, as a mark of satisfaction, made a present of two valuable diamond rings each to the Nawab, his Begum (sister of His Highness) and his son Nawab Sultanool Moolk Bahadur, and distributed Rs. 1,500 and 500 gold mohurs to the servants and attendants of the host. This is right royal style.

Our Hyderabad Column below adds some interesting particulars on this subject.

Holloway's Ointment and Pills.—Dangerous Chest Complaints.—The enumeration of these diseases is scarcely necessary, as, unfortunately, most Englishmen know them to their cost. Coughs, common colds, influenza, bronchitis, asthma, pleurisy, inflammation of the lungs, and even consumption in its early stages, are best treated by rubbing Holloway's Ointment upon the chest and upon the back between the shoulders. It penetrates internally, checks the cold shiverings, relieves the overgorged lungs, gradually removes the oppression from the chest, and restores the obstructed respiration, hitherto so distressingly disagreeable and highly dangerous. In treating this class of diseases, Holloway's Pills should always be taken while using his Ointment; they purify the blood, promote perspiration, and allay dangerous irritations.

OUR HYDERABAD COLUMN.

Hyderabad, the 18th September, 1892.

YOU have noticed the fact that His Highness was recently staying at Falaknama, as the guest of Nawab Vicar-ul-Omra. His Highness's stay at Falaknama extended over a week and odd days. Could you form an idea as to what amount of money it cost Nawab Vicar-ul-Omra to entertain his guest? Would you believe it?—the kitchen expenses alone amounted to Rupees six thousand a day. I cannot vouch for the truth of my information, but I can assure you, though the amount may seem much too high to people outside Hyderabad, it does not seem so to us, who are accustomed to hear of lacs, where thousands would surprise others. From this one item you can easily form an idea of the entire cost.

THE sensation caused by the Pamphlet case was about to abate a little, when it received a fresh impetus. A rumour is afloat that it is in contemplation to dissolve the Home Secretariat, of which Nawab Mehdi Hassan, the prosecutor, is in charge. How far the rumour is correct, is yet to be seen, but the fact is, within the last few days two of the principal departments—the Medical Department and the Court of Wards—have already been separated from the Home Secretariat, and the Post Office and the Mint, it is said, will soon follow suit, leaving, for the present, only the Judicial and the Municipal (conservancy) Departments in the hands of the Home Secretary. While the work of dissolution is going on here, Nawab Mehdi Hassan is absent in Upper India busy collecting evidence in defence of his honor and character. What connection there is between the Pamphlet case and these sudden changes in the Home Secretariat, I cannot say. The perverse public seem inclined to attribute the one to the other, though the connection is not distinctly visible.

YOU will be glad to hear that Mr. Rudra has really got back his sunnud to resume practice in the Nizam's Courts. I say really, because the news which was published some months ago by some of your contemporaries, was premature. On that occasion, he was about to be re-enrolled, when some obstacle was thrown in his way most unexpectedly and he was disappointed. But this time the matter is settled pucca, and the High Court's order will appear in the next issue of the Jarida. I believe the circumstances which led the Nizam's High Court to strike Mr. Rudra's name off the roll of its Advocates, are well known to you. But for the benefit of those of your readers who may have forgotten the facts, or may be entirely ignorant of them, I hope I may be permitted to recapitulate them here in brief. In March 1891, Mr. Gribble, late of the Deccan Times, instituted criminal proceedings in the court of Mr. Bosanquet, second Assistant Resident, against Mr. Gallagher, late of the Deccan Standard, charging him with defamation. Mr. Rudra appeared for Mr. Gribble, and in defence of his client, happened to make the following remarks:—"It is a well-known fact the Government of Hyderabad is a personal one; it is also a well known fact that Justice in Hyderabad is a toss-up; and that the Judges are all more or less partizans of the Government." The remarks gave umbrage to the Minister, and had the ultimate result of depriving Mr. Rudra of his sunnud. Mr. Rudra fought hard to get back his sunnud, and it is gratifying to observe that his efforts have at last been crowned with success. The odds against him were so very strong that another man in his circumstances would most probably have quietly left Hyderabad without even an attempt at reinstatement. But Mr. Rudra is not a man to be overcome by difficulties, and the perseverance and courage which he has displayed in this matter surely redound to his credit.

THROUGH the active exertions of the patriotic and public-spirited Mr. Ram Chunder Pillay, one of the leading Pleaders of this place, and under the presidency of Nawab Mohsin-ul-Mulk (Madhi Ali), Political and Financial Secretary to the Nizam's Government, a public meeting was held at Secunderabad, on the 5th instant, "to express the gratification of the general community at the election of Mr. Dadabhai Naoroji as a Member of Parliament" and to thank the electors of Central Finsbury. Nawab Mahdi Ali's fame as an Urdu speaker is not confined to Hyderabad. It is believed that in this respect he has no superior even in Northern India—the home of the Urdu language—and but few equals. His diction is faultless and his delivery easy and graceful like that of a finished speaker. The speech which he delivered the other day at Secunderabad as President of the meeting, fully sustained his well-established reputation. While fully sharing with the nation the joy that this remarkable event—the election of Mr. Dadabhai Naoroji as a Member of Parliament—has caused, the Nawab cautioned his audience "not to form any exaggerated hopes, or to draw any unwarranted conclusions" from it. For, he said, "if they did this, they would at once see that the objects on which they had set their hearts could not be realized by the admission of a single Indian gentleman into the House of Commons. They would not be achieved, indeed, unless they had in the House at least 350 Indian gentlemen, or a similar number of other members, who entirely sympathized with and supported the objects in question. What could one vote do in a body composed of six or seven hundred members? A single voice in such a large assembly is like the chirruping of a sparrow in the midst of a brass band." In my humble opinion, Nawab Mohsin-ul-Mulk takes a most sensible view of the situation, and each of his remarks is characterised by sound and sober judgment. The speech has been translated into English, and I have much pleasure in sending you a copy of the printed translation. It bristles with humorous anecdotes, which caused roars of laughter among the audience. I leave it to you to reproduce the speech in its entirety or to make extracts from it, with your own remarks on them in your own exquisite style. The speech, I am sure, will repay perusal.

MR. F. H. B. Skrine has gone to Darjeeling on special duty. We believe he is engaged on the decennial report which is due.

MR. Lokendronath Palit must have improved rapidly to be appointed officiating Magistrate and Collector of Rajshahi, during the absence, on leave, of Mr. J. C. Price. We have great pleasure in hailing him thence of Glamis.

THE Englishman of the 8th September contained this curious editorial, which the pressure of other matters prevented us from noticing earlier:

"It is evident from the report of the British Consul at Jeddah that there is no falling off in the popularity of the Hadj, in spite of the hardships which are involved in the pilgrimage. A pilgrimage to Rome is an easy and pleasant act of devotion. The pious traveller gets into a train, just like anybody else, and he arrives at the hour fixed. If he goes in company, Messrs. Cook undertake the arrangements. They will carry a child to Jerusalem without a hitch, on due notice. But under such agreeable conditions, do forty-seven thousand pilgrims, rightly so described, visit Rome in the twelve months? That is the number, within a fraction, who landed at Jeddah last year. Messrs. Cook are responsible for a large proportion of these also, but only from port to port. Before reaching the ship, and after landing, most of them have gone through perils and sufferings, such as our forefathers underwent in the Middle Ages. Besides they know what awaits them before starting; but religious enthusiasm tempts them to brave the worst. It may be regretted that the Consul did not add, how many of the forty-seven thousand returned. In the days before Cook, it used to be reckoned that one in three must perish—among Far Eastern pilgrims at least. We observe the nationalities with interest. Nearly a quarter were British Indians, another quarter are returned as 'Javanese,' among whom, doubtless, our fellow-subjects of the Straits, zealous Hadjis, are counted. If a Shereef of Mecca could arise, such as Islam formerly produced, a born leader of men, he might be a power in the world; and there are such in abundance among the true Arab stock. But he will never be permitted to show himself while the Turk rules—which may or may not be a matter for congratulation."

That is an extraordinary editorial for a leading journal. We strongly suspect the devil—the enemy of scribes if not of mankind—has carried away the editor's head. After the opening sentence on the popularity of the Hajj—or, as he puts it in the orthodox European way, Hadj—notwithstanding all the hardships of that pilgrimage, the writer goes off at a tangent to the Christian pilgrimage to Rome and describes its easy terms by way of contrast. Then, without notice, he proceeds all the way to Jerusalem, with a child under the protection of Messrs. Cook. Thence he turns back to Europe and asks an incoherent question about forty-seven thousand pilgrims visiting Rome. We suspect here a derangement of epitaphs, or at least of geography. For the writer, without dwelling at Rome, immediately takes the same number of pilgrims to Jeddah and speaks of their antemortem and postmortem perils and sufferings, likening them to the experiences of Christian pilgrims in the days of mediæval barbarism. Thenceforth he sticks to the poor Hadjis. So far so good. But his mind is not completely recovered, for he concludes with another plunge into incoherent speculation about the possible rise of a Shereef of Mecca a born leader of men—wherefor, the philosopher telleth not. Such a Shereef might be a power in the world, but why is he wanted at all?

what need of the world or of Islam for such a leader? we are not informed, and we are wholly left in the dark as to the possible mission of the Hero. The whole aspiration has a nightmare look. The advent is by no means an unlikely event. At any rate, there are such in abundance, we are told, in the true Arab stock. Only they have no chance in the present political arrangements of Islam. These strong leaders of men dare not air their pretensions in the dominions of the Sultan. Those indomitable heroes have a wholesome dread of the Pasha's bastinado. So much for the Englishman's dream of a heroic Shereef of Mecca of the true Arab stock! Of course, no excursions of these writers on Mahomedan politics can be complete without a passing kick at the unspeakable Turks.

THE Amir is all submission. As desired by our Government, he has agreed to withdraw his troops and agents from Wano and Waziristan to Ab-i-Istadah. He is besides grateful that the Afghans will be allowed to remain in possession of the other doubtful points, such as Asmar and Chageh, pending the conference with Lord Roberts. The date of that conference he is still unable to fix, on account of the continuance of the troubles with the Hazaras. He repeats the assurance that no sooner they are ended, he will write to the Viceroy when he will be able to receive and meet Lord Roberts. Already, preparations are making for his reception. Three proclamations have been issued—one posted on the gate of Jellalabad city, the second sent to the elders of Mazina, an important village in Rud-i-Hissarak, and the third addressed to the Muftis and Kazis of Kajja, all enjoining that respect should be shown to the British Mission on its arrival.

THE Centenary of the French Republic was celebrated on the 22nd September at the Pantheon. Fêtes are being held throughout France in celebration of the event.

THE report that the Duke of Connaught is coming out to India to succeed Lord Roberts, is said to be without foundation. But who is to be our next Commander-in-Chief?

THERE has been a death from cholera at Hull, the victim being a fireman on board a steamer from Hamburg.

A DACOITY of American proportions is reported from Kansas in a railway train. The robbers removed the rails at a certain part of the line in the prairie, the train was wrecked, five passengers killed and many injured. In the confusion that followed, the robbers decamped with one million dollars of the Mexican Central Railway.

THERE have been serious disturbances in Sydney. A crowd of six thousand miners and others assembled in the town and sent a deputation to wait on the Premier and demand the release of the leaders of the strikers at the Broken Hill Mines. The Premier declining to receive the deputation, the crowd charged the entrance to Parliament House, to force an entry. They were, however, repelled. The charge had its effect on the Premier, for he consented to receive the deputation, though he would not release the leaders imprisoned, as the law must take its own course.

FOR the seizure in July last of three British sealers by a Russian gun-boat off the Copper Islands, the Times now demands an apology from Russia for the insult to the British flag and an indemnity for the crews for their sufferings and loss.

CHOLERA has broken out in Galicia and Cracow, and Holland. In the second it is increasing. There have been numerous fatal cases in Brussels. Russia is not yet free from the disease. It is on the decrease in Hamburg.

THE Daily News speaks of a Convention just entered into between Russia and China for the establishment of Russian Consulates in Central China and in Manchuria and Mongolia to oust the British commerce.

THE rumour of an offensive and defensive alliance between France and Russia is positively denied at St. Petersburg.

IT is reported from St. Petersburg that Colonel Yanoff has immediate orders to withdraw to Ferghana.

THE DOORGA POOJA.

INDIA is a land of religious Fasts, Feasts and Festivals. Not a month—scarcely a week passes without its special observances. This time of the year is peculiarly sacred: more occasions of demonstrative piety are crowded within the months of October and November than any other sixty days of the three hundred and sixty-five. The Doorga Pooja inaugurates the Hindu season of worship in Bengal. The worship of the ten-armed Amazonian of the Indian Olympus is here most popular. All Hindus, particularly those of the Sakta and Saiva sects, recognise the duty of devotion to Sakti (Force) the female principle, but it is in the Gangetic Delta of all parts of India that this principle—Sakti—is formally worshipped as Doorga—one of its myriad forms. It is on this worship that the Bengali concentrates all the pious ardour of his soul—lavishes all his wealth. The occasion is also utilized for secular enjoyment—for family gatherings and social amenities. Holy days—the word holiday has lost its original import—holy days are not necessarily red letter days. There are races whose religious days are grim and awful days of hard and harsh exercise. Intent upon the due observance of the prescribed ceremonies, they scarcely care to look upon the glorious sun and sky, moon and stars, or listen to the song of birds, or inhale the perfume of the flowery fields wafted by the appreciative breeze. Nor are such things unknown in this country. Thus, the principal religious demonstration of the Mahomedans is, from top to bottom, from beginning to end, one round of agony, or would be so if they rigidly observed their law. Not so with the Hindu. Although unfeignedly religious, he is not sombre and lugubrious. His religion, too, is agreeable. His conception of Divinity is more Hellenic than Hebraic. God with him is no terrible scourge—not a Nadir Shah of infinite puissance—nor are the gods and goddesses so many Legrees—slave-driving task-masters. Nor does he wholly abandon himself to religion. According to his rude ideas of life and happiness, he enjoys himself to the full on the most solemn occasions. The procedure of his religion admits of his doing so. The worship is wholly performed by his priests so that he is left entirely free to make the best of the occasion. The days of Fasts are the only exception. These have to be kept at personal cost. They cannot well be observed vicariously. Although the fasts are usually followed by feasts, the fasts have to be endured in propria persona; and they are very real trials, particularly in this valley of the Bhagirati. The privation of the Catholic Lent is a joke in comparison with it. The cumulative effect of the absolute Mahomedan Ramadan fast during the whole day from day-break to sun-down, repeated in due succession for a whole month, may be more crushing, but the Bengali Hindu's total and unbroken abstinence from food and drink for the space of a whole day and night—full twenty-four hours—is far more difficult. But these exercises of personal devotion are, with scarcely a single exception, unconnected with the popular demonstrations. The stoical ascetic side of Hinduism is very properly kept out of view. Its practice is personal and lonely, or at most confined within the seclusion of the domestic circle. The public ceremonies are very different in character. They are all Feasts and Festivals. The Hindus have no public worship in the Western sense—no gathering of many people in a single house for prayer together under the ministration of a priest. They pray individually, in private and in silence, with or without the assistance of a priest. Their public worship is the spectacular ceremonies observed before the symbols of divinity—statues of gods and goddesses—accompanied by the exercise of respect and consideration to relations and connections, courtesy to neighbours, and good will to all men, with charity to the poor, clothing many and feeding all comers, with music and song and dance, and general merriment. Let no man from this think lightly of the religious side of these Festivals. There is not a more earnest worshipper than the orthodox Hindu, and the religious element in these Poojas is thoroughly genuine. On these occasions, his whole soul is stirred, and he is filled with a passionate sentiment of religion—a sense of the presence, or at least neighbourhood, of Divinity. Yet such is the harmonious correlation between his faculties of devotion and enjoyment that he can make the most of these Festivals in the best secular way. The duty of attending to the divinity being left to the priests, the master of the house who celebrates the Pooja is free to attend to his guests, feeding and amusing them, and ministering to their enjoyment, according to his means and taste. The gods and goddesses themselves are very human in their ways, dispositions, and views. The religion of every race is tainted with anthropomorphism, for man cannot transcend himself. Hinduism is deeply, almost avowedly, anthropomorphic. If God created man in his image, man has created innumerable gods and goddesses in his own. Our divinities are, like us, delighting in eating and drinking, in singing and dancing. Hence the Hindu Poojas are characterized by these features. Of these, the grandest is the Doorga Pooja. It is a protracted Festival extending, in its full integrity, through a fortnight, and culminating in the last five days. We are already in the midst of it. It is the Carnival of Bengal. Its functions in this country as Christmas in Christendom.

TERRIBLE ACCIDENT ON BOARD THE TROUT.

THE river steamer Trout of the India General Steam Navigation Company has just escaped a colossal accident. It was of course a providential escape. But, humanly speaking, the preservation was due to the prompt action and coolness and prudence of some of the passengers and, above all, the untiring exertions of the crew. The navigation of the Pudda is notoriously difficult at all times. The great river, always formidable, is, during the latter end of the rainy season, truly terrible. The swollen stream with its vast volume of water flies through the country like an arrow, sweeping everything before it in its resistless course. It was a terrible accident that overtook the Trout, but luckily it was not completed.

It was at about 4 O'clock in the afternoon of Monday last that the steamer, packed full to suffocation with passengers from Rampur Baulia, steered out for Damukdia Ghat as usual. For nearly four hours she ran down the current with the wind in her favour, safely and neatly without a hitch or break, when, all of a sudden, in the dark, at about 7-30 P.M., she received a rude shock which brought babies down to the ground from the enclosed lap of their mothers, tumbled down the olden folk from their respective seats, prostrated those who sat on the floor in native-fashion, and sent others who lay stretched on the ground rolling about, causing a great disturbance and confusion in all quarters on board, and no small consternation. After careful enquiry it was found that she had unfortunately grounded at one of the many sandbanks. All efforts to extricate her proving unsuccessful, there was a compulsory halt. So the passengers stopped, with the prospect of passing the night in the very centre of the Pudda, a mile off from either bank. While lying in this unpromising situation, they, after a short time, began to feel as if the steamer was making a slow movement. But it was so slight and almost imperceptible that they took no special notice of it. At half past 11 O'clock, however, as the passengers lay quietly in their respective quarters, trying, with more or less success, to drown in the oblivion of sleep the anxieties of their precarious situation in mid stream, some of them found reason to suspect that the hold was filling. Inquiry was silently directed to ascertain the truth. The suspicion being verified, one of the crew was sent down below to take the measure of the water. On the man jumping into the hold all his body, except the head, became quite invisible. Further inquiry brought to light the fact that a plank 3 cubits long and 1 broad had fallen off the bottom. The feelings of the passengers at this ugly disclosure in the heart of the great Pudda, far from any possible help, may be better imagined than described. They had already been frightened enough, but now they were paralyzed with fear, as if confronted by death and no mistake. It was lucky that at that hour of midnight only the passengers of the most educated and advanced class were apprized of the imminent danger, or else the consternation on board would have caused such confusion and disorder as would have precipitated the vessel to its doom.

The commander—a native—was wide awake and unremitting in his efforts to save the vessel, and the whole crew seconded him admirably. They at once set to work to pump out the water. But the quantity already in the hold was so great, while the gap in the bottom was so large admitting fresh water in huge bucketfuls, that the struggle with the element seemed hopeless. They made heroic exertions, however, and at last towards dawn the carpenters were able to repair the leak, putting a new plank in place of the lost one. With the coming of day, the hopes of those on board revived, and their joy knew no bounds when early in the morning they were landed safe and sound at their destination. And never perhaps in their lives did they offer up prayers with such unfeigned devotion as on that occasion.

Within the last two months nearly half a dozen accidents of this kind have taken place, but, though they were not so fraught with danger, they nonetheless caused great inconvenience and trouble to the passengers. The navigation of the Pudda is most difficult and dangerous, particularly at this time when the water is rapidly going down. It is, we believe—it certainly was, we know—the rule with the steamers plying in this river never to run after sunset. They are bound to anchor before sunset, but as the Rajshahi steamers cannot keep punctuality in starting from Damukdia and Baulia so they cannot generally reach their destination in time. The company have been running their steamer at night till 10 or 11 P. M. without the least regard for the safety of the passengers, against all rules and experience. There was complaint before this accident, and a high Government official who personally experienced these difficulties and dangers reported to the head office this most disgraceful and discreditable state of things in very strong terms. Even that report had no effect upon the company. There is no commander or captain of the ship as far as command is concerned, and therefore no fixed time is kept for departure or arrival. The new agent at Baulia does not insist upon keeping time, and apparently only cares for increase the number of passengers and weight of luggage and goods. No ferry boat can show such a miserable state of confusion, filthiness and want of discipline and order as is seen on board these steamers. The furniture is such that no gentleman nor lady can conveniently or safely use for the nonce. The seats are dirty and rickety and broken. The arrangement for food is simply disgraceful. Instead of cooks, coolies seem to have been employed in the kitchen, who cheat the passengers. Over a little quarrel between the serang and the goods' clerk, one hour of valuable time is lost. The very coolies do not obey the commander. If the Railway goods' clerk smokes, the passengers have to wait for him, and for numerous such other reasons the steamer is detained. If an accident takes place, no information is given at Dumukdia for the information of the passengers. No telegrams when the steamer leaves one station or arrives at the other. It is said in Mr. Bell's (local agent formerly) days better arrangements prevailed. He used to look more closely into the work of the serangs and clerks and insist on punctuality. No limit is fixed for the number of passengers for each steamer nor for the goods. Any number of passengers and any quantity of goods are taken and the steamer is dangerously overloaded. No responsible officer seems to examine these steamers. We hope Government will order a sifting and thorough enquiry into the matter by some high officers, and that they will examine the respectable passengers, among whom we may mention Babu Mohendernath Sanyal, Government Pleader, Babu Nobin Chunder, Sub-Judge, Rajshahi, Moulvi Shamsul Hoda, High Court Pleader, Moulvi Syed Mahomed, Deputy Magistrate, and others.

The company get Rs. 200 monthly from the Rajshahi District Board as a subsidy for running the steamer, and that body too might well demand an explanation.

After the water in the hold was discovered, the crew and the serang with all other men on board did their best to save the steamer, and they were successful.

In a dark night when one cannot see 10 yards before him, how is it possible for the pilot to see his way? We hope Government will not allow any company to ply their steamers in this careless, hazardous and irresponsible way, and will frame stringent rules for guidance and constant inspection by experts. Government is responsible for the life and property of its subjects.

The night navigation should be strictly forbidden.

The number of men and the quantity of goods for each steamer should be fixed and punctuality enjoined.

A BULL FIGHT IN BENGAL.

Barnagore, New Year's Day, 1864.

AND here am I these eight days, laid up, violently ill of my eternal complaint, confined to this ultima thule of civilization, far from wife, and banished from friends and the activity of life. For the first time this afternoon I put out my head in the open air. I sallied forth from my den into the street and found the whole town out to see a bull-fight—not, thank God, a fight between a man and a bull—the Bengalees have not reached enough courage to be so audacious and bloody as the Europeans—but a fight between a couple of bulls, without any human interference. Their amphitheatre was the old Bârowaree site, now a waste—I wonder it has been suffered to remain so in the cry of the Europeans for waste lands. It is very conveniently situated in the centre of the neighbourhood, and is the most public spot in the whole place, being on the thoroughfare, and exactly at the confluence of two public roads. The spectators occupied two of the boundaries of the field, namely, the great thoroughfare to the west and the footpath to the south leading to the house of the Banerjees, and were so ranged in lines that it required a slanting ground beneath their feet to give you a gallery, and make the idea of amphitheatre complete. The women occupied the house tops, the daughters-in-law—who by the custom of the country are bound to seclusion more absolutely than the daughters—taking advantage of the intense attention of the men to the sight, no longer struggling through the thick veil of the long single robe (saree), and the daughters drawing to the full upon the liberty allowed them by custom of appearing in public without the inconvenient intervention of a veil. When I reached the battle it was raging above half an hour. The whole neighbourhood was there, but the news had gone forth and people from the more distant parts of the town were hurrying breathlessly to the scene—some unlucky fellows, as will always happen in the hurry, the nails of their feet striking violently against obtrusive stones which, as in every road, like rocks in the sea, raise their heads above the surrounding level, coming to grief, tumbling down, stretched on all fours, calling piteously for help, and none so slow to give them heed, and serve a brother's turn, still, minding less the streaming blood than regretting, in more than a Titus' spirit, the minute lost, limping on, no sooner than prostrate, and coming down again from sheer heedless hurry, which leaves them peculiarly at the mercy of the rocks and shoals of land navigation. Carriages passing the thoroughfare stopped in obedience to the magnetic attraction of numbers. A few invalids and other unfortunates who had been left in charge of houses were essaying to take in the fun as best they could from their confinement. A few zealous "lovers of sport" had closed their business to take their places as bustling oracles in the "race-stand," while others had come out into the street in front of their shops to see the combat. In a word, the whole town was up. All eyes were directed to the contest, all save those of a knot of idlers whose time is occupied between stimulating drugs or beverages, and dice—played of course not for money—and who were now at their favorite game. They were there from an early hour. They were too interested in their game—far too absorbed in the progress of the sham hostilities of the wooden pieces on their board, to notice the battle of living creatures fought in bloody earnest at their side, not twenty-five yards off. Not but that they did not know what was going on. From time to time notice was given them, by sympathetic friends; indeed, the tumult of the bulls and men left them not the poor pretence of ignorance. But they were not to be moved. Once only, indeed, when the crisis of a game was past, they raised their slightly relieved minds and less vacant faces, and asked, what all that tumult in their peaceful neighbourhood meant, but the crisis the next moment relapsing in right earnest, the answer was lost upon the deepening embarrassment and abstraction of their minds. Once again, and but once, when one game was concluded, and the pieces were being arranged for another,—this is the time when players take a leisurely pull of the hookkabs they had left off their hands, and discuss the battle closed—how far, in what proportion, generalship and good fortune influenced the issue, how the best tactician as well as dashing warrior must fail when fate made a dead set against him—and deliver other like observations—it was then only that they turned their backs to see the fight—it was but for a moment, and then they turned their backs again to resume their play with a look of profound pity for the multitude crowded to an amusement so supremely tame, which was eminently rich. For the rest, they were in that state of mind in which the player at another cognate game, the chess, being informed by a messenger who had run from his house to tell him that his son had been bitten by a deadly snake, pertinently enquired—"whose snake?"—in that state in which the absorbed philosopher was when, without budging an inch or doffing his clothes, he was continually calling out for his servant to take the grate away whence his garments had caught fire. Why, even now, you could see that couple of sharp youngsters acting the part of lookers on, pretending to follow the game with all imaginable earnestness, but really intent on dislodging the ready tobacco-and-fire-pots (chilms; Bengalice, kolkis) from the hookkabs of the players and pulling at them from theirs, while the others fancied they smoked as they vainly plied their cold lifeless steam engines.

From a distance, through the interstices of a bush, I had descried a great cloud of dust raised by some bulls bounding to and fro. When I reached the scene, the dust had subsided, the bulls I found were three. It was a single combat. Two only were engaged, and I could not with certainty discern the functions of the third—whether it was an umpire or simple spectator like ourselves, whether it was excited by the sight, or whether it was burning to join the fight—there it was—in the ring but not fighting—not fighting but far from inactive—watching the struggle mad with a terrific restlessness—now clearing the path of the belligerents of all bush and prickly shrub and now ploughing up the field with its effective horns, now going out of the ring and out of sight altogether, as if it would not return, and again suddenly entering appearance with greater fury than ever, now bounding and butting and savagely charging the bystanders, as if for their impertinence and barbarity in quietly looking on and enjoying while two of its race—perchance two brothers—inflicting such dreadful wounds upon one another, and anon raising a genuine bull war-cry which sent all children unto the arms of their mothers a-crying. But the combatants themselves—oh the horrid combatants! Perfectly bullish! There they are,—the heads of both resting on the ground, the horns of each planted into the head of the other—in a statuesque stillness, yet in an attitude scaring, by its downright significance—one of the eyes lacerated by fearful incisions of horn but uncomplaining, and all flashing not fire but lightning! You speculate on the perfect stillness in the unmistakable hostility of the situation. You hear they have been hotly engaged over half an hour in which the black elderly gladiator has had much the worst of it, having been pushed to a corner and then felled to the ground and bayoneted, though not rendered out of time. Of course, they are now taking breath. Five—ten—fifteen minutes. The spectators, erewhile breathless with the excitement of expectation of some great coup, give way to symptoms of disappointment—some sit down on the ground, some call for the pipe of peace, some yawn, others crack jokes, and others again, more knowing, turn about and cast their eyes for a moment on faces and bosoms they may not have another opportunity equally good of beholding. Some among the mob of the Bhadracracy, wearied with dancing attendance, joined the younger rowdy plebeians in imitating the bovine battle cry and pelting the bulls with brickbats in order to rouse them to action; but against this savage amusement some plebeian Nestors, I was glad to note, raised their voice with all but complete success, only one young gent, picqued at the humane remonstrance of the plebs, continuing to make a show of pelting after the others had desisted, and defending himself on the adroit plea that the pelting would have the effect of separating the belligerents and ending the demoralizing sight! Vain conceit! the hypocritical "swell" was dying for the moment the brutes would begin again to dig each other's frame!

Meanwhile, the lovers and the sweethearts and the gallants are looking out. Opportune moment blessed interregnum for them! Monee is intently watching her tall Durwan of the opposite Baboos', who, in a pair of embroidered Cabul shoes, a nice clean dhootee, a peeran, an embroidered cap, and a piece of fine scarlet broadcloth passed across his shoulders—all these elements of dress of such quality as his masters rarely venture upon—and feeling himself in the presence of her love, and of beauty-dom,—is flourishing his great moustache, which would be Napoleonic if it had been less Hindustanee, and she congratulates herself on the excellence of her taste as she finds his head stand 6 inches above the tallest gallant in the assembled beaudom, and half his moustache outweigh the jungle on the upper lip of the whole fraternity. That dwarfish little sans-hair—a gallant in his own way—has drawn his spotted Cashmere over his head, lest, if the feathery world spare him, some of the old maids who wanton with him—rather than he with them—strike his inviting head with the fallen flowers and undeveloped little fruits of the coconut tree. Ráyi—tusked Ráyi, who would frighten away any number of children who had not been accustomed to her characteristic anatomy, Ráyi, the Soorponakha of Barnagore, and the great spoiler of its young men and old, who is always thrusting her love upon gentle or low,—was in high feather, and busy at her game.

But the Bulls? They had not moved. Though more than an hour had passed. There they remained a spectacle as before, like stuffed animals articulated in the attitude of engagement in a museum. Human patience could stand it no more, and the crowd dispersed. For myself, the first indications of the evening dew warned me back to my dormitory.

THE BEHAR CADASTRAL SURVEY.

The blue-book on the Behar Survey concludes with the following despatch from Lord Cross, dated 24th December, 1891 :—

My Lord Marquis,—I have considered in Council the important papers forwarded with your letter, No. 85, dated 28th October, 1891, concerning your decision that a cadastral survey and record-of-rights should be effected in four districts of North Behar, namely, Mozufferpur, Durbhanga, Sarun, and Chumparun.

2. Chapter X. of the "Bengal Tenancy Act, 1885," empowers the Local Government, with the previous sanction of the Governor-General in Council, to direct that a survey be made and record-of-rights be prepared for any local area in Bengal. Proposals for undertaking this work in Behar have been discussed for some years, and three successive Lieutenant-Governors of Bengal have held that the relations of landlords and tenants in Behar will never be placed on a secure and definite basis, until the land is surveyed and rights are recorded. This general proposition may probably be applicable to a great part of Bengal, and it is certainly true of North Behar, where an extremely dense population subsists by agriculture alone, where the competition for land is severe, where the average rental has been enhanced since 1840* by 114 per cent., and where landlords are exceptionally strong and tenants are exceptionally weak. Experience in other parts of India has shown beyond the possibility of doubt that until an accurate and authoritative record of landed rights is prepared, tenants cannot be protected in the enjoyment of the rights which the law declares that they possess, and the maintenance of which is essential to the prosperity and contentment of the country.

3. In the permanently settled districts of the Benares Division, adjoining North Behar, a field survey had been made and a record-of-rights had been prepared 40 years ago; yet in 1878 it was decided that "a re-survey and a revision of the record-of-rights was essential to the well-being of the peasant classes in those districts and was expedient from a political as well as from an administrative standpoint." In 1877, when the work had begun, the Local Government expressed its hope that "the result would be a decrease of litigation and a settlement once for all of quarrels that for years have been the bane of many villages." When the Local Government reviewed the work in 1889, after the survey and record-of-rights for the five districts had been completed, the Lieutenant-Governor was able to say that there could be "no doubt" regarding "the necessity of the work of survey and record, and the value of the results, although much litigation took place before rights were finally ascertained and recorded. And it did not appear from the five voluminous reports on these operations that any section of the landed classes objected to the work or to the results thereof.

4. After the investigation and record-of-rights in the Benares Division, the Local Government was able to say that there did "not appear any reason to suspect the existence of rack-renting" in those districts. The land is mostly divided into very small properties, and many of the land-owners were said to be "of a status differing little from that of tenants." But in North Behar much of the land is held by large landowners, and the experimental survey, effected in North Behar during 1877 over an area of 411 square miles, showed that the great increase of rents during the last 20 years was not justified by the extension of cultivation, or by any improvements in the fertility of the soil, or by the rise in the price of staple produce. Mr. Collin, who conducted the survey operations, reported that the enhancement of rents in the tract he had investigated had been "obtained from the most part arbitrarily, and on no fixed principle, and had not been legally obtained." The raiyats' consent to enhancements had, he added, often been obtained "by concealment of facts . . . and by improper pressure upon the raiyats." There seems no reason to doubt that the tract surveyed in 1877 was fairly typical of North Behar, and the need for a survey and record-of-rights is probably much stronger in that tract than it was in the Benares Division.

5. The Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, while he is decidedly of opinion that the survey of North Behar ought to be undertaken, warns your Government that the landholders as a body will disapprove and oppose the measure; that the indigo planters will not be unanimously in its favour; that the leading raiyats, some of whom are now holding their land on favourable terms, will oppose the survey and record-of-rights, while the majority of raiyats will not appreciate the benefits of survey, will certainly dislike the temporary trouble and expense that will devolve upon them, and in any case, are unable to make their voices heard through the same channels as the landholders.

6. The main arguments urged against the survey appear to be three, namely :—

- (1.) That it will harass the people, and cause ruinous and unnecessary litigation.
- (2.) That it is unnecessary, as the gradual working of the Tenancy Act is giving protection to the raiyats.
- (3.) That, if the survey is made, the Government ought to pay for it from the public treasury, and ought not to compel the landowners to bear the cost.

As to the first point, it may be admitted that in the districts of the Benares Division the preparation of the record-of-rights was attended with a good deal of litigation; but the disputes which came to a head were in existence, they were not fomented by the survey, and the information obtained at the survey enabled the Settlement Officer and the Courts to settle those disputes once for all. It is not possible to forecast with certainty the course of litigation during the North Behar Survey. Concerning the experimental survey in Mozufferpur Mr. Collin wrote :—

"The number of objections filed were 3 per cent. of the number of separate holdings, but it sometimes happened that one petition contained objections to the entries of rent payable by, or to the area of land held by a number of raiyats. The number of objections is therefore not strictly a test of the extent to which the records were disputed; nor is it a test of the litigation due to the survey, for a number of objections were disposed of without dispute. It would be fairer to take the number of contested objections which became civil suits, and which were made into suits between the individual parties. The number of such contested objections was a little less than 3 per cent. of the number of holdings. As the landlords and raiyats were given copies of their jamabandi slips, and had every opportunity of disputing the correctness of the entries, the small proportion of objection suits may be taken as a proof that the work was generally correctly done. It is a proof, moreover, that the proceedings were not calculated to give rise to unnecessary disputes or needless litigation. This result cannot but be considered satisfactory, when it is remembered that it was anticipated by some that the survey and settlement would (to quote the words of the late Babu Kristodass Pal) plunge the country into a flood of litigation, stir up the worst passions of both the landlord and the tenant, open a wide door to perjury and forgery, and throw the agricultural population into a sea of trouble, expense, and loss."

During surveys made by the Bengal Court of Wards in recent years it has repeatedly happened that differences regarding rates of rent and holdings have been amicably adjusted by compromise between landlords and tenants, and these operations have not led to any serious increase of litigation between zemindars and raiyats on Wards' estates. It will be remembered also that precisely the same predictions were made seven years ago by the opponents of the Bengal Tenancy Bill; they said that the new law would set class against class and would flood rural Bengal with a sea of litigation. Five years have passed since the Tenancy Act came into operation; and the Board of Revenue have been able to report year after year that the Act has not caused any serious increase of litigation or agrarian trouble.

7. As to the second point, it is quite true that the Bengal Tenancy Act has wrought a great and valuable improvement in the legal status of the majority of Bengal raiyats. But in North Behar a vast number of the raiyats will not reap the advantage of the law until their status and rights are authoritatively ascertained and recorded. It was probably a surprise to the landed classes in Behar, landlords as well as tenants, and it was perhaps somewhat of a surprise to the revenue authorities, when the experimental survey in Mozufferpore revealed that 91 per cent. of the rayyets possessed tenant rights of a valuable kind. As might be expected, the rayyets are reported to value the extracts from the record-of-rights which certify to their status, and to have been disappointed at the closing of the cadastral work in 1877. I see no reason for doubting the correctness of the late Sir Rivers Thompson's view, who, as Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, wrote :

* At para.69 of Mr. Collin's report on the experimental survey in Mozufferpur, it is said that "the greater part of this increase has taken place within the last 15 or 20 years."

"No matter how excellent and liberal the rights provided for by law may be for such a population as we have to deal with, it cannot be doubted that, until a record of rights shall have been completed, the peasantry will, to use Sir John Strachey's words, remain the victims of chicanery and oppression, and our Courts will be systematically made use of for the perpetration of injustice."

8. In regard to the third objection, it is true that in other parts of India the general treasury bears the cost of a cadastral survey and record-of-rights. But in temporarily settled districts the treasury reaps an immediate increase of land revenue as the result of these operations ; and so it is just that the cost should be borne by the general taxpayer. Although in the permanently settled districts of the Benares Division the landed classes were not called upon to pay directly for the recent re-survey and record-of-rights, it must be remembered that one-half the costs of those operations was defrayed from the unexpended balance of a special fund contributed by the landholders. The other half was paid from the general treasury. In the case of North Behar it is proposed that the general treasury shall bear one-eighth of the cost, the remainder being defrayed half by the landlords and half by the tenants. The reason for thus limiting the State share of the cost is apparently because the decision of 1877 regarding the cost of the Benares survey is regarded as an unnecessarily liberal concession ; and because the land revenue paid at present by the Benares districts is very much heavier than that paid by North Behar. The North-West Provinces Government Orders of the 15th of June, 1889, show that the five permanently settled districts of Benares pay on the average a land revenue of 26½ annas for each acre of cultivated land, and that the total land revenue amounts to 39 per cent. of the corrected rental. At present there is no precise information of this kind regarding North Behar ; but I am informed that the land revenue there probably does not exceed 10 annas per acre, and perhaps does not exceed 20 per cent. of the total rental. I consider that there are good reasons for the treasury bearing a smaller share of the cost of the Behar survey than it did of the Benares survey. But if on reconsideration your Government should decide to undertake a larger proportion of the total cost, I should be prepared to accept such a decision most readily.

9. After a careful consideration of the whole subject, I cordially concur with your Government in accepting the decision of the Bengal Government that a survey should be made and a record-of-rights should be prepared in North Behar. When the work is once begun, it should be prosecuted with all the economy and expedition that may be possible without impairing the correctness of the result. I trust it may be found possible to train and employ in the undertaking a considerable number of Behar villagers, so that the survey may leave behind it an indigenous agency capable of maintaining correct field maps and records hereafter. I am confident that your officers will do all in their power to make the survey operations as little irksome to the people as possible. But some little disturbance to the people is inseparable from such an undertaking ; and it is therefore desirable to carry it through as promptly as possible.

10. In previous correspondence much stress was rightly laid on the necessity for arranging that the record-of-rights should be duly corrected and maintained year by year, when once it has been correctly prepared. I am glad to see that you are keeping this requirement in view, and that the Lieutenant-Governor promises to report hereafter his definite recommendations. I observe that, while he does not propose to establish in Behar a complete village accountant (patwari) agency and system of the North India type, still he hopes to devise a simple and economical plan for entering year by year in the record-of-rights all changes of tenures or tenancies, and all changes in the rent demand. I shall be glad to receive further report from you on this subject, and also respecting the recovery of the survey expenditure from the different classes interested.—I have, &c., (signed) Cross.

* Note.—The estimate is framed thus :—The land revenue of North Behar is Rs. 34,96,000. The cultivated area in the permanently settled districts of the North-West Provinces is 69 per cent. of the total area. If we take the same proportion, the cultivated area of North Behar would be 69 per cent. of 12,500 square miles (8,100,000 acres), or about 5,589,000 acres. This makes the land revenue fall on the cultivated area at 10 annas per acre. The average rent-rate in the tract of the Mozufferpur experimental survey was Rs. 3¼ per acre. But the rents of some parts of North Behar are probably considerably below that rate.

No. 21, dated India Office, London, the 15th July 1886.
From—Her Majesty's Secretary of State for India,
To—His Excellency the Right Hon'ble the Governor-General of India in Council.

I have considered in council the letter of your Excellency in Council, No. 8, dated 4th of May last, on the subject of the cadastral survey and record of rights in the Mozufferpore district of Behar, and of the Bill to amend the law relating to canoongoes and patwaris in the Lower Provinces of Bengal.

2. My predecessor in council, while agreeing to the proposed experimental operations in Mozufferpore, directed that the cost should be borne wholly by the Government Revenues, remarking that, "as the measure at present is purely experimental, it would not be right to lay any part of the expense on the people."

3. You state that you are not willing to incur this expense from the General Revenues, and you consider that the proposal to charge it on those revenues is "tantamount under any circumstances, and especially under existing financial circumstances, to a withdrawal of the sanction to a survey and record of rights."

4. You submit certain explanations with a view of removing the objections of my predecessor in council to the levy of a cess to meet the charge, and you state that, unless these explanations should be sufficient to remove the objections, the only course to pursue is to abandon the experiment.

5. The explanations submitted, do not, in my opinion, remove the objections to levying a tax on the land for an experiment which your present as well as your previous letter shows to be not only not desired by the persons interested in the land, but to be strenuously opposed by them, whether Zemindars or rayyets.

6. I agree with you therefore that the only course to pursue is to abandon the proposed measure for the present.

From—C. J. Lyall, Esq., Offg. Secretary to the Government of India, Revenue and Agricultural Department,
To—The Secretary to the Government of Bengal, Revenue Department.

In continuation of my telegram No. 451, dated the 16th July, I am desired to forward, for the information of His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor, copy of a despatch from the Secretary of State, No. 21 (Legislative), dated the 15th idem, in which His Lordship has decided that the cadastral survey and record of rights in the Mozufferpore district should be abandoned, and that the Patwari Bill, now before the Legislative Council of His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor should not be proceeded with. A copy of the despatch of the Government of India, to which Lord Kimberley replies (No. 8, dated the 14th May, 1886), is also enclosed.

2. The purport of the Secretary of State's decision should be communicated to the persons whose memorials on the subject of the Patwari Bill were forwarded to the Government of India for transmission to His Lordship with Mr. MacDonnell's letter No. 378T---R, dated 4th May 1885, and Mr. Macpherson's letter No. 1477T---R dated 9th September 1885.

3. I am now to enquire what measures His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor proposes to take to bring the survey and record of rights to a conclusion and to ask for a report on the work which has been accomplished by it. It appears from a communication* received from the Surveyor-General that an area of 412 square miles has been surveyed during the past field season, but that this area encloses 93 square miles, of which the cadastral survey was postponed. The Government of India would be glad to learn whether the Lieutenant-Governor thinks it worth while, in order to make the work compact before removing the survey party, that this internal area should now be cadastrally surveyed. I am also to ask whether, in view of the Secretary of State's refusal to authorise the levy of any fresh taxation for the purpose of reorganising and improving the efficiency of the patwari staff, His Honour can suggest any practicable measures, in the nature of those referred to in the paragraph 8 of my letter No. 130R, dated 3rd March last, for utilising the already existing patwaris, whose maintenance by the Zemindars is required by the law as it at present stands.

4. As it is necessary at once to take measures for the disposal of the survey party hitherto employed in Mozufferpore, I am to request that a very early answer may be furnished to the first and second questions in the preceeding paragraph.

ASRUKANA is a collection of poetical pieces of singular pathos and beauty of expression * * * It is a series of mournful songs that the reader is here presented with and they must touch a sympathetic cord in every heart that can feel. There is a singular appropriateness in the title of the work and in its pious dedication to the memory of the husband of the fair writer.—The Indian Nation.
Bengal should be proud of this poem.—The Calcutta Review.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

AFTERWARD.

O STRANGE, O sad perplexity,
Blind groping through the night ;
Faith faintly questions can there be
An afterward of light ?

O heavy sorrow, grief and tears,
That all our hopes destroy ;
Say, shall there dawn in coming years
An afterward of joy ?

O hopes that turn to gall and rue,
Sweet fruits that bitter prove ;
Is there an afterward of true
And everlasting love ?

O weariness, within, without,
Vain longings for release ;
Is there to inward fear and doubt
An afterward of peace ?

O restless wanderings to and fro,
In vain and fruitless quest ;
Where shall we find above, below,
An afterward of rest ?

O death, with whom we plead in vain
To stay thy fatal knife ;
Is there beyond the reach of pain
An afterward of life ?

Ah yes ; we know this seeming ill,
When rightly understood,
In God's own time and way fulfil
His afterward of good.

LOVE'S SACRIFICE.

AN old man lived by the Solent Sea ;
With his little daughter alone dwelt he ;
The light of his life was the little maid,
And truly his deep love she repaid.

One eventide she heard him say
That a seaweed would take his pain away ;
For he tossed at night on sleepless bed,
And this weed would soothe him to sleep, he said.

On one rock alone did this rare weed grow,
Which could only be reached when the tide was low ;
Far out on the sand in the ebb it stood,
And the green sea foamed around, at flood.

Soon as the dawning's dusky light
Broke on the darkness of the night,
The little maid was on the beach ;
The tide was low, the rock in reach.

She climbed its top and grasped the weed,
With joy to help her father's need ;
But all her strength could only move
One root—small trophy for her love.

Forgetful thus of self, too late.
She stayed ; but tide for none will wait,
And silently the sea had come
To claim the maiden for its own.

One startled glance revealed her doom ;
She thought of father, love, and home—
For her no more. The hungry sea
Soon high above the rock will be.

The waters quenched that life of love ;
But, darkened here, 'tis bright above,
And far beyond the sunny skies,
She gathers flowers in Paradise.

Waiting and sad, her father sate
Within their cottage-garden gate,
For her, his love, his life's one light,
Now sadly quenched in darkest night.

No tidings came. As evening fell,
He sought the beach she knew so well.
He called—no voice in answer came,
But mocking echoes of her name.

The winds awoke ; the angry tide
Swelled on the beach—but still he cried
To her all night, till eastern skies
Again aroused earth's miseries.

The dawn fills up his agony,
And with a loud, heart-broken cry,
He found his darling at his feet—
But the little heart had ceased to beat.

The salt spray kissed her forehead white ;
The seaweed, with its colours bright,
Wove her a winding-sheet ; her hair
Lay tangled in its beauty rare.

He knelt, and raised her from the sand ;
But, when he took her little hand,
Ah, what a tale of love he read !
The small right hand, now pale and dead,
Still tightly clasped the charmed root,
Of love, of life, of death, the fruit

THE LOGIC OF LOVE.

I. Her respectable papa's.

'Dy dear, be sensible ! Upon my word,
This—for a woman even—is absurd.
His income's not a hundred pounds, I know.
He's not worth loving.'—But I love him so.'

II. Her mother's.

'You silly child, he is well made and tall ;
But looks are far from being all in all.
His social standing's low, his family's low.
He's not worth loving.'—And I love him so.'

III. Her eternal friend's.

'Is that he picking up the fallen fan ?
My dear ! he's such an awkward, ugly man !
You must be certain, pet, to answer "No."
He's not worth loving.'—And I love him so.'

IV. Her brother's.

'By Jove ! were I a girl—through horrid hap—
I wouldn't have a milk-and-water chap.
The man has not a single spark of "go."
He's not worth loving.'—Yet I love him so.'

V. Her own.

'And were he everything to which I've listened ;
Though he were ugly, awkward (and he isn't),
Poor, lowly-born, and destitute of "go,"
He is worth loving, for I love him so.'

WEEKLYANA.

TWENTY-SEVEN years ago, our spirited citizen, Baboo Jadu Lal Mullick, a grandson of the famous millionaire Baboo Nimai Charan Mullick, celebrated with befitting éclat the annual autumn worship of the family idol, named Singhobahini Debee—the Lion-riding goddess. This goddess is worshipped by the different members of that family by turns ; Baboo Jadu Lal's turn came again this year. It has been a year of drain for him. Within a few months of one another his mother died and one of his sons was married, and these are expensive events in the life of a Hindu. Notwithstanding, Baboo Jadu Lal has scarcely shown any disposition to stint in the present worship. There have been Nautches in his newly built palatial residence in Pathuriaghatta Street, commencing from the 15th and continued daily up to the end of last month. Invitations were issued to all the Hindu, Mahomedan and European gentlemen throughout the town and suburbs and the entertainments attended every evening by the élite of society. A great many priests have received gifts in money and clothing, and other guests, including relations, been daily treated in sumptuous style. Members of the Sonarbania caste to which the Baboo belongs have also been presented with suitable dresses, and, above all, from 1,000 to 2,000 beggars daily fed during those 15 days.

The whole programme was worthy of the wealth and position of the richest descendant of Nimai Charan Mullick. May God preserve Baboo Jadu Lal for another 27 years to celebrate the next Pooja on a grander scale !

THE storm raised over the election of Sheik Bechu as a member of the Calcutta Corporation, has subsided. It commenced with the prosecution of Sheik Nubbi for false personation at the polling-booth and his conviction. That conviction was followed up with an application for the trial of Sheik Bechu and his friend Baboo Preonath Mullick for abetment of the offence proved against Nubbi. That again was succeeded by another for prosecution of the three for perjury. The result of all these various attempts shews that Baboo Preonath more than Sheik Bechu was the object of the attentions of the prosecutions. The Babu has purchased peace for himself and his friend by resigning his office of member of the Corporation. The charges against them have been withdrawn, or dismissed. Babu Preonath goes out of the Corporation but Sheik Bechu remains. Nothing would have forced him to resign. He is a match for all his pursuers.

FROM this week, the day for the departure of the mail from Calcutta is Wednesday and not Tuesday.

THE Sealdah Magistracy seems more determined to put down the phooka than the Northern Police Court of this city. While our Northern Magistrate's highest punishment has reached Rs. 20—double the sum with which he commenced—the Sealdah court has just fined a man Rs. 50 and ordered rigorous imprisonment of 3 months for another.

A PARAGRAPH is going the round to the effect that cabbage has always been said to be a cure for intoxication, though this is the first time we hear of it. It is added that the Egyptians ate boiled cabbages before their other food if they intended to drink wine after dinner, and some of the remedies sold as a preventive of intoxication on the continent contain cabbage seed.

IN La Lumiere Electrique, M. d'Arsonval gives interesting information with respect to electrical fishes, confining himself especially to the Gymnotus electricus and the Raia torpedo. The former is the more formidable of the two. The electrical apparatus of the Gymnotus is situated underneath, the positive pole at the head and the negative at the tail. This fish folds itself into a circle so as to complete the electric circuit round the body of its prey and give it a violent shock which stuns it. M. d'Arsonval possesses a Gymnotus which can discharge sufficient electricity to magnetize electro-magnets. In this animal, the electrical discharge is continuous and uni-directional. Not so the torpedo, which you can touch without receiving a shock, unless it is irritated. The electricity is generated only at the will of the fish and is not always ready for discharge within its organs.

SHORTLY before his death, the late Mr. D'Arcy, Conservator of Forests, N.-W. P. and Oudh, had completed his "Notes on the Preparation of Forest Working Plans." His widow now reaps the benefit. The Government of India have sanctioned the payment to her of Rs. 1,000 for the useful little work.

THE rain fall at Castle Rock this year is registered at 400 inches, the heaviest on record.

ONE Mrs. Lambert, residing at Ekbalpur Road, was brought up before the Alipore Police Court charged with defrauding Government by executing a maintenance bond, in favour of her daughter, Miss Winnie McKeon, on an insufficient stamp. She pleaded guilty but claimed, as a British-born, to be tried by a European Magistrate. She was ordered to produce evidence, and the case stands adjourned.

THE ways for making money are endless. Not long ago we mentioned to our readers the artificial creation of cripples in Europe. We thought that the queerest and most strange business. But there is a queerer, stranger. The inventiveness of the Celestials transcends the sharpness of the races of Christendom. We read :—

"There are many curious trades in the world, but the most strange must surely be the 'artificial manufacture of wild men.' Yet a well-known English doctor in China has just certified from his own personal experience that this art is regularly practised in the Flowery Kingdom. First a youth is kidnapped, then bit by bit he is flayed alive, and the skin of a dog or a bear grafted piece by piece upon him. His vocal chords are next destroyed by the action of caustic to make him dumb, and the double purpose causing 'etiolation' of the skin and utter degradation of the mental faculties is effected by keeping him immured in a perfectly black hole, for a number of years. In fact, by treating him like a brute for a sufficiently long time he is made into one. At last he is exhibited to the entirely credulous Chinese as a wild man of the woods, and his possessors reap a rich harvest. The priests, it seems, are adepts at the art. When a kidnapper, however, is caught by the people he is torn in pieces, and when the authorities get him they torture him and promptly behead him. Such is life under the rule of the Son of Heaven."—Daily Chronicle.

Truly, indeed,

—for ways that are dark, &c.,
The Heathen Chinese is peculiar.

By notifications Nos. 3631-J. and 3633-J., in the Gazette of India of September 24, 1892, the Governor-General in Council takes power, for the purposes of the exercise of civil jurisdiction within, and in respect of, the cantonment of Secunderabad and the Hyderabad Residency Bazars, to direct the transfer of any particular civil suit or appeal or proceeding pending before

(a) the Resident at Hyderabad, by virtue of his jurisdiction over the said cantonment or the Bazars, to the Judicial Commissioner of the Hyderabad Assigned Districts, or

(b) any Civil Court having jurisdiction within the said cantonment or the Bazars and subordinate to the Resident at Hyderabad, to any other Civil Court of equal or superior jurisdiction subordinate to the Judicial Commissioner of the Hyderabad Assigned Districts, whenever it appears to the Governor-General in Council that such transfer will promote the ends of justice or tend to the general convenience of parties or witnesses.

The Court to which such civil suit or appeal or proceeding may be transferred shall, as far as may be possible, regard being had to the law for the time being in force and administered in the said cantonment or the Bazars, deal with the same as if the suit or appeal or proceeding had been initiated in such Court.

SUNLIGHT has now been calculated to be 6,00,000 times greater than full-moon-light.

IN the prosecution for defamation against Mr. Balakistna Chetty, a member of the Madras Municipality, by its Health Officer, Dr. Nield Cook, for the remark, namely, that, from the time that they had ceased to have Civilian Presidents, not only the Sanitary Department, but the whole Municipality, was notoriously corrupt, the defence pleaded privilege. The Magistrate held that the occasion was indeed privileged, but that the accused had, by his recklessness, rendered void the privilege he might have claimed for the utterance, and sentenced him to a fine of Rs. 250 or two months' simple imprisonment. In other words, the Magistrate ruled that the Municipal Commissioner was privileged, but he could not claim any privilege against the Health Officer.

OUR OWN NEWS.

TO-DAY is the Vijayā—the day of final consignment of the great Doorga group of statues of gods and goddesses to the river. It is sacred to Peace and Fellowship and Good Will. May the spirit of this day reign in the hearts of all our readers and all our people and the whole population of the Indian Empire and the whole British World!

This is our last issue for the season. We now respectfully take our leave. After a fortnight's rest, we will make our appearance again on the 22nd October.

A DEPUTATION from the Church Missionary Society waited on Lord Rosebery to urge the retention by the British Government of Uganda. The Foreign Minister promised the consideration of the matter, but he was at the same time unwilling that the nation should be drawn into a venture, when it is not clear where it will end.

A BRITISH man-of-war has been ordered to Vladivostock to enquire into the recent seizures of Canadian sealers by a Russian cruiser.

THE proposed Lord Roberts mission to the Amir is viewed with distrust in Russia. The Novosti regards it as harmful to Russia and likely to lead to the absorption of Afghanistan by the British, thus cutting off from Russia the route to the Indian Ocean. This, the paper adds, would create a much graver motive for going to war than the Pamirs question.

HASHIM ALI still refusing to surrender, the troops under General Lockhart have been ordered to the front.

IN the August number of the North American Review appeared an article from the pen of the Duke of Argyll, in which he compared the Home Rule movement to the attempt made by the Southern States to ruin the integrity of the nation. In the present number, Mr. Gladstone replies to the charge, and vindicates Home Rule.

CHOLERA has shewn itself at Riga.

SIR Grant Duff has at last commenced to write himself down. He has found a notable solution of Russophobia. In the United Service Magazine he recommends a written alliance of peace between the Powers of Europe. He thinks that it easier to secure the peace of India by assisting to maintain peace in Europe than by attempting to meet Russia alone. At the same time, he considers it a hopeless task to try to convert the electors to his view.

NELSON'S old ship the Foudroyant had for many years been lying up at Devonport as non-effective, and recently been purchased by a German firm and taken to Swinemunde. The English nation has now awakened to the duty of bringing her back. The sum required is six thousand pounds, for which the Lord Mayor has opened a fund. It would have been more to the purpose to detain the art collection carried off by the Court of Russia and the Chambers Sanskrit MSS. carried off by the King of Prussia.

EXCESSIVE drills and inspections have driven the First Life Guards stationed at Windsor to mutiny and rage. Eighty saddles were found, on the morning of the 26th September, to have been cut, and the men were confined to barracks. A later telegram says only twenty-four saddles were slightly damaged, the men alleging that they were unfit for use. No arrests have been made.

THE Monarchists in France held a banquet at Montauban. A representative of the Comité de Paris declared that the Monarchists were unable to conform to the Pope's injunction to renounce Monarchy. He proposed a union of the Catholics in France at the next elections, in view of a large and united majority.

IT is telegraphed from London that at a meeting on the 24th September, the Cotton operatives passed a resolution against the proposed five per cent. reduction of wages. The meeting was, however, in favor of assisting the masters to curtail production. There was a conference of Cotton masters and men at Manchester, in which they could not come to any conclusion. The masters declined to curtail production and the operatives refused to accede to a five per cent. reduction of wages.

THE Currency agitation has gained a step. The Home Government is of opinion that the Government of India is free, independent of Parliament, to deal with the currency question. But, we fear, nothing can be done without orders from Home, and our Finance Minister Sir David Barbour considers that the solution of the difficulty is a common standard of value for England and India and the adoption of a double legal tender by international agreement. Any action of the Government of India is sure to be opposed by those in India who are for allowing things as they are. The Government on the spot can no longer be silent. They must speak out.

AMONG our next cold weather distinguished visitors will be the minor Maharaja of Gwalior and the Prime Minister of Nepal. The latter comes on the invitation of Lord Roberts to visit the Camp of Exercise.

IT is telegraphed from Constantinople:—

"Official contradiction is given to the statement recently made by the Armenian correspondent of a London newspaper that by order of the Sultan a modified or mutilated version of the Koran has been printed. It is declared absolutely impossible that the text of the sacred book, which millions of Mussulmans know by heart, should be altered, especially by him who, in his capacity as Khalifa, is called upon to be solicitous for the scrupulous observance of its tenets. The Committee of Indian Mahomedans in England has also written to the papers denying the rumour and denouncing those who invented it."

In consequence of the general ignorance, the contradiction was needed. But any one who knows sufficiently of Islam must have laughed at the Armenian's nonsense. The man simply does not understand what he talks about. A Dodd's Beauties of the Mahomedan Scriptures, a Bowdler's Koran which may be placed in the hands of any lady without fear of its hurting her modesty, would be just the things in Christendom, but it is out of the question in Islam. The idea is absurd—outrageous. So even in Christendom would be the idea of a similar treatment of the Bible. If the Koran contains matters that would raise a blush in beauty's cheek, much more does the Bible. Yet no Pope or Archbishop or Reformer has ever proposed to purge and purify the Christian Scriptures of their grossness. Islam is more conservative than Christianity. Such a proposition with regard to the Koran would strike Mussulmans with horror. Unless we are greatly mistaken, not even the Sultan could venture on interfering with the text of the holy volume of Divine utterance. The feat was found impracticable even in the earliest days. Otherwise, Persia would have had a different Koran.

THE Health Officer of Calcutta, Dr. W. J. Simpson, having urgent call to go to England, applied for and obtained six months' leave, and the Municipal Commissioners at his suggestion appointed Dr. J. O'Brien as his locum tenens on Rs. 600 per mensem, and allowed an increase of Rs. 250 to the Assistant Health Officer, Dr. R. Sen, in addition to the latter's substantive pay of Rs. 250. Dr. Sen was to carry on the entire administrative work of the Health Department, and Dr. O'Brien, who is holding the post of Professor of Anatomy and Second Surgeon in the College Hospital on a monthly salary of Rs. 1,250 and is also a Municipal Commissioner, was to officiate as the Health Officer, with liberty to practise and perform the duties of his Government appointment and thus to devote as much of his time to municipal work as he could spare from his other duties. Dr. Simpson was to get 750 Rs. being half of his pay of Rs. 1,500, and the remaining half of his pay, plus 100 Rs. which he got as horse allowance, was to be distributed as above mentioned. On the proposal being forwarded for the sanction of the Government of Bengal, the Lieutenant-Governor disapproved of this arrangement, and Mr. Risley communicated the views of Government to Mr. Ritchie in the following terms:—

"As regards the proposal of the Commissioners to appoint Dr. O'Brien to act, as Health Officer, during Dr. Simpson's absence on leave, I am to say that the proposal seems to the Lieutenant-Governor to be open to objection in more ways than one. It is a retrogression from a position taken up when it was decided that a whole time officer was required to do justice to the work: and Dr. O'Brien has already important and onerous duties to perform as a Government servant, which must prevent his giving any large portion of his time to the work of Health Officer. Sir Charles Elliott would therefore much prefer if the Commissioners can find any suitable medical officer who can devote his whole time to the work, as locum tenens to Dr. Simpson."

At a special meeting the foregoing letter of Government came before the Commissioners for consideration, the Chairman formally proposing that the resolution of the last meeting be reconsidered in the light of the Government letter and that endeavours be made to seek a whole-time officer by advertisement. A discussion ensued in which the difficulty of securing a whole-time officer for such a short spell as six months was dwelt upon. Thereupon Dr. Sanders proposed an amendment, that the Assistant Health Officer, Dr. Sen, be appointed to officiate for Dr. Simpson, with authority to appoint a consultative officer, paying him whatever his consultation fee may be. Several Commissioners approved of Dr. Sanders' suggestion. Mr. D. R. Lyall, however, observed that in the event of the Commissioners voting for Dr. Sen, they would be stultifying themselves. Dr. Sen might be a very capable man, but at the last meeting the Commissioners had resolved that he was not sufficiently qualified for the appointment and had therefore appointed Dr. O'Brien to officiate for the Health Officer. It was, besides, paying Government a very poor compliment and was certainly not in compliance with the request of Government to appoint the Assistant Health Officer. At the last meeting they had agreed to Dr. O'Brien's appointment as Health Officer, with Dr. Sen in administrative charge of the office. Now they threw Dr. O'Brien out and put Dr. Sen in his place. Mr. Ritchie said that he was quite taken by surprise at Dr. Sanders' proposal, and he was of opinion that there was no chance of Government accepting such a resolution. A warm discussion followed, and ultimately Dr. Sanders' amendment was put and carried by a majority of 22 to 17.

This business was not a creditable exhibition of Local Self-Government. Nearly all the men of weight and sense of responsibility voted against the arrangement. Mr. Lambert spoke warmly against it and Mr. Lyall made a telling speech exposing it, while the Chairman reminded the meeting of its futility. All to no purpose. Neither argument nor warning had any effect upon a foregone conclusion.

In the volume of minutes of the Calcutta University for the year 1891-92, just published, we find the following item in the proceedings of the meeting of the Syndicate held on the 14th November 1891, under the presidency of the Hon'ble Mr. Justice Gooroodas Banerjee:—

"178. On the motion of Nawab Abdool Luteef Bahadur, it was RESOLVED—

That the following alteration in the B. A. Pass Course in English for 1893 be notified in the Gazette:—

For "Bacon—Essays" and "Thackeray—English Humourists" read "Bacon—Essays, omitting the Essays on Unity in Religion, Boldness, Atheism and Vicissitude."

"Thackeray—English Humourists, omitting the Essay on Prior, Gray and Pope."

The above evidently refers to what the Nawab mentioned in his speech at the Medressa meeting, reported by us on September 17, that it was at his instance that certain text-books of the University, containing imputations against the Mahomedan religion were, if not wholly eliminated, at least purged of their poison, that is, prescribed minus the objectionable parts. The most grateful acknowledgments of his community are due to Nawab Abdool Luteef Khan for his action in this connection and the vigilant watch in general maintained by him over the interests of Islam.

UDIPI SRINIVASA CHARI, a native of the South Canara District, aged about 22 years, was a cook in the service of a Malukdar in Aska. He was seen one afternoon in the company of a boy of seven or eight years who wore, among other minor jewels, a gold necklace worth Rs. 80, the lad being the son of a guest of the master. The boy was missed shortly after. In the search that followed, the parent and others asked the cook to get into a well and search the boy. Udipi obeyed and brought out the body of the deceased boy with all the jewelry except the gold necklace. The cook was suspected of the murder of the boy and the theft of the necklace, and charged accordingly. It is said that in the police enquiry, the prisoner produced the necklace from under a mat. The prisoner pleaded entire ignorance of the death and the theft. Notwithstanding, he was convicted of murder and sentenced in the Sessions Court of Ganjam to transportation for life. There was an appeal to the High Court. The Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Handley, after hearing the Public Prosecutor, for the prisoner was unrepresented, confirmed the conviction and sentence and dismissed the appeal. In ordinary course, there would have been an end of the matter. But it was not to be so. A few days after, the Chief Justice having conceived doubts as to the justice of the order, called for the record, perused it and came to a different conclusion. Convinced that he had made a mistake, he was ready to make the necessary reparation. He communicated his doubts to his colleague who, however, saw no reason to amend the order. In this situation, the Chief Justice openly intimated in court to the Public Prosecutor that the case would be taken up anew and heard by a third Judge, Mr. Justice Parker. It requires courage no doubt to confess a mistake like that, but the man who, conceiving a doubt would not go carefully into the matter again, or who convinced of error could not from vanity rectify it, is simply unfit for the bench. Madras is fortunate in a humble, human Chief Justice.

JAPAN is extending her silk trade. In 1887, Yokohama exported no more than 3,979 pieces of silk fabrics. Last year the total was 1,00,108. The export of silk handkerchiefs during the same period rose from 312,902 to 1,074,458, while the increase in silk work exported was over 60 per cent. in the five years. This accounts for the decline of the Indian silk.

At the instance of Captain F. Beauclerk, of Hyderabad, the Poona Second Industrial Conference has adopted the following extraordinarily-worded resolution on the Currency Difficulty:—

"That having consideration to all facts, internal as well as external, of the Empire's present social and economic condition, and especially to the indebtedness of the rayyet, and the absence of trade disputes about wages, no settlement of the currency seems to be in the interests of India that enhances the value of rupees beyond the market rate, and that it would be dangerous to attempt such; but that having consideration for the trade and other advantages, especially with regard to imported capital, of a stable gold exchange, it is advisable to consider the whole question impartially in all its bearings. This Conference, however, thinks that the subject is very little understood and the Government will be well advised to commit the matter to a commission of experts, to take evidence on all matters that mutually concern production in India, and the standards of value in silver and gold-using countries with which Indian trade is conducted. The Conference fears that unless this commission sits and takes evidence in India, important facts may be overlooked, without full consideration of which no correct conclusion can be come to."

Having consideration to this, that, and the other; but having consideration for one, two and three! Having consideration to all the facts of the Empire's condition, especially to the indebtedness of the rayyet [why not, to the rayyet's indebtedness?] and to the absence.....; but having consideration for the trade and other advantages, especially with regard to,..... Such is the diction and such the construction. The matter is of a piece with the manner. The Conference cannot be accused of any rashness. It does not commit itself to much of an opinion. Its voluminous Resolution is a veritable mountain in labour. After all, its threatening array of "consideration to" and "consideration for," the Conference resolves that "no settlement of the currency question seems to be in the interests of India that.....," but that after all, "it is advisable to consider the whole question impartially." An unimpeachable doctrine as true in Currency and political economy in general as in astronomy or acoustics, as sound in art or belles lettres as in science. Surely, it is always advisable to consider the whole question—whatever it may be—impartially, in all its bearings. Only, no ghost of a grandiloquent Industrial Conference was needed to discover that truth. The concluding advice to Government to make over the question to a conclave of experts, is of the same character. And this is the great Poona Palaver of all the Wise Men of the East to regenerate our country and people!

AN upcountry contemporary's London staff sends a notice of Thomas Cooper, the Chartist, in which "the Purgatory of Suicides" is called "an epic poem." These London literati deserve to be sent to the Purgatory of presumptuous ignorance. They might as well have called Cooper's Poem a Pindaric Ode.

THE late Earl of Dudley provided in his will for the sale of his collection of pictures. They were offered to the public at Christie's on June 25 and realized £101,320. Here are some of the principal lots as given in an English paper:—

"View in Holland," by Hobbema and A. van de Velde, 9,600 gs., Agnew; 'Travellers passing through a Wood,' by Hobbema, 2,300 gs., Martin Colnaghi; 'The Enamoured Cavalier,' by Mieris, 3,400 gs., Vokins; 'Interior of a Kitchen,' A. Ostade, 2,500 gs., Agnew; 'St. John preaching in the Wilderness,' Rembrandt, 2,500 gs., P. Colnaghi; 'The Ruin,' Jacob Ruysdael, 1,400 gs., Lesser; 'Halt of a Sporting Party,' Wouvermans, 3,500l., C. Wertheimer; 'Panel from a Triptych' attributed to J. van Eyck, 3,400 gs., Vokins; 'La Vieja,' Murillo, 1,800 gs., M. Castagni; 'Virgin and Child,' Fra Angelico, 850 gs., Seidelmeyer; 'Madonna,' with a landscape background, Giovanni Bellini, 1,100 gs., Agnew; 'a fine example of Canaletti,' 1,950 gs., Agnew; 'and a View on the Grand Canal,' by the same, 2,100 gs., M. Castagni; 'Virgin and Child,' with St. John, Lorenzo di Credi, 2,400 gs., Vokins; 'Virgin and Child,' Carlo Crivelli, 7,000 gs., Murray; 'La Simonetta,' Filippino Lippi, 1,600 gs., M. Nattali; 'The Crucifixion,' Raffaele, 10,600 gs., Dr. Richter; 'La Vierge de Novar,' Raffaele, 3,050 gs., J. Reid; 'Mother and Child,' Titian, 2,400 gs., Mond."

In seven years, sixteen pictures have been sold at Christie's for over 5,000l., totalling 118,156l., or an average of 7,384 each. Here they are:

1886 Rubens.....	£7,200	1889 Hobbema.....	£5,460
Carlo Dolce.....	6,600	1890 Turner.....	7,450
1887 Boucher.....	10,395	Paul Potter.....	6,095
Gainsborough.....	9,975	1891 Turner.....	7,450
Turner.....	6,825	Meissonier.....	6,772
Millais.....	5,250	Watteau.....	5,400
1888 Rosa Bonheur.....	5,827	1892 Raphael.....	11,130
Landseer.....	5,197	Hobbema.....	10,080

We may here add that Raphael's "Madonna di San Sisto" was purchased by Augustus III. King of Poland for 22,000 crowns. Murillo's "Conception of the Virgin," the greatest of his religious paintings, was acquired by the French Government at the sale of Marshal Soult's collection for 615,300 francs—about £25,000. Raphael's "Crucifixion," which at the Dudley sale fetched 11,130l. had been officially valued by the Director of the National Gallery, Sir Frederic Burton, at 115,500l. But probably the highest price fetched by a painting was paid eight years ago to the Duke of Marlborough for a Madonna of Raphael—some seven lacs of Rupees!

ONE of the commonest tricks of Anglo-Indian genius is to invent samples of the so-called "Baboo English." The result is not unfrequently a weak decoction of Anglo-Indianese. "Baboo English" is no doubt a remarkable phenomenon. But it is an extensive field. There are kinds and degress of it. Broadly divided into two kinds, there are the ambitious University Babooese and the modest unclassical jargon. The former is figurative and allusive, discursive and philosophical, bristling with wise saws and foreign phrases, and specially rich in Shakespeare. But it is not necessarily ungrammatical. The other description is plain, matter-of-fact, but nonetheless unintelligible, in many cases for the most part. We have ourselves received a communication in the latter tongue. As a genuine article, and withal not without value as a linguistic curiosity, we lay it before the reader:—

HONOURED SIRS,—With due respect and humble submission I beg most respectfully to solicit your kind favour, that your honour will be kind enough to do the necessary consideration of the following matter and issue its necessary order for your poor servant.

On the 18th instant I send 2 Carts of Teak Timber to Serampore in day time. My Cartmen were arrested for what reason I am not sure of it. Only I heard one Cartman was loaded on his Cart some Paper which his Cart at once put his cart on my Bull's leg which they make dispute to each other Cartmen which my Bull at once useless and rest other Bull of mine was killed by his Buffalo. My cartman take his 2 Buffalos and reached the Timber to the party on their return was arrest by the Police one Cartman of mine was not in the quarrel he foolishly arrested by Police Sook Deb Sing my brother.

I have the honor to be
Hd. Sirs
Your most obedient servant

THE Indian Daily News the other day recorded the death of its city editor, Mr. H. H. Hills. He was a broker but not doing a roaring business. He, as usual, employed his leisure in instructing the public on commercial and monetary subjects through the press. Thirty years ago, he was Secretary or Managing Director of the Company which owned the Bengal Hurkaru newspaper. This had been the property of Mr. Samuel Smith, once the prince of newspaper proprietors, when his paper was one of the two leading dailies of Calcutta, a position which it maintained down to the mutinies of 1857. Those events were disastrous to the press as to other business, and Mr. Smith died in poverty. The Company too, like Mr. Smith, failed and the paper was purchased by old Mr. Mendes, the wellknown Portuguese or Eurasian auctioneer of Cossitollah (now Bentinck Street.) Mr. Mendes was a rather remarkable man. He had a passion for trade and property speculation, and engaged himself in various lines of business, but, being in his way a capital man of business, he managed to succeed in most things that he undertook or took over. Curiously enough, though no man of letters, not to say an illiterate man, the business of journalism had as great a fascination for him as for the late Mr. Robert Knight. Mr. Hill was connected with many newspapers before he joined the staff of the Indian Daily News.

AFTER a lapse of half a century, Dr. Arnold, of Rugby fame, has been adjudged one of England's great men and is to be awarded a place in Westminster Abbey. It has been resolved that the monument shall consist of a seated figure, or bust, or medallion in high relief. It took as many years for a public memorial to Lord Byron.

Dr. Arnold was a man of note and some size. But he was no genius in contemplation nor hero in action. He was a thoroughly respectable character. He was a sincere Christian and would have been a thoroughly liberal politician but for his peculiar views on Church and State. His nature abhorred everything mean and ungenerous. When Dr. Hampden was persecuted for his Rampton Lectures, he took up the cudgels in behalf of the Doctor in a memorable article in the Edinburgh Review of tremendous passion. As an author, he will be remembered for popularising Niebuhr in England. His best work was as Head Master of Rugby, and his best monument is his pupil-friend Stanley's Life of his Gooroo.

Holloway's Pills.—Impurities of the Blood.—To ensure health it is absolutely necessary that the fluids and solids of the human body should be kept free from those impurities which are continually getting admission into the system by erroneous living, unwholesome atmosphere, or disordered stomach. The only safe and certain way to expel all impurities is to take Holloway's Pills, which have the power of cleansing the blood from all noxious matters, and at the same time removing any irregularities which their presence may have already produced in any organs. Holloway's Pills expel all humours which taint or impoverish the blood, which they purify and invigorate, and give general tone. They are applicable to all alike—young or old, robust or delicate.

THE long-and-much talked of charity of Maharaja Jotendro Mohan Tagore of Pathuriaghatta, is now an accomplished fact. He has made over to the Treasurer of Charitable Endowments a security of the Government of India of the 4 per cent. loan of the subscribed value of one lakh of rupees, for such support and maintenance as the terms imposed will allow, of impoverished Hindu widows of Calcutta and its suburbs. The charity is to be called "Maharajmatah Sibasundary Dabee's Hindu Widows' Fund." Though founded in the name of his mother, it is to be an appenage of his hereditary title of Maharaja. It is to be administered by "a Committee consisting of the Maharaja himself, or the representative of his own hereditary title of Maharaja Bahadur, the Chairman of the Corporation of Calcutta, the Chairman of the Native Committee of the District Charitable Society, Calcutta, and the Chairman of the British Indian Association. The Committee are required to relieve as many widows as possible, the monthly payments being restricted to Rs. 4 and 3 from the interest of the security. "The recipients are to be selected by two or more members of the Committee, provided, however, that no person shall be admitted to the charity without a certificate from two respectable residents of her neighbourhood, stating that she bears a good character and is a worthy object of charity." The Bengal Government is charmed with the charity. The Government Resolution in this week's Gazette says:—

"The charity is remarkable in itself for its munificent endowment, the peculiarly Hindu purpose which it serves, and the distinctly Hindu character of its dedication. It is also interesting as the first application of property in trust for charitable purposes, under the provisions of Act VI of 1890."

The Resolution then sums up the charity of the Maharaja's life: "This splendid donation merits the warmest approbation of Government, and it affords the Lieutenant-Governor the very greatest pleasure to acknowledge the beneficent liberality of the Maharaja Bahadur, who has thus increased the claim to public gratitude which he had already established by making a free gift of a portion of the land on which the Mayo Hospital is built, and by giving handsome donations in aid of that institution, and of the Lady Dufferin Victoria Hospital and building."

The date of the official announcement lends an additional grace to the certificate.

MR. Edward Manson, of the Middle Temple, has published a neat little work entitled "Bramwelliana; or, Wit and Wisdom of Lord Bramwell." It contains an excellent photograph of his lordship, underneath which is the following quotation from the speech he made at the banquet on his retirement:—"If I had the choice whether to be a great or a good judge I would prefer the latter."

Lord Bramwell had the weakness of posing as one who never cared for popular applause. It is related that—

"On one occasion some observation in a charge to a jury was received with applause. The judge paused a moment, and then said quietly: 'I recall those words, I must have been saying something foolish.'" (27, Law Journal, p. 317.)

That joke is an antique.

Lord Bramwell gave a different character to Chief Justice Cockburn, saying:—

"Chief Justice Cockburn indeed, who liked a page of the Times daily devoted to him and his performances, picked out of the general list cases which would afford him the gratification; but no other chief ever did."

Cockburn could not have been the orator that he was—the greatest on the British bench—unless he had shared to the full the amiable weaknesses of common humanity. After all, such a character with all its weaknesses appeals to the general heart of mankind more than does the cold austerity of the cynic.

POPULAR assemblies are often guilty of as great excesses and absurdities as the worst of princes. The most signal illustrations were offered by the great French Revolution which first asserted in the Old World the sovereignty of the People. The mob of conscript fathers of New Zealand has lately gone in for the most remarkable instances of stupid puerility in our times of any popular chamber. We read in the English papers:—

"Considerable amusement was caused in the New Zealand Legislative Assembly on the Speaker reading the correspondence respecting the petition to the Tzar of Russia. Last session, on the motion of Sir George Grey, it was resolved to approach the Tzar, urging the claims of the Russian Jews to more humane treatment. The resolution was sent in the form of a petition to Lieutenant-General de Richter, the Tzar's aide-de-camp, who has replied that by his formal instructions he is not authorized to receive petitions or addresses from representatives of foreign countries with reference to questions, concerning the internal administration of the Russian Empire, and he is, therefore, compelled to return the address without having submitted it to the Emperor."

Each country has its peculiar humour. The humour of these New Zealanders is to laugh against themselves. There is probably no other people who are amused at their own humiliation.

Go-ahead and no mistake is the American eagle—in every respect. The Roman bird is as obsolete as the Dodo; the double-headed monster of Russia is a formidable savage—that is all. But for variety of resources and capacity for progress as well as for puiissance, commend us to the North American fowl! John Bull the Great himself must bow the head before Brother Jonathan. As for Nicholas Frog and Lewis Baboon and Cousin Michael and the rest, they cannot hold a candle to him. The superiority of the Americans is patent in every thing. Favoured sons of Nature, they are great all round—in the little and the bad as well as the great and the good. Nothing like them and theirs for size! Their districts are provinces, their provinces—kingdoms, their country quite a continent; their rivers are almost impassable barriers, their cascades are sublime cataracts, their lakes are seas, their seas—oceans. Their own works are on the grandest scale. Politically, they are a multitude of states artificially bound together. Their progress has been unprecedented—their enterprize and invention are without parallel. Morally, they present opposite extremes. A generation back, the spirit of freedom and the spirit of slavery freely and familiarly hobnobbed with one another. Nor is the conflict between light and darkness over yet. In that land of anomaly which, proud of a Constitution the first article of which declares that "all men are created equal," kept down another race of men in bondage vile, the most extraordinary diversities prevail. Education and spirit are common but not morals. It is a land of religion and infidelity—of saints and sinners—in which the professed saints are gross polygamists—in which the Heathen Chinese is an angel before the heathen Yankee or the Christian filibuster. If the Penbods of America beat the charitable donors of the Old World, there are in our Hemisphere no such accomplished knaves, desperate villains and utter brutes as the United States bradmashes. The British Eugene Aram has been surpassed by the American Dr. Webster, while the circumstantial evidence on which the scientific murderer was brought to the gallows is a triumph of American detective skill. The faint-hearted criminals of other lands are dominated by some instinct of propriety. They usually respect certain places and occasions. No such weakness with the American evil-doers. They never hesitate to perform their operations in the open day, or the illuminated night, in the theatre the court of justice, the legislative chamber, or even the house of God. Here is the last characteristic feat in American depravity:—

"A tragedy unexampled in its sensational features occurred in the city of Mexico on the 2nd August. John Palmeyre, a well-to-do young farmer of an adjoining district, was married to a Miss Alice Muller, the daughter of a country doctor. The marriage was attended by a good many friends, and among them John Ellias, an Ohio man, who had courted Miss Muller for several years, but in vain. When the engagement between the young couple was announced Ellias made some threatening remarks, but as he and Palmeyre had been friends for some years, and appeared to be on the best of terms then, no notice was taken of his remarks. The wedding took place at a little country church, and afterwards the party returned to the residence of the bride's father, where a banquet was laid out, and where later on in the evening a country ball was given. The bride had danced once or twice, when Ellias asked for the privilege of a waltz. She made some remarks to her new husband about its being 'her last' dance, and accepted. In a moment the two were spinning round the room, when suddenly while the young girl was still dancing with him, Ellias was seen to disengage his left hand, draw a revolver from his pocket, and raising it quickly to her forehead, blow her brains out. The whole thing occurred so quickly that the girl could never have realized what had happened. She fell dead to the floor, her bridal dress saturated with blood. John Palmeyre was the first to spring towards the murderer, but, before he could reach him, Ellias fired again and lodged a bullet in the young husband's chest, from which he must die. Then, before he could be prevented by the horrified guests, Ellias put a third bullet through his own head, and actually fell dead upon the corpse of his partner in the waltz of a few moments before."

Murder is as old as the issue of the first man. Even single act dramas embracing three homicides including a suicide, from time to time startle us. But such a diabolical series of triple murders has probably never occurred before. Homicidal vindictiveness is common enough, and there are brutes who spare not the object of their former love. But this Ohio Ellias is the very devil incarnate.

WHY SHOULD INDIA PAY?

AN uppretending little letter appears in the London Daily News which deserves more than a passing notice. It is as follows:—

"WHY SHOULD INDIA PAY."

SIR,—In your leading article this morning on the new Cabinet, you remark: 'Economists will observe that the double appointment given to Lord Kimberley (Secretary of State for India and Lord President of the Council) saves the country from the payment of the salary attached in the ordinary course of things to the functions of President of the Council.' I hope I may be considered an economist in the sense implied by you, but I confess that I for one should have observed Lord Kimberley's double appointment with increased pleasure if it were not the fact that the salary attached to the functions of Secretary of State for India comes out of the pockets of the Indian ratepayers. Will you permit me to respectfully suggest for Mr. Gladstone's consideration that his lordship should draw part of his salary from the English Exchequer and part from the Indian—2,000*l.* from the former and 3,000*l.* from the latter? A saving to the Indian Government of even 2,000*l.* per annum is not to be despised in these hard times, when the rupee is down to 1*s.* 2½*d.* It is sometimes forgotten in England, though never in India, that the entire cost of the India Office, including the salaries of the staff, from the Secretary of State to the charwoman, is a charge on the Indian revenues. The recently published home accounts show that the amount for last year was no less than 227,985*l.* The emoluments of the Secretary of State, Under-Secretaries, members of Council, &c., alone came to 134,070*l.* Some of us who are not adherents of the National Congress fail to see why, in regard to all events to the official Parliamentary representatives, India should be treated differently from the Colonies, but that opens up a larger question, and my object now is simply to recommend a slight rearrangement by which a small measure of justice may be done to our Asiatic fellow subjects.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

S. DIGBY.

Northbrook Indian Club, Whitehall-gardens, August 17."

That is an opportune little service of no small importance, for which the Indian Empire ought to be grateful to Mr. S. Digby. The extravagant Home Charges ever waxing, without let or hindrance, are the millstone on the people which crushes them. The British sojourners in India had never cared about the burdens of the people until they were yoked to bear the same. Even when the Income Tax was first introduced in India by the late Right Hon'ble Mr. James Wilson to the universal dissatisfaction of the people, the Europeans made a virtue of the necessity of the hour. It was a time when, with the recollections of the Mutinies and all their horrors still fresh, the European community hated the natives as if every one of them was a Pandy implicated in the massacres of Delhi and Cawnpore and in the unmentionable outrages that never happened. At that time, because the natives complained of the new inquisitorial impost, the Europeans thought themselves bound to support it. They delighted to contrast their enlightened and patriotic readiness to undertake the necessary burdens of the state with the barbarous and disloyal attitude of the natives, who, by their own rebellion and the necessity of reconquering them, had involved the Empire in debt and financial embarrassments. But the citizenship of spite could not be a lasting policy. The practical operation of a measure is different from the theoretic view of it. The most scientific impost is not, perhaps, a jot easier to bear because of its strictly scientific or even equitable character. Their actual experience of the new tax disillusionized the Europeans; its recommendations according to "bookish theorick" no longer sufficed; all their political and sentimental sympathy for it vanished. They would no longer remember that there were any natives in the matter. By the time that the tax came to be introduced a second time, the Europeans' feeling had changed. They not only thought the complaint of the natives reasonable, but were almost prepared to join them in a united protest. Since then, indeed, notwithstanding racial and social separation, and political differences, the Europeans have shown a distinct tendency to sympathise with one of the chief grievances of the natives—the inordinate costliness of the administration. The principal plank on the financial side of the platform of pure Indian politicians, is the impeachment of the authorities for waste of resources involved in the plethora of Home Charges and the readiness to engage in unnecessary Little Wars on the Frontiers, and sink millions in speculative frontier defences and colossal military preparations in view of a future contingency which may not happen within a measurable period, and which, at any rate, may be better provided for, and far more cheaply, by strengthening our position within—a waste which has already made the Income Tax—confessedly a burden of grave emergency, not to say a war tax,—a permanent burden on the people and is the source of other demands on the subject population. Whatever grounds may exist for the Military Expenditure, the same cannot be alleged for a great part of the Home Charges. As regards the former itself, though Military Expenditure must be incurred, Military Extravagance—the making ducks and drakes with the people's money in the name of the defence of the Empire—was certainly not needed at all. The people cry in the wilderness for relief. Formerly, the very merchants and tradesmen and others, who represented European civilization in the East, did not pity them. It is the pressure of the Income Tax that first opened their eyes and their hearts to the people's grievance. Still it was regarded as the special concern of the natives. Since then, the accelerated depreciation of the currency—the hastening ruin of the Rupee—has quickened their apprehension. Already, there is a talk of rapprochement between the two classes. The truth is, the Exchange Difficulty has affected the whole question of the finances of the Empire. Intelligent men see that such a currency relation as has steadily been going on between the mother-country and the Dependency, means only loss to the latter. And that loss means only increased burdens on the tax-payer. Much as the native publicist or orator may inveigh, and not without reason inveigh, against the Home Charges, a good part of them is a necessary evil. Establishments at Home are required and must be paid for. It is their extravagant scale that riles us, and their tendency to spread and absorb more and more of India's resources. Another fruitful source of increase of these Home Charges is this depreciation of the currency itself. We are in this desperate situation that, even if the Home Charges remained stationary, our charges on them must increase! Those Charges being all in British Currency, in making our payments for them in our own coin, we have to find more and more Rupees as silver steadily goes down.

That is a cruel position to be landed in. But there is no good in fretting. Let us all combine to extricate ourselves out of this Currency shoal, if possible. In the mean time, let us husband all our resources. Let us stop waste. Let us not be ashamed of cheeseparing and haggling. Let us take care of the pence, and though that will not lead the pounds to take care of themselves, we shall, at any rate, save many shillings, the aggregate of which comes up to a respectable sum. It is on that account that we hail good Mr. Digby's letter. If he could be a sort of Joe Hume in Indian affairs without the House, he would do more good than many ambitious orators within.

The immediate question raised in Mr. Digby's letter, is worthy of the practical attention of our politicians and our friends, the more so as a convenient avenue to the larger question which he names just to burke for the moment. That other question concerns not a paltry saving of £2,000 a year—welcome as even that would be—but very much more. It concerns not only the full salary of Her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for India, but also the salaries of the Under-Secretaries and Deputy and Assistant Secretaries and all the Assistants and Clerks of every grade—in fact, the whole India Office Establishment charges. There is no reason in the world for saddling India alone with the whole cost. England ought in fairness to bear a part. The point ought to be urged on the conscience of the Liberal ministry. There is no reason for treating India differently from the Colonies, except that the Colonies can speak whereas India is dumb, that the Colonies are powerful and would stand no nonsense and India is weak and must submit. But this is not the reason of Liberal politics, and it is not enlightened government.

HOWRAH.

Shibpur, Sep. 23.

A sensational case of much importance in which one Kalachand Nuskar, by caste "Podh," of poor means, charged one Gocul Chunder Gangooly, of respectable connections, with having enticed away his alleged lawful wife of prepossessing appearance from his legal protection, came on for hearing, on Saturday last, before Mr. Grierson, the District Magistrate of Howrah. This was a reference-case from the Court of Baboo Brojodullub Huzrah, under section 349, along with a judgment to shew that Gocul was found guilty of the charge framed against him, but he deserved to be punished more severely than what Baboo Brojodullub Huzrah is empowered to inflict under section 489 as a Deputy Magistrate of 2nd class powers. Mr. D. White, barrister-at-law, assisted by the experienced pleaders of the Court, appeared on behalf of the accused Gocul Chunder Gangooly, and Baboo Asutosh Bosh, pleader, for the prosecution. The Court was unusually crowded on the occasion and Mr. Grierson was obliged to order his chap-rasis to clear the Court. The learned counsel for the defence made short work of the case. After some preliminary observations, he pointed out that the prosecution had utterly failed to prove that Nando Dassi is the lawful wife of the complainant Kalachand Nuskar, and that in the absence of proof of marriage the case could not proceed. The Magistrate was satisfied and at once discharged the accused. The crowd outside the Court house on hearing the news of acquittal burst out in thanks to Mr. D. White for his advocacy which did not occupy more than three quarters of an hour, and went away almost surprised, with such conscience as is illustrated by one of the eminent thinkers of the West in—"A housemaid may be deterred from going to meet her lover in the garden, because a howling ghost is believed to haunt the laurels; but she will go to him fast enough when she discovers that the sounds that alarmed her were not a soul in torture but the cat in love."

A VISITOR.

AN ENQUIRY.

SIR,—I have read with great gusto your able and learned article on the Hyderabad case in which Mr. S. M. Mitter, whom I suppose to be a near relative of a native Civilian of Bengal, is just now involved. In the course of this admirable article, you have as Nestor of the Indian Press, alluded in somewhat ambiguous terms, to the noble service rendered by a Calcutta gentleman to Babu Surendranath Banerjee at the time of the acceptance of his bail in the contempt case. As a biographer of Babu Surendranath, I respectfully solicit you to publish the full name and designation of that noble-hearted gentleman who stood bail for him in that famous case, when he was deserted by the "crushing crowd" of false admirers and friends and left to chew the cud of bitter disappointment at that dangerous hour of severe trial and peril.

HYDERABAD AND THE ELECTION OF MR. DADABHOY NOWROJI, M. P.

[Translation of the opening speech in Urdu, delivered by Nawab Mohsin-ul-Mulk, Political and Financial Secretary, H. H. the Nizam's Government, as President of the Public Meeting held at Secunderabad, on the 5th September 1892, to express the gratification of the general community at the election of Mr. Dadabhoi Nowroji as a Member of Parliament.]

GENTLEMEN,

I thank you from the bottom of my heart for the honour you have done me in selecting me to preside at this meeting. I assure you I cannot find any words that can adequately express my gratefulness to you for this great distinction. It cannot but be a source of pleasure and pride to any person to be chosen as the mouth-piece of a large and representative assemblage like this, consisting of people belonging to different countries, communities, and creeds, and characterized by a great diversity of thoughts and sentiments. I feel this pleasure and pride to a higher degree as I am conscious of being in no way deserving of the favor you have done me in asking me to take the chair this evening. For a Mahomedan to be called upon to preside at a meeting of this kind, with which, as would appear to a casual or superficial observer, the Parsees in the first instance, and after them the Hindoos would be specially concerned, is an eminent proof of the fact that these communities are fully alive to the pernicious and fatal consequences of national differences and religious distinctions, and are not only sincerely prepared to discard them, but to give practical proofs of their willingness to put them entirely away; whilst, on the other hand, for a Mahomedan to consent to take the lead on an occasion like the present clearly indicates that the community, to which I have the honour to belong, is always ready to co-operate and sympathize, without any prejudice, jealousy, or religious intolerance, of which it is generally unfairly accused, with the other communities of India, on every suitable occasion, in every beneficial undertaking, in every deserving cause, and, in fact, in every matter conducive to the welfare of the country at large, and not calculated to injuriously affect the condition or interest of any particular class or section.

Gentlemen, as you are well aware, we are assembled here to-day to express the sense of honour we feel in consequence of the election of one of our honoured and esteemed countrymen as a member of the Imperial Parliament, and, in so doing, to practically demonstrate the increasing interest and delight we take in all that concerns our rights, aspirations, and objects, to declare our sincere gratitude to the electors of Central Finsbury for the independence and freedom from prejudice they have shown in electing as their representative a man alien to them in race and religion, and, above all, to manifest the deep loyalty and devotion which bind us indissolubly to the throne of Her Majesty the Queen Empress. All these are objects on which the meeting may be rightly congratulated, and on which many hope-inspiring prophecies for the future may be founded, especially when one takes note of the fact that people differing so widely from one another in respect of race, religion, nationality, profession, and opinion are here collected together in harmonious concord, displaying a wonderful unanimity of purpose and identity of views. It is indeed a pleasant and edifying sight to behold Hindoos and Mahomedans, Parsees and Bengalees, Madrascas and Deccanees, Sikhs and Brahmans, the rich and the poor, all sitting shoulder to shoulder, inspired by one thought and actuated by one motive. Would to God that this union were real and lasting, and, that in spite of all differences of faith, creed, or custom, there may be a perfect agreement of thought and feeling on all subjects connected with the well-being and progress of the country. Let the Brahmin paint his forehead with his peculiar mark of distinction and sing his hymns in his temple, let the Lingayet hang round his neck the holy Ling and offer his prayers to Mahadeo, let the Parsee, with his sacred thread round his waist, believe that fire is the emblem of God, let the Sikh heartily blow his conch shell and shout huzzas to his Gooroo or spiritual guide, let the Mahomedan from his mosque proclaim with gusto the summons to prayers and cry out Allah-o-Akbar or God is great, but may they never be at variance on any point that affects the welfare, honour, and advancement of their country; may they never, by their thought or action, offer the least impediment to any laudable undertaking that has for its object the good of the land they live in; and may they always join, as they have done today, with one heart and one voice, in all works likely to prove advantageous to the community at large. When such an union has been effected amongst the different communities of India, we may consider that God has at last grown merciful towards the country, and wishes to shower His blessings on that considerable class of his creatures who greatly outnumber the inhabitants of some of the largest and most flourishing states of Europe. But until this union is consummated, it is futile to expect any real and abiding progress, and national honour must always remain an idle dream.

Gentlemen, I have used the expression national honour, but what meaning does that phrase convey? People ordinarily think that high lineage and descent, wealth and grandeur, power and influence, estates and emoluments, medals and titles, are marks of honour. But no mistake can be greater. Is a man necessarily honourable because he has been born in a noble family, because he has unlimited resources at his command, because he exercises sway over a number of men, because he lives in a splendid palace with all the pomp and circumstance of a prince, because he is a Knight, a Baronet or a Doctor of Laws, because he enjoys a Jagir or Mansab, or because he is dubbed a Jung or a Dowla? No, none of these accidents is a real claim to honour, which truly springs from a well-ordered mind, a spotless heart, singleness of purpose, steadfastness of will, resignation, fortitude, patriotism and sympathy with humanity at large. May a man be a Syed or a weaver, a Brahman or a Sudra, a peer or a pauper, a prince or a peasant, may he dwell in a castle or a cottage, may he ride on stately elephants and fleet horses or bestride a humble donkey, if he is endowed with the qualifications above mentioned, he is a man to be rightly honoured, and some of this honour is reflected on the family to which he belongs. Similarly that community, which boasts of having several men of this stamp, gains honour to itself, and the country, whose different communities and classes can each produce such men in any appreciable number, must be considered as upholding its national honour. Although India at one time could truly lay claim to such national honour, when she could point to hundreds and thousands of her sons endowed with those qualifications which bring honour in their train, yet even in these degenerate days, she is not wanting in men who are the pride and ornament of the community and country to which they belong. And among these is our worthy friend Mr. Dadabhoy Nowroji who has achieved the honour he so well deserves, and to congratulate whom on that honour we are met here today. He is not a nobleman or millionaire by birth, but belongs to a humble yet respectable family. He only received the ordinary education imparted in our schools and colleges, but from his early boyhood displayed considerable quickness of intelligence and great aptitude for learning and improvement. As he advanced in years, he gained a name for himself by the active and enlightened interest he took in all movements of reform, and the unflagging zeal and sympathy he evidenced in whatever was calculated to promote the welfare of India. Indeed the material and moral amelioration of the country of his birth has always been his watchword and motto, and with that goal steadily in view he has boldly grappled with all difficulties in his way, and has not seldom succeeded in overcoming them by the force of his talents and ability. Although at one time he reached the highest stage of worldly honour to which a native of India could ever aspire, that is to say, attained to the dignity of the Prime Minister of an important Native State in India, yet, as he had never set his heart upon that as the object of his life, he did not regard it as the final fulfilment of all his wishes, or the crowning achievement of his lifelong exertions. India's welfare continued as much his absorbing passion as it ever was before, and the fire of sympathy for the Indian people burned in his breast with the same ardour that it had hitherto displayed. Gentlemen, I will not detain you with a long history of the life and doings of this remarkable man, as most of you are probably well acquainted with it, but I hope you will permit me to describe the rather singular way in which I first came to know him some 25 years ago. You will perhaps be surprised to learn that my acquaintance with him dates so far back. You will wonder how we managed to come into contact with each other at a time, when, as you know, I had not set foot in the Deccan, and when he had not yet had an opportunity of paying a visit to the N.-W. P., where I had till then remained. Gentlemen, it was altogether a one-sided acquaintance. It made me fully acquainted with Mr. Dadabhoy, whilst he was entirely ignorant of who I was. This happened in 1867 in the following manner. In that year, a few enterprising and sympathetic men in England and India had established a society, under the name of the East Indian Association, for the discussion of Indian matters, and for the suggestion of means and measures for the improvement of the condition of this country. If my memory does not fail me Mr. Dadabhoy was the Secretary of this Association, and he read before that body an excellent paper, well-reasoned, and impressive. A translation of it was published by our venerable and esteemed Sir Syed Ahmed Khan in his paper, the Aligarh Institute Gazette, and I read it with great attention and interest. That was when education and enlightened ideas were just beginning to cast their morning rays in that part of India where I come from, and people had just commenced to hear of civilization, patriotism, and things of that kind. I cannot describe to you, gentlemen, the effect produced on my mind by the perusal of that able and instructive paper. Since then I have seen many more of Mr. Dadabhoy's literary productions, and kept myself in touch with all that he has done or attempted in the course of his useful public career, but I had no opportunity of forming a personal acquaintance with him till 1888, when, fortunately, I was deputed to England on a special mission by His Highness the Nizam's Government. As a result of my actual intercourse with him, I found that his ability and worth were still greater than what they appeared to be merely from the accounts one heard of him, and that the qualities both of his head and heart exceeded even the high estimate I had previously formed of them.

Gentlemen, Mr. Dadabhoy's election as a member of the Imperial Parliament is one of those many astonishing events, which have been witnessed in the present century. As you are all aware, we have, during the course of the last hundred years, actually seen accomplished many things which no one previously dreamt of, and which were, indeed, considered absolutely impossible. If there were any persons, who believed in their feasibility, or endeavoured to bring them about, they were set down as maniacs and lunatics. It is in this century that the steam engine was invented, steam ships launched, railways constructed, distant countries united by submarine telegraph, the Suez Canal built, and the phonograph devised. Among wonders such as these must be included the fact that a black man has found admission into the ranks of the white, and, cutting his way to a seat in Parliament, has placed himself on an equal footing with Englishmen. Mr. Dadabhoy has shown that all difficulties disappear before firmness and perseverance, and that nothing is impossible for courage and exertion to achieve. Would you not have thought the man a fit inmate for Bedlam, who had told you, some 35 years ago, that a black man could enter Parliament? Would you not have laughed at the very idea? But today we see that very idea realized. It has become an accomplished fact, an astonishing fact, indeed, like many others, but, all the same, a fact worthy to be recorded in history.

Gentlemen, it is not so very long ago that Englishmen and Natives of India were considered altogether such distinct species, that it was thought there could be no relationship between the two, and that if any could exist, it must be of the same kind as that existing between a man and brute. So deeply was this notion implanted in the minds of men, that it was even supposed that white men were the creation of the Almighty and that black men were manufactured by the Prince of darkness. But it is now gradually being demonstrated that both are the subjects of the same sovereign, both possess equal rights, and to both is open the path to progress. There is only one difference, and that is that Englishmen have attained to maturity, whilst the natives of India are still in their boyhood; the former have, by their civilization and enlightenment, by their courage and perseverance, already overcome many of the obstacles that block the way of a nation's advancement, whilst we have but just learned to walk, and manage to keep ourselves on our legs. Still, however, we have amongst us a few that can run and keep company with Englishmen, and among these is Mr. Dadabhoy, whose success at the hustings shows that he can hold his own against any Englishman. But, gentlemen, giving every credit to Mr. Dadabhoy for obtaining this success, I cannot but say that I doubt whether the credit is entirely his. I believe that the electors of Central Finsbury have a claim to a large portion of the honour, which this success reflects, because it is due to their independence of thought and freedom from prejudice that Mr. Dadabhoy now enjoys the privilege of being a member of the highest governing body in the realm. If we go further and look at the matter more deeply, we must confess that it is to Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen-Empress and the British Government that we are indebted, in no small measure, for the result over which we are rejoicing. It is only under the peaceful, just, and sympathetic rule of a sovereign like our beloved Empress and under a free and high-principled Government like that of Great Britain, that such an event is possible. It is that enlightened Government, which has burst the strong and cruel shackles of national and religious distinctions, and has opened the doors of Parliament to all subjects of Her Majesty, of whatever caste, colour, or creed. Had it not been for these fortunate circumstances, Mr. Dadabhoy's sterling merits would have been of no avail, nor would the electors of Central Finsbury have been in a position to show their spirit of independence.

Gentlemen, I am not going to take up your valuable time by saying anything further regarding Mr. Dadabhoy, the electors of Central Finsbury, or the British Government, or by singing the praises of the one or showering panegyrics on the others. Even if I were a poet, which I am not, and could manufacture encomiastic verses by the yard with the ease of a Khakani or an Urfi, I should be at a loss to find original material wherewith to build up my eulogistic ode, for those, who have already preceded me in this line, have taken all the wind out of my sail. There is not a single important town from London to Bombay, or from Madras to Calcutta, where the people have not already completely thrashed out the subject. Under these circumstances, if I venture to harp on the same theme, perhaps you will all fall off to sleep, or, a worse catastrophe still, some one amongst you will probably be inclined to greet me in the same way as a newly arrived Civilian at Delhi did a learned sonneteer. This erudite bard had composed an idyl in honour of the worthy official, and one verse stated that "Heaven was his (i. e. the Civilian's) threshold, and angels were his guard." The Civilian returned the compliment by a vigorous application of his whip on the back of the poor whining author, and when the latter asked the reason of this strange proceeding, the Civilian complacently replied "If you have a tape-line with you, go and actually measure the height of the plinth of my bungalow. It is exactly 2 feet 3 inches. If you had described it as 4 feet 6 inches high, or double of what it is, I could have forgiven you, knowing that you, Orientals, are great liars. But a lie like yours I had never heard before. Why, you place my threshold so high, that if we were to fire a gun, the ball would not reach there even at the end of 1,573 years." With the fate of that unfortunate versifier before my eyes, I shall give a wide berth to all poetical fancies and confine myself to some practical observations, that are suggested by the election of the Rt. Hon'ble Mr. Dadabhoi Nowroji.

This remarkable and gratifying event will be viewed in different lights by different classes of people, according to their respective bent of mind, but we must take care that its novelty or excitement does not carry us away so far as to lead us to form any exaggerated hopes, or to draw any unwarranted conclusions. There is one class of people, including highly educated and able men of this country, who think that the present system of administration in India is far from being satisfactory, and who wish that a radical change may be effected therein. Those amongst them, who, on account of the greater eagerness and activity of their disposition, have not the leisure to look calmly aside, must have probably commenced to hope that their desires will now be fulfilled, that the evils they complain of will be removed, that representative Government will be established in India, that the Legislative Councils will be constituted on the elective principle, that the restrictive rule which compels the natives of India to go to England in order to compete at the Civil Service Examination will be abolished, and that the Arms Act will be repealed. Such sanguine people must, however, carefully bear in mind the constitution of Parliament and the powers and procedure of the Executive Government with which, I dare say, they are better acquainted than myself. If they did this, they would at once see that the objects, on which they had set their hearts, could not be realized by the admission of a single Indian gentleman into Parliament. They would not be achieved, indeed, unless they had in the House of Commons at least 350 Indian gentlemen, or a similar number of other members, who entirely sympathized with, and supported, the objects in question. What could one vote do in a body composed of some six or seven hundred members? A single voice in such a large assembly is like the chirruping of a sparrow in the midst of a brass band. It can have no effect on the policy of the Government. Look at the case of Ireland. In spite of the great ability, power, and influence of Mr. Gladstone, he could not carry out his Irish policy simply because he had not a majority at his back. It is a great mistake to expect anything from Parliament unless a majority can be secured therein.

There is another large class of people, who know nothing about the principles of the British Government or the nature and constitution of Parliament, who are, in fact, utterly ignorant and unthinking, but who follow blindly in the wake of the class first described. Mr. Dadabhoi's election will perhaps inspire these men with the most exaggerated hopes. No wonder if they begin to think that no measure can be now carried out in direct opposition to their wishes, and that no Civil Servant, nay, not even the Government of India can dare do a high-handed thing. They have probably commenced to imagine that if an English official commits any rash or imprudent act, his head will be at the mercy of Mr. Dadabhoi's eloquence, or if the Government passes any measure of which they do not approve, it will have to stand the fatal fire of Mr. Dadabhoi's denunciations. These men are excessively exultant over Mr. Dadabhoi's victory, and are never tired of ringing constant changes on his name. It is an extremely difficult task to enlighten them as to the true state of affairs, and to extricate them from the error and illusion under which they labour. In spite of their absolute ignorance of even the fundamental rules of Parliamentary procedure and of the relation between the legislature and the executive, they go on shouting "Parliament, Parliament" and "Dadabhoi, Dadabhoi." Their re-iterated vociferations remind one forcibly of the story of the man who used to cry out "Persian Pomegranates, Persian Pomegranates." This honest individual used to extol this luscious fruit wherever he went, and the words above quoted constantly escaped from his lips. A sepoy happening to hear this high tribute of praise, asked him to give him a few of the delicious seeds, so that he might taste them and see what they were like. The man replied "Where am I to give them to you from? Bless me if I have ever seen the pomegranate myself! It was my great-grand-mother's youngest uncle's brother-in-law that had seen a Persian pomegranate on the table of Nawab Dowla of Lucknow, and the Nawab had told him that it had a most delightful taste." You may well imagine the sepoy's feelings when he received this consoling answer, and a veil may be drawn on the still livelier feelings that must have been excited in the poor eulogist of "Persian Pomegranates" when he received a good dressing at the hands of the enraged soldier. Gentlemen, it is a grievous mistake for those, who have no idea of what is beneficial or prejudicial to themselves in the circumstances in which they are placed, and who have not the least notion of Parliamentary Government, to build any lofty castles in the air, on the strength of this solitary election.

Lastly, there are those, who consider Government as the sheet-anchor of their hope and their ultimate harbour of refuge, and who dread the very name of Parliament as a child dreads that of a hobgoblin. They are apprehensive that if the doors of Parliament are freely thrown open, and if that assembly readily lends its ear to the party, which wants everything to be done and regulated by election, their interests will be seriously affected, as they are far backward in education. As it is to their advantage that the powers and prerogatives of the executive should remain unimpaired, in order that they may gain by its favor what they cannot claim on the strength of their merits, they fear anything that may tend to curtail those powers, lest they should be deprived of all chance of attaining to positions of honour and emolument in the State. People of this class, and those, who do not look upon natives of India with an eye of respect, who consider them utterly unfit for any post of honour, and who erroneously believe that their advancement is detrimental to their own interests, must be feeling very anxious at Mr. Dadabhoi's election, and must be conjuring up doleful visions of Madrasces, Deccancees, Malabarees and specially of dread Bengalees, all donning the stove-pipe hat of the full-blown M. P. They must, however, discard these unpleasant nightmares, remembering that though the Hall of Parliament is a spacious and lofty chamber, its entrance is exceedingly narrow, and especially difficult for natives of India. Because a single fortunate gentleman has, by the dint of thirty years' incessant and arduous toil, succeeded in making his way through those strictly guarded portals, is it to be inferred that a broad and beaten path has been paved for all that may choose to follow in his footsteps? Those that think so commit the same ludicrous mistake that the Bania in the anecdote did, who was startled out of his sleep by a rat running over his fat paunch. I ask your leave to relate this little story, which I hope will not be out of place here. A sleek and well-fed Bania was laying flat on his back on the floor of his house in deep slumber. A rat in one of its ravaging expeditions happened to cross over his protuberant abdomen, and this made him start up with a frightened cry. He began to weep and give vent to loud lamentations, which drew all the neighbours to his side. They inquired of him what the matter was, and he told him what had happened. "What," asked they, "have you been bitten so severely that you bellow like that?" "No," said he, "nothing of that sort, but I bewail my unfortunate lot as my belly has been made a public thoroughfare; this time it is only a rat, but next time it may be an ox, or a horse, or even an elephant. For God's sake, devise some means to protect me from being trampled to death." On hearing these sad accents, those who were of the same mental calibre as he was, began to sympathize with him and offer him every consolation in their power. But one of the fellows, who had a little more common-sense than the rest, exclaimed "Well, my good friend, don't be at all uneasy on that account. The door of your house is so small that none of these large animals can come in." This re-assured the Bania, who expressed the highest admiration for the cleverness of his ancestors who had taken such wise precautions against a contingency so disquieting to his nerves.

I need not tell you, gentlemen, that the different views above indicated either fall short of or exceed the golden mean, exaggerating the real state of things on the one hand, or under-estimating it on the other. We must however, steer a middle course, and form a calm and sober judgment, uninfluenced by vague desires or unfounded fears. Looking at the matter from a practical and common-sense point of view, it must truly be a source of pleasure to all classes in India to see Mr. Dadabhoi take his seat in Parliament, and they cannot but regard his election as a great honour to their country. They should make his life a model for themselves to imitate, and try to acquire those mental qualifications and force of character, which have raised him to his present position. And they should, further, look upon him as an able and straightforward champion of their cause, who will perform his duties with the greatest skill, prudence, and circumspection. I congratulate him cordially on his having attained to this dignified position,—a position which confers upon him greater honour than what he would have been entitled to if he had been made a Knight or a Baronet; for in the latter case, he would have ranked after several members of his own community, who had already obtained the honour before and the distinction, bestowed as it would be, as a favour by the Government would not have been so valuable as the spontaneous mark of approbation he has received from a free and independent country. He stands at present without a rival or competitor, and even if, by the grace of God, other natives of India, in course of time, meet with the same success that he has achieved, his name will still continue at the head of the list. I earnestly wish that he may be long spared to enjoy this high honour, and to give the benefit of his valuable services to this country.

Gentlemen, I beg your forgiveness for having taken up so much of your precious time, and for having put you to the trouble of listening patiently to my discursive remarks. I thank you once again for the honour you have done me in selecting me as your chairman. Before sitting down, however, I will ask you to join me heart and soul, in expressing our loyal gratitude and devotion to Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen-Empress, under whose benign and equitable rule we enjoy such undisturbed peace, and such equal laws as render an event, like the one we are celebrating today, possible.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

A 'POOR' RICH MAN.

ON a summer morn—long faded
Into distance of the Past—
In a chamber warm and shaded,
By an awful gloom pervaded,
A 'poor' rich man breathed his last.

'Mid the outside beauty lying
Round his fair and stately home,
Sad and lonely he lay dying—
Only summer winds were sighing,
Only raindrops broke the gloom.

All around was wealth and splendour;
Yet no weeper came to shed
Tears of sorrow, true and tender—
Such as only love can render—
By his solitary bed!

Hirelings, set to watch, had slumbered
As his dying breath he drew,
For they knew his hours were numbered,
And they cared not, nor were cumbered
With Love's servings, kind and true.

(Love had stood, perchance, and waited
To receive the dying breath,
Till the agony abated,
Till the spirit worn, belated,
Fled into the arms of Death!)

With observance high and stately,
He was borne unto his tomb;
And hired mourners, all sedately—
Who had laughed aloud so lately—
Wore long faces full of gloom!

While the muffled bells tolled slowly
From the belfry overhead,
And the 'De Profundis' holy,
Sung by voices melancholy,
Sounded, for the silent dead!

Only when his head was covered
With the earth all brown and cold,
Pitying eyes at last discovered
One poor woman's form, which hovered
O'er the silent, voiceless mould.

Only one he had forsaken
And betrayed in her lost youth,
Came to mourn—as if o'er taken
By her grief—as if to waken
Him to honour, love, and truth.

Yea, she wept as if despairing,
With a heart by anguish torn,
While the idle crowd, uncaring,
Some with bitter jests unsparing,
Mocked her! pallid and forlorn!

THE IDEAL WIFE.

SOMEWHERE in the world must be
She that I have prayed to see,
She that Love assigns to me.

Somewhere Love, her lord and king
Over her is scattering
Fragrance from his purple wing.

By the brink of summer streams
I have dreamed delicious dreams;
What I will, my sweet one seems.

In the sheen of autumn skies
I have pictured sunny eyes,
Till the thought too quickly dies.

When the winter fire burns low,
Lovely faces come and go
As the dying ashes glow.

'Tis her voice I hear so oft
In the music low and soft
That the western breezes waft.

Tell her, Love, that years fly fast,
Bid her come to me at last,
Ere her golden days are past.

Shall we ever, ever meet?
Shall I find in thee, my sweet,
Visions true and life complete?

Whisper low to Love apart,
Whisper, darling, where thou art,
Perfect wife and noble heart.

WEEKLYANA.

TWO great poets have passed away—one American and the other English—Whittier and Tennyson. Lord Tennyson was buried in Westminster Abbey. The procession to the grave included the leading political, literary, artistic, and dramatic celebrities, besides representatives of the Queen and the Royal family. Her Majesty sent a wreath, a yard in diameter, inscribed, as a mark of her sincere regard and admiration.

LOSS upon loss! The Poet Laureate has been followed to the grave by his imaginative friend—a poet in a different material—Thomas Woolner, the sculptor. Across the Channel, France has lost her great prose writer Renan, a scholar, inquirer, and thinker of world-wide reputation.

ON the morning of the 13th, heavy rain fell in Madras flooding the Black Town. A week after, on the 19th, a cyclone passed over Cocanada, causing immense damage to the crops, breaching the canal and flooding the country.

THE Viceroy leaves Simla on Thursday, the 27th October 1892, on tour, accompanied by the Marchioness of Lansdowne, the Foreign Secretary, the Deputy Foreign Secretary, the Private Secretary, the Military Secretary, the Surgeon to the Viceroy, three Aides-de-Camp, namely, Captain the Hon'ble C. Harbord, Lieutenant H. A. Pakenham and Lieutenant S. H. Pollen, and Mr. F. W. Latimer.

The Viceregal tour takes in Hyderabad, Mysore, Bangalore, and Madras.

Arriving at Hyderabad on Thursday the 3rd November, the Viceroy will hold a Levée of all Civil and Military officers at Chadarghat Residency, the same evening at 9-30 P.M. "His Excellency," so runs the notification, "will also be glad to receive other gentlemen, European and Native, who should submit their names previously to the Resident."

There will also be a Viceregal Levée at Government House, Madras, on Saturday, the 26th November, at 9-30 P.M., of all Civil and Military Officers and the Native Officers of the Native Regiments in Madras and of "other Gentlemen, who should submit their names previously to the Military Secretary to His Excellency the Governor of Madras, who will issue cards of admission, which should be shewn to the Aide-de-Camp in waiting before the Levée, if required."

Here is a departure from the usual practice followed in these receptions. We suppose this is an attempt to purge the Levée of unwelcome intruders. Such a measure had long been called for. The privilege of approaching the Representative of Majesty has been simply abused by a set of worthless aspirants after social notoriety, native and European. A drastic treatment ought to be applied to the Government House Lists, followed by a sumptuary regulation. This is specially required for the natives.

FROM Madras, Lord Lansdowne sails by the R. I. M. S. Citve. He reaches Calcutta on Friday, the 2nd December, at about 2 P.M. and disembarks at Prinsep's Ghat at 5 P.M. in the R. I. M. S. Launch Maud. The official programme of reception is as follows:—

"His Excellency will be received at Prinsep's Ghat by His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, Members of His Excellency's Council, the principal Civil and Military Officers, and other Gentlemen who are desirous of attending.

Guards of Honour of British Infantry and of the Administrative Battalion, Presidency Volunteers, with Band, will be drawn up at Prinsep's Ghat.

His Excellency the Viceroy's Body-Guard and the Calcutta Mounted Volunteer Corps will form the escort.

The route taken will be by the Strand Road and Esplanade Row into Government House by the North-West Entrance.

A Guard of Honour of Native Infantry, with Band and Colour, will be drawn up in front of the Grand Staircase of Government House.

A Viceregal salute will be fired from the ramparts of Fort William as His Excellency lands.

Full Dress will be worn by Officers entitled to wear uniform. Gentlemen not entitled to wear uniform will appear in Morning Dress."

THE Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal leaves Darjeeling on the 26th October and arrives at Calcutta the next day, reaching Sealdah by rail at 12-20. It will be a private entry. After a stay of five days at Belvedere, Sir Charles Elliott will start on his autumn tour on the 1st

November from Howrah at 20-57. This departure as the one at Darjeeling will be private. He will be accompanied in his tour by only the Private Secretary, the Chief Secretary bearing him company only to Ranchi. The places to be visited and inspected are Giridih, Parasnath, Bagodar, Hazaribagh, Ramghur, Ranchi, Kuru, Chandwa, Lathihar, Muika, Khandi, Daltonganj, Gurhwa, Mahomedganj, Bodha, Rhotasgurb, Dehri, Arrah, Muzaffarpur. The gubernatorial party of two will return to Calcutta on December 1, the arrival at Howrah, at 5-45, being private.

SURGEON-COLONEL A. H. Hilson takes three months' privilege leave from the 1st November next. In accordance with the modern principle of economy in the Government, Dr. Birch, of the Calcutta Medical College, will continue to be Principal of that institution and be in addition the Inspector-General of Civil Hospitals, Bengal.

IT has been suggested that Government suffers in the revenue from the practice of using instruments purporting to be powers-of-attorney in transactions which are virtually mortgages.

THE Vice-Chairman of the Calcutta Corporation has obtained leave on medical certificate. The Chairman considers that the papers sent in disclose a state of health in which it would be humane to pension off Baboo Gopal Lal Mitter before time.

THE Eurasians of this city have decided upon a Club of their own. The site selected is the Opera House. The old structure will be pulled down and a new substantial building raised in its stead.

MR. DIGBY writing to the Hindu on the British Committee of the Congress says:—

"The constitution of the British Committee of the Congress is of so much interest to your readers that I make no apology for writing somewhat fully upon it. In the London correspondence of the Manchester Guardian of Tuesday last the following paragraph appeared: 'Mr. W. S. Caine, M. P., has retired from the London Committee of the Indian National Congress. The Committee are also losing the services of their Secretary, Mr. William Digby, C. I. E., who has resigned his appointment from the 1st proximo. In accepting his resignation, the Committee have recorded their great regret at the severance of their long connection with Mr. Digby and their cordial appreciation of his valuable services to the cause of India and his devotion to the interests of the Congress movement in this country. Mr. Digby leaves for India on the 14th October, and will be absent from England about six months. He expects to take part in the Congress to be held in December.' It will be remembered that the Congress work in England for about two years was done by the Indian Political Agency, an organization which was established by, and was under the control of Mr. Digby. Mr. Hume strongly urged the appointment of a Committee. A number of pro-Indian friends in England were consulted. From nearly every one came the same statement, viz., that it would be a mistake to constitute such a Committee. Lord Hobhouse, Lord Ripon, Sir W. Markby, Sir W. W. Hunter, Mr. Bradlaugh, and others, all said the same thing. So far as the last mentioned gentleman was concerned, he specially advised that no change in the existing arrangements should be made, and he distinctly stated that under no circumstances, would he join a Committee. A small Committee was eventually formed; it never contained more than seven Englishmen. Mr. Digby, who had had control of the work previously, was asked to become Secretary of the Committee, and he did so. To the ordinary propaganda the 'running' of a journal was subsequently added. Mr. Digby, when he became a candidate for Parliament, stated that if he were elected, he should at once resign his paid Secretaryship, as he did not consider holding it would be consistent with what he wanted to do in the House of Commons for India. Some members of the Committee remonstrated with him, arguing that there was no necessity for his doing what he proposed; but he maintained his position, adding that, in any case it was his intention to retire from the paid Secretaryship at the end of this year, when he hoped to retain his connection with the work as Honorary Secretary. On this understanding Mr. Digby recently asked for two and-a-half months' leave to the end of the year, resigning his paid Secretaryship on December 31, as he was proceeding to India, but after some conversation, it was thought better that the official duties should end on October 1,—duties and pay terminating on that day. A seat on the Committee was offered to Mr. Digby, who, however, declined it, stating that he purposed renewing the active operations of the Political Agency, which has fallen somewhat into abeyance during the past year or two. Thus the matter stands. As regards what is to be done in the future I will tell you more when I know more. Meanwhile, since the meeting of the Committee, Mr. Caine, as announced above, has retired from the Committee. In his letter of resignation he urges Mr. Bradlaugh's plea as to the objection which exists to a member of Parliament remaining Member of a body whose decisions may hamper his action in the House of Commons. At the same time Mr. Caine makes no secret of the fact that had Mr. Digby continued in association with the Committee, he would not have retired. It is believed that Mr. Schwann and Mr. McLaren will follow, Mr. Caine's example. The Committee, which will then consist of Sir William Wedderburn, Mr. Hume (who purposes leaving for India in January), and Mr. Dadabhai Naoroji, M.P., will probably be added to by the inclusion of other friends of India. The task of reconstitution will not be easy, the objections to serving on an Indian Committee in England by the right class of men being exceedingly difficult. The upshot, however, will probably be that not less but much more attention will be directed to Indian affairs than has been the case during the recent year or so as the result of what has happened."

Mr. Digby is expected in India next week. He will remain in this country for about six months.

ON Thursday last Miss Abbott, daughter of Mr. H. E. Abbot, of the Indian Planter's Gazette, was married in St. Paul's Cathedral, to Mr. A. S. Barrow. There were a large number of friends to witness the interesting ceremony. The presents too were large and valuable, including several cheques to the aggregate value of about Rs. 2,500—one of 1,000, one of 500 and others of 100 and 50 each. Not the least noteworthy or least welcome was the gift of a considerate friend who, eschewing the degraded currency of India, sent a note of £5.

THE Hindoo Patriot, of Oct. 21, reproduces in their entirety the notifications about the Viceroy's tour dated Simla, the 8th, the 11th and 14th October 1892 and the Programme of the Viceroy's arrival in Calcutta issued by the Military Secretary to the Viceroy, with the following addition:—

"The following order, issued by the Government of India in the Legislative Department, is republished for general information.

H. J. S. COTTON,
Chief Secy. to the Govt. of Bengal."

Here the reprint closes. Our contemporary evidently takes the notifications from the Calcutta Gazette. That Gazette is more to blame than the Bengal Government gazette in the native press (as distinguished from the Bengali Government Gazette.) As a blind follower, the Patriot does not try to stop where the Calcutta Gazette draws no line. The Reprints from the Gazette of India in the Calcutta Gazette of the 19th October, are a continuous series without break of any kind, and our contemporary merely follows the same course. He sins in high company and adds his own blindness.

NOTES & LEADERETTES

with OUR OWN NEWS.

THE trial of Major Ram Chunder and five others for murder of Kunj Behari Lal, of the Ulwar Council, has concluded, but judgment has been deferred. The defence not only pleaded not guilty but justification. The Major's plea was that whereas he belonged to a country without definite laws the court was trying the case under British law. The Maharaja ordered Kunj Behari Lal's death, therefore the accused was guilty of no offence. Another accused Budda's statement was: "I am guiltless. Whatever happened was done by order of the Raj." Two letters purporting to be the order of the late Maharaja were produced and proved to bear his initials. Rebutting evidence was allowed to shew that the initials were not the Maharaja's. Mr. Colvin, counsel for the defence, in opening his case, said that if the court were satisfied that the letters were genuine, then their bearing on the case would have to be considered. How would Ram Chunder's guilt stand if he had merely obeyed the orders of his King? If the court held that this circumstance was no justification in law, then he would urge that it had a most material bearing on the question of punishment. Three Members of Council were examined as to the powers of the Maharaja. They all said that in all cases final orders rested with the Maharaja, who administered punishments and delivered decisions according to custom, precedents, and justice. His word was final and he could do as he liked. One member went so far as to say that he would consider himself bound to obey an order to wage war against another State and that the Maharaja had the power to hang any subject without any inquiry or trial. The punishment in the State for murder ordinarily was death, or life imprisonment.

GOVERNMENT have at last resiled from the attitude of "masterly inactivity" on the Currency Difficulty. They have decided to take action in the matter. The Indian Currency Association, headed by Mr.

Mackay, have accomplished a feat in almost no time. Their representations, backed by the growing agitation in this country, have shaken the power that be in England out of their pleasant stupor and their dependence on the fetish of laissez venir. Already, a Committee have been appointed, with the Lord Chancellor of England as President, to consider the expediency of modifying the Indian Currency Act. They have invited President Mackay to come in person before them to explain his views and answer their enquiries. As for authority to alter the currency by legislation, it exists in the Government in this country. The Secretary of State for India, Lord Kimberley, is of opinion that there is no need for Parliamentary sanction and that it is open to the Government of India, with the consent of Her Majesty's Government, to repeal or modify the Indian Act XXIII of 1870 which regulates the Currency system of India.

We publish elsewhere the official correspondence on the subject.

Mr. Mackay leaves India today to give evidence before Lord Herschell's Committee. He will remain in England for four days and be back to India early in December.

During Mr. Mackay's absence, his able lieutenant, Mr. J. A. Anderson, has been appointed Vice-President of the Association and Chairman of the Central Committee with powers of the President.

THE Local Government have circulated the Preliminary Report of the Select Committee on the Draft Bill to amend the Bengal Municipal Act, 1884, for the opinion of Municipalities and Associations. The principal points of reference are the group system of water-supply and drainage recommended by the Belvedere Conference of the 18th July, the provision for the training and employment of medical practitioners not accepted by the Select Committee, the abolition of the tax upon persons according to their circumstances and property suggested by the Select Committee, the attempt to simplify and cheapen the existing system of collecting taxes, the extension of the Calcutta Survey Act, the proposed building regulations, exemption of Jails, Hospitals, Mills, Railways, from water rate and obligation on the part of Municipalities to maintain common free privies.

The Bill is an attempt to introduce the comforts of civilization into all Bengal Municipalities, and as such it is all welcome. But the question is, Will the localities dignified with the name of Municipal towns be able to bear the reforms. Can they afford to pay for the new luxuries? If the existing law could be worked out properly and thoroughly, there would hardly arise the present necessity of its amendment. The great reforms proposed would not be wanted so badly and they could come in time without any external pressure, if the Municipal Commissioners understood their duties.

THE measure which is immediate and is likely to be felt, is the wholesale introduction of the rate on the annual value of holdings. Government do not seem disposed to agree with the Select Committee who would leave to the Municipalities to pronounce in its favor or not. Each Municipality is called upon to report fully on the matter. If the rate is made wholesale, the Municipalities and not Government must bear the odium of the innovation.

TOWARDS the end of September last, we had to record a terrible accident on board the river steamer Trout—full of passengers coming for the great national Festival of the Doorga Pooja—of the India General Steam Navigation Company in mid Padma at night. Complaints now reach us of the inconvenience felt and danger undergone by passengers on the Cachar Line steamers of another Company—for want of ordinary landing and shipping conveniences. Not only are there no wharfs: A narrow open plank connecting the bank and the steamer is often all the accommodation provided for embarking and debarking. The trouble and anxieties of that Procrustean path to boat or bank or—a watery grave, may be easily conceived. It is a mockery to call it a path. It can be such only to a Blondin. But by this ridiculous apology for a bridge, all ages and conditions of men including poor Bengali women burdened with children are virtually forced to get into or get down from the steamer. No wonder that, about two years ago, a coolie woman with her child fell into the river—the child was saved but the mother was drowned. We wish she had been a bishop. For, notwithstanding the casualty the worshipful company did not care to change their—path. The scandal continues.

OUR HYDERABAD COLUMN.

Hyderabad, Deccan, October 15.

NAWAB VICAR-UL-MULK, better known as Moulvi Mushtak Hossein, Revenue Secretary to the Nizam's Government, has applied for pension with a view to retire from service. This circumstance, however it may be regarded by the outside public, is an event of the greatest importance to the people and the Government of Hyderabad. Though nominally holding subordinate charge of a single department, Nawab Mushtak Hossein has been practically exercising supreme control and power over every department of the administration since Sir Asman Jah became the Prime Minister. Sir Asman Jah is said to be so completely in the hands of Nawab Mushtak Hossein that the latter is acknowledged on all hands to be the de facto Prime Minister, and it is to him that all the wrongs, blunders and oppressions which are committed by the present Government are mainly ascribed. Sir Asman Jah's greatest mistake as well as misfortune has been that he has allowed himself to be guided solely by the counsels of Nawab Mushtak Hossein—to the utter disregard of the wiser counsels of his brother Nobles and other high officials, among whom there are many who are of far higher calibre and sounder judgment than his favorite henchman. When the Revenue Secretary found that the Prime Minister was disposed to rely upon him entirely for the work of administration, he naturally formed in his mind ambitious schemes for self-aggrandisement, and it is not difficult to trace how, step by step, he has augmented and consolidated his power till he has virtually become the Dictator of Hyderabad. His first care on assuming office as Revenue Secretary, it is said, was to cripple the powers of his rival Nawab Mahdi Ali, the Political and Financial Secretary—who was also his greatest friend and benefactor. Nawab Mahdi Ali, however, had the support of the Resident Mr. Howell, and so long as that officer remained in Hyderabad, Nawab Mushtak could not carry out his scheme with regard to his rival, but as soon as Mr. Howell left and was succeeded by Mr. Fitzpatrick, Mahdi Ali found himself reduced to a nonentity. Nawab Mahdi Ali still bears the designation of Political and Financial Secretary and draws his full salary, but the real functions of that important office are exercised by the Revenue Secretary in the name of the Minister. Nawab Mushtak further strengthened his hands by smuggling Nawab Mehdi Hassan into the office of Home Secretary by removing Mr. Syed Ali Bilgrami, who had been occupying that office since the dismissal of Sirdar Abdul Huq. (It will be remembered, Mr. Howell had been strenuously opposed to the appointment of Mehdi Hassan as Home Secretary). With Nawab Mehdi Hassan as Home Secretary and Mahdi Ali crippled, Mushtak felt his position secure. About this time Maharaja Peshkar Narendar Pershad Bahadur died. Raja Kishen Pershad, the grandson of the late Peshkar, should have succeeded his grand-father in the office of Peshkar in the ordinary course of things. But Kishen Pershad was known to be a favorite with His Highness, and Mushtak, as if for that very reason, set his face against his appointment, and to this day Raja Kishen Pershad has been sedulously kept out of his legitimate and hereditary office. The treatment of Kishen Pershad gave umbrage to the Hindu community and Mushtak's conduct was harshly criticised in the press. This harsh but just criticism had the effect of exasperating him against the Hindus. Naturally a bigot, his bigotry increased a hundred-fold, and he was heard to say openly and with seeming pride, that he was resolved to follow the policy of Aurungzebe with regard to the Hindus. The Raja of Anagundi, a descendant of the Rajas of Vijayanagar, was the first Hindu Chief who fell a victim to Nawab Mushtak's bigotry. The cases of the Rajah of Godhawal and other Hindu Princes and Chiefs have been already alluded to in a previous issue of Reis & Rayyet. Suffice it to say that by his unjust treatment of the Hindu Chiefs, Mushtak rendered himself thoroughly obnoxious to the Hindu subjects of the Nizam. Nor did he stop here. He gave equal cause of dissatisfaction to the Mahomedan aristocracy of Hyderabad. It would make a long list to give the names of the Mahomedan jagirdars who have suffered in some shape or other at the hands of Nawab Mushtak Hossein. Having tasted the sweets of power, he hungered for more and more. If at this stage Sir Asman Jah had the good sense to check him, it would have been better for both of them, but instead of doing that, His Excellency supported him in every step, and ultimately he virtually delegated his entire authority—almost unlimited authority—to him. This injudicious delegation of authority by Sir Asman Jah to Nawab Mushtak Hossein has proved extremely baneful to the subjects of His Highness. Mushtak's high-handedness is now severely felt by all classes of the people—Hindus and Mahomedans alike. But while the mild Hindu is content with invoking in silence the aid of his gods and goddesses for the redress of his grievances, the bold Mahomedan perforce must seek other means. A large number of the Mahomedans have recently formed themselves into an association and have resolved to take active measures. A few days ago they submitted a representation to the Minister praying His Excellency to relieve them from the tyranny of Nawab Mushtak Hossein. They also took care to inform Sir Asman Jah that in case they failed to obtain redress from him they would appeal to His Highness, and in the event of their meeting with disappointment in that quarter, they would carry their appeal to the Government of India—and to St. Stephen's, if need were. Their earnestness elicited from Sir Asman Jah a promise of an early enquiry into their grievances, and with this promise they were pacified for the time being. How far, and in what manner His Excellency's promise will be carried out, it is yet to be seen. This is a mere outline of the state of affairs in Hyderabad. But, as Nawab Mushtak Hossein has at last been obliged by force of circumstances to tender his resignation, people are beginning to hope that a better day is about to dawn upon them. So deep-seated and so wide-spread is Mushtak's unpopularity that the news of his proposed retirement has been hailed with genuine and universal joy throughout the Nizam's Dominions, and, it is said, when the proposed retirement becomes an accomplished fact, the public will express their mutual congratulations by distributing sweets among friends and neighbours and celebrate the occasion by giving alms to the poor, as they did on a previous occasion, when the Mining Bubble burst and Sirdar Aboul Huk was disgraced.

THE Viceroy will arrive at Hyderabad on the 3rd November and leave on the 8th. On his way to Hyderabad, Lord Lansdowne will visit the far-famed caves of Ellora. Grand preparations are making at Hyderabad and at Arungabad. Dr. Lawder, Private Secretary to Nawab Vicar-ul-Omra, has been deputed to Arungabad, to make the necessary arrangements for reception of the Viceregal party.

The approaching advent of the Viceroy has been the signal for the cleansing of the Hyderabad Augean stable. The Nizam has taken up the Herculean task upon himself.

Early on Tuesday morning, we received the following telegram from Hyderabad:—

"Mushtak Hossein's resignation accepted. He had been forced by circumstances to tender resignation once before two years ago, but through the Minister's intercession it was not accepted. People were beginning to fear same would be the case this time, but the Nizam, rising above adverse influences and exercising his own judgment, has accepted the resignation. Mehdi Hassan suspended. Both news received with joy. The Viceroy expected 3rd November. Reception preparations progressing."

This was followed up by another:—

"Oct. 21.—Mushtak left last night, Nizam's order about his leaving Hyderabad was peremptory. People expressing joy in various ways. Nobles and jagirdars with followers on elephants and horseback went in procession to Afzal-ul-Dowlah's tomb, offered thanks to God that the country at last is free from Mushtak's hands, prayed for His Highness' long life and prosperity. Mushtak Hossein and Mehdi Hassan's successors not appointed yet. Rumours premature. Salutary changes expected."

Yet another telegram followed:—

"Oct. 22.—Government Jarida publishes order about Mehdi Hassan's suspension. His future will be decided after the conclusion of the Pamphlet case. Nawab Imad Jung, Chief Justice, appointed to officiate for Mehdi Hassan. Nawab Mahdi Ali officiates as Revenue Secretary in addition to his own duties.

Ekbal Ali, Assistant Revenue Secretary, suspended. He is called upon to explain his conduct with regard to a young European lady to whom he is alleged to have made certain offensive proposals."

We heartily congratulate His Highness on the prompt manner in which he has rid his State of the vampire which had been eating the vitals of his sovereignty. We sincerely trust that His Highness will now take an active part in ruling his valuable patrimony, and not allow hungry adventurers to have everything in their own way, in consequence of the incompetence of a nominal Prime Minister.

The coup d'état with which the Nizam has surprised the whole world, and which has left His Highness's hands free to make the best arrangements for the administration of his State, may be taken as a convincing proof of what stuff he is made, and a promise of what he is capable of doing in the future.

REIS & RAYYET.

Saturday, October 22, 1892.

HYDERABAD.

For sometime past, Hyderabad has been too much with us. Just now, it is the focus of interest. The Viceroy will shortly be there. He will have difficult work before him in that hotbed of intrigue where all His Excellency's powers will be taxed to the utmost to discern who's who and what's what. Perhaps it may be useful to his Lordship to attempt a resume of the previous history and the present situation.

In January 1869 the last hereditary Ruler of the Deccan, Nawab Afzal-ud-Daula, died. He left an infant son. Accordingly, the country came under the Regency of a couple of Joint Administrators, Nawab Vicar-ool-Omra Bahadoor and Nawab Sir Salar Jung. Latterly, on the death of the former, in 1877, the latter alone remained at the helm. Salar Jung was a capable man, thoroughly conversant with Hyderabad matters, who made some improvements in a rotten administration and laid the foundation of progress in the State, by strengthening the Service by infusing into it fresh blood from British India—Hindustan chiefly. He was not above the last infirmity of noble mind, however, and lavished the resources of the State and his own in making interest with British officials and with Europeans in general. In 1883, he died, leaving two minor sons. The administration devolved upon the old Peshkar Maharaja Narain Pershad. Meanwhile, the Minority was drawing to a close, and, as a natural consequence, the country was more than ever torn by rival factions contending for mastery. At length, upwards of a year after the death of the great Sir Salar Jung, Nawab Meer Mahboob Ali Khan Bahadur Asaf Jah completed the 18th year of his age, and was installed on the Gaddi of his forefathers by the Marquis of Ripon. This was a matter of course. Unfortunately, the Viceroy, in a weak moment, yielded to the numerous strong friends of Salar Jung, European and native, in Hyderabad and out of it, to appoint as Prime Minister Meer Laik Ali, the eldest son of the deceased statesman. The way this arrangement was effected exemplifies the tortuous methods of Indian diplomacy, native and British. The realization of a foregone conclusion was given the appearance of a concession to the native sovereign. Young Mahboob was put up to ask for the premiership for his youthful "chum," and the British Providence of South Asia lent an indulgent ear and was pleased to grant the wish. But even on this footing the business scarcely disguises its true character. For, it comes to this, that the Viceroy in the same breath installed an Oriental Prince of eighteen, brought up in the zenana, at the head of a great kingdom and gave him to help him in governing it an Oriental noble scarcely his senior in years and without any exceptional advantage in experience. We protested against the jobbery and even gave some offence by frequent railing against the fatuity of inaugurating the new régime of a Boy Sultan and a Boy Vizier. But there were many to write up the folly as if it were the perfection of policy. And British officialdom was content that the maintenance of the family of the late Salar Jung meant the continuance of British preponderance at Hyderabad. It was an enormous blunder that was committed by the Government of India, and no extraordinary sagacity was required to predict the end of it. Such a cast—whatever the theatre, or wherever—could perform but one species of drama—the ludicrous. Such an administration must make confusion worse confounded in the unhappy State. Not the least objection to the arrangement was that it led the ever-suspicious native mind, not only in the Deccan but in other native States likewise, to believe that it was made on purpose to deprave the administration to find an excuse for further encroachment on the native sovereignty.

The two stars soon played out their parts in their risible game. Luckily, it was a single-act farce. Soon enough, as anticipated, the boy King and the boy Minister fell out. This result too was hastened by British measures. Everything was done to corrupt the latter. If it is ever necessary to trust such an inexperienced lad with administration, it is indispensable to keep the strictest watch over him. So far from making any efforts to keep him straight, however, he was virtually encouraged to go to the bad. To justify his appointment, he was cheered for incompetence, praised for neglect, glorified for administrative vigour when he was notoriously lazy. Every incentive to exertion was cut off from him. He gave himself up to hard drinking, and in the society of courtiers like Mahdi Hassan quite forgot himself, gave himself the most presumptuous airs, entirely ignoring his master, and behaved as if he was the sovereign and not the servant. No matter: he got kudos all the same. The newspapers, here, there, everywhere, sang his greatness. Many Europeans remembered his father's goodness and others had experienced the son's. As for the British officials, they were irrevocably committed to bolster up their boy. They went on from the first creating a reputation for him. Honours were heaped upon him—to make him the vainer and more impracticable. Of course, the Nizam was mightily annoyed at such conduct, and tried his best to bring the man to his senses. But the latter paid no heed to his master's remonstrances, secure in the patronage of the British Government. At length His Highness resolved to turn the minister out, but here the Viceroy intervened.

In the ordinary course of things, His Excellency would have been averse from anything like a reversal of the policy of his predecessor. Lord Ripon had got Laik Ali (Salar Jung II.) in; it was his pet arrangement; he had taken more than a mere official interest in the fortunes of the family; and it was expected that his successor would, in decency and mutual kindness, evince some particular zeal in maintaining the protégé of the last preceding Viceroy. Lord Dufferin chivalrously fulfilled that expectation, but not at one iota of sacrifice of his duty as ruler of India. He knew what was due to the Nizam, and he gave it in full. He did not abuse his position—he attempted no bullying. He employed persuasion only. He essayed to save the minister by reasoning with the master and by, above all, appealing to his better feelings. He referred to the great services of the family of the Minister to the kingdom of Deccan, specially the services of the late Salar Jung I. in the troublous times of 1857 and next throughout till his lamented death. It was that consideration which had led the Government of India to consent to the elevation of his eldest son—a mere stripling—to the difficult and responsible post of Minister. The British Government did not wish to see the family of the deceased statesman sink into utter insignificance. Doubtless, the same consideration coupled with youthful companionship had actuated His Highness. As for capacity, it was hoped that the chip of the old block might prove worthy of the stem and trunk. If that hope had not so far been realized, that was due more to neglect and vice than to any inherent deficiency. For all accounts allow the young man fine parts. Let His Highness give his Minister another chance and he may perhaps turn a new leaf. To turn him out would not only extinguish the hopes of the whole family but compromise the dignity of both His Highness and the Government of India who had appointed him. This frank statement had the desired effect on the open and generous soul of the Nizam. Lord Dufferin found the young Padishah of the Deccan, of whom much nonsense had been told, a most excellent man to deal with, and of course a thorough gentleman. His Highness was open to any reasonable suggestion. Even in matters touching his honour he had force of character enough to exhibit moderation. In deference to the fatherly counsel of the Viceroy he was prepared to subdue his rage against the insolence of office of the young and little man dressed in brief authority. To Laik Ali (Salar Jung II.) the Governor-General spoke in other terms and in a different tone. All of a sudden the poor fellow discovered that he was nobody and that the Nizam was all in all whose servant only he was, and whom it was his duty to please. Thus sternly rebuked and reduced to seek mercy, he was taken in favour again and continued in office. The entente cordiale procured by the kind offices of the head of the Indian Government was, however, of a short duration. The Nizam performed his part honourably; the failure was on the other side. And it was a greivous failure. Neither the entreaty of his native friends nor the remonstrances of the Residency succeeded. He not only neglected the administration but he failed in the etiquette of private life. This sprig of Moslem nobility had lost the very instincts of a gentleman. Meanwhile, the wrongs of the Nizam accumulated, until there was every reason to apprehend some scandalous explosion. Still there was so much disinclination in influential circles, not only in India but also in England, to throw the son of the great Salar Jung overboard, that the wise men of the East hit upon a curious device. A European military officer, Colonel Marshall, was appointed with the designation Private Secretary to the Nizam to keep the Minister in check. He was not much of a success. His temper was not suited to so delicate a position. He embroiled himself needlessly in personal encounters. His connection with the Deccan Mining Company is wellknown. During his brief tenure he managed to earn immortality as the instrument of God and the Government of India for starting the Native Aid in the Military Defence of the Indian Empire. Young Salar Jung pursued the even tenour of his evil way. Indeed, unamenable to counsel, undeterred by omens, indifferent to consequences, he went from bad to worse, until he was—non est. The close of his extraordinary career was dramatic. One week in 1887 we had to announce the Hedjirah of the Hyderabad Premier. Salar Jung II. had quitted office without delivering the seals or giving any sort of charge. He had taken French leave of office.

It is impossible to do good to a man against his will. The laws against suicide are futile. A determined self-murderer will have his way. Notwithstanding the persistent determination of so many good men and true on all sides to keep the House of Salar Jung in power, the Government of India were at length compelled to allow the formation of a new ministry. So Nawab Asman Jah, since knighted, a scion of the great Shums-ool-Omrah family, was entrusted with the charge. Herein too the discerning might detect a trace of the same partiality.

How the choice fell upon Sir Asman Jah we confess we do not know, but we have a shrewd suspicion that it was because he was known to be a partisan of the great Salar Jung, in his disputes with the Premier nobleman of the State, the Amir-i-Kabir Sir Khurshed Jah,—a service which Sir Salar Jung fully repaid by siding with Asman Jah in his family dispute for inheritance with the Amir-i-Kabir and his brother, the present Vicar-ool-Omrah. It was expected that as Minister Sir Asman Jah would continue the policy of Salar Jung. It was thus that, although he was not in the country, Sir Aman Jah was sent for from Europe to fill the office which was left open for him. Now Asman Jah had a man formerly holding a small post in his employ, named Mushtak Hossein, in whom he had great confidence. He not only brought him forward, making him Revenue Secretary, but gradually let him the upper hand in the entire administration. Instead of continuing the policy of Sir Salar Jung I., Sir Asman Jah's right-hand man deprived all the high officials of Salar Jung's time of the power which they exercised and made the same over to his own creatures, relatives and countrymen of Rohilkhund. The only man of the régime of the younger Salar Jung who was allowed to have some power, was Mahdi Hassan, the Home Secretary, because he gladly stooped to play second fiddle to Mushtak Hossein—a rôle from which others with more self respect instinctively shrank.

Such are the little, very little men dressed in brief authority who have been permitted these few years to play pranks before high Heaven in the State of Hyderabad, to the utter disgust and degradation of the nobility and gentry, and the injury of the population. Sir Asman Jah has proved himself incompetent for the duties of his high office. He is merely a fool in the hands of his subordinates and courtiers, chief of whom is Mushtak Hossein. So entirely dependent upon the latter is the Minister that, when, a couple of years ago, the Nizam got impatient of Mushtak Hossein and wanted to dispense with his services, Sir Asman Jah represented to His Highness that he would not be able to carry on the Government without its soul. To such a pass, alas! is Hyderabad fallen. The Nizam not being prepared for an arduous and protracted struggle, as he knew that Asman Jah was a favorite of the Resident, was compelled to give in and to allow Mushtak Hossein to continue. The maladministration of the State has, however, now reached its lowest depth, and His Highness has become so profoundly annoyed with the Mushtak Hossein régime, that the latter has been convinced that his days are numbered. With a view to escape an ignominious dismissal, he has finally come to the conclusion that the wisest thing for him is to retire with a handsome pension, and so he has submitted his papers to the Prime Minister, and the latter has placed the same before His Highness. The rumour of Sir Asman Jah's approaching retirement owes its origin evidently to the general belief that he would not be able to carry on the administration for one day without the help of Mushtak Hossein.

It is well known that a large portion of the income of the unfortunate State is spent in influencing the public Press, both in India and England, to laud up to the skies the eminence of Sir Asman Jah's administration of the Deccan, and in entertaining, in a right royal style, not only European officials of all classes in India who happen to visit Hyderabad, but also all English and Foreign visitors to India. Globe-trotters never experience such lavish hospitality in any other part of the world. The result is that the whole civilized world sings in chorus the praises of Sir Asman Jah and his excellent administration. All this is done in the name of the Nizam, and at the expense of his Treasury, but we do not think that His Highness has more than a nominal hand in the matter. He certainly gains nothing by the outlay, except perhaps a coarse satire on Oriental Princes, maybe even a delicate sneer at his own moping retirement out of the way of these enlightened sight-seers. The gratitude is reserved for the astute servant who squanders his master's resources to strengthen himself against his master.

There is no pretence to delicacy in the work of the regular staff of claqueurs. In their letters and leaders and pamphlets and books the Hyderabad Prime Minister is the greatest of statesmen and the noblest of gentlemen; while his master the Nizam is always an imbecile, unwilling to work, incapable of administering his State, inaccessible to the general public, quite unmindful of the happiness or prosperity of his numerous subjects, indifferent to public opinion, given up to pleasures, and dividing his time between the Zenana and Shikar. Such is the unenviable portrait of the Nizam as painted by the parasites of his Premier in the Press and by others who are under deep obligations to His Excellency. The latter well knows the injustice of the portraiture—no one better—and doubtless in his better moments he is ashamed of his hand in the business. But he can not help; he himself is controlled by his own nearer parasites, who prop him up in power and, of course, claim the right to dictate his policy. Indeed, it is all policy. The policy is to keep the real Ruler of the State in the background—by proclaiming to the world that he is perfectly incompetent—and to perpetuate the reign of anarchy and oppression, in the hands of a number of harpies more intent upon self-aggrandisement than mindful of the welfare of the subjects or of the reputation of the chief.

From what we have heard, from various sources, of the character of the Nizam, we are tolerably confident that His Highness is a young Prince of remarkable intelligence, possessing great dignity of demeanour, and evenness of temper, good-natured, most courteous, large-hearted, generous and charitable, averse from depriving any one of his bread, manly in his habits, fond of riding and shooting, thoroughly loyal to Her Imperial Majesty the Queen-Empress, and always ready to act according to the advice of the Government of India and the Resident. In fact, he is a perfect gentleman in every sense of the word and a good Native Prince of our day. Unfortunately, he has no chance of showing his metal—scarcely an opportunity for the humblest part. He is suppressed. Under the system prevailing in Hyderabad, with the sanction of the Government of India, he is no body. The Prime Minister is all in all. Nay, the reality is something worse. For, after all, it is not the Prime Minister but his factotum who is the Ruler de facto of the Deccan. The latter directs the entire administration without even always consulting his principal. As for taking the orders of His Highness the Nizam, that is a duty more honoured in the breach than the observance. It is only on international questions in which British interests are involved, that the Minister consults the Resident, and in certain other matters wherein the sanction of the Nizam is absolutely necessary, he obtains His Highness's sanction as a mere matter of form. That is all.

The Nizam is heart-broken. Remembering his humiliation and heart-burning, when the younger Salar Jung was guilty of repeated acts of disloyalty and insubordination, and when the Government of India for two or three long years virtually refused to sanction his dismissal although most earnestly urged by His Highness, he has in a manner resigned himself to his fate. Fearing that his representations against his present Minister, with whose administration he is by no means satisfied, may again be disregarded by the Government of India, and he may again be made the laughing-stock of India, he evidently prefers to keep quiet to save his feelings, thus allowing affairs to drift.

Such, we take it, is the state of mind of the Ruler of the Deccan, and no one who has charity as well as self-respect will, we trust, feel disposed to blame the Prince for shunning society, shutting himself up in the zenana, or absenting himself from the capital for weeks and even months, on hunting excursions, or even occupying his time in the purchase of jewellery and other articles of interest. The poor man finds that he is not allowed to exercise the power which he has inherited from an illustrious line of ancestors, and that he is perfectly powerless to prevent the injustice, oppression and anarchy which prevail in his territories, under an administration which is carried on in his name, but in which he has not the slightest power to interfere.

His Highness is no longer a boy King, having completed his 26th year. As long as he was a hobbled-hoy, there was substantial ground for entrusting the actual administration of his State to some one of maturer years. But now that he has arrived at the prime of life, and is presumably competent to rule over his subjects, unfettered by ministerial interference, we do not quite understand why the Government of India do not give him full permission to administer the affairs of his State in the best way he can, and see how he discharges his duty to his subjects as well as to the paramount Power. Ministerial responsibility we understand, but what good in an imperium in imperio of Chiefs and ministers and Residents? With respect to the Little Mogul of the Deccan, it is plainly unjust at least not to give him a trial for a couple of years or so. When other native Chiefs of his age are exercising full powers within their respective territorial jurisdictions, why should not the Nizam be allowed a similar freedom of action? A high and experienced British Official is at his elbow in the shape of the Resident, who can always give him salutary advice, whenever he goes astray, or can suppress him instantly if there be need.

It is evident that His Highness is not satisfied with the conduct of Sir Asman Jah. Assuredly, he has not sufficient confidence in him, such as a ruler ought to have in his chief Steward. This fact came out unmistakably in the great Diamond case. Certainly in negotiating for the purchase of the diamond the Nizam did not take his Minister into his confidence. Had there been a feeling of cordiality between the master and the servant, the former would never have thought of transacting a business involving half a million sterling without consulting the latter.

But the end has come. Sir Asman Jah had never been ambitious himself, and in accepting office he lent himself to the views of others, as indeed in office he carried out or allowed to be carried out the policy of others. His resignation follows in natural sequence the retirement of the prop of his ministry, Mushtak Hossein. The pedestal crumbled away, how can the Pillar of the State stand? If a sudden clinging to power or submission to some fresh intrigue should arrest the natural course, it might be necessary for the Residency to confirm him in his normal resolution. The moment he realises that the Government of India will not support him against the Nizam to be permanent fixture of offence to his master, he will cease to be an incubus on the State.

The coast thus cleared, the administration of Hyderabad would be free to turn a new leaf, and we would strongly and earnestly advise the Viceroy to avail himself of this splendid conjuncture for doing justice to a most loyal but ill used Prince, and giving the long suffering rayyets of the largest native State a chance of escape from the chronic zulum to which they have been subjected. We make no extravagant demand. The millions of Hyderabad have a natural claim to be governed by their own sovereign if he is fairly competent for the charge. And surely the Prince himself is entitled to an opportunity of redeeming his character—so far as it has been compromised under a conspiracy of misrepresentation—of shewing his capacity for ruling his State, of giving up any idle habits that he may have contracted from a long want of healthy and useful occupation, in fact of commencing a new career.

Nothing would be easier or more natural for the Viceroy than personally to assure the Nizam, during the private interview which he is sure to have at Hyderabad, that he would gladly allow His Highness perfect freedom of action in the choice of the Prime Minister and other high officials, if His Highness would care to take the administration of the State into his own hands. This would be an act not merely of justice but also of grace, from the hands of the Representative of Imperial Majesty.

NAWAB MUSHTAK HOSSEIN—A BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

MOULVI Mushtak Hossein is a native of Amroha in the district of Moradabad, N.-W. P. Amroha is famous for its pottery and its simple Syeds, but Mushtak is no Syed, being but a Kamboh—whereby hangs a tale. Nothing is known of Mushtak's early life until he made the acquaintance of the well known Moulvi Sami-ullah Khan, C. M. G. (who went to Egypt with Sir Evelyn Baring as an assistant). He lived with Moulvi Sami-ullah Khan for a long time in the hope of improving his circumstances, but not meeting with much success in that quarter, he sought the help of Sir Syed Ahmed Khan whose religious views he shares and who got him employed in the British service as Tehsildar and Serishtadar alternately. While thus employed, ambition lured him to Hyderabad, where his friend Moulvi Mahdi Ali (now Nawab Mohsin-ul-Mulk) had preceded him and was already enjoying a fat salary. He looked up to Mahdi Ali for help, and that help was readily accorded to him. Moulvi Mahdi Ali used his influence with Sir Salar Jung I. and got his friend appointed as Secretary to Nawab Bushir-ud-Dowlah (now Sir Asman Jah) who then held the office of Judicial Minister. Mushtak soon managed to ingratiate himself into the good graces of Nawab

Bushir-ud-Dowlah and gained his confidence. When Nawab Bushir-ud-Dowlah was in open enmity with his uncle, the late Nawab Vicar-ul-Omra, (father of Sir Khurshed Jah,) who afterwards became the Amir-i-Kabir and co-Regent with Salar Jung I., Mushtak went to Gwalior—without the knowledge of Salar Jung—on a secret mission. The object of the mission was to see Major Tweedie,—who had been formerly the First Assistant to Resident at Hyderabad and was at that time Resident at Gwalior—regarding something unfavorable to Nawab Vicar-ul-Omra Bahadur. The result of the mission proved far otherwise than what Mushtak had wished or expected. Major Tweedie reported the purport of Mushtak's mission to Sir Richard Meade, the then Resident at Hyderabad, and that officer in his turn reported the matter to Sir Salar Jung, who at once telegraphed to Mushtak to the effect that he need not take the trouble of returning to Hyderabad as his services had been dispensed with. Crest-fallen, Mushtak wended his way back to his former patron Syed Ahmed Khan, who again took him up by the hand and employed him as Manager of the Boarding House in connection with the Aligarh Institute. Here he remained for more than two years. The humble pittance—Rupees 40 or so—which he used to get from the Aligarh Institute, was hardly sufficient for his support, but during the whole of this period Moulvi Mahdi Ali supplied him with ample funds from Hyderabad regularly, every month. Shortly before the death of Sir Salar Jung I., Moulvi Mahdi Ali prevailed upon His Excellency to condone Mushtak's offence and reinstate him. After the death of Sir Salar Jung I., the Peshkar Maharaja Narain Pershad Bahadur was appointed Senior Administrator and Salar Jung II. Junior Administrator. Mushtak induced the simple-hearted Maharaja to grant him the arrears of his pay for the whole period of his banishment, amounting to Rs. 19,000 (nineteen thousand), but the Resident, Mr. Cordery, coming to know of it, protested against the measure, and so Mushtak had to disgorge the money. Subsequently, the Maharaja Peshkar got so much annoyed with him that he was on the point of dismissing him from the Nizam's service once again, when Moulvi Mahdi Ali came to his friend's help and saved him. During Colonel Marshall's time, Mushtak had once the misfortune of being ordered out of the presence of that officer. The circumstance which made Colonel Marshall lose his patience with Mushtak was in connection with the condition of a prisoner in Mushtak's jurisdiction, who was brought to the point of death by cruel treatment. Mushtak was at this time Subadar of Warrangal and bearing the title of Nawab Intessar Jung. As soon as Sir Asman Jah became the Prime Minister, he appointed his former favourite as the Revenue Secretary. Not content with that, he shortly after perpetrated the crowning outrage. As if to expose his own bar sinister, he degraded the highest nobility in the kingdom to spite his kinsmen. He actually procured for Sir Syad Ahmed's quondam clerk the proud titles of "Vicar-ud-Dowlah," "Vicar-ul-Mulk." Titles had already been depreciated enough, but the bestowal of these upon Mushtak humbled in the dust the ancient nobility of the Mogul Empire. The titles of "Vicar Jung," "Vicar-ud-Dowlah," "Vicar-ul-Mulk" and "Vicar-ul-Omra" rightfully belong to the family of Shums-ul-Omra. A nephew of Sir Khurshed Jah Shums-ul-Omra Amir-i-Kabir Bahadur at present bears the title of "Vicar Jung," and the younger brother of Sir Khurshed Jah bears the title of "Vicar-ul-Omra" which he has inherited from his father. Nawab Vicar Jung's next lift in the line of title, according to the usual custom of the country, would be "Vicar-ud-Dowlah," and then "Vicar-ul-Mulk." But unfortunately for that nobleman, Moulvi Mushtak Hossein has filched from him that which was his by right of birth, wealth and prestige. Would any other titles than those of "Vicar-ud-Dowlah" and "Vicar-ul-Mulk" satisfy Mushtak? People say that, as it was at the instance of the late Nawab Vicar-ul-Omra that Mushtak was disgraced—dismissed, and banished—so to revenge upon the memory of that nobleman, he prevailed upon Sir Asman Jah to obtain for him the title of "Vicar-ud-Dowlah" and "Vicar-ul-Mulk," if he can not have that of "Vicar-ul-Omra" so long as the present bearer of that title happens to enjoy it. And thus we find Moulvi Mushtak Hossein the Kamboh of Amroha rejoicing in the high sounding and most honorable title of "Vicar-ud-Dowlah—Vicar-ul-Mulk."

Sometime before the Diamond case cropped up, Mushtak succeeded in inducing Sir Asman Jah to grant him the arrears of his pay for the period of his banishment and non-service, the very amount which he had to disgorge under pressure from Mr. Cordery. While the Diamond case was going on, he managed to get from His Highness a palatial building as a present or reward for his services in connection with that case—the building being worth about fifty thousand Rupees. (The value of his services—the Manifesto item included—is known to the public.) After obtaining the house he also got the wherewithal to furnish it—the moderate sum of twenty thousand Rupees. (According to another version, he obtained twice twenty thousand). The house was obtained in the name of his son Mr. Mahomed Ahmed, Barrister-at-Law, who has married an English wife.

THE CURRENCY QUESTION.

GOVERNMENT AND THE TEA PLANTERS.

From—J. F. Finlay, Esq., Secretary to the Government of India.
To—R. J. Harrison, Esq., Hony. Secretary, Darjiling Planters' Association.

Simla, the 12th October, 1892.

SIR,—I am directed by the Governor-General in Council to acknowledge receipt of your letter No. 279, dated 24th September, 1892, forwarding a memorial to His Excellency the Viceroy in Council, from the Darjiling Planters' Association, on the subject of the Indian currency question.

The Government of India understand that the memorialists object, in the interests of the Indian tea industry, to any change in the Indian standard of value whereby the rupee would be given a fixed value in relation to gold, while at the same time the silver standard of China might continue to depreciate relatively to gold and to the Indian rupee under the new condition of things.

1. The prosperity of the tea industry of India is necessarily a matter of concern to the Government of India, and the arguments contained in the memorial have been carefully considered. The Governor-General in Council will not offer any opinion at the present time on the expediency of attempting to introduce a gold standard into India; the question has often been discussed and the arguments pro and con are doubtless familiar to the memorialists. There is one matter contained in the memorial, however, which appears to the Government of India to require careful examination.

The memorialists apprehend that if the value of the rupee were fixed with reference to gold, while the gold value of the Chinese tael continued to fall, China would obtain such an advantage over India in the production of tea that she would regain the ascendancy which she has lost, and that the tea industry of India might be entirely and irretrievably injured. In other words, the memorialists contend that if two countries compete in the production of the same article, the country of which the standard of value is depreciating relatively to the standard of the other country must prove successful in the competition.

It is this proposition which in the opinion of the Government of India requires examination.

2. It is unnecessary to remind the memorialists that international trade is regulated by, and dependent upon, the comparative cost of production of commodities. India, for example, grows tea and exports it to England in exchange for (say) cotton goods, because it is found that by devoting a certain amount of labour and capital to the production of tea and exchanging that tea for cotton goods, a larger quantity of cotton goods is obtained than could be secured by devoting the same amount of labour and capital to the direct production of cotton goods in India.

It is obvious that the real cost, or amount of labour and capital, required to produce tea, piece-goods, and all other commodities must remain precisely the same whatever the standard of value may be, and a change of standard cannot possibly, therefore, have any effect on the fundamental condition which regulate international trade. Accordingly, if a change in the value of the monetary standard injuriously, or beneficially, affects the production of any commodity, it must do so by impeding, or facilitating, (as the case may be) the operations of production and trade, rather than by modifying the essential conditions on which production and trade depend. Is it then the case that the depreciation of the standard of value necessarily stimulates the production of articles of export; if so, is such stimulus permanent, and is it attended with any drawback?

3. A mere alteration in the relative value of gold and silver, leading to an alteration in the exchange between two countries confers no advantage on the one country over the other, in so far as regards the exchange of commodities for commodities. For example, if a certain number of pounds of tea sell for Rs. 100, and a certain number of yards of calico sell for £10, and if Rs. 100 are worth £10, India will receive Rs. 100 for her tea and pay £10, or Rs. 100 for her piece-goods. Assuming that the relative value of gold and silver alters, so that it takes Rs. 1,200 to equal £10 in value, India will, other conditions remaining the same, receive Rs. 200 more for her tea than she did before, but she will have to pay Rs. 200 more for her piece-goods, and consequently the country, as a whole, in that exchange of commodities for commodities which constitutes international trade, neither gains nor loses by a fall in the gold value of silver.

Since the country, as a whole, neither gains nor loses in the international trade by the fall in the value of silver, it follows that, if the tea industry gains by the fall, such gain must be made at the expense of other members of the community. In other words, for every additional rupee which the producer of tea receives, owing to the fall in exchange on account of tea exported, some other person in India has to pay a rupee more as the price of articles imported.

4. It may now be considered what is the nature of the gain made, at the expense of other members of the community, by the producer of goods for export when silver falls relatively to gold, whether this gain is permanent or not, and whether it is attended with corresponding drawbacks. The gain (if any) made by the producers of tea when silver falls relatively to gold arises solely from the fact that the alteration in the value of silver affects the exchange with England and the wholesale price of tea before it acts on other prices and on wages. If all the expenses of the tea producer rose simultaneously with, and to the same extent as, the rise in the wholesale price of his tea, due to a depreciation of the standard, he could derive no benefit from depreciation. It is the fact that all prices and wages do not rise simultaneously to the full extent that enables him to make a slight and temporary profit at the expense of the persons whom he employs, and of all other persons to whom he has to make fixed money payments.

This profit is usually only temporary, since with the depreciation of the standard all wages and prices tend to rise, and when the rise is completed the profit disappears. If the profit should happen to be considerable, and should last for some time, it supplies an unnatural and temporary stimulus, to the trade, which leads to over-production and consequent reaction.

Moreover, large and sudden falls in the value of the standard necessarily imply the possibility of large and sudden rises, and fluctuations in the price of a commodity due to alterations in the value of the standard cannot fail to have an injurious effect on the trade as a whole.

5. The Government of India feel sure that the memorialists will admit that international trade must be considered as a whole, that trade and production are extended and improved by everything that adds to the welfare of the country at large, and that illegitimate and temporary gain made by one section of the community at the expense of another can only prove injurious in the long run.

In this view of the case it cannot be doubted that the possession of the same standard of value by two countries must, other things being equal, increase not only the total trade between the two countries, but the trade in each particular article, while the existence of two standards fluctuating in relative value constitutes a grave impediment to business, and not only reduces the aggregate of business, but injuriously affects every industry which contributes to make up that aggregate. It appears, therefore, to the Government of India that if India possessed the same standard of value as England, always assuming that that standard of value was in itself a good one, trade between the two countries would be stimulated instead of checked, and every industry in both countries contributing to that trade would be benefited instead of injured.

6. To sum up, the Government of India are of opinion—

(1) That a country, as a whole, makes no gain in its international trade by a depreciation of its standard, since the extra price received for its exports is balanced by the extra price paid for its imports.

(2) That the producer of an article of export may make a temporary and unfair gain from depreciation of the standard at the expense of his employes and of other persons to whom he makes fixed payments.

(3) But that this gain, while not permanent, is counterbalanced by a tendency to over-production and consequent reaction and depression, by a liability to sudden falls in price as well as to rises, and by the check to the general increase of international trade which necessarily results from the want of a common standard of value between countries which have intimate commercial and financial relations.

If the Government of India are right in the views they have just expressed, and they entertain no doubt as to their correctness, it will follow that the adoption of the same standard of value by England and India, always assuming that standard to be in itself a good standard, would facilitate international trade, stimulate production in both countries, and place China at a disadvantage as compared with India in the production of tea, as well as of all other commodities, for sale in the English market.

7. In conclusion, I am to say that a copy of the memorial will be forwarded for the information of Her Majesty's Secretary of State for India.

INDIAN CURRENCY ASSOCIATION

6TH OCTOBER, 1892.

The Members, Indian Currency Association.

DEAR SIRS,

You are aware that a copy of our petition was sent to the Government of India in June last, with a request that it might be forwarded to the Secretary of State in the hope that it would receive the support of His Lordship. A few days ago we learned by the public telegram that the Secretary of State had sent a despatch to the Government of India on the subject of our petition, and on my applying for a copy of that despatch I was furnished with same on 29th ultimo. For the information of the members I publish below a copy of the despatch together with copy of my letter of 1st instant to the Government of India in which I acknowledge its receipt. A copy of the letter I have been told will be sent to the Secretary of State.

I have further to inform you that I received on 1st instant a communication from H. E. The Viceroy stating that he had received a telegraphic despatch from the Secretary of State in reply to a telegram from the Government of India on the Currency Question. The despatch stated that a committee of which Lord Herschell will be President is to be appointed to consider the expediency of modifying the Indian Currency Act. This means, I believe, in other words, that Her Majesty's Government are to ask a Committee, of which the Lord Chancellor of England will be President, to advise them as to the expediency of establishing a gold standard in India.

I adopt this method of giving the members of the Currency Association authentic information as to the progress and result of our movement, in preference to sending round circulars, as the latter course would involve considerable delay. I will be much obliged if those members who observe this notice will bring it to the attention of others.

Yours obedient servant,

JAS. L. MACKAY,

President.

INDIA OFFICE.

London, 25th August, 1892.

Financial No. 159.

To His Excellency the Most Honorable the Governor-General of India in Council.

MY LORD MARQUIS.

I have considered in Council your Excellency's Letter, dated the 12th of July, No 183, forwarding a copy of a letter from the President of the Indian Currency Association with a memorial which that body proposes to present to the House of Commons, praying that, in the event of the forthcoming International Conference failing to arrive at a satisfactory solution of the questions to be submitted to it regarding the more extended use of silver as currency, the Government of India may be empowered to take such measures as it may see fit for the adoption of a gold standard. The memorial further begs that, in view of the probable failure of the Conference to arrive at my practical issue, such power may be now given to your Government as will admit of its exercise without delay after the termination of Conference.

2. The currency system of India is regulated by Act XXIII. of 1870, and it is open to your Excellency's Council when assembled for the purpose of making laws and regulations to repeal or modify this Act, provided that the previous consent of Her Majesty's Government shall have been given to the proposed measure: so that there is no necessity for an application to Parliament on the subject.

3. It would have been interesting to me if the Indian Currency Association had expressed its views more fully on the probable results of the measure which they advocate, and more particularly as to its effect on trade and prices in India.

I have &c.,

(Sd.) KIMBERLEY.

INDIAN CURRENCY ASSOCIATION,

Simla, 1st October, 1892.

To the Secretary to the Government of India, Finance Department.

SIR,—I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of your letter No. 3998A. of 29th ultimo enclosing a despatch from the Secretary of State replying to my letter which accompanied copy of the petition of this Association addressed to the House of Commons, which you were good enough to transmit to the Secretary of State for his information.

2. In the 3rd para. of his Lordship's despatch a regret is expressed that the Currency Association did not state its views generally on the possible effects on trade and prices of "the measure it proposes."

3. I would respectfully point out that the petition suggests two alternative courses, either bimetallism or a gold standard for India.

4. Bimetallism has already been so amply discussed in all its bearings, that it was considered unnecessary to repeat the statements of fact and theory connected therewith, as they must be familiar to His Lordship and his advisers.

5. As to the possible effect on trade and prices which would follow the introduction of a gold standard, I would venture to suggest that if His Lordship desires to secure further expert opinion on the subject, the same may be readily obtained at home, and I would add that the various questions involved have already been largely discussed in the report of the Royal Commission of 1886. A section of that Commission expressed the opinion that the fall in prices in England was "mainly due to circumstances independent of changes in the production of or demand for the precious metals or the altered relation of silver to gold," and as Her Majesty's Government have taken no steps to introduce bimetallism it may be concluded that they adopted this view. They can have no reason, therefore, to fear that the introduction of a gold standard into India will injuriously affect prices, as the change from silver to gold could be made at approximately the market rate of the day, and the additional demand for gold would be much less than the additional demand caused by the measures for the demonetization of silver which began in 1873.

6. I would add that those who favor a gold standard hold that to retain as a standard of value a metal which in its relation to gold is constantly fluctuating and persistently depreciating is opposed to the principles on which the theory and practice of currency are based. Even if most of our commercial relations and all our financial obligations were not with England, which has a gold standard, no good arguments can be found for the retention of the silver standard unless it can be restored to the stable position which it formerly occupied. The retention of the silver standard in India under existing circumstances, is politically inexpedient and unjustifiable. There is no reason to believe that the change in the standard of value from silver to gold will injuriously affect trade or prices in India any more than the change injuriously affected trade and prices in the countries of the Latin Union, in Germany and in Java. On the contrary, if the ordinary course of prices has not been violently interfered with in those countries, where the silver coinage is retained at a ratio to gold considerably higher than that proposed for India, it seems clear that there is greater reason for holding that Indian prices will not be affected. In India rupees will remain rupees, and the producer and consumer will regulate the prices asked and paid, as hitherto, by supply and demand.

7. In a previous letter I had the honor to inform you that the petition of this Association had received 5,000 signatures, and I have to state that it has now received 16,868, more than half being those of educated natives. I take this opportunity to send you, for the information of Government and the Secretary of State, thirty copies of the Proceedings of a General Meeting of the Association held at Calcutta, on 25th August last, at which the following resolution was unanimously carried:—

"That this meeting views with alarm the condition into which the currency of this country is drifting in relation to gold, and the crisis which appears to be approaching, and it desires to place on record its opinion that the Government of India should take such steps as they may think expedient, in the general interests of the country, to arrest further depreciation pending the result of the deliberations of the Conference about to sit in Europe."

In view of the statement made by the Secretary of State, that it is open to the Government of India to repeal or modify the currency system of this country without Parliamentary sanction, provided the previous sanction of Her Majesty's Government shall have been given to the proposed measure, I venture to hope that His Excellency the Viceroy in Council may, without delay, apply for the permission of Her Majesty's Government to introduce a measure which will have the effect of arresting further depreciation in the gold value of the Currency of India pending the result of the deliberations of the Conference about to sit in Europe.

8. Since writing the foregoing paragraphs I have been informed that a committee will be appointed in London to consider the expediency of modifying the Indian Currency Act. I trust this means that the proposal for introducing a gold standard into India will now receive a thorough examination. If so, the announcement will be received with satisfaction throughout the country, and it will tend to allay the feeling of despair which was taking possession of all classes in regard to the currency prospects of India.

I have the honor to be,

Sir,

Your most obedient Servant,

JAS. L. MACKAY,

President.

Holloway's Ointment and Pills.—Reliable Remedies.—In wounds, bruises, sprains, glandular swellings, enlarged veins, neuralgic pains and rheumatism, the application of this soothing Ointment to the affected parts not only gives the greatest ease, but likewise cures the complaint. The Pills much assist in banishing the tendency to rheumatism and similar painful disorders, whilst the Ointment cures the local ailment. The Pills remove the constitutional disturbance and regulate every impaired function of every organ throughout the human body. The cure is neither temporary nor superficial, but permanent and complete, and the disease rarely recurs, so perfect has been purification performed by these searching yet harmless preparations.

CALCUTTA, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 29, 1892.

No. 546

ALFRED TENNYSON.

"LORD Tennyson passed away quite peacefully at 1-30 A.M." on the 6th October 1892, at his summer residence, Aldworth, Halsemere. Such is the report of the attending physicians Sir Andrew Clark and Dr. George H. R. Dabbs. Those who witnessed the death describe it as a most peaceful and almost imperceptible transition from life to death. The doctors attribute the death partly to suppressed gout and partly to an attack of influenza, but principally to natural decay. It was besides a picturesque passing away. One account says:—"There was a certain grandeur about the closing scene which will fix itself in the memory of those who were sadly fortunate enough to witness it. The full moon streamed through the oriel widow and shed a soft light upon the recumbent figure of the dying poet. The only illumination was that supplied by nature. The face of the dying man wore an absolutely painless and peaceful expression. On rare occasions there was abundant evidence that the powers of his mind remained almost unimpaired." According to Sir Andrew Clark, the death of Lord Tennyson was the most glorious he had ever seen. "The room was almost in darkness, and the poet lay in the moon light, with a Rembrandt-like background."

THE PASSING OF MERLIN.

"I am Merlin,
"And I am dying,
"I am Merlin,
"Who follow the Gleam."

—Tennyson's Merlin and the Gleam.

I.

Merlin has gone—has gone!—and through the land
The melancholy message wings its way;
To careless-ordered garden by the bay,
Back o'er the narrow strait to island strand,
Where Camelot looks down on wild Broceliand.

II.

Merlin has gone, Merlin the Wizard who found
In the Past's glimmering tide, and hailed him King
Arthur, great Uther's son, and so did sing
The mystic glories of the Table Round,
That ever its name will live so long as Song shall sound.

III.

Merlin has gone, Merlin who followed the Gleam,
And made us follow it; the flying tale
Of the Last Tournament, the Holy Grail,
And Arthur's Passing; till the Enchanter's dream
Dwells with us still awake, no visionary theme.

IV.

To-day is dole in Astolat, and dole
In Celidon the forest,—dole and tears.
In Joyous Gard blackhooded lean the spears:
The nuns of Almesbury sound a mournful toll,
And Guinevere kneeling weeps, and prays for Merlin's soul.

V.

A wailing cometh from the shores that veil
Avilion's island valley; on the mere,
Looms through the mist and wet winds weeping blear
A dusky barge, which, without oar or sail,
Fades to the far-off fields where falls nor snow nor hail.

VI.

Of all his wounds He will be healed now,
Wounds of harsh time and vulnerable life,
Fatigue of rest and weariness of strife,
Doubt and the long deep questionings that plough
The forehead of age but bring no harvest to the brow.

VII.

And there He will be comforted; but we Must watch, like Percival, the dwindling light
That slowly shrouds him darkling from our sight.
From the great deep to the great deep hath he Passed, and, if now he knows, is mute eternally.

VIII.

From Somersby's ivied tower there sinks and swells
A low slow peal, that mournfully is rolled
Over the long gray fields and glimmering wold.
To where, 'twixt sandy tracts and moorland fells,
Remembers Locksley Hall his musical farewells.

IX.

And many a sinewy youth on Cam to-day
Suspends the dripping oar and lets his boat
Like dreaming water-lily drift and float,
While murmuring to himself the undying lay
That haunts the babbling Wye and Severn's dirgeful bay.

X.

The bole of the broad oak whose knotted knees
Lie hidden in the fern of Cumnor Chase,
Feels stirred afresh, as when Olivia's face
Lay warm against its rind, though now it sees
Not Love but Death approach, and shivers in the breeze.

XI.

In many a Vicarage garden, dense with age,
The haunt of pairing throstles, many a grange
Moated against the assault and siege of change,
Fair eyes consult anew the cherished Sage,
And now and then a tear falls blistering the page.

XII.

April will blossom again, again will ring
With cuckoo's call and yaffel's flying scream,
And in veiled sleep the nightingale will dream,
Warbling as if awake. But what will bring
His sweet note back?—the minute, it scarcely will be Spring.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given, any other being unnecessary and likely to cause confusion.

XIII.

The Seasons sorrow for Him and the Hours
Droop, like to bees belated in the rain.
The unmoving shadow of a pensive pain
Lies on the lawn and lingers on the flowers,
And sweet and sad seem one in woodbine-woven bowers.

XIV.

In English gardens fringed with English foam,
Or girt with English woods, he loved to dwell,
Singing of English lives in thorp or dell,
Orchard or croft; so that when now we roam
Through them, and find Him not, it scarcely feels like home.

XV.

And England's glories stirred Him as the swell
Of bluff winds blowing from Atlantic brine
Stirs mightier music in the murmuring pine.
Then sweet notes waxed to strong within his shell,
And bristling rose the lines, and billowy rose and fell.

XVI.

So England mourns for Merlin, though its tears
Flow not from bitter source that wells in vain,
But kindred rather to the rippling rain
That brings the daffodil sheaths and jonquil spears,
When Winter weeps away and April reappears.

XVII.

For never hath England lacked a voice to sing
Her fairness and her fame, nor will she now.
Silence awhile may brood upon the bough,
But shortly once again the Isle will ring
With wakening winds of March and rhapsodies of Spring.

XVIII.

From Arthur unto Alfred, Alfred crowned
Monarch and Minstrel both, to Edward's day,
From Edward to Elizabeth, the lay
Of valour and love hath never ceased to sound,
But Song and Sword are twin, indissolubly bound.

XIX.

Nor shall in Britain Taliessin tire
Transmitting through his stock the sacred strain.
When fresh renown prolongs Victoria's Reign,
Some patriot hand will sweep the living lyre,
And prove with native notes, that Merlin was his sire.

ALFRED AUSTIN.

—The Times.

OCTOBER 6, 1892.

Dear Friend and honoured Master, art thou dead?
And shall I see no more thy reverend face
Recall our older England's manlier grace,
Nor any more admire that noble head,
That brow as board as Shakespeare's, that grave eye,
Now soft with mirth, now fired with fantasy,
Nor bear again thy rugged kindly speech
Lighten the darkling ways of thought, and teach
The Right thou lov'dst, nor breathe the eager air
Of thy lone eyrie with thee, nor behold
Thy bent, cloaked figure, dark against the gold
And purple of thy dear secluded hill,
Pace with uncertain footsteps day by day
The much-loved round, nor in the failing light
Upon thy smooth lawns watch the summer night
Steal o'er the ghostly plains, nor mark the strain
Of thy blithe thrushes with thee, nor again

The enamoured lonely nightingale complain?
Thy years were come to harvest; home-spent years
Of reverence from without, of love within.
A perfect life, health, riches, honours, fame,
All these were thine, no prize was left to win;
Scant sorrow, save that fine despondency
Which fans the smouldering genius into flame;
Only two brief experiences of tears,
The dear friend lost in youth, the son in age;
Bracing thy soul to bear whatever should be.
Such lives Fate grants not often, nor for long,
And rarest to the suffering ranks of song.
Why should we mourn, save for our private pain
And friendship which shall never come again?
Our race can never lose thee, whose fair page,
Rich with the harvest of a soul inspired,
So many a weakling life and heart has fired;
Thou art not wholly gone, but livest yet
Till all our England's sons their tongue forget.
Thy place is with the Immortals. Who shall gauge
Thy rank among thy peers of world-wide song?
Others, it may be, touched a note more strong,
Scaled loftier heights, or glowed with fiercer rage;
But who like thee could slay our modern Doubt?
Or soothe the sufferers with a tenderer heart?
Or dress gray legends with such perfect grace?
Or nerve life's world-worn pilgrims for their part?
Who, since our English tongue first grew, has stirred
More souls to noble effort by his word?
More reverent who of Man, of God, of Truth?
More piteous of the sore-tried strength of Youth?
Thy chaste, white Muse, loathing the Pagan rout,
Would drive with stripes the goatish Satyr out.
Thy love of Righteousness preserved thee pure,
Thy lucid genius scorned to lurk obscure,
And all thy jewelled Art and native Grace
Were consecrate to God and to the Race.
This day extinguishes a Star as bright
As shone upon our dying Century.
Here, as in that great England over sea,
"Light after Light goes out," yet 'tis not night.
The peaceful moonbeams kissed him as he lay
At midnight, dying in the arms of Love;
Thou couldst not wait the dawn of earthly Day.
Farewell, best soul, Farewell. And if, indeed,
Some care for things of earth may mount above,
As is our hope, enfranchised spirit, plead
For this our England which thou lov'dst so long
And crown'dst with thy diadem of Song.

LEWIS MORRIS.

—The Times.

LORD TENNYSON.

No "moaning of the bar!" Sail forth, strong ship!
Into that gloom which has God's face for far light;
Not dirge, but proud farewell, from each fond lip,
And praise—abounding praise; and fame's faint star-light
Lamping thy tuneful soul to that large noon
Where thou shalt quire with angles. Words of woe
Are for the unfulfilled—not thee, whose moon
Of genius sinks full-orbed, glorious, a-glow.
No "moaning of the bar!" Musical drifting
Of Time's waves, turning to the Eternal Sea;
Death's soft wind all thy gallant canvas lifting.
And Christ thy pilot to the Peace to be.

—The Daily Telegraph.

WEEKLYANA.

THE date of the Viceroy's Levée at Madras has been changed from Saturday, the 26th November, to the previous Friday, the 25th November. That shews disturbance in the earlier programme of tour. On account of the death from cholera of two European ladies at Roza, Lord Lansdowne does not go to Arungabad.

THE Viceroy will hold a Levée of all Civil and Military Officers and the Native Officers of the Native Regiments of the Garrison, at Government House, Calcutta, on Thursday, the 8th December 1892, at 9-30 P.M. Gentlemen purposing to attend the Levée must send their cards to the Aide-de-Camp in waiting not later than Saturday, the 26th November 1892. Gentlemen who have not already been presented at the Court of St. James or at Government House are required to add the names of Gentlemen who will present them. The presenting Gentlemen must themselves attend the Levée.

What is the definition of a Gentleman?

The Drawing Room has been fixed for Wednesday, the 14th December at 9-30 P.M. Cards will be received by the Aide-de-Camp in Waiting up to Thursday, the 8th December. Ladies are expected to appear in Full Dress, but without trains.

"There is a rumour to the effect that copies of the Amir's proclamation against the Shias have found their way to Persia and into the hands of the Shah. As the latter is a Shia, and the Amir's proclamation incites all true believers to kill the Shias and make their women and children slaves, relations between Persia and Afghanistan are not likely to be improved thereby."

The above appeared in the Indian Daily News of the 30th ultimo. We are sorry to find that the bitterness of feeling between the two sects has been on the increase rather than the contrary.

THE forthcoming World's Fair of Chicago is, of course, expected to be go-ahead. Its very amusements will be formidable. The denizens of our effete Hemisphere who may wish to attend, specially those of weak nerves, had better prepare themselves for the sights and sounds and shocks in store for them by at least a course of attendance at sensational plays and exhibitions, besides the reading of frightful accidents by flood or field. For us of the Old World, the showman entering the lion's cage and petting the king of the forest as if he were a cat or a spaniel, and even introducing his arm into His Majesty's terrible buccal cavity, or Blondin walking on the rope from bank to bank of a river and cooking high in the air, reaches the extreme limits of endurance. Chicago will offer something beyond these wellknown efforts. Everything in America is on a large scale, and the sensations supplied will be as ample as the most diseased craving could desire. At any rate, an American projector proposes to the Executive Committee of the Fair

"to lease a piece of land near the show ground upon which he intends to build a railway a mile in circumference with another line inside the main tract, the two being connected by a switch. On one side the projector would erect a grand stand capable of accommodating 30,000 people. The lines would be placed in such a position that two engines with carriages going in opposite directions would collide. Thus he would produce a real railway disaster, which he contends would prove an attractive spectacle. He proposes for the purposes of his display to buy abandoned engines from different railways, which can be procured cheaply. He says he can provide performances twice a week at a cost of £500 each."

Artificial thunder and lightning on the stage is familiar to play-goers. But artificial railway collisions of the genuine kind for pastime will be decidedly new. How far they will be pleasant we need not discuss. Nor need our nice caterers stop here. We expect to hear some enterprising soul setting up a neat little, but sufficiently powerful, Ætna or Vesuvius and providing for the fun of the visitors volcanic eruptions. Collisions are common enough on certain lines, and after the first few performances the made railway collisions at the Fair will be too commonplace to draw. Then will be the season for liquid fire and distilled damnation and the rest of it. Then volleys and showers of brimstone and fire will be a relief to the jaded imagination. Nothing short of earthquakes for the Fun of the Future! Nor need there be any particular anxiety on that score. There are quacks enough ready to advertise Pills and Mixtures for the Earthquake as there are vaunted nostrums already for the gout.

SIR Charles Elliott will have Mr. H. Luttman-Johnson. The services of the Judge and Commissioner of the Assam Valley Districts have been transferred to Bengal. He replaces Mr. J. C. Veasy, retired from the service, and takes charge, on the 1st November, from Mr. H. G. Cooke, the officiating incumbent, as Commissioner of the Dacca Division. Mr. Cooke will officiate as Commissioner of the Orissa Division and Superintendent of the Tributary Mahals during the absence, on furlough, of Mr. Toynbee.

THE German Emperor is said to have celebrated the birth of his daughter by pardon to all female prisoners now undergoing sentence for their first crimes committed through distress or anger.

It appears from the Hoogly correspondent in the Indian Daily News, that the District Magistrate Mr. Duke paid all the shrad expenses on the death of the father of one of his clerks and was himself "present on the occasion to see that everything was well done." We hope the Church will not issue its anathema against Mr. Duke. Anyhow, God will bless the sympathetic Englishman.

A DARING fraud and forgery is being investigated at the Serampore Magistracy in the Hooghly District. On the day the offices closed for the Dussehra vacation, a deed of mortgage was registered at the office of the Sub-Registrar of Serampore. The document purported to have been executed by Protap Chunder Bose, a son of the deceased Tarini Churn Bose of this city, in favour of one Nanda Lal Roy. The consideration was Rs. 35,000, the securities being chiefly Calcutta properties valued at 3 lacs and a garden at Rishra near Serampore. The deed was prepared at the office of Baboo Ashutosh Dhur, attorney, High Court, Calcutta. The executant was identified by Peary Lal Halder, an articulated clerk to the said attorney. Protap Chunder who had been absent from town when the deed was executed, being informed of it by another attorney of the High Court, expressed total ignorance of the transaction, came down to Calcutta and started the enquiry. Warrants were issued against the mortgagee and his identifier and summonses against the attorney and an attesting witness to the deed, Gobind Chunder Dey. The attorney stated in court that to the best of his belief the complainant whom he saw in court was not the person who had executed the deed. His clerk Peary Lal too made the same statement, and added that the complainant was not the person whom he had identified. The complainant claimed to be known to the attorney, on which Babu Ashutosh said that he might have seen the complainant before but he did not know him by name nor knew his father's name. From a statement of the attorney's it appears that one Benodi Lal Roy, brother of the mortgagee, was the person who had taken a leading part in the transaction and had introduced the executant to him, and that one Bani Madhub Shaw acted as broker in the transaction. Processes have also been ordered against these two persons. The personator keeps himself away.

IT is also suspected that two or three questionable transactions were passed in the Calcutta Registration office about the same time.

A YOUNG dealer in second-hand books in London sold to a private English collector a small uncut volume on the Early English Settlements in North America for 75s. for which he had just paid 5s. While he was felicitating himself on the enormous profit he had made on a single transaction—indeed a single volume, he was surprised with an offer of 500s. for the same volume or another copy. It is said that there are Americans in the market who are ready to pay down 1000s. or more for the same book. It is a pity the London papers do not give the name and date of the book. There are so many on the same subject.

THE famous Tretyakov Gallery of pictures by Russian artists, including a specially fine collection of Vereschagina, has been bequeathed by the late owner to the city of Moscow, together with funds for the maintenance and extension of the gallery.

FATHER Marcellino of Civezzano, South Tyrol, has come upon a document from which it appears that a Franciscan friar of Jodi had accompanied Columbus on his voyage of discovery of America.

NOTES & LEADERETTES

with

OUR OWN NEWS.

IN view of possible military eventualities threatening on the frontier, Lord Lansdowne is understood to be most anxious to avoid a change in the personnel of the chief command in India. We believe the Viceroy has prevailed upon Lord Roberts to stay if the interest of the State should be thought to require it. Considering that the Commander-in-Chief's medical advisers press him to have done with the East and run to Europe instantly, his Excellency's submission to the call of the Chief of the State involves no ordinary sacrifice. It may cost his valuable life itself. Such loyalty is worthy of the Hero.

It is said that the Viceroy in Council has sent a despatch to the Secretary of State for India strongly recommending that the term of Lord Roberts' office may be extended and he be requested to remain in India another year, till November 1893. It is understood that the Governor-General has further made a personal request in his behalf. It is Lord Lansdowne's earnest wish that so long as he remains at the head of the Government of India, his administration may not be weakened, as it must be, by the appointment of a new general officer, however able and distinguished, at the head of the Army. Lord Roberts is awaiting the decision of the Home Government. For our part, we cannot conceive that decision to be contrary to the recommendation of the Government on the spot here, which has charge of the peace and protection of the Empire. Such a decision, we are afraid, will not commend itself to all. The service boasts many heroes more or less genuine and they will be apt to see in an extension to Lord Roberts only a block to promotion. But these selfish grumblings cannot be listened to when the efficiency of the State machinery is concerned, specially when the honour and safety of the Empire might be at stake. The Viceroy's anxiety for the salus populi is worthy of Lord Lansdowne. Having, from the outset of his administration, worked in harmony with Lord Roberts, and having shaped his military policy and taken his military measures not only under his Lordship's advice but also in reliance upon his professional experience and, above all, his Lordship's military genius, it is quite natural that he should feel uncomfortable at being left in the lurch as it were, with the prospect of pursuing that policy and following up those measures with inferior help.

A MORE loyal representative of Commerce and Manufactures does not exist than Mr. S. E. J. Clarke, and his various capacities of Secretary to the Bengal Chamber of Commerce, Secretary to the Indian Jute Manufacturers' Association, Secretary to the Calcutta Hydraulic Press Association, and Secretary to the Calcutta Import Trade Association, give him a clear advantage in ventilating mercantile grievances with speed and effect. He has now drawn up a powerful protest against the principle of taxation in the Jute Warehouse and Fire Brigade Act. The Bengal Chamber of Commerce through him contends that "the only fair way of dealing with the question of the support of the Fire Brigade is to make it a purely Municipal duty." The Chamber may well resent the payment of Rs. 60,000 from the surplus of the Jute and Fire Brigade fund to the Municipality instead of its application towards temporary reduction of the license fee on Jute warehouses. The proposition of the Chamber is thus laid down:

"It is manifestly unjust that the cost of the Fire Brigade should fall on any one class of property, such as the Jute Screw Houses, when other or more dangerous Trades entirely escape."

"As probably some modification of the Act may be contemplated, the Committee would venture to point out that not only is the principle of making one class of Trade pay for the expenses of the Fire Brigade unjust, but likewise that those who insure should be taxed for the benefit of those who do not. The cost of the Fire Brigade is fairly contributable to by all the inhabitants, and would, with more propriety, be borne by General Funds."

Whatever the cogency of the propositions, the policy was different when the Jute warehouses were brought under special taxation and legislation. If the warehouses are now different and there have not been the constant fires therein which the law was made to prevent, that ipso facto does not prove that the necessity of the law has determined. It is a proper question, however, whether the special taxation should not now be extended to other dangerous and inflammable materials to the relief of the jute industry. The Government admits the situation, for we find that "the Lieutenant-Governor agrees with the Committee of the Chamber in the opinion that it is unreasonable to make Jute and Cotton Warehouses pay—and more than pay—for the Fire Brigade required for Calcutta and the Suburbs, and the obvious remedy for the present state of things would be to increase the area of taxation and to levy fees on all warehouses, buildings, or places used for storing any dangerously inflammable materials." Mr. Clarke justly complains:

"This was in 1878, yet it cannot be said that the Act of 1884 which is now to be repealed was in any sense a concession to the principle for which the Chamber was contending, or a relief to the Jute Trade."

The Municipal Commissioners are naturally averse from abandoning a source of income which has been in existence for so many years. In the present state of affairs, we may expect a compromise or a lightening of the burden on Jute and Cotton Warehouses. Mr. Clarke is, however, bound to succeed. He who could abolish a national holiday by his persistent efforts, may well claim the repeal of the jute tax in this city.

THE Egyptian exile Araby the Unblest has addressed the following letter to the Times :—

"Sir.—My attention having from time to time been called to various remarks in your newspaper as to the state of my health, I would beg a small space in the same powerful journal to state what is really the case, as there are still many good English friends who take some interest in my position. I have never been, nor can I ever be, well in the hot, moist climate of Colombo, so totally different is it from the dry atmosphere of my native country. Of recent years this influence has taken much more effect, and not only have my eyes suffered to a painful extent, but my general health has become exceedingly feeble. But for the periodical visits which I make to Mr. —'s beautifully-situated tea and coffee estates in the high districts of this island, where bungalows, servants, and every possible comfort are most generously placed at my disposal by my host, I am afraid that the climate of Colombo would long ere this have finished its work so far as I am concerned.—I am, sir, yours sincerely,

A. ARABI, THE EGYPTIAN.

Elsternwick, Kollupitiya, Colombo, Sep. 10."

So, Araby the Egyptian is Araby the doomed! The victim of a mischance, he is being slowly but surely ground down to death under a sort of solitary confinement by the effectual forces of adverse climate. And wherefore? He has been punished enough already for his indiscretion or his crime, if you will. It is a pity that such brilliant ability should lie fallow. A grave responsibility rests on those who consign it to inaction. But it is vain to lament the past. Age and disuse have done their work and that ability is now only a tradition. The Egyptian does not seek or intend to work. He has lost both the capacity and the inclination for it. He wants to live in health and comfort if possible, if not to die in peace among his friends at home. What prevents England from granting his prayer? The reasons against his going to Egypt no longer exist. If he may still be formidable in the valley of the Nile, he may be sent to that of the Euphrates or that of the Jordan, or to the Hedjas or Nejd, or any Soonnee Mahomedan country with a tolerably salubrious climate—anywhere out of the Black Hole of Ceylon. There cannot be the slightest danger in sending the brave man to any place on the globe on his word of honour. Another African—a greater hero by far—has proved what a Mussulman's truth is. Shall England be behind France in generous trustfulness?

A REMARKABLE American named Alexander Russell Webb was lately in Calcutta as a visitor. He had formerly been a journalist in the United States, but about 5 years ago he took service under the American Government as Consul in the Philippine Islands and had ever since been living at Manila. For a number of years he has been studying the various religious systems in the world as far as he could do so with the help of English books, and ultimately finding the Mahomedan religion as the best has embraced Islam. He is of opinion that as there is virtually no real religious belief amongst the majority of his countrymen of the Union, if the principles of Islam were clearly placed before them, they would gladly follow his example. In this view he has resigned his Consular appointment and is now on his way back to America. Having visited Singapore and Rangoon on his way, he came to Calcutta, and is now in Bombay. He will probably visit Europe and England before returning home. His idea is to issue a first class English journal in which he will place before his readers articles explaining the religion of Mahomed, and answering the attacks made upon it by the learned of other Faiths. He believes that he will, in this way, be able to create a taste among his countrymen for the study of Mahomedanism, as he means to print and distribute thousands of copies of his paper.

He was received in Calcutta by a large number of Mahomedans of the mercantile community, and was their guest in a house in Amratollah Street.

Those who met him are unanimous in giving a good report. He impressed his visitors as an educated, enlightened and courteous gentleman, of strong health and will, full of energy and vivacity—just the man to do and get on.

A MAN of 75 and a woman of 69 have been married in New Zealand after an engagement of fifty years.

Punch's advice to those who are about to marry has become classical and proverbial. The old sage of Fleet Street said—Don't. It is not always safe advice—either to the giver or the receiver. Our discreeter Oriental message is—Wait.

What a waiting game was matrimony for that reverend couple! They must be lineal descendants of Fabius himself.

THE Viceroy is on tour. Leaving Simla on the morning of the 27th, the Viceregal party arrived at Umballa by special train from Kalka at 8-30 and was received on the platform by Mr. C. E. Gladstone, the Deputy Commissioner, the Maharaja of Patiala, Capt. Maxwell, R. A., and others. After dinner in the train, Lord Lansdowne left en route for Poona at 9-30. The train was due at Bhopal at 8-30 in the evening of the 28th. The Begum was herself present to receive the Viceroy, and entertained His Excellency at a dinner in a shamiana adjoining the station. Dinner over, the Begum made her appearance. She proposed in Urdu successively the healths of the Queen-Empress, and of the Viceroy and the Marchioness of Lansdowne, which were suitably though briefly acknowledged by Lord Lansdowne, Captain Meade, the Political Agent, throughout acting as interpreter. The stay was short and the special train left for Poona shortly after 10 o'clock.

SIR Charles Elliott arrived at Calcutta on Thursday. He leaves again on Tuesday next for the autumn tour.

THE Secretary of State having sanctioned a sixth Judge for the Allahabad High Court, Mr. Judicial Commissioner W. R. Burdett has been appointed to the new judgeship. Mr. M. S. Howell, Additional Judicial Commissioner in Oudh, succeeds him. Mr. Howell, in his turn, is replaced as Additional Judicial Commissioner by the Hon'ble George T. Spankie, Barrister-at-law.

Mr. Burdett is an M. A. of Trinity College, Dublin, and a Barrister-at-law, who has been over thirty years in the Civil Service of the Upper Provinces, the last five of which he has held with credit judicial appointments, whereof the last was the high office of Judicial Commissioner in Oudh.

Mr. Howell is an Oxonian, of Corpus Christi, a Fellow of the Calcutta University, a scholar and Orientalist and member of the Asiatic Society of Bengal. He has published a valuable high class Arabic grammar of the classical language of the Koran. He is junior to Mr. Burdett in standing but by only a year or so, being thirty years in the service. He has served in different lines, executive, educational, and judicial. For the last twelve years, he has devoted himself exclusively to judicature, both criminal and civil.

Mr. Spankie is still a comparatively young man, being only 44 years of age, but he is a lawyer by profession and an exceptionally clever man. Called to the bar in 1871, he accepted office in the Allahabad High Court as Official Reporter to the Court in April 1873 and officiated as Registrar at the end of the year and again in 1877. Reporter he was more than once. He also did a good deal of independent practice with great credit to himself and his. For he comes of a legal family. Like the Stranges and the Nortons in Madras, and the Pearsons in Bengal, the Spankies have distinguished themselves in these Provinces as Judges and Advocates. Mr. Spankie's father was the Advocate-General of the old Supreme Court in Fort William and his uncle Robert was long an honoured Judge of the High Court, N. W. Provinces. The Calcutta Advocate General had more than an Indian reputation. He was a rather famous man in his day at home, not only at the bar but also in the press, in Parliament, and in society. Mr. Spankie, therefore, has need to be at once good and clever, if only to retain self-respect. Luckily for him, he is both in a large measure. The opinion in the Upper Provinces is that he will be a distinct acquisition to the judiciary but a loss to the bar.

As regards the qualifications of the favoured individuals, no fault can be found with the appointments. We can only regret that the opportunity has not been taken to introduce a native gentleman to the higher judiciary.

MR. Justice Mahmood, of the Allahabad High Court, having obtained a year's furlough, Mr. R. S. Aikman, Judge of Farukhabad, has been selected to officiate for him. This is a retrograde movement. It is not to be excused on the plea that it is but a temporary arrangement. If there is any better ground for making it, the Government should lose no time to make it public. Meanwhile, the arrangement has a sinister appearance. The appointment of Mr. Aikman to act for a whole year for Mr. Mahmood, will deprive the natives of the only High Court judgeship reserved to them. It will be felt by our countrymen throughout the Empire as a blow to their legitimate aspirations. In Upper India, it has already been the subject of public meetings at Benares and other places. The last demonstration was held at Allahabad, in the grounds of the Kayastha Pathshala, under the presidency of Raja Rampal Singh, of Kalakankur. On the proposition of Pundit Latchmi Narain Veyas, seconded by Mr. Simeon and supported by Mr. J. E. Howard and Mr. Madan Mohan Malaviya, they recorded the following resolution:—

"That this meeting desires to give public expression to the deep disappointment and regret which have been caused throughout the Province by the announcement that it has been settled that the vacancy occasioned in the N. W. P. High Court by Mr. Justice Mahmood's furlough is to be filled up by a European and not an Indian Judge; and that having regard to the fact that the marked ability with which natives of India have filled the highest judicial offices in this country, has been testified to by the most competent authorities and to the recommendations of the Public Service Commission for an increased employment of the natives of India as High Court Judges, this meeting expresses the earnest hope that the announcement referred to above is premature and unauthoritative, and that the Government will not ignore the claims of Indians to the highest appointment open to them in the Judicial Service of the Province and do justice to them."

It is a pity the promoters of the meeting found no one to lick that Resolution into better shape and language. But the very awkwardness of its form and expression proves the purely indigenous character of the demonstration. The Resolution is a genuine outcome of native feeling and represents a substantial grievance. Having watched Sir Auckland Colvin from the time he was Financial Member of the Government of India, we have always found him generous to native claims, though without maudlin effusiveness. Unless there be any peculiar justification for it we wot not, we confess that, in the absence of specific information, we are in no haste to take him for the true author of the arrangement. But the mist ought to be cleared up. Will our contemporary of the Pioneer or the Morning Post do the needful?

WE have had submitted to us a collection of prints from the workshop of Mr. Heberlet supplied to different customers, mostly as illustrations to periodicals and books. We can unhesitatingly pronounce upon their excellence. They look like the best drawings on stone but are in reality printed from photographs—printed by the calotype process. They of course recall the noble illustrations by that process which now lend an artistic interest to the annual Administration Reports of the Surveyor-General. Formerly these Reports used to be illustrated by the finest photographs of mountain scenery, of sun and cloud, snow and mist effects, but since the introduction of the calotype, those photographs have been thrown into the shade. The Surveyor-General's office is the only place in India where this process is understood and worked. Mr. Heberlet is the only man who, having with much intelligence and at no small labor and sacrifice, mastered the trick, has made a business of it. He has, we understand, given up his connection with the press, to devote himself entirely to it. We hope a family man like him will not have to rue his ambition and enterprise. By the excellence of his work, he deserves success. By the moderate rates at which he turns out his work, he ought to command it. This, therefore, is the first genuine opportunity for illustrated literature and journalism. Already, the Englishman office has utilised Mr. Heberlet's skill by enriching the Englishman's Saturday Evening Journal with his photo-etchings. Some of the illustrations were simply charming. Who that has once seen will forget the picture of the noble avenue of palms in the Botanical Gardens?

THE Bengalee has an obituary notice of the late Poet Laureate which invites remark. The article, which is simply and familiarly headed "Tennyson," is replete with fresh biographical information, original criticism, and even new readings, such as we shall look for in vain in any of the numerous writings on the subject with which we shall soon be flooded from Europe. We are told the deceased was a supremely lucky man.

"His was not a chequered career. It was not his lot to work amidst disappointments, and troubles, and to struggle against adverse fate."

The truth is that Lord Tennyson was almost snuffed out for nearly ten years by a great bereavement. But the writer does not remember that the Poet was the author of In Memoriam. That trifling production is not once mentioned in the whole course of the article. The writer might have at least remembered the luckless visit of the poet's accomplished son, Lionel Tennyson, a few years ago, to India and the deadly malaria which he caught staying in the neighbourhood of the home of the editor of the Bengalee, at Government House at Barrackpore, and from the effects of which he expired at sea on the homeward voyage. Like many other Indian journalists, the Bengalee quotes without rhyme or reason Tennyson's fine compliment to his predecessor in the Laureateship, in his dedication to the Queen. But he improves upon them all in his reading. He writes:—

"In 1850, he received the laurel—

Green from the brows,

Of him who uttered nothing base."

The distribution of feet to the lines is original, the punctuation original. It is a mercy of Providence to the lamented deceased that the lines scan, somehow, otherwise it were mangling upon murder of the poor Poet. We say Providence, because clearly we do not owe it to the kindness of the critic. The appropriate quotation on the laurel—"green from the brows,"—is followed by a pithy characterization and description, to wit—

"He was a wise and a happy man, a thinker and a dreamer, who read and walked."

The truth of that sentence will be conceded at once. We certainly are not prepared to deny that the deceased, great poet as he was and noble lord as he became, read and walked. We may add to our contemporary's information some perfectly authentic information, namely, that Lord Tennyson ate and drank and talked. If he read and walked more than he ate and drank and talked, he probably smoked more than anything he did.

Yet, there are gleams of comprehension and insight in the notice, and the concluding paragraph is good. The whole seems to be a patch-work of the labours of different hands artificially combined by one who could not say "boh" to a goose.

WHILE this writer is not aware of In Memoriam, another neighbouring contemporary, who by the bye has written the best thing in the Indian press on the late Poet, insists upon that as the Poet's greatest work. That is the partiality of the psychologist—not the appreciation of true criticism. As well might you place Lucretius above Virgil and Homer!

WE read in an English paper:—

"Mr. Andrew Carnegie, who gave a sum of 10,000*l.* to build a library at Ayr, and Mrs. Carnegie were the guests of the burgh on Oct. 5, in connection with the laying of the memorial stone of the new building. The town was decorated, and a half holiday was generally observed. A procession was formed from the municipal buildings to the library, where the guests met with a very hearty reception. Mrs. Carnegie laid the stone, and her husband was afterwards presented with the freedom of the royal burgh of Ayr. In acknowledging the honour Mr. Carnegie said he felt more strongly bound than ever to devote the remaining years of his life less and less to aims which ended in self, more and more to the service of others, by using his surplus wealth and spare time in the manner which seemed most likely to produce the greatest good to the masses of the people from whom the surplus wealth came to its possessors, only as a trust to be passed through their hands as administrators. Mrs. Carnegie was presented by the library committee in Burns's cottage with an album containing photographic views of the land of Burns."

How few are the men blessed with wealth who breathe such noble sentiments! But Mr. Carnegie—over and above the foundation he has laid for another world—has been nobly recompensed. Ayr is something much more and infinitely higher than a royal burgh. It is the land of Poesy. One of its humblest sons has made it famous through all time. For, the home of the inspired ploughman can never be forgotten. Every hill and dale—all the nooks and corners—of that obscure locality in Scotland, have been consecrated by the genius of song. And it is the distinction of the Carnegies to be the benefactor of Ayr—to comfort, to heal, and to adorn. It is no small privilege that is theirs, to link their names with the Vale of the Muses and the scenes of the life of Scotia's chief singer and the true People's Poet. Few very wealthy men have the heart to give away, and still fewer givers are so lucky as to be blessed with such a windfall of immortality in the normal exercise of their charitable propensities, as Mr. Carnegie and his worthy consort.

THE Indian Daily News, as the only paper in Lower Bengal which has a regular correspondent at Hyderabad and other sources besides of information respecting Deccan affairs, naturally appreciates our efforts to place the public in possession of all facts necessary for a correct comprehension of the politics of that Court. That journal concludes its opening leader of Tuesday last thus:—

"In the last number of Reis and Rayyet there is a very full and fair account of the state of affairs in Hyderabad and what has led to it. We perceive that the views of our contemporary are much in accordance with our own, and the indication of a new minister much in the same direction."

In the same issue, the Indian Daily News has also the following editorial note:—

"Reis and Rayyet in its issue of Saturday last throws a good deal of light on the affairs of Hyderabad, and gives copious notes of some of the chief intriguers there. The record is interesting; and if it should meet the eye of His Excellency the Viceroy, the account would well answer for what the Americans would call an 'eye-opener.' It is only that we have ourselves had so much on the subject that we do not reproduce the interesting and instructive account."

IN our last issue we stated, on the strength of telegrams received from Hyderabad, that the Nizam had not only accepted Mushtak Hosain's resignation, but issued peremptory orders for his leaving His Highness's territories. We also announced the suspension of the Hyderabad Home Secretary, Mehdi Hassan, as well as that of his bosom friend or creature and Mushtak's chief lieutenant, Ikbāl Ali, for making an immoral proposal to a young European lady. Those items of news have been fully confirmed. We now find that the Deccan Budget is quite disconsolate at his patron's disgrace and unable to understand why he has been suddenly dismissed and deported, and why has Mehdi Hassan too been suspended on such an apparently insufficient ground. Knowing well that his friend had taken advantage of the incompetence of the Prime Minister over whom he had acquired undue influence, not only to usurp all the functions of Government but also virtually to suppress the hereditary Ruler, this journalist is unable to believe the Nizam capable of performing such extraordinary feats, and in his despair jumps to the conclusion that the order was issued on the day following the Resident's unusually long interview with His Highness.

The Nizam's intelligence and ability have never been seriously questioned. Accordingly, we have no difficulty in believing that the first step to clear the Augean stable was his own and of no one's instigation. Once his forbearance was exhausted, the rest was comparatively easy. Even if the Resident, in his interview, had advised these measures, that public officer deserves only praise. Notwithstanding that the Deccan Budget, reserves its praises for Mushtak Hosain, saying that his services to the Hyderabad State have been "on the whole honest, faithful and zealous," and "deserve exceptionally generous treatment at the hands of His Highness," it is compelled to admit that he has not been quite successful in his last high and responsible position, and that "it was Mushtak Hosain's misfortune that he was constitutionally and by training unfitted, and when once the lust of power, almost unbridled power, entered his soul, he found the temptation to misuse it at times, more than he could withstand." Mushtak's friend gives him another parting kick in the following sentence. "The excessive unpopularity of Mushtak Hosain and the great discontent which was everywhere felt was fast bringing the whole administration into disrepute."

From further information that we have received from the capital of the Nizam, we learn that His Highness had given strict orders on the day that he accepted Mushtak Hosain's resignation, that he must quit Hyderabad in four days. Sir Asman Jah tried his best to persuade His Highness not to enforce this last order, but the Nizam was firm and resolute. The result was that the little-Great-man had to run away on the 4th night, to the disconsolation of his chief and his numerous friends, relatives and creatures. As for Mehdi Hassan, it was not only his disobedience of the orders of His Highness in delaying to submit an explanation in the Pamphlet Scandal case, but also his contumacy in not clearing his conduct in the bribery case in connection with the estate of the Salar Jung family that moved the Nizam to suspend him.

THERE is jubilation in the Nizam's dominion over the fall of Hosain and Hassan—we mean Mushtak and Mehdi. We have received the following telegram from Hyderabad:—

"Public joy at Mushtak Hosain's departure. Mehdi Hassan's suspension continues unabated. Sweets distributed and prayers offered. His Highness is taking greatest interest in State affairs, doing everything himself. For this people are extremely pleased. Their gratitude knows no bounds. It is proposed to present an address to His Highness expressing joy and gratitude for his present attitude regarding State affairs. A deputation composed of leading citizens and representative men will wait with an address. His Highness has consented to receive the deputation on Monday."

THE Municipal Commissioners met on Thursday and dispersed sanctioning only the first item of business. It was a melancholy adjournment. One of their prominent members had died that morning. Mr. Lee in opening the meeting thus bore his testimony to the worth of the departed colleague:—

"It is with profound sorrow that I have to announce to you what I am informed has been based on authentic information. A telegram has been received announcing the death of one of our foremost and ablest Commissioners, one who was distinguished alike for his zeal and for his intelligence—Babu Prannath Pandit. I think we ought to adjourn this meeting till next Thursday. It is because he over-worked himself that he was unable to make a stand against the fever, and fell an easy victim. We cannot afford to lose another valuable life from the same cause, and I therefore ask you to sanction our Vice-Chairman's application for leave for two months and eighteen days."

REIS & RAYYET.

A TRUE PATRIOT THE LESS!

AN accomplished literary man and a true patriot has passed away. We have been shocked by the sudden news of Baboo Pran Nath Pandit's death. He has gone without notice from the scene of his useful career, with the fairest prospect before him of extended usefulness, in the prime of life, without enjoying its prizes. Not yet forty, he has simply killed himself. He had been habituated to excessive mental toil without any exercise. If from time to time he had the opportunity for a change to the Upper Provinces or other parts of India, he never ceased to work even there. Not remunerative work but the work of charity or patriotism or love of letters. People have no idea—his best friends scarcely suspect—of the amount of literary work he went through for his country, for his friends and relations, for strangers. We all in this country who know the trick, have to give that work, but Pran Nath Pandit's facile pen turned out a larger amount than most. Besides, he was an ardent politician and would give up everything for his interest in the subject of the hour. He was not fussy and shrank from vulgar competition with the demagogues. He was ready to labour for the cause however, and he did yeoman's service. He was not a pleasing speaker, having no voice and a bad elocution, and he was deficient in verbal memory, yet he had all a true politician's passion for oratory. Wherever he went he got up meetings and gave lectures and addresses, besides doing literary work for every body. He was a most active and useful member of the Suburban and town Corporations, without forcing himself forward. The assistance of a lawyer and a ready literary man and a keen politician, was invaluable to these bodies. But for the variety of his tastes, besides that he was for a long time locked up in a single protracted litigation in Purulia, he would have been a great vakil of the High Court, with the prospect of translation to the bench to which his lamented father Shumbhoo Nath Pandit was the first Indian to be raised. He might have been made a member of the Bengal Council, but he was too shy to approach the great, and his public labours, solid and valuable as they were, were performed in a respectable delicate way so as to escape the notice of the powers that make. In consequence of the proud isolation in which the Europeans keep themselves, they do not know the real forces at work in native society or the obscure men, prouder than themselves, who form opinion or start questions or ply grievances. There is scarcely an Englishman among the numerous members of the Civil and Military services who ever heard of the late Pran Nath Pandit. Excepting Mr. Stevens who accidentally made his acquaintance at a quiet country town, we doubt if there is one in authority who will be disposed to believe that this Pran Nath Pandit was not only one of the ablest natives but really one of the ablest men in the country. Yet so he was, beyond question. The fact is that the official classes do not come across the best men among the people. The better types maintain their selfrespect by keeping themselves aloof from the haughty conqueror. They often thus wrong the Englishman as well as do harm to their countrymen by not letting the governing foreigner have the help of their information and counsel. Many Englishmen are polite and anxious to learn and do good, but, thrown into the company of inferior natives who make up for their worthlessness by brag which imposes on the stranger, they receive misinformation and misdirection. Not the least injury that these men, the salt of the native community, do by their indifference to cultivate Europeans, is that they permit a bad estimate to be formed of native character. If Sir Lepel Griffin had known Pran Nath Pandit, for instance, he would not have lapsed into his raving about the Baboos. An able man himself he would have respected ability in another. And no man of any judgment could fail to perceive the worth of so good, so amiable, so respectful, so modest a character as Pandit's. His ability was great. The range of his intellectual sympathy was extensive. He did not confine himself to law or even law and politics. Belles Lettres, History, Oriental literature, antiquities, Ethnology, nothing came amiss to him. It is a pity he did not concentrate his powers on a single work. He wrote many booklets and pamphlets. While he was still at College he published an edition of the Sanskrit Megh Duta—the celebrated "Cloud Messenger" of Kalidasa—with a metrical translation in Bengali showing great promise. He had scarcely passed his law examination and taken his degree of B. L. before he launched a learned tract on the Unchastity Case as it was called—the case of the Assamese Kolitanees which was then exercising Hindu society. He took a great interest in the case and agitated it in the public interest. Unknown to his family, the youngster, still in his teens, without independent means of his own, apart from the patrimony he shared with his minor younger brother, actually borrowed money to procure an appeal in the case. Such enthusiasm for the public good is as rare as it is noble. He early joined the Asiatic Society and was no inactive member. He read a paper on the Morals of Kalidasa, his favorite poet, which was listened to with interest by his grave and reverend seniors and was inserted in their journal. In studying the antiquities of the country, he did not rely upon the current or accepted deciphering and interpretation of ancient mural tablets, but brought his Sanskrit and his acute understanding to bear upon their signs. And no doubt he had the advantage over many eminent European archæologists and even natives like Dr. Rajendralala Mitra in that he possessed a first hand competent knowledge of Sanskrit, whereas they for the most part relied upon the guidance of their Pandits and Sastris. Pran Nath Pandit presented to the Society a fresh reading of a mutilated copper plate inscription which is one of the few authentic foundations for the history of Bengal in the Hindu period. The wise men of the classic Hall in Park Street must have been struck at the phenomenon of their meek juvenile colleague with leaden eyes that seem to fear to meet the gaze of his seniors, boldly challenging the reading of the great Colebrook and the mighty Mitra. It is noteworthy that the irascible and pugnacious Rajendralala Mitra took the young knight's vicious thrust quietly. At the bar he had no opportunity; what he was capable of was shown in the far off Kol country. Leading the forlorn hope in behalf of one of the local Rajas—the Zemindar of Pandra on the banks of the Barakar, opposite to the Pachete Raj—he floored his father's friend and colleague at the old Sudder bar, the veteran Baboo Ashutosh Dhur, who pleaded his own cause. With his historic, ethnological, and anthropological love and his knowledge of comparative jurisprudence, Pandit started a perfectly original contention, out of the range of the ordinary lawyer, or any mere lawyer. Luckily he had a Sub-Judge—the lamented Ganganand Mookerjee—who was brave enough not to be scared away by the novelty of the argument of the brilliant young pleader and quite competent to grasp it. Of course he took time, but at last he accepted Pandit's view, which was subsequently upheld by the High Court. It would be too long to tell the story of Pandit's political activity—the many meetings he organized or helped in organising, the many speeches he made, the numerous petitions he drew up or sent—while keeping himself in the background, from the days of the memorable if short-lived Indian League down to the Consent Bill agitation. It must be confessed that he too lost his head over the last business. He was the intellectual soul of the agitation—the chief draughtsman of the movement. The graduates' elaborate Protest was his composition, and he wrote many other arguments for the rotten cause. It was a prostitution of ability, but the ability was unquestionable.

In private life, he was good all round, in every relation, whether as son, as husband, as brother, as father, as master, as neighbour, or as friend.

ENGLISH MOSLEM INTELLIGENCE.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Liverpool, 6th October, 1892.

The Oriental Congress at London brought many visitors to England from the East, and several of these have found their way to Liverpool. Amongst those who made a pilgrimage to the Northern seaport was the Honourable Ahmed Weke, chief of the Bureau of the Council of Ministers at Cairo, Egypt. He arrived in Liverpool on the 27th of September and stayed several days, visiting in that period the overhead railway, the Mersey tunnel, the art gallery, museum, Law Courts and other public buildings. On Tuesday evening he dined with Mr. Quilliam at his residence Fern Bank, Fairfield, and subsequently drove to the mosque where he took part in the Isha Nimaz, the Imaum on that occasion being Bro. L. Emin Nabakoff. On Wednesday he inspected the Moslem College, and was introduced to Professor Falkner, the Headmaster, and Mr. Hedley Haschim Wilde, the Vice-Principal, and to some of the elder pupils. The visitor expressed himself as highly pleased at the intelligent replies given by the scholars to his questions, and as to the mode in which the school was conducted. On Friday evening the Jumma services were conducted by Hadji Elasbi Gussus, formerly of Fez in the kingdom of Morocco but now residing in Liverpool.

On Sunday morning a public lecture was given by Bro. Hassan Rudford who took for his subject "My experiences when a Christian compared with those as a Moslem." The chair was taken by Bro. T. Omar Byrne (Hon. Secretary).

On Sunday evening a large audience assembled in the lecture hall to hear a lecture by Bro. Quilliam, the subject being "Islamic Proverbs." The lecture lasted over an hour, and was enlivened by many anecdotes illustrating how certain proverbs had their origin. The lecture concluded with a vivid description of the Caliph Omar's direction to his lieutenant to burn down a palace which one of his captains had erected as being an abuse of power, and his memorable saying "Purchase the next world with this so that thou shalt gain both," advice which the lecturer said could be as well followed now, as when it was given nearly thirteen centuries ago. The chair was occupied by Bro. H. H. Cotes, who sails this week for the West coast of Morocco.

On Monday the 3rd October, there sailed from Southampton for New York, His Excellency Ismail Hakki Bey, the Imperial Commissioner from the Porte to the Chicago Exhibition. His Excellency had intended to travel with his Secretary Fahri Bey to the United States via Liverpool, but not being able to obtain berths in the Liverpool liners, he was obliged to proceed by a steamer sailing from Southampton. His Excellency has proceeded to Chicago to assist in the preliminary ceremonies in connection with the Exhibition. He will return to Turkey via Liverpool, the first week in November. Fahri Bey, as second Commissioner, will remain in Chicago to superintend the arrival of the exhibits there.

ADAM IBN ADAM.

SIR AUCKLAND COLVIN IN AND ON RAMPUR.

SIR Auckland Colvin had been to Rampur. Leaving Katgodam by special train he arrived at Bareilly in the afternoon of the 20th October. The same night the Lieutenant-Governor started for Moradabad en route for Rampur. Arriving there on the 21st, he was received by Major Vincent and the members of the Regency Council at the Kosi Bridge, the boundary of Rampur territory. In the afternoon, His Honor visited the new library where he was presented with addresses in Urdu, Persian and Sanskrit. After examining the more valuable Persian books, the whole party proceeded through the city, out to the cavalry lines, and there witnessed tent-pegging and several feats of horsemanship by the Rampur Cavalry. An official dinner, at which the members of Council and all the visitors were present, and fire works concluded the programme of the day. Next morning, on the 22nd, at 7, the Lieutenant-Governor took the round of the city, visiting the College, the High Schools, the new law courts, the hospital and the jail. A full durbar was held at eleven in the durbar hall in the Kurshed Munzil, where the trials for the murder of General Azim-ud-din took place. Sir Auckland Colvin made a long speech in Urdu of which the following is a translation :—

Raises of Rampur.—It was proper that before laying down the administration of these Provinces I should revisit Rampur, where I have not been for more than four years, in order that I might personally take leave of the family of the Nawab, of the Raies and officials of Rampur and of the Rampur people, with all of whom, since my accession to office, I have been so intimately concerned. During the four and a half years which have elapsed since I was here last events important to you have occurred and considerable changes have taken place. Of these changes, some have been permanent in their character, some are only temporary. I will speak first of the former.

The object of my former visit to Rampur was, you will remember, to place the late Nawab Mushtaq Ali Khan on the throne. Scarcely had he occupied it for a year when he was removed by the hand of Providence, leaving behind him two minor sons of whom I will say more presently. That was the first important event which occurred after my visit. The second incident was, as you know, the murder of the late Vice-President of the Council, General Azim-ud-din Khan Bahadur. This last event has led to grave results, and has for the space of more than a year caused disorder and confusion in the affairs of Rampur. In any circumstances, and had the late General been an officer appointed by the Rampur State, his murder must have led to vigorous inquiry, and to the punishment of those concerned. But it was the British Government which nominated General Azim-ud-din Khan to be Vice-President of the Council of Regency which was appointed to administer the affairs of Rampur at the late Nawab Mushtaq Ali Khan's death; and at the time of his murder the General was loyally discharging the duties of the office to which he had been thus appointed. The murder of the General was, therefore, a defiance aimed at the British Government which had nominated him; and it became necessary that retribution should be exacted from those who had ventured to assassinate its nominee. How the duty thus imposed on this Government has been discharged you are all aware. The plot which was formed to take away the General's life has been laid bare: some of those who joined in it being proved guilty, after a prolonged and impartial investigation and trial, have been executed; while others who were implicated by the evidence given at that trial have absconded, and may therefore be held to fear to present themselves before the courts, and to accept, if proved guilty, the consequences of their acts. Meanwhile, their property is in the hands of the State, and their situation is one which those among you (if there be any) who may have sympathised with their object or were cognisant of their plans, may now contemplate and consider with advantage. The murder of a high officer appointed by the British Government to a seat in a Council of Regency in a Native State is an outrage which will never be allowed to pass with impunity, no matter what may be the influence of those concerned in it, or the apathy, or timidity of those in whose midst the murder was planned and committed.

These, then, are the two incidents of a permanent kind which have occurred since 1888, viz., the death of the late Nawab Mushtaq Ali Khan, and the murder of the late General Azim-ud-din, Khan Bahadur. They have led again to further results, which, however important they may be, are in their nature temporary, and of which I will now speak. The chief result has been the substitution of an English officer as President of the Council in the place of the member of the Rampur family who, up to the time of the murder of the late Vice-President, filled that post. You will remember that on a previous occasion I expressed my wish that Rampur should be governed by men of the same country and the same religion as those of its inhabitants. If that is not wholly now the case, it is not the fault of this Government. When the late Council was dissolved by the murder of its Vice-President, authority in Rampur was paralysed. So apparently successful and so terrible a crime made men doubt the ability of the Administration to reimpose and to maintain the obedience which it is necessary that a Government should exact from its subjects. In Rampur it was evident that a suitable head to the Government would not be found; and after most careful enquiries I came most reluctantly to the conclusion that outside Rampur no competent Mussalman candidate offered himself for the difficult task of administering Rampur, to whom I could with confidence entrust it. I therefore selected Major Vincent, who, during his term of office, has completely reimposed the authority which recent events had shaken; has assisted in exposing the plot which led to the murder of the late General; has conciliated those who were the enemies of the State or of the family; and with the help of his colleagues, Ali Hassan, Khan Bahadur, and Nawab Yar Jang, has inspired into all branches of the Administration that vigour and energy which is necessary to good government and to success. It is due to his firmness and to his tact that affairs in Rampur have resumed their ordinary course, and that every man now follows his employment without fear of violence or of oppression. The assistance given to the Council by the officials subordinate to it—by Mr. Wright perhaps more particularly—deserves also my acknowledgments.

A railway is about to be brought to your gates; the telegraph has connected you with the rest of India; your roads, bridges, and your canals have received due attention; your city has been protected from the floods of the Kosi, and its drainage has been greatly improved.

But valuable as have been the labours of Major Vincent and of his colleagues, they have for their aims, as you know, the substitution in due time of the authority of Nawab Hamid Ali Khan, for that of the present Council of Regency. You are aware that the education of the young Nawab, who has now entered on his 18th year, and of his younger brother, Nasir Ali Khan, has been a source of constant care to me and that it has been my object, while imparting to the Nawab a competent knowledge of the English language, and some acquaintance with its literature, to provide for his instruction in the Persian and Arabic languages to the degree which is required by your customs and which is expected by you of your Rulers. It is a source of great pleasure to me to be able to say that Nawab Hamid Ali Khan has fully profited by the opportunities placed within his reach; has proved himself to be possessed of excellent capacity and to be endowed with those qualities of temper, good sense, sagacity, and self-discipline which are essential to successful rule. The Government of India has approved the proposal of this Government that the Nawab should now extend his education by taking a voyage for a few months to other countries; and it has therefore been arranged that in March next he should leave India for eight or nine months, in order to visit China, Japan, America, England, and the principal cities of Europe. He will be accompanied by persons selected from among you whose presence will be a guarantee that the requirements of your customs and of your religion will be complied with; and he will return to India before the close of 1893, a Pathan of Rampur as he will leave it, but with his mind enlarged, his experience greatly increased, and with extensive observation of other countries which will be useful to him in the government of his own State.

I have further been authorized by the Government of India to inform you that if the condition of affairs in Rampur continues to be satisfactory (it is for me to see to that), it is the intention of that Government that the Nawab, shortly after his return from his travels, should be placed on the throne of Rampur with such temporary conditions and restrictions as to the exercise of his authority as are customary in the case of Princes of his age, and are necessary in order to safeguard them in the commencement of their rule from the consequence of their own inexperience or from the evil counsels of designing men. The precise nature of the precautions to be adopted, until the Nawab shall have acquired further experience and attained to a somewhat maturer age, will be for the later consideration of the Government of India. Meanwhile you will be glad to learn that before long has passed you may count on having your Nawab again resident amongst you, and resuming, I hope, in the hearts of his people the place which was so long and so worthily held by his regretted grandfather, the late Nawab Kalb Ali Khan.

Now, Raies, I take leave of you. It is a pleasure to me to believe that during my term of office it has been permitted to me to reintroduce stability into Rampur affairs, which, after the death of Nawab Kalb Ali Khan, had fallen into so great confusion; and to re-establish a good understanding which was so sorely needed between the Council of State and the chief members of his family. I have been enabled to bring to justice violent and bloody men, whose deeds as you know, whatever may be said to the contrary by unprincipled or interested advisers, are condemned both by your law and by your religion as they are by our own. I have caused your Nawab to be educated with the most scrupulous and conscientious care, and his brother is being equally carefully educated. Believe me, I have discharged to the best of my abilities the trust imposed by Providence upon me on behalf of of the State, the family, and the people. I wish you all farewell, and prosperity to the State of Rampur and to its future ruler, whose career, in later years, will, I trust, illustrate to you all the advantages which he has derived from the careful education imparted to him, and from the vigilant control exercised over him at the time of life when it was most essential.

ONE QUEEN, ONE FLAG, ONE COIN.

Recently Dr. John Pollen, of the Bombay Civil Service, approached the Dublin Chamber of Commerce on the subject of the danger to commerce arising from the violent fluctuations in the value of the rupee. He said he drew their attention to the subject in no petty personal spirit. It was true that, in common with other servants of the Crown in India who had families at home, he had a distinct personal grievance, but he never suffered himself to forget that he served, and drew the pay of, the people of India, and that the prosperity of millions of his Indian paymasters was a much more important matter than the prosperity of a mere handful of Indian Civil servants. If the fall in the value of the rupee had proved beneficial to India and the people of India, it would be the duty of the servants of India to hold their peace and let the benefit go on—nay, to actively aid in reducing the value of the rupee down to a penny, or less. But if the present state of things with regard to the rupee had, as even the cautious and far-seeing Bombay Chamber of Commerce admitted, proved disastrous to the development of the resources of India, then it became the bounden duty of every public servant of India to do his best to remedy the mischief. Dr. Pollen then proceeded to point out that the inflow of British capital into India has been seriously checked, and that the construction of railways (notably the one connecting Delhi—the heart of the Empire—with the nearest seaport, Karachi) had been transferred; that the calculations of the most prudent traders had been upset, and that the greatest confusion and uncertainty reigned throughout the commercial centres of the Empire, the currency of India being at the mercy of American Silver Kings, rings, and intriguers. This state of things was discreditable to British Administration, and, in the interest of the Empire at large and of the people of India in particular, a remedy must be found, and found promptly. For his own part he believed in the "One Queen, one flag, and one coin" principle. He was alive to all the difficulties, and, above all, to the enormous expense involved; but the great change had become imperative, and ought to be made. The step was, no doubt, a great one to take; but it would make the British Empire greater, and he trusted that British administration would not fail "through craven fears of being great." A Dalhousie would not have hesitated to make the change, and the British Government would have done well to have listened years ago (when the rupee was worth two shillings) to the advice of Sir Richard Temple, who, acting on the suggestion of a clearheaded Irish financier, urged the introduction of a gold standard into India. Dr. Pollen considered the paucity of Irishmen at the Councils of the Government of India at the present moment was deeply to be regretted, for Irishmen possessed a capacity for dealing with financial questions in an imperial spirit—a capacity denied to the cautious Scotchman or calculating Anglo-Saxon. Dr. Pollen thought that the difficulty and dangers attending the introduction of the gold standard into India had been greatly exaggerated. The country people of France were as much given to hoarding as the rayyets of India; yet the "Napoleon" did not disappear from currency. And there was really no reason why the sovereign, once introduced, should not circulate as freely in India as in other parts of the British Empire. He ridiculed the idea that sufficient gold for currency in India would not be forthcoming. It would not come with a rush, but it would come in a steady, everwidening stream. On the grounds that introduction of the gold standard would benefit "India of the Indians" and the Empire at large, he urged the Dublin Chamber of Commerce to support the principle of "one Queen, one flag, one coin," and to pronounce against all other patchwork remedies.

MAHOMEDAN PROPAGANDA IN AMERICA.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "BOMBAY GAZETTE."

Sir,—For the last two years I have been in correspondence with Mr. Alexander Webb, the United States Consul at Manilla. Mr. Webb has fully studied the religious systems of the East, and being convinced of the truth of Islam he has embraced this faith. By his last letter and a telegram he informs me that he has resigned the post of Consul General at Manilla, and has started for America, via Burma and India, to establish a mission at New York for the propagation of the Islam faith on the American continent.

As the subject has attracted a great deal of attention in this country, I think, Sir, that the scheme of American propaganda, framed by Mr. Webb, as well as his last letter to me, may be fitly placed before the public at this juncture.

More than seven thousand rupees have been already collected at Hyderabad, Deccan, and it is evident that in this epoch-making last decade of the nineteenth century the Islamic world is fully prepared to push its triumphs in the Western world through the refined instruments of persuasion and preaching.

Let it, however, be said to the credit of the English race that without their noble instincts of justice, love of truth, and moral courage, the task of propagating Islam in their enlightened country would be simply hopeless.—Yours &c.,

Bombay, September 12.

BUDRUDIN ABDULLA KUR.

Consulate of the United States of America at Manilla, Philippine Islands, Manilla July 4, 1892.

Budrudin Abdulla Kur, Esq., Bombay.

My dear Brother,—Your letter, dated the 1st ultimo, and enclosing one from our esteemed brother, Abdulla Arab, is at hand. It gives me great pleasure to know that you are taking such an active interest in the proposed American mission, which, I feel assured now, will be a pronounced success. I am fully satisfied that when the Mahomedans of India thoroughly understand the nature of the movement and the character of the field in which it is to be established, together with its possible effects upon the propaganda in Europe, and upon the Moslem organization in the East, they will give it their most earnest and active support. To me, it is in no sense an experiment likely to result in failure, for I know the general tendency of thought in my country and the general characteristics of my countrymen too well to entertain for a moment the idea that anything but success is possible. Besides I have faith in the power and wisdom of Almighty God (Praised be His name for ever), and as Islam is the true religion I feel confident that He will guide, direct and support a movement for its propagation which promised such great results as this. I have for several years been convinced that there were unseen influences at work bringing about a condition of things calculated to overthrow the current erroneous religious systems of the world and establish mankind in the one true system. But what that system was to be was to me uncertain until I arrived at a comprehension of the character and doctrines of Islam. I have had some strange experiences of which I hope to have the privilege of talking with you soon, and which have seemed to me as evidence that God was guiding me for some great and wise purpose, the ultimate object of which was the spiritual benefit of mankind. I do not desire to give you the impression that I believe I have been inspired directly, but circumstances have so shaped themselves in my life that they have drawn me directly toward the movement in which I am about to engage with all the earnestness, vigour, and intellectual ability that God has given me. As I wrote to you more than a year ago it seemed that I was destined to work out quietly, and in my own way the bringing of my countrymen to a knowledge of Islam, and it hardly seemed probable then that any other way was open. But God in his wisdom has opened a broader, surer, and better way generally, and I can see clearly how I am to devote my efforts to bring about more speedily and thoroughly the desired results. I am impatient to meet you and talk freely with you concerning the matter, for I feel sure that you will agree with me not only that the object is of the grandest importance, but that there has been something more than ordinary human agencies at work in bringing the project to its present condition. God is great, and will surely guide His servants in the right way.

I have sent my resignation to my Government, and I am awaiting instructions as to the disposition of the office and effects. If I am obliged to remain here until my successor arrives, I will be unable to leave before about the 1st of October, but if I am authorized to turn the office over to some one here I can leave the latter part of August or early in September. I will then start for Bombay via Singapore, Rangoon and Calcutta. My wife and family left for the United States on the 8th of last month, and will go to a fruit ranch about 40 miles from San Francisco, where they will remain until I am fairly settled in New York.

The books you sent me have been a source of the deepest interest to me, and I have learned a great deal that was new to me, concerning the diversity and general direction of Mussulman thought and opinions. I understand that you do not endorse all the views, and the opinions expressed and judging from your marginal notes I am inclined to the belief that you and I will not be very far apart in our views. I have, or think I have, a good conception of the spirit of Mahomed's teachings and the fundamental principles of Islam. Hence I am forced to reject many of the opinions I have encountered. Hughes' Dictionary of Islam abounds with prejudice and error, and there are some suggestions made by Syed Ameer Ali that I can hardly endorse. The critical exposition of the Jihad is a most important and interesting work to me, but it ought to be rewritten and revised, so that its English will be smoother and more concise. But in his treatment of the subject the author has furnished me with matter which will be of inestimable value to me when I begin active work in America. But of these matters I hope, if it is God's pleasure, to talk with you when we meet. God grant that the hearts and minds of our brethren in India may be opened, and that those who are able to do so will give us as much literary help as they can.

Praying that the peace of God and His richest blessings may be with you here and hereafter, I am, your obedient brother,

ALEXANDER RUSSELL WEBB.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

THE SINGER'S PRIZE.

His face grows lower grimly,
His eyes grow dimmer and rain;
His hands grow dimmer dimly
His voice grows dimmer and pain.

His hands grow lower her fingers,
His eyes grow dimmer the light,
His hands grow dimmer her fingers,
His voice grows dimmer till night.

Her bright young face is sunken,
And fails her gentle breath;
Her fair young form is shrunken,
To fit the robes of death.

And I think of the woodland shadows
That she has never seen;
Of the wonder of song in the meadows,
When all the world is green.

But now the close lips quiver,
The nimble hands are slow,—
The voice she dreams of ever
Rings in the room below.

The mad young poet is singing,
With only a crust to eat;
But a fountain of light is springing
Up from the narrow street.

And whether he sings in sorrow,
Or whether he sings in glee,
He hopes that the world to-morrow
Will list to his melody.

And I think though his heart were burning
With words no man e'er said,
The world would be turning and turning
If to-morrow he were dead.

Only, both late and early,
The girl, as maidens will,
Dreams when the voice comes clearly
Up to her window-sill.

A brave face has she found him,
A manner frank and gay,
And long ago has crowned him
With myrtle wreath or bay.

A good sword clanging loudly,
A plume on waving hair,
A cloak that drapes him proudly,
Such as the players wear.

So whether in grief or sadness
He sings, he has won the prize,
When he brings the light of gladness
To a dying maiden's eyes.

WEEKLY NEWS.

THE last week of the last month was a dark one for Bengal. It was signalled by the discharge of a bombshell in the city of Calcutta, following notification in the Calcutta Gazette of the new orders. It was not only sudden, but entirely and absolutely unexpected. Notwithstanding any powers reserved in obscure corners of the statute-book, the country was not prepared to believe that any Government in India under the control of the British Parliament could surprise a British Province of a morning with the withdrawal of its powers, and so much prized by Englishmen and enjoyed by all people, without any warning to them. It seems yet a dream:—

"The 20th October 1892.—It is hereby notified for general information that, in the exercise of the powers conferred on him by section 269 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, the Lieutenant-Governor is pleased to modify the orders contained in the notifications, dated the 7th January, the 27th May, and the 13th October 1862, published in the Calcutta Gazette of the 8th January, the 28th May, and the 15th October 1862, respectively, under which offences defined in the following chapters of the Indian Penal Code, viz.—

Chapter VIII (offences against the public tranquility),
" XI (false evidence and offences against public justice),
" XVI (offences affecting the human body),
" XVII (offences against property), and
" XVIII (offences relating to documents and to trade or property marks), and attempts to commit, such offences, are declared to be triable by jury in any Court of Sessions established in the districts of the 24 Parganas, Hooghly, Burdwan, Murshidabad, Nadia, Patna, and Dacca; and hereby revokes so much of the aforesaid orders as apply to offences defined in the following chapters of the Indian Penal Code, viz.—

Chapter VIII (offences against the public tranquility),
" XVI (offences affecting the human body), with the exception of sections 363 to 369 (kidnapping and abduction), 372 (selling a minor for purposes of prostitution, &c.), 373 (buying a minor for purposes of prostitution, &c.), and 376 (rape), and
" XVIII (offences relating to documents and to trade or property marks).

These orders shall take effect from and after the 1st November 1892.
The Lieutenant-Governor is further pleased, in exercise of the powers conferred on him under section 269 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, to direct that from and after the 1st November 1892 all offences defined in Chapter XX of the Indian Penal Code (offences relating to marriage), and attempts to commit, such offences, shall be triable by jury in any Court of Sessions established in the districts named above.

H. J. S. COTTON,
Chief Secy. to the Govt. of Bengal.

The order made on the 20th October, and gazetted on the 26th October, has the force of law from the 1st November, before the country is even aware of it. This is revolutionary celerity indeed, not unbecoming the bloodless coup d'état.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given, any other being unnecessary and likely to cause confusion.

LET us understand the situation on which we are thrown, and take account of profit and loss.

The offences declared in 1862 to be triable by jury are 209 in number, namely,

Chapter VIII., I. P. C., Sections 143 to 145 and 147 to 160	16
Chapter XI. ... 193 to 225, 225A, and 226 to 229	38
Chapter XVI. ... 302 to 304, 304A, 305 to 309, 311 to 318, 323 to 338, 341 to 348 352 to 358, 363 to 374, 376 and 377...	62
Chapter XVII. ... 379 to 382, 384 to 389, 392 to 404, 406 to 409, 411 to 414, 417 to 424, 426 to 440, 447 to 462	70
Chapter XVIII. ... 465 to 469, 471 to 477, 482 to 492	23
Those revoked are 91, namely,
Chapter VIII. ...	16
Chapter XVI. ...	52
Chapter XVIII. ...	23

The concession is for 6.

Sir Charles Elliott gives 6 while he takes away 91. The balance against him therefore is 124. This is sweeping like a new broom, to be sure—with a vengeance! Nay, he is a patent steam broom which sweeps over vast areas with indiscriminate fury. The next step, we believe, will be, if Sir Charles Elliott is allowed to sweep away, to abolish the Courts and try all accused in the Secretariat.

The notification of the 7th January 1862, under orders of the Lieutenant-Governor Sir John P. Grant and the hand of Mr. Secretary E. H. Lushington, declared that the trial of the offences in Chapters 8, 11, 16 and 17 of the Indian Penal Code in any Sessions Court in the districts of the 24-Pergunnahs, Hooghly, Burdwan, Moorshedabad, Nuddea, Patna and Dacca should be by jury.

In the notification of the 27th May, 1862, the privilege of trial by jury was, in continuation of that of the 7th January, enlarged by order of Sir Cecil Beadon, K.C.S.I., in those districts in regard to offences under Chapter XVIII of the Indian Penal Code. By a further order in October following, the jury trial was made applicable to abetments of, and attempts to commit, the said offences in the said districts.

Sir Charles Elliott, through the Hon'ble H. J. S. Cotton, now condemns the previous notifications of Sir John P. Grant and Sir Cecil Beadon as blunders and sets himself to rectify them.

We give below the offences with their punishments which the present Government declares not triable by jury:—

NOTES & LEADERETTES

with
OUR OWN NEWS.

FROM almost the beginning of the month of October, the unsteadiness of the atmospheric pressure was very noticeable. There was a continuous rise and fall of the barometer at almost all the stations bordering the Bay. Before the 15th there was no sign at all of a squally weather except the monsoon waxing somewhat strong and the pouring in of rain at almost all the stations in Bengal. After that date stormy weather began prevailing in the South East of the Bay, attended with strong wind in the Diamond Islands. There was a brisk fall of pressure on the Madras coast on the 16th. The sky was dense with clouds, ushering a heavy downpour, particularly at Vizagapatam, the next day. On the 18th another depression formed near the Andamans and the day after it was moving towards the Ganjam coast. It rained heavily at Mausaliptam on the 20th, the storm having expended most of its energy, though the weather was not quite settled in the Bay showing strong monsoon. Again on the 27th a depression formed in the centre of the Bay with squally weather, and the next day it was advancing towards Nellore. After the 29th, the weather was improving, though there were clouded skies and rains almost all over Bengal and the bordering stations of the Bay. There has been definite clearing from the beginning of November, with occasional showers of rain here and there. Late in the season, however, the strong monsoon winds are still blowing in the Bay.

THE month of October has been unusually disastrous this year. Not the least to India which, between the fury of Nature and the folly of man, has suffered woefully.

HERE is the report of a considerable fatal shipping accident by two of the survivors :—

"The Bokhara left Shanghai on Saturday, the 8th of October, with a moderate north-east breeze and a following sea. On Sunday the wind increased and the barometer fell to 29.88. Captain Sams thought a typhoon was approaching from the southward and he consulted the other officers who concurred in the opinion. Consequently preparations were made and completed by midnight, when everything on board was made as taut and snug as possible.

At four o'clock on Monday morning the barometer sank to 29.15. The wind freshened to a gale accompanied by a thick haze and a tremendous sea. An attempt was made to wear the vessel down the Formosa channel but, although tarpaulins and sails were hoisted, the heavy sea and furious wind rendered all efforts futile.

During the course of the day all the life-boats were either smashed or washed away. Everything moveable on deck was washed overboard. The smoking-room was wrecked, but hardly any water penetrated into the saloons.

The Bokhara, at noon on Monday, was drifting in a south-westerly direction and, whenever practicable, the engines were put 'slow astern.' At this time the officers realized their extreme peril and, though they spoke hopefully to the passengers and encouragingly to the crew, they were aware that the steamer was utterly at the mercy of the elements. At this critical period oil was poured down the latrines and had an excellent effect, so much so that many of the passengers thought the fury of the storm had abated and that the worst had passed.

As hour after hour passed this was found not to be the case as the dangers of the situation only began to be more clearly disclosed and the frightful character of the typhoon was apparent to all. At 9.45 p. m. three large seas swept over the vessel, smashing in the aft-sky-lights and stokehole doors and putting out the fires. It was then recognised that the ship was entirely helpless and unmanageable and that nothing remained but to await the end.

At half-past eleven the third officer called the attention of Captain Sams to a dark outline discernible on the lee-beat and, on the lead being heaved, it was found that there was only a depth of ten fathoms under the steamer's keel.

In semi-darkness, amid showers of blinding spray, over crests of enormous waves, land was indistinctly seen.

The final catastrophe being imminent and death staring the ship's company in the face, Captain Sams, who was navigating the vessel with a courage and skill which no man could have exceeded, bade 'Good-bye' to his officers and went to the companion of the saloon to help the passengers on deck.

As the Bokhara struck the rocks with a terrific crash a great sea swept over the deck and carried overboard Captain Sams who was never seen again.

Within two minutes the Bokhara disappeared beneath the waves and when daylight dawned on Sand Island, one of the Pescadores group, not a vestige of this fine mail boat was to be seen."

The latest report is that 23 souls were saved, seven Europeans and sixteen lascars. As many are supposed to have perished.

A MORE terrible disaster was the loss, on the 27th October, of the Anchor Line steamer Roumania, bound from Liverpool to Bombay, off

Peniche to the north of Lisbon. She is a total wreck. She had 55 passengers and 67 of a crew. In a blinding storm accompanied by fog, the vessel struck some rocks a thousand yards from the shore, and was swept by the tremendous seas. The sole survivors are said to be Captain Hamilton, Lieutenant Rooke and seven lascars.

IN the American continent, on the 28th October, over a square mile of the wholesale business quarter of Milwaukee, the capital of Wisconsin and a great trading and "pork-packing" centre, on the west shore of Lake Michigan, and where 14 railways meet, was destroyed by fire, occasioning an estimated loss of ten million dollars.

IN India, while the people have been crying for food in many parts, floods have breached the Mu Valley and Southern Mahratta railways.

IN our own Province of Bengal, towards the end of the last month, an Elliottic hurricane swept over seven of the districts, uprooting an old institution.

THE Amir is not yet prepared to receive Lord Roberts and his mission, his hands being still full with the Hazara revolt. In the meantime, however, arrangements are making in India and in Afghanistan for the meeting.

THE new departure in Nepal proceeds apace. It has just been ratified and accelerated by an interesting and significant ceremony.

On the 27th October, at Khatmandu, in the Hanuman Dhoka Palace, Maharaja Bir Shumshere, the Prime Minister, was invested with the insignia of Knight Commander of the Star of India, by a Companion of the Order, Colonel Wylie, the Resident. The Companion must have been specially empowered for the ceremony. The occasion was availed of for mutual exchange of friendly protestations. The Resident did not tell the Prime Minister the truth that the decoration was to mark the esteem in which the British Government held the bold cutthroat and the firm grip in which he held Nepal, but offered it as a pledge of firm friendship between the two Governments. The Prime Minister, with equal diplomacy, was profuse in the expression of his good wishes for the British Power and his own constant endeavour to serve that Government to the best of his ability. The puppet of faindant Royalty, the youthful Maharaja Dhiraj himself, was impressed for the occasion to add to the dignity of the ceremony, and in a speech, which was read by the Raj Guru, his Puppetship in high terms recommended his formidable wire puller, the Prime Minister, to the Resident. That part of the farce might well have been avoided. It was a gratuitous affront to Nepal and a shock to the civilized world. The recommendation of the King's speech was unnecessary. Our Government, which had already shown a cynical disregard of past obligations and even pledges to the late Jung Bahadoor, has now been virtually purchased by the weak régime now in power in that kingdom. Under the rule of Bir Shumshere, Nepal, for the first time in its history, is accessible to the British. The Commander-in-Chief of India himself has been welcomed and flêted in places where the British Resident had hitherto been a stranger. Another revolution or two in Khatmandu will fully establish the suzerainty of England in that exclusive mountain region which is the last stronghold of Hindu supremacy and Indian independence.

PRIVATE Allen court-martialed to death for murder of Lieutenant Green, of the Rifle Brigade, was executed at Barielly on Wednesday.

THIS is the last month of Sir Auckland Colvin in India. He has taken leave of Rampur and is now busy in performing the last offices of a British Governor in other portions of his territories.

THE death of the Senior partner in England—Mr. J. Nicolai—has been followed by the insolvency of the old firm of Kelly and Co. of this city.

SIR Charles with Lady Elliott left on his autumn tour on the 1st November. There has been a slight alteration in the programme. His Honor returns to Calcutta on the 30th November to partake of the hospitality of the loyal Scots who assemble that evening to offer oblations of haggis and whiskey to their patron Saint. Captain Currie does not accompany him. The only other companion for the tour is Captain G. C. Lister, A. D. C.

LADY Elliott, it is said, will be going home in spring and will not be in India next season.

THE Hon'ble H. H. Risley has gone on leave of one month and seventeen days, Mr. J. A. Bourdillon acting as Secretary to the Bengal Government, in the Financial and Municipal Departments.

THE Chamber of Commerce has re-elected Mr. R. Steel as a Commissioner of the Port of Calcutta.

NEW rules in supersession of the existing ones to regulate the importation of petroleum by sea into the Lower Provinces in Bengal, are published in the Calcutta Gazette of the 2nd November 1892.

WE learn from Hyderabad that the cause of Mushtak Hosain's leaving in a clandestine manner and in the middle of the night, was the terrible explosion of public feeling against him. It was universal and unprecedented. The joy of the people at the fall of the virtual tyrant of Hyderabad, knew no bounds. Nor was the feeling confined to any particular community or class or creed. His resignation was welcome news, but it was not felt as a relief, from the fear that he might withdraw it, and the Nizam might be importuned by the Minister into allowing Mushtak to stay. No sooner was it announced that His Highness had accepted his resignation than the great city burst out in a shout of satisfaction, and Hindu and Moslem were loud in praise of God, and showered blessings on their Prince as the instrument of the Deity in this great act of deliverance. How could poor Mushtak face a whole people in such a mood? It would have been hazardous for him in the light of day to drive from his residence to the Railway station. The feeling against him is so intense, all over the city, that sweetmeats have been distributed as thanksoffering, from ten thousand houses, 5,000 men assembled at the Mecca Musjid and offered special prayers for their deliverance from Mushtak's yoke; and sweetmeats worth Rs. 500 were distributed among the people assembled. Another way of manifesting their joy has been the composition of hundreds of poems of all descriptions in Persian and Urdu, containing vile abuse and sending them to himself by post, for his perusal, besides being largely read and recited among men of all grades throughout the town. Even people who did not know Mushtak Hosain have been joining the rest in abusing him. This is undoubtedly not a laudable way of treating a high official who has—spontaneously or reluctantly—resigned his post, and whose resignation has been accepted by the chief. But, however ungenerous or indecent such treatment of a fallen man to whom yesterday the proudest were ready to sneak, these demonstrations unmistakeably shew the extent of dissatisfaction which had been caused among the entire population by his unjust proceedings and tyrannical administration.

THE visit to the Ellora Caves having been abandoned on account of cholera at Roza, which he had intended to make his head-quarters from the 29th October to the 2nd November, the Viceroy passed those days with Lord Harris. Leaving Bhopal shortly after 1 A.M. of the 29th October, the Viceregal party reached Poona early on the 30th. At Kirki, the Governor of Bombay, accompanied by Colonel Rhodes, Military Secretary, Mr. Edgerley, Private Secretary, Captains Poore, Cox, and Nuttall, with a small escort of the bodyguard, met the Viceroy and Lady Lansdowne at 8-30 and drove them to Ganeshkhind. It was a private and non-official visit and no public demonstrations were allowed except the presentation of an address from the Poona Municipality. Their Excellencies with Lord Harris went for a water excursion on the river in the afternoon of the 31st. The private entertainments closed with a musical ride of the Governor's bodyguard. The receiving of the municipal address was deferred to the last day—the 2nd November—when the party left for Hyderabad. In his reply, Lord Lansdowne alluded to the new Indian Councils Act in these terms:—

"I notice with special satisfaction your reference to the approaching reconstitution of the Legislative Councils. The importance of this reform forced itself upon me from the time when I commenced my term of office in India, and I have never ceased to press it upon the attention of Her Majesty's Government. Our proposals have received the cordial support of both the great political parties at home, and I rejoice to know that we are now able to predict with something like certainty that the time is near at hand when effect will be given to the Statute passed this summer by the Imperial Parliament. I can assure you that I have spared no efforts, and will spare none, in order to give effect to that important measure in a manner which, to use your own words, will afford a fresh stimulus to the policy of local self-government initiated by Lord Mayo's administration and developed by his successors.

We are at this moment in correspondence with the Secretary of State as to the rules and regulations to be issued under the new Act, and it would obviously be improper for me to offer you a premature announcement of our intentions, but I may without indiscretion tell you that we are in agreement with you upon one of the most important principles involved, and that we hope to be able, in accordance with your suggestion, to recognise the urban and the rural boards in the several provinces of India as units for the selection of some proportion of the non-official members of the reformed Councils.

Gentlemen, we do not pretend that we are going to introduce into India fully developed representative institutions of the kind which have been gradually and laboriously erected in Western Europe, but the proposed enlargement of the Councils, the addition to them of members who will be, as far as the conditions of this country permit, representatives of the principal classes and interests of India, the concession of the right of interpellation, and the admission of the annual discussion of the Financial Statements of the different Governments, will, I venture to think, give to the deliberations of the Councils, and I am speaking both of the Viceroy's Council and of the local Councils, an importance and a degree of public usefulness to which they have up to the present time not attained."

A grand reception awaited Lord and Lady Lansdowne at Hyderabad. The Prime Minister Sir Asman Jah and other Hyderabad officials with Mr. Irwin, the first Assistant Resident, welcomed the guests on behalf of the Hyderabad State at Lingampalli, where the train halted for a few minutes and Sir Asman Jah was received by his Excellency in his saloon carriage. At the Kuldarga and Wadi stations in Hyderabad territory, the principal district officials of the Hyderabad State were present with guards of honor of the Nizam's reformed troops. The Viceregal party reached Hyderabad on the 3rd November, at 4-30 P.M. The Nizam himself welcomed Lord and Lady Lansdowne to Hyderabad.

A royal salute of 31 guns announced to the general public the arrival of the distinguished guests.

A guard of honour of the Nizam's regular troops was drawn up at the station, which was elaborately decorated, and the approaches to which were thronged with Natives. On their Excellencies alighting from the railway carriage, they were received by the Nizam. After a short conversation, His Highness conducted their Excellencies to the State carriage which was in waiting to convey them to the Chadarghat Residency. The Viceroy with Lady Lansdowne, Mr. Plowden, and an A. D. C. occupied this, the Nizam following in the second carriage. The rest of the party and the Hyderabad officials made up the procession in other carriages. The escort consisted of a troop of the 21st Hussars. The route for about two miles to the Residency was lined by the Nizam's troops and decorated with bunting, while the Residency itself and the approaches to it, as well as the housetops, were densely thronged with spectators. At the Chadarghat Residency a guard of honour of the Suffolk Regiment was drawn up to receive their Excellencies. Here the Nizam remained in conversation for a short time with the Viceroy and then left for his palace in the city.

WE have received the following telegrams from Hyderabad:—

"November 2.—The Viceroy arrives tomorrow afternoon. Grand preparations made. Intriguers busy. They have enlisted the services of an energetic European gentleman. Their chief aim now seems to be to get Mr. Plowden removed, because he has proved too strong for them. It is said they propose representing to the Viceroy that Mr. Plowden has been interfering too much in the internal administration and that whatever changes have taken place recently have been at his instance. But the fact is the Resident had no hand in the recent changes. The Nizam has done everything himself. His Highness is showing marvellous activity, giving little rest to himself, being constantly engaged in State affairs, going minutely through every file and writing orders thereon."

"Nov. 3.—The Viceroy and Lady Lansdowne arrived at 4-30. Their Excellencies were received at the station by the Nizam and the Resident. The scene on the platform was magnificent. All the nobles and high officials dressed in gorgeous costumes were present. The Nizam's body guard, the African cavalry, lined the route to the Residency. Their Excellencies and staff drove to the Residency followed by His Highness and nobles according to rank. After dinner, the Viceroy holds a Levée at the Residency at 9-30."

"Nawab Sarwar Jung Bahadur, formerly tutor to the Nizam, has been appointed Secretary to His Highness. The appointment has given satisfaction to the general public. The selection does credit to His Highness."

"A deputation composed of the leading Jagirdars waited upon His Highness at 7 P.M. yesterday, and presented an address expressing sing joy and offering thanks for the interest His Highness is taking in State affairs with special reference to recent changes. His Highness made a suitable reply. After presentation of the jagirdars' address, another deputation composed of the leading citizens headed by Moulvi Abdul Guffur, vakil, presented a similar address on behalf of the rayyets and the general public, to which also His Highness replied in suitable terms. His Highness was extremely pleased with both the addresses and His Highness' replies gave immense satisfaction to the members of the deputation."

"November 5.—At nine yesterday morning, a deputation composed of Nawab Vicarul Omra, Nawab Zaffur Jung, Kishen Pershad, Saheb Jung, waited upon the Viceroy to enquire after His Excellency's health on behalf of His Highness. This ceremony is called Mizaj Parsi. At 11 His Highness visited the Viceroy at the Residency. The Nizam's visit was followed by the Minister's who was accompanied by Nawab Vicarul Omra, Zaffur Jung, Kishen Pershad. The Viceroy paid return visit to the Nizam at 3-15. In grand state Nawab Vicarul Oma, Zaffur Jung, Kishen Pershad, Saheb Jung, came to the Residency to escort the Viceroy to the palace. The route from the Residency to the Chowmahalla palace was lined by the Nizam's body guard. The Viceroy's escort was composed of a company of the Hussars and the Resident's bodyguard. At eight, the Viceroy was entertained at dinner at the Chowmahalla palace. The route from the Residency to the palace was beautifully illuminated. More than 200 were present at the dinner, mostly Europeans and select nobles. The Viceroy in his speech expressed joy at the interest His Highness is taking in State affairs. After dinner, fireworks. This morning, review at Secunderabad. At noon His Highness had a private interview with the Viceroy at which important questions were discussed and settled. At two His Excellency lunched with the Minister at Bashir Bagh. His Highness was present. The Viceroy pays a visit to Nawab Khurshed Jah at seven. The Nizam attends the dinner at the Residency, after which there will be an Evening Party.

"The appointment of Sarwar Jung as General Secretary to His Highness has given satisfaction to the public. He is a native of Lucknow and comes of a very respectable family whose numerous acts of loyalty to the British Government in troublous times have been formally and substantially recognized by that Government. He was educated at the Canning College, has thorough command over English, Persian and Arabic, is well read and well informed. For his high character and affable manners he is held in high esteem and equally liked by the nobility and the gentry of Hyderabad."

THE Deputy Magistrate of Madura convicted, under section 283 of the Indian Penal Code, a person for erecting a stone platform in a public roadway and building thereon a pandal. The Sessions Judge of the District being of opinion that no obstruction was caused by such construction to any particular person or persons, referred the matter to the High Court. The Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Parker have ruled that the Sessions Judge was right in holding that the conviction could not be sustained under section 283, but as the accused had encroached on the public way and had reduced the width of the street from 14 to 8 feet, such an act was a public nuisance and was punishable as such.

THE Inspector-General of Registration has warned his Sub-Registrars against the vicious practice of taking leave in anticipation of sanction. Hereafter any one absenting himself without previous permission of the District Registrar, will not be allowed to rejoin without the orders of Government. It speaks little for the supervision of the Department with its District Registrars and inspecting staff that such a lax custom should have grown up as the Inspector-General's circular condemns.

IN noticing last week the excellence of the prints from photographs submitted by Mr. Heberlet to our judgment, and welcoming the moderate rates at which he is prepared to supply such work, as offering the first genuine opportunity for illustrated literature and journalism in this country, we forgot to mention that Mr. Heberlet and his brother have started business as the Calcutta Phototype Company, in Dalhousie Square, where they receive orders.

MR. H. Lee, the Chairman of the Calcutta Corporation, has been appointed a member of the Legislative Council of Bengal, vice Sir Henry Harrison deceased.

Sir Charles Elliott is not always happy in the dispensation of patronage, but this appointment is misery itself. We say this out of no ill will, for from the time we heard of him, when he was a junior Civil Servant in charge of the Sub-Division of Baraset, from our lamented friend Brindaban Chunder Chatterjee, long before we saw him, we have always harboured good feelings towards Mr. Lee. Indeed, we write in kindness and sympathy for him as well as in the public interest. He might just as well be invested with the command of an expedition to the frontiers. Indeed, as a powerful valourous man, a first rate athlete, a splendid sportsman, a capital shot, he would not only endure the toils and fatigue of march, but might by his feats astonish the rude military tribes into submission and friendliness. Altogether, he would certainly be more at home in the camp of war than in the debating club of law-makers. We do not understand how such an appointment came to be seriously made and gazetted. It shows the Lieutenant-Governor's complete isolation. Has Sir Charles Elliott no friends? Is he such a bear that his very Secretaries avoid the trial of offering advice without being asked? Surely, the State is not the arena for practical joking.

The truth is Mr. Lee has not what is vulgarly called the "gift of the gab." So much the better for him perhaps. At any rate, so it is. And it is scarcely kind to pile on his devoted head more and more obligations which can only be fairly discharged by the possessor of that gift.

As the Chairman of the Municipality, Mr. Lee is already burdened with too many speaking engagements.

It is no discredit, morally or intellectually, to any man, not to be a public speaker any more than not to be an actor. A fluent tongue is rather a presumption against depth and solidity. The whole business of speechification is a delusion, which will yet be unmasked in the future, with the Elective System and many another superstition of our enlightened times. The device of deriving good laws from the struggle of orators, is for wisdom at par with the plan of discovering the best orators, statesmen and law makers by the choice of the least instructed and least responsible part—the majority—of the population, from among those who, under such circumstances and conditions, care to be candidates. But so long as legislation by public meetings remains the custom or law of the land, men who can talk on their legs must be preferred for the business. It is neither to public good nor private comfort to impress to the service innocent wights, however worthy and capable in other respects, who are not blessed with the knack. Each man to his sphere. Every talent has its function. To put the round man in the square hole, involves a waste of public resources.

HINDUISM is particular about the time and conjuncture of stars for every act. Every step in life is taken in proper season and hour prescribed by the sages. Hence the Hindu's constant study of the Hindu almanac. Even religious observances are not practised at random, but each in its proper season, or else they are worse than useless—positively sinful. Charity only, if anything, is never amiss, but unless the donative offerings are strictly timed, their religious merit or value as passports to Heaven, is a good deal wasted. What wonder then at the chronological punctiliousness of the Hindus? They more than any other race literally believe that there is a time for everything. Eclipses and remarkable conjunctions of the heavenly bodies are the best time for gifts, as well as for a variety of religious exercises, such as offering the cake to the spirits of ancestors. A grand opportunity came to Hindudom in the great Eclipse of last evening. The heavenly event was all the more auspicious on account of occurring in the holy month of Kartik. Thousands of men have gone to Benares and other places to wash their sins and perform good works.

Last night's Eclipse had the advantage of a clear and a cloudless moonlit sky, so that it could be not only patiently observed but also thoroughly enjoyed. The glorious moon of the Indian autumn, so celebrated by our Poets, with its lavish effulgence made a milder day of the night. Observers were ready with their telescopes from a quarter to 8 P.M. The actual contact took place at about 2 minutes past 8. The eclipse was a total one. The Bishdhar Panjika puts it almost at the same time. The Hindu Press Panjika calculates the time to be 3 minutes after 8. The Arya Panjika, however, goes so far as to make it 8-12. The height of inaccuracy is reached by the panjika published by Raja Peary Mohan Mookerjee's Pandits of Bali which times it 8-23. Most enterprising of all, though with futile enterprise, the Gupta Press Panjika calculates the eclipse according to all three different authorities. Following (1) the Rāghabānanda the time is 8-23, (2) the Vāswatī, it is 8-13, and (3) the Manjari, 8-11. So, after all, the Bishudha Sidhanta and the Hindu Press Panjikas had calculated as near as possible the correct time.

It is interesting to learn what was the last act of consciousness of the late Poet Laureate. The ruling passion strong in death, in the afternoon before his exit he called for his Shakespeare and himself turned the leaves till he came upon "Cymbeline." To quote the Pall Mall Gazette—

"His eyes were fixed on the pages, but whether and how much he read, no one will ever know, for again he lay in dream or slumber, or let his eyes rest on the scenes outside. . . . Then, the stars came out and looked in at the big mullioned window, and those within saw them grow brighter and brighter, till at last a moon, a harvest moon for splendour, though it was an October moon, sailed slowly up, and flooded the room with golden light. The bed on which Lord Tennyson lay, now very near to the gate of death, and with his left hand still resting on his 'Shakespeare,' was in deep darkness, the rest of the room lit up with the glory of the night, which poured in through the uncurtained windows. And thus, without pain, without a struggle, the greatest of England's poets passed away."

Yes, probably the greatest with one exception—that of the Bard on whom he doated till his last breath. The deceased

Rivalled all but Shakespeare's name below.

It is a culpable omission in the reporter not to mention the particular edition last, which was also that habitually, used by the great poet. It was evidently a single-volumed one. Is it illustrated? Is it Cowden Clarke or any other? Involuntarily the heart of every lover of poetry warps upon those thoughts. The fact will soon be ferretted out, at least in the interest of the publisher. The latter's ware is now invested with a new interest. The particular copy of Shakespeare sanctified by the touch of the vanished hand, has become something more than historical. It is monumental and sacred—a relic to be preserved for the veneration of posterity to the remotest times. If brought under the hammer just now it will command a fabulous price.

THE following items of Indian intelligence occur in the Overland Mail of the 14th October in a prominent part, at page 2, among the editorial "Notes on the Week":—

"His Highness the Gaekwar of Baroda and suite arrived in London on Oct. 12 from the Continent, having crossed from Calais to Dover in the steamship Invicta."

"The Maharaja of Guzerat, with his family and suite of thirty persons, has arrived in Paris, and is staying at the Grand Hotel."

We have always noticed with pleasure our contemporary correct the frequent blunders of the Times and other leading members of the British Press. And now the corrector is in need of correction himself. The physician himself is laid up. The innocence of the O. M. establishment is emphasised by the juxtaposition of the two slender paragraphs. The subeditor of the journal has evidently no idea that the two Oriental magnates whose movements he chronicles, are one and the same person.

IN consequence of the attitude of the Bengal Government, we have been hoping that the complaints of distress for food in many quarters were very much exaggerated, if not wholly groundless. But all doubt has now been removed, and we trust the Government will recognize the truth manfully and do their duty with sympathetic promptness and energy. The condition of many villages in the metropolitan district, especially in the South, is pitiable. The cultivators are simply starving. So in different places Bankura. In Mymensingh, deaths have commenced. Zemindars and other private men are doing their best to help the sufferers, but the proportions of the distress are too great for them to grapple with it. Some of the landlords after doing their best have fled for fear of looting by the starving mob. We entreat Sir Charles Elliott to suspend for the moment political economy and feed the hungry like a Christian governor.

News from Jummoo represents a sad state of public health. Fever reigns in every household. Not a single family in which at least half the members are not laid up.

THE POINT OF LAW IN HYDERABAD.

THE Government of Hyderabad, we are informed, is very much exercised over an important legal question, which has arisen in connection with the Pamphlet Defamation case. Mr. Furdunji Jamshedji, Private Secretary to the Minister, declined to answer certain questions put to him by Mr. Eardley Norton, defendant's counsel, in the course of cross-examination, on the ground that the questions had reference to official matters, and that he as an officer of the Nizam's Government, could not reveal such official matters without the permission of the Minister. Mr. Norton said that the sections of the Indian Evidence Act bearing upon privilege applied only to communications made to an officer, and not to communications made by him, and as the questions put to Mr. Furdunji referred to communications which were made by him to the Minister, and not to those which the Minister had made to him, he, Mr. Furdunji, could not claim privilege under those sections. The sections in question are 123 and 124. Section 123 runs thus:—"No one shall be permitted to give any evidence derived from unpublished official records relating to any affairs of State, except with the permission of the officer at the head of the department concerned, who shall give or withhold such permission as he thinks fit." Section 124 says:—"No public officer shall be compelled to disclose communications made to him in official confidence, when he considers that the public interests would suffer by the disclosure." Mr. Bosanquet, the Residency Magistrate, held that these sections applied to British officials only, and that an officer of the Nizam's Government could not claim the privilege arising under these sections. He therefore ruled that Mr. Furdunji should answer all the questions put to him, and he gave him time till the next day to make up his mind on that point. The Magistrate also warned Mr. Furdunji that, whether he obtained the Minister's permission or not, if he should decline to answer the questions the next day he would have to suffer the penalty of the law. The next day Mr. Furdunji did not attend court, but sent in a petition to the Magistrate stating that the Minister wished to consult the Resident on the question of privilege, and praying that his further cross-examination might be postponed till then. Mr. Furdunji's prayer was granted and his cross-examination postponed. We are not aware what conversation the Minister has had with the Resident, or what opinion the Resident holds on the subject. Now, the question is—Is Mr. Bosanquet's interpretation of the law correct? At the outset it would be difficult to find fault with his interpretation, as the Act is a British Act and the "State" and "public officers" mentioned in the sections must necessarily mean the British Government and the officers of the British Government. But at the same time there is nothing in those sections to show that the States governed by the Sovereign Rulers of India or as they are called the Native States, and the officers of those States are excluded from the privilege which those sections confer upon officers of the British Government. Considering the relations existing between the Native States and the British Government as the Paramount Power, is it not reasonable to suppose that it was the intention of the Legislature to confer the privilege equally upon the public officers of the British Government and the public officers of the Native States? We really think that in case Mr. Bosanquet's interpretation be held correct, the Native States will have serious cause of alarm. The question affects not only the Hyderabad State, but all the Native States. The privilege which the British Government values so much for its own welfare, is equally valued by the Feudatory States, and it would be an act of the gravest injustice to them to deprive them of that privilege. The Nizam, we are credibly informed, is most anxious that his Government should not be deprived of this cherished right, and so must be the other Princes of India. The question then arises—Are the matters connected with Nawab Mehdi Hassan's case at all to be treated as State secrets? If our information is correct, while the Minister and Nawab Mehdi Hassan's friends in the Hyderabad Government, consider those matters as State secrets, His Highness the Nizam thinks otherwise. His Highness is anxious about one thing only—that the truth in the case should be known. It is said, His Highness never took so much real and absorbing interest in any case before as he has been doing in the present case. In the Sowar Commission case, in which he himself was concerned, the British officers, through mistake or from intention, made a mountain of a mole-hill—a merest accident being made to appear an intentional assault—and though every attempt was made to throw dirt on His Highness, he did not seem to feel the least concern in the matter, being certain in his mind that the truth would come out in the end—and the truth did come out in the end. In the Diamond case, His Highness had to suffer all the sad consequences of the innumerable mistakes committed by his advisers and yet he treated the whole matter—abuse included—as a sort of joke. But in the present case His Highness feels differently. If the main charge brought against Nawab Mehdi Hassan in the Pamphlet, should prove true—a grave insult has been deliberately offered to Her Majesty by one of His Highness's own officials. This is the reason why His Highness takes such keen interest in the present case. There is no Prince in India who is more sincerely loyal to Her Majesty than His Highness the Nizam Mahbub Ali. Coming to the throne at a time when he was scarcely weaned from his mother's breast, he acquired all the traditions of his family as he grew up—traditions best calculated to instil into the soul courage, magnanimity, and loyalty to the British Power. Thus he early discovered—what were not the least important of those traditions—how, while the throne of the Great Mogul was blotted out of existence, and the rich principalities which had been carved out by the brave contemporaries of Asaf Jah were swallowed by the British Lion one by one, Hyderabad alone was allowed to remain in peace and tranquillity, and how when Tipoo on one side and the Peshwa on the other threatened to crush Nizam Ali between them, the British turned the tables, against both and saved Hyderabad from imminent ruin. Learning all these traditions as he grew up—nourished upon such unexceptionable historic pabulum—the young Prince naturally learnt to look upon the British not only as his friend and ally but also as his protector. This feeling of loyalty for the Paramount Power which was engendered in his mind in early infancy increased with his years, and it was this feeling which, on the eve of his installation, induced him to visit Calcutta—the seat of the Imperial Government—and invite Lord Ripon to Hyderabad in order to install him on his ancestral gadi. (And so for the first time in the annals of Hyderabad a Nizam of Hyderabad was installed on his ancestral throne by a representative of the Paramount Power.) But besides this feeling of loyalty for the Paramount Power, His Highness has, in common with every other Indian, a personal feeling of respect and veneration for the Grand Old Lady who, through God's grace, wields her sceptre over India as the Queen-Empress. It was this personal feeling of respect and veneration for Her Majesty which led His Highness to give such hearty and warm reception to the Royal visitors—the Duke of Connaught and the late lamented Prince Victor, and to indulge in such lavish expenditure on the occasions of those royal visits. The genuine pleasure which the Nizam felt on those two occasions fully testified to his sincere attachment for Her Majesty. It is therefore not difficult to conceive the anxiety with which His Highness is watching the proceedings of the Pamphlet case. His Highness earnestly wishes that the enquiry should be as thorough as possible, and that his own Government should withhold no information or documents that may be in its possession and that may be required for the purposes of this enquiry. The Nizam also wishes that such information and communications as may throw any light on the present case should not be considered as State secrets. He believes that neither the State nor the public will in the least suffer by any disclosure that may be made about Nawab Mehdi Hassan's affairs. He does not at all wish that his officials should claim for such information and communication the privilege under the two sections of the Indian Evidence Act. We do not pause to enquire whether His Highness is right or wrong from point of view of statesmanship, but we have no hesitation in saying that the attitude which His Highness has taken in this case does credit to his heart. It shows how deeply loyal His Highness is to Her Majesty, as it also shows that he has shaken off the obnoxious influence which had hitherto held him down. It shows that he is resolved to think and act for himself.

The Government of Hyderabad is differently minded. And here we must inform our readers that the peculiar constitution so to speak of Hyderabad makes its sovereign a distinct personality from the Government. The Minister, as the head of the administration, is alone responsible for all administrative miscarriages and blunders. Thus, just now, justly or unjustly, the Government is very unpopular, but the Nizam continues to be as popular as ever. The unpopularity of the Government does in no way affect the popularity of the Prince. It is owing to this peculiarity that we find that, while the Nizam is taking one view of the questions that arise, Mr. Furdunji, his Government is taking another. In this connection we may mention that, in exactly what to do with regard to the question of privilege raised by Mr. Furdunji, Nawab Mushtak Hossein, the Minister's right-hand man, drafted a most angry, unmeaning and threatening minute on the subject for the edification of the Government of India. Fortunately, the draft was shown to Nawab Mahdi Ali—as a new departure from the ordinary practice—and that officer having condemned it, the elaborate document was at last consigned to its proper sphere—W. ISLAM IN ENGLAND.

(BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Liverpool, 13th October, 1892.

Sometime ago a Christian clergyman who for some years we believe resided in Calcutta, but who subsequently removed to Rheims in France, paid a visit to Liverpool and devoted several days to attending the public lectures at the Mosque and otherwise enquiring into the progress of Islam in England. He was so struck by what he saw and heard that he wrote a book called "Studies in Mahomedanism" and expressed in his preface his object in so doing as being a desire to, if possible, win back the Moslem converts to Christianity.

His book has been somewhat harshly criticised by the "Athenæum" and other papers and recently one of the Liverpool weeklies thus alluded to his work :—

"An author, late of Calcutta, has just published a book entitled: 'Stories in Mahomedanism, with a chapter: "Islam in England." Special attention is paid to Liverpool as the headquarters of the Eastern faith, and he says: 'In the autumn of 1891, being in England, I resolved to visit Liverpool and investigate thoroughly Mahomedanism in that city. During the four days of my stay I was the guest of the President, and was treated with much kindness, and shown everything in the Institute, and told all about the inner working of the whole movement, with the clear understanding that I could make public whatever I pleased. I timed my visit so as to arrive on a Friday, the "Day of the Assembly," and at once made my way to the Institute, though doubtful of obtaining admittance, as the services on that day are for the Faithful only. It was the hour of evening prayer when I reached Brougham Hall, and the first thing I saw and heard was the President standing in the balcony of a window, which did duty for a minaret, giving the Azan or Call to Prayer, both in Arabic and English. I had not heard the famous Call since leaving Egypt in the year 1888, and it sounded passing strange to me to listen to it in the streets of an English city. As the cry "Allah is Great! Allah is Great! I bear witness there is no God but God! I bear witness that Mahomed is the Prophet of God! Come to prayers! Come to salvation! Allah is Great!" was raised a crowd gathered and listened with considerable curiosity, but without any remark.'

Mr. Pool speaks highly of Mr. Quilliam, the president, who was converted to the Mahomet's doctrine in 1884, when on a visit to Morocco. He, however, arrives at the conclusion that "the movement is a forlorn hope; Islam in England may drag on for some years a feeble existence, but then it will probably die a sudden death." I have not much faith in prophets, so I cannot hazard an opinion on his conclusion."

Seeing that the Liverpool Moslem Institute has now made eighty-six (86) converts from Christianity, Judaism, Spiritualism and atheism to Islam, and in addition has a capital boy's school with masters who have had English University education, the prophecy of the Reverend author is not likely to be fulfilled. Probably with him "the wish is father to the thought."

Last Sunday evening (October 9th) Mr. T. Omar Byrne delivered a lecture on "Personal Responsibility." The attendance was everything that could be desired, and the excellent remarks of the lecturer were listened to with great attention.

The Hon'ble Mr. Justice Amcer Ali of Calcutta is in London. He has invited Mr. Quilliam to join him there.

The London Anjuman-i-Islamia holds a dinner on Saturday in commemoration of the birthday of the Prophet. The Liverpool Society have arranged to feed 250 poor people in commemoration of the same anniversary. Yours ever,

HADJI ADAM MOHAMMED.

THE COURTS OF THE RANAGHAT SUB-DIVISION.

5th October, 1892.

There are now two Munsiffs in the Ranaghat Sub-Division, the first Munsiff Babu Mananath Sen is an experienced and hard-working officer and though he does not soar above mediocrity, he performs his duties tolerably well. He is rather of an irritable temper and, like the tip of a lucifer match, ignites at the least friction and is extinguished immediately. The second or additional Munsiff Babu Jagut Chandra Dass comes from the District of Faridpur, bordering on Backhergung. It seems that he has been in the service for a short time and has not gained that power of critically discriminating right from wrong and truth from falsehood which intelligent and mature experience gains in time. His intellect seems to be of the ordinary run but it is hoped that mature experience will make him a passable judge.

On the 12th of September last he came to court at about 11 A.M., and left it after half an hour alleging that he was unwell; and those who saw him at the time must have been convinced that he was not all right in his health. The ailment seems to be ephemeral, for on the next day he was found sitting in court precisely at 11 A.M. doing his office work without any appearance of illness. He ought to consider what amount of expense, vexation and trouble the parties to suits and witnesses had to suffer for his absence on that day. Both the Munsiffs have been here for a few months only and the cases decided by them have not been subjected to the crucial test of an Appellate Court, so I do not make any comment on the subject.

The Deputy Magistrate of Ranaghat has been in charge of the Sub-Division for nearly three years. The public have watched his proceedings for sometime, but so long they kept their opinions to themselves. I will now refer to some of his doings as a judicial officer.

(a) He comes to court generally between 12 noon and 1 P.M. and sometimes even later. But no party is allowed to present a petition after the time of call for Darkhast is over; and on some days no call for Darkhast is made at all, so that people coming from long distances are obliged to stay at Ranaghat for another day to present a petition, to the great loss and inconvenience of those parties.

(b) He frequently gets out of temper and sometimes speaks in high words and browbeats parties and witnesses to suits according to his own sweet will.

(c) He remains in court some times to 10 P.M., to the great inconvenience of Amla, Munktears, parties and witnesses.

(d) In taking down depositions of witnesses he translates in English what the witnesses depose to in Bengali. This translation unfortunately is not always accurate, and sometimes does not express the meaning of the deponent. Here are some specimens of the erudite Deputy Magistrate's translations :—

1. "A little remaining of the night."
2. "After they left, I saw the bolt catcher broken."

What this "bolt catcher" means, the Deputy Magistrate will be good enough to explain for the benefit of the public.

3. "I pay his fee sometimes in cash and sometimes in arrears."
- A nice method of payment in arrears!

4. "Shortly after a constable came and talked to Jemadar in silence."

What a wonderful man the Deputy Magistrate must be, to make a constable talk to Jemadar "in silence!"

(e) As already stated the witnesses give their depositions in Bengali and the Deputy Magistrate translates them into English; but after the completion of the deposition of a witness he does not condescend to read over to him (the witness) what he has deposed to. This is optional with him (the Deputy Magistrate) in Summary and Summons cases, but in Warrant Cases he is bound to do so. Sec. 360 of the Criminal Procedure Code strictly enjoins "As the evidence of each witness taken under Sec. 356 or Sec. 357 is completed, it shall be read over to him in the presence of the accused," &c. The "shall" above quoted is imperative and obligatory.

The Subdivisional officer Babu Kedarnath Biswas is very unpopular, and there never was before (with a single exception) such an unpopular officer in Ranaghat.

ACT NO. X OF 1892.

[This Act of the Governor-General of India in Council received the assent of His Excellency the Governor-General on the 25th October 1892, and is published in the Gazette of India of the 29th October 1892.]

An Act to provide for the levy of a rate on private estates under the management of the Government to meet the cost of supervision and management.

Whereas it is expedient to provide for the levy of a rate on private estates under the management of the Government to cover the cost of all Government establishments in so far as they are employed in the supervision and management of such estates, other than establishments specially entertained for any particular estate or group of estates, and to meet all contingent expenditure incurred by the Government in connection with such supervision and management; It is hereby enacted as follows :—

1. (1) This Act may be called the Government Management of Private Estates Act, 1892.

(2) It extends to the whole of British India, inclusive of Upper Burma and British Baluchistan; and

(3) It shall come into force at once.

2. In this Act, unless there is something repugnant in the subject or context,—

(1) "immoveable property" includes land, buildings, hereditary allowances, rights to ways, lights, ferries, fisheries or any other benefit to arise out of land, and things attached to the earth or permanently fastened to anything which is attached to the earth, but not standing timber, growing crops or grass;

(2) "gross income" includes all receipts of every kind in produce or cash, except money borrowed, recoveries of principal and the proceeds of sale of immoveable property or of moveable property properly classed as capital; and

(3) "private estates under Government management" include—

(a) estates under the Court of Wards;

(b) encumbered estates under Government management;

(c) estates attached for default of payment of Government revenue;

(d) minors' estates placed under the guardianship of a revenue-officer of the Government by a Civil Court;

(e) estates managed by a Collector in pursuance of any order made under the Code of Civil Procedure; and

(f) all other estates made over to or taken under the management of a revenue-officer of the Government as such under any law for the time being in force or in virtue of any agreement.

3. It shall be lawful for the Local Government—

(1) to levy on all private estates under Government management a rate, not exceeding five per cent. on the gross income, calculated as nearly as may be possible, to cover—

(a) the cost of all Government establishments in so far as they may be employed in the supervision or management of such estates other than establishments specially entertained for the supervision or management of any particular estate or group of estates, and

(b) all contingent expenditure incurred in consequence of such supervision or management;

(2) from time to time to vary such rate; and

(3) to reduce or remit such rate in any special case or cases as may be equitable;

Provided that, in deciding the amount of the rate to be levied under this Act on any particular estate or group of estates, the Local Government shall consider the expenditure incurred on special establishments for such estate or estates.

4. In cases where an officer of the Government is employed to give legal advice or to audit accounts on behalf of any estate, the Local Government, if it considers the services rendered to be of a special nature, may, in its discretion, direct a special charge to be made against that estate on account of such services, irrespective of the rate leviable under the last foregoing section.

5. Nothing in this Act shall apply to the cost of establishments specially entertained or to expenditure of any description specially incurred in respect of any particular estate or estates.

6. All rates for general supervision or management levied by any Local Government before the commencement of this Act shall be deemed to have been levied under this Act.

7. The Local Government may make any rules and issue any orders which may be necessary for carrying this Act into effect, and which are consistent therewith.

8. Where any Government establishment is employed in such supervision as aforesaid, the Local Government shall be the sole judge of the cost attributable to such employment, and its decision thereon shall not be questioned in any Court of Law or otherwise.

9. Section 17 of the Court of Wards Act, 1879 (passed by the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal in Council), and so much of Act III of 1881 (also passed by the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal in Council) as relates to section 17 of the said Court of Wards Act, 1879, are hereby repealed.

GOVERNMENT MANAGEMENT OF PRIVATE ESTATES BILL.

The hon'ble Sir Philip Hutchins moved (in the Viceregal Council held at Simla, on the 20th October 1892) that the Report of the Select Committee on the Bill to provide for the levy of a rate on private estates under the management of Government to meet the cost of superior supervision and management be taken into consideration. He said:—

"I shall not trouble the Council with many general remarks on the policy of this Bill. It is enough to remind them of the fundamental principle upon which it rests, namely, that it is only for the benefit and protection of private proprietors that the State undertakes the management of their estates, and that consequently all expenditure incidental to such management, including a fair share of the pay of supervising officers, ought to be provided for out of the income of the estates and not out of funds levied from the general taxpayer. The Bill has been favourably received in all the provinces, and, I believe, by the Press also so far as it has been noticed at all. I may therefore pass on at once to a brief statement of its principal details, noticing in particular those in which the Select Committee has made any material alteration.

"Of the definitions contained in the second section the most important is that which indicates the income upon which the Government rate or commission is to be calculated. We have made it clear that borrowed money is not to be taken as income. The sale-proceeds of immoveable property have all along been excluded; we have now exempted also the proceeds of such moveable property as would itself be properly classed as capital. I will illustrate what is meant by an example. Jewels could not be properly classed as income, but are capital. Accordingly, if the Court of Wards ever finds it expedient to sell any of its wards' jewels, the money realized will not be regarded as income and will not be liable to the rate. On the other hand, there are obviously many kinds of moveable property which could not be classed as capital. Such, for instance, are the crops raised on the proprietor's home-farm, the produce of his cattle, and in horse-breeding districts his young stock. Where these are sold the proceeds will be regarded as income. The Bengal Government wished to assess the rate on the 'current demand,' or rents payable by the tenants of the estate, but we preferred to adhere to the draft Bill in this respect, as the alternative proposal would have left out of account all such items as I have just indicated.

"Then comes section 3, which empowers the Government to levy a rate on all income, defined as I have stated; but this rate is subject to two limitations: it must not be more than sufficient to cover a reasonable estimate of the cost of establishments and contingent expenditure, and it must in no case exceed 5 per cent. The maximum first proposed was 4 per cent., but instances have been adduced from Bengal, the Punjab and Ajmere which seem to show that a somewhat larger percentage may occasionally be required. We have accordingly allowed a maximum of 5 per cent. This rate will cover, among other things, all ordinary legal advice, and it will of course be subject to the other condition that no more is to be taken than the estimated value of the services rendered.

"Power is reserved to the Local Government to reduce or remit the rate whenever this seems equitable, and the Committee has inserted a proviso to make it clear that whenever any considerable special establishments are entertained for an estate its claim to a reduction shall receive due attention.

"I have been asked how this will work, and in reply it may be convenient that I should explain how I anticipate that Local Governments will ordinarily proceed. General estimates of the cost of supervision and management have already been framed in all provinces, and the probable income of each estate will be shown in its annual budget. As soon as the budgets are ready for next year—or at once upon the estimates of the current year—the Court of Wards or Financial Commissioner will probably submit a statement showing the amount to be raised, the aggregate income, and what estates have special managers or any other special establishments which would give them a claim to reduction. They will also propose a general rate and such reductions as appear to them appropriate; and thereupon the Local Government will determine the rate and what reductions or remissions shall be allowed. In subsequent years, if matters have generally remained the same, it will only be necessary to show changes which have taken place or are proposed. As an instance of a case in which reductions should be allowed, I may refer to a province in which most of the smaller estates are under the direct management of tahsildars, although others have special managers. The former would naturally be made subject to the full rate, while the latter would be entitled to a reduction.

"The next section to be noticed is section 5. This provides that nothing in the Act is to apply to establishments specially entertained, or to expenditure specially incurred, for any estate or group of estates. It has been objected that the Bill gives no power to charge such special expenditure to the estates; but the reason is obvious. Every estate is clearly liable for its own special expenditure under the general law. The only doubt has been whether the cost of general supervision and management could be levied from all estates by a general rate, and it is that doubt which will now be removed. For the same reason it has not been thought necessary to provide that the rate shall take precedence over private debts. Creditors can only look to the net income, or, in other words, to the gross income less the cost of management and other expenditure incurred in the realization of the income.

"In conclusion I have only to mention that we have added a section, at the instance of my hon'ble friend the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, repealing enactments which provide in that province for very nearly the same matters as are dealt with by this Bill, but not so comprehensively."

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

ON THE BRIDGE.

IT was young Robin and his love
Stood on a Bridge at even-song ;
Night's countless lamps were lit above ;
Below, the streamlet slid along.
Across the rail she lightly leant,
And gazed into the quiet stream,
Wherein she saw with deep content
The buried stars reflected gleam ;
But never stars shone half as bright
As Elsie's eyes, that summer night.
Around her taper waist, an arm—
Her gallant Robin's—gently lay ;
In place and hour there lurked a charm,
That owned no kinship to the day.
Familiar sounds upon the gale
Were softly wafted to the ear,
And from the darkness of the vale,
The love-lorn mavis fluted clear ;
But sweeter than the song he sung,
The words that trembled on her tongue.
The shadows deepen in the dell ;
Weird bats athwart the water play ;
And on the fitful breezes swell
The village church-bells far away.
Through all the windings of the glade,
The stately trees, like phantoms stand ;
Whilst Love was leading man and maid
Far onwards into fairyland ;
And neither had on earth a part,
Save only in the other's heart !
Anon, from yonder wooded ridge,
The cold moon climbs the blue expanse,
She glorifies the rustic bridge,
Her beams upon the brooklet dance ;
She softly winds about the twain
The radiance of her liquid light,
As though, for lovers, she would fain
Create a fairer day from night.
Her silver signet—nothing loth—
She sets upon their plighted troth !

LOVE IS LOVE FOR EVERMORE.

UNDER the blue of a summer sky,
Under the spell of Beauty's thrall,
Watching the sun-clouds floating by,
Watching the wavelets rise and fall ;
Happy as lovers alone can be,
Dreaming what bliss the years will bring—

Dreaming beside the summer sea—
Hearing the dancing waters sing,
With rippling murmur along the shore—
'Love is love for evermore.'

Under the gray of a cloudy sky,
Under the shadow of Love's eclipse,
Standing apart with flashing eye,
Standing apart with quivering lips ;
Fighting a duel 'twixt love and pride,
Waging a war that is fraught with pain,
Turning Love's pleading lips aside—
Turning deaf ear to the wave's refrain,
Breaking in sadness along the shore—
'Love is love for evermore.'

Under the gloom of a gathering storm,
Under a midnight wild and dark,
Watches a shivering maiden's form,
Watches and waits for some one's barque ;
Helpless it rides without spar or mast,
Driven ashore, and tossed about,
Drifting to death, and the cruel blast
Downing his cries with mocking shout.
Above the roar breaks a wail ashore—
'Love is love for evermore.'

Under the dawn of a smileless morn,
Under the sorrow that grieves for the dead,
Weeps a woman with heart forlorn—
Weeps, and will not be comforted ;
Suddenly, swiftly, with eager face
Steals one to her through wrack and rain—
Love has its triumph in a long embrace—
The dead hath risen to life again ;
And the waters murmur as before,
'Love is love for evermore.'

SPRING IN AUTUMN.

SHALL we remember in some time far off,
When youth is dead and life has lost its sweetness,
What scents and sounds that day was woven of,
Whose memory, rose-like, in our life's December,
Would melt its snows to June's divine completeness ?
Shall we remember ?

O day too bright, too brief ? when we two stood
Beside the old wall, ivy-veiled, moss-covered ;
The purple mist clung to the crisp dun wood—
May to our hearts, set in the year's November—
Above our souls the soul of parting hovered !
Do you remember ?

Ah, that one moment ere we turned to go !
 If this my earthly life have end to-morrow,
 Strong in that memory my soul will know
 Not one regret for life's expiring ember,
 Nor one thought's pain, nor one hour's dream of sorrow,
 While I remember !

WEEKLYANA.

ON Thursday morning the Englishman, in a little paragraph, gave warning to the public that "it is probable that the Bengal Government will shortly publish all the papers in connection with the jury question." The "probable" was of course only journalistic modesty for the certain.

Our contemporary is evidently in the confidence of Government. It not only made the announcement of an early publication of papers, but devoted a leader on the "Truth about the Bengal Jury System"—from Abolitionists' point of view. Evidently, the Hindoo Patriot has ceased to be the confidant of the Bengal Government. What is the Press Association about? Has it no truth to give out in regard to the question of the hour? Mr. Risley is on leave. Perhaps we must wait till his return in December. In the meantime, Sir Charles Elliott himself may be explaining and justifying his own action.

THE Englishman begins its leader with the statement that the action of Sir Charles Elliott has received the sanction of Lord Lansdowne's Government and the approval of the Calcutta High Court. Our contemporary adds that the Lieutenant-Governor did not take the step without consulting his officers, and that there "is a practical consensus of opinion among all the officials who were consulted that the evils of the present system in embarrassing the course of criminal justice far outweigh the public material advantage of utilizing the participation of the people in trials as a means of their social and political advancement." On that latter statement we join issue absolutely and in every respect—in fact no less than in principle. We question the statement as we question the generalization. We deny the alleged "consensus of opinion among all the officials who were consulted." And we challenge the correctness of the opinion itself. Under any circumstances, the people have been most shabbily treated by their rulers. Dramatic surprises and stage tricks ill comport with the gravity of administration. Nor had Her Majesty's lieges of Bengal and Behar given any cause for the extraordinary secrecy and haste with which the operation of the Abolition of Trial by Jury has been carried out. As for the publication of the exculpatory papers on the jury question, the justification should precede not follow the action taken. Of course, our contemporary, with all its zeal for Government, is English, at bottom, and admits that "it would have been more judicious on the part of Sir Charles Elliott had he simultaneously with the issue of the notification published a resumé in the Gazette of the reasons for curtailing the scope of the jury." That is the suggestion of a struggling conscience ill at ease under the obligation of defending the indefensible. A little more judiciousness would not have made much difference. Absolute judiciousness was needed by the gravity of the problem. Oh for the rarity of statesmanship among our rulers!

THE announcement in the morning is followed up in the afternoon with an Extraordinary issue of the Calcutta Gazette, in which is published for general information twenty-two letters leading to the Notification of the 20th October.

THE Government Astronomer, Madras, Professor Michie Smith, observed no features of special importance in the lunar eclipse of Friday week. The magnitude of the eclipse amounted to only 1.92 of the moon's diameter, that is, the diameter of the shadow cone of the earth was less than one and one-tenth times the moon's diameter; consequently the eclipse to the naked eye at no time seemed total, though totality really lasted for 44 minutes. The most striking feature, however, was the way in which Aristarchus, the most brilliant crater in the moon, shone out brightly through the dull red glow of the surrounding country, long after it was completely immersed in the earth's shadow. The coppery red colouration of the eclipsed moon was well marked.

Father A. de Penaranda of this city thus rectifies in the Englishman the Madras observations :—

"The extract from a Madras paper under this heading in your to-day's issue lapses into manifest astronomic heresy, when it ventures on a would-be explanation of the technical term 'magnitude' (which, by the way, was in the late eclipse 1.992, not 1.92, as therein stated.) 'That is,' says the para in question, 'the diameter of the shadow cone of the earth was less than one and one-tenth times the moon's diameter.' Now, the diameter of the 'shadow cone,' i.e., the diameter of a section of that cone at the distance of the moon, is always, even when the moon is in apogee or at its greatest remoteness from the earth, between two and three times the moon's diameter and was, in fact, on the present occasion, more than two and a half times that diameter (5549" as against 2013"). The magnitude of a lunar eclipse is in reality the ratio borne to the moon's diameter by the depth of immersion, at mid eclipse of the most deeply immersed point of the moon's disc, a rather complex notion, which it is not easy to make clear without the aid of some diagram. But this I dare say matters little."

ACCORDING to the Englishman of the 10th November, "it is probable that Sir Steuart Bayley will get the next vacant seat in the India Council," and "Sir Mortimer Durand may be invited to take charge of the Political and Secret Secretariat at the India office."

UNDER the authority conveyed by the 29th section of the Act 21 and 22 Victoria, Chapter 106, His Excellency the Governor General of India is pleased, subject to the approbation of Her Majesty the Queen, Empress of India, to appoint the Honourable Sir Charles Haukes Todd Crosthwaite, K.C.S.I., of the Indian Civil Service, to be Lieutenant-Governor of the North-Western Provinces and Chief Commissioner of Oudh.

THE following notification dated Simla, the 2nd November, 1892, appears in the Gazette of India of the 5th November 1892 :—

"In exercise of the power conferred by Statute 33 Victoria, Chapter 3, Section 6, and in supersession of the rules published in Notification No. 1534, dated the 22nd August 1879, the Governor General in Council has been pleased to make the following rules, which have been sanctioned by the Secretary of State in Council with the concurrence of a majority of the members present:

1. The Local Government may appoint any member of the Provincial Civil Service subordinate to it, who is a Native of India and of proved merit and ability, to any of the offices, places, and employments ordinarily held by members of the Civil Service of India, to fill which it has been declared by such Local Government (by notification in the official Gazette) that members of such Provincial Civil Service can properly be appointed; provided that no appointment shall be made to the office of District and Sessions Judge, or Chief Administrative Officer of a district, or to any Administrative office of higher rank, if the vacancy to be filled is permanent, or for a period of more than three months, without the sanction of the Governor General of India in Council.

2. The Local Government may, with the previous sanction of the Governor General in Council (but not otherwise), at any time appoint any Native of India of proved merit and ability to any of the offices, places, and employments specified by such Local Government in any such notification as in Rule 1 is mentioned; provided that not more than one-fourth of the offices, places, and employments so specified shall at any one time be held by Natives of India not members of the Provincial Civil Service subordinate to that Local Government; but this proviso shall not apply to or include any Native of India (not a member of a Provincial Service) who has, prior to the making of these rules, been appointed under Statute 33 Vict., Cap. 3, Section 6, to an office, place, or employment in the Civil Service of India.

3. The Local Government may (with the previous sanction of the Governor General in Council, in any case in which such sanction is required for a permanent appointment) declare any appointment to be made on probation only, and may prescribe the terms on which it is made and the conditions with which the person appointed must comply before he can be confirmed.

4. The Local Government may at any time suspend and, with the previous sanction of the Governor General in Council, remove any person appointed by such Local Government under these rules."

THE most remarkable prodigy in the journalistic trade must be credited to France. Certainly the biggest, wonderfulest concern of a little newspaper is Le Petit Journal, a Parisian daily paper with the largest circulation of any journal in the world, edited, managed, and entirely conducted by the chief owner, M. Cassignol. The number of copies printed is 1,200,000, the number of readers being from 3,000,000 to 5,000,000. It is a diminutive sheet of only four pages of five columns each, yet it commands great influence in France. The first and second pages are occupied by signed leaders. The writers are such men as Xavier de Montepin, Paul Bloet, Jules Mary, Emile Richebourg, Paul Saumières, and Paul d'Agremont. For a single article they often receive a hundred pounds—the rate at which Mr. Gladstone has been paid for his recent article in the North American Review. No wonder that the charges for advertisements are very high. So much as £2 a line each insertion is payable for every advertisement in the last page and £4 a line for that on the third page. This is not only the unalterable rate, but no deduction is allowed on any account for long or continued advertisements. If the letters in a line are twice or three times as large or deep as the letters of a reading notice, they have to be paid for in proportion. Nor are advertisements ever allowed intrusion into the first two pages. There are three editions of the paper. The first is printed at from five to seven in the evening for outside cities of France, like Bordeaux, Nice, Marseilles, &c. The second edition, at from seven to nine P.M., for transmission by railways to Lyons, Dijon, Havre, &c. The last is reserved for Paris and its suburbs.

The offices of this monster of a letter-press dwarf on the Rue de Lafayette occupy fourteen buildings. 500 to 600 men are at work for the journal. The editorial, reportorial and other departments are above, while the great machines, consisting in part of fourteen gigantic rotary Marinoni presses—after the invention of Hippolyte Marinoni, the father-in-law of M. Cassigneul—are below. The presses print 40,000 copies an hour. These machines, in fact the entire offices, are owned by Cassigneul. This gentleman has had a remarkable career. The sixth son of a policeman in a little town in Italy, he commenced life as a compositor, and he is now worth £3,000,000, or over four crores of Rupees. The capital of the company running the paper is estimated at £2,000,000.

ON Tuesday, the 8th November, Mr. Ganesh Krishna Shahane, the Editor and Proprietor of the vernacular newspaper Suryodaya, published every week in Thana, was arrested in Poona, on a warrant issued by the First Class Magistrate at Sholapur, in a case of defamation preferred against him by Rao Bahadur Hebliker, Huzur Deputy Collector and Magistrate at Sholapur. He was released on a bail of Rs. 500.

HERE is a characteristic anecdote of European pretension :—

"Mr. Shakspeare, the great authority on the dialects of northern India, and whose Urdu Dictionary is the standard work of reference, used to pride himself on the purity of his Urdu pronunciation. But his amiable vanity once received a severe shock. Once he spoke to his new Delhiwal syce [even the mehtars of Delhi, by the bye, speak classical Urdu] on some matter, but the syce kept gazing at him. Mr. Shakspeare repeated what he had said, but still that perplexed stare. At length his patience gave way and he rushed at his humble retainer a la Anglaise, when the poor fellow blurted out : Hazur main Angresi nahin samajhta ! Here was the mystery cleared,—the Urdu of the Sahib, over which the courtly Munshis used to go into ecstasies, was incomprehensible in the home of Urdu."

OUR OWN NEWS.

THE distress owing to scarcity of food is spreading in the country. We have received the following telegram from Balasore :—

Nov. 8.—At the instance of Raja Boikunth Nath Dey Bahadur, a public meeting was called last evening at the zilla school hall to raise subscriptions for the relief of the poor people of Kamarda in thana Balia-pal of this district, who are suffering from scarcity. The District Magistrate, Mr. Cornish, presided. A committee has been formed to raise subscriptions for administering relief to the poor sufferers in the affected parts, and nearly Rs. 4,000 have already been subscribed. The grateful thanks of the public are due to Mr. Cornish, our popular and kind hearted Magistrate, for the timely measures he has adopted to meet the crisis."

IN our issue of the 3rd September last, we commented on a communication from a so-called "Turk of Constantinople," published in the London Daily News, in which the writer proclaimed that the approaching advent of Mr. Gladstone to power was causing lively satisfaction at the capital, inasmuch as the Mussulmans of all but the official classes had, it was said, always regarded the illustrious English statesman a defender of the oppressed of all creeds and nationalities. Since then, a friend of ours, who seems to be well acquainted with the writer of that letter, tells us that "the 'Turk of Constantinople' writing in the Daily News, is originally a Christian Syrian by birth, the son of the famous Arab grammarian and poet Ahmed Faris, who, not finding himself sufficiently rewarded in Constantinople, has gone to England where he is serving the cause of the Grand Old Man. These letters are luckily not taken for seriously by any body, nor will the anger of the Grand Old Man be so vehement as his words, for Lord Rosebery has got quite different views on the Eastern Question, and appreciating the difficulties the Sultan has to contend with, he will hardly deviate from the course of Lord Salisbury."

THE Bengal Government has found it necessary to republish the Rules contained in Home Department Resolution of the 11th May 1885, emphasised in the same Department's Resolution of the 22nd July 1887, forbidding all servants of Government, covenanted or uncovenanted, to receive complimentary or valedictory addresses in any form, or to accept testimonials of any kind, or to attend public meetings or complimentary entertainments of a formal and public character held in their honor. Sir Charles Elliott warns all officers under his Government that any breach of the rules therein laid down will be seriously dealt with. The rules by themselves do not apply to the receipt of addresses by the heads of any Government or Administration. Nor are they, we find, elastic enough to embrace the wives of officers, who are, we believe, free to accept what may be offered them in recognition of the services done by their husbands or by themselves.

OF the many anecdotes which are being told of the late Poet Laureate perhaps the most characteristic is that furnished by the Tablet. The writer was on a visit to Farringford some four or five years ago. Sitting under the shadow of the great magnolias that cover one side of the house, the conversation turned upon the supernatural and the possibility of communications from the other world. Tennyson then related how, one fine Sunday, in one of the New England States, a dissenting minister noted for his powers as a preacher, instead of reading a text and giving a sermon, suddenly in a most dramatic manner began to recite "The Charge of the Light Brigade." The congregation listened breathlessly to the end. They could not choose but hear that impassioned musical tongue. But before the end of the service elders and people alike were loud in their anger at the way in which the house of prayer had been profaned. The minister was wholly unprepared for the complaint. He remembered having gone into the pulpit intending to speak on the need for charity and was wholly unconscious of what a different performance he had given. Convinced at length by irresistible testimony, of the contretemps he had committed, he was filled with shame and remorse. He kept a close sabbath that day, within his room, and passed a sleepless night. At daybreak word was brought that a man looking like a tramp wanted to see him urgently. Though as yet scarcely prepared, he made a desperate resolve to see him. The visitor walked straight up to him and said calmly : "I come to thank the man who has saved my soul." The minister stood in silence wondering whether this was another illusion for his confusion, while the stranger went on : "I was all through the Crimea and I was in the thick of the fight at Gettysburg but never till I heard you recite that poem in the chapel yesterday did I know what I had to thank God for. Sir, from that hour I determined to change my life, and I want to thank the man to whom I owe my salvation."

We are not told—at least in the Allahabad Morning Post in which we read the charming story—whether, and how, the pastor was reconciled to his flock. Perhaps delicacy is not much observed in the great democracy of the West. Still we can scarcely conceive the reverend gentleman proceeding next Sunday in high spirits, armed with his godsend of a visitor of Monday morning—like a teetotal orator with his drunkard reclaimed—to face his congregation, if not to justify his strange behaviour in the pulpit which had scandalized them on the previous sabbath, at any rate to show them how the Lord in his mercy had turned the matter to good account. The incident was too sacred for making political capital of, or religious. No reverent soul would think of such a use of such a thing. A true pastor would brave the obloquy of elders and congregation ten times over than degrade the mysteries of grace that may be vouchsafed in the thick of the faithlessness of our work-day world. Yet it were a pity if the wonderful conversion of the retired man of war and the world in both hemispheres through a well-known piece of poetry of bloodshed impressively recited in absent-mindedness from the pulpit of a chapel by the minister in lieu of the sermon, were entirely withheld from the members of that church. If the knowledge did not make more converts, it would dispose them all to a better frame of mind. The unco-religious have little hope in this world—or the next. But many of the rest might learn to relent towards many things which they have been taught by foolish teachers to despise and hate as the abominations of the world.

OUR old friend Kassim Atiff Soorati, the well known merchant, landholder and owner of the only silk manufactory in Calcutta, recently returned from pilgrimage to Mecca, and is now a full blown Haji. He intends to celebrate the event befittingly. Our readers are aware, that it was he who threw water on the blazing fire of dispute between the Mahomedans of Shambazur and the Hindoo purchaser of the ground on which the small mosque stood and which had caused the unfortunate riot in the beginning of last year—by buying up the piece of land from the Hindoo proprietor and making it over to the Mahomedans living in that neighbourhood for purposes of the mosque. He will now build a grand mosque upon that site, measuring about 10 cottahs, and make a Wakf (religious trust) of that property from the proceeds of which the regular expenses of the mosque are to be met.

We are glad to learn that Haji Kassim Atiff did not forget the convenience and comfort of his co-religionists performing the Haji. During his recent visit to the Hijaz he got a well excavated at Jeddah at a cost of Rs. 1000, repaired all the taps of the Water Supply at Mecca, carried 12 coolies with him, from Mecca to Medina and back, and had the 14 or 15 wells on the way cleansed at a cost of Rs. 1,500, and paid the return passage of 100 poor Indian pilgrims. If the other wealthy of the Mahomedan persuasion similarly spent their money to facilitate the uncomfortable and irksome journey which Indian Mahomedans have to undertake in the Hajj season, the discomforts attending such pilgrimages will gradually be minimised.

THE last witness examined for the defence by the Commission in the Hyderabad defamation case, was Raja Rampal Sing, of Kalakankar. He is reported to have said that he had heard Miss Donnelly was bad. In the year 1870 Mehdi Hassan had introduced her to him as his friend not as his wife. The Raja was not spared by the counsel for the prosecution. The questions then turned on his own marriage. Regarding that he made a curious statement that after the death of the Indian Rani of Kalakankar, he has been plunged in the arduous business of matrimony, not only marrying repeatedly but also devising new forms of union or new adaptations of old forms. It is all right, of course. Our Raja is no Rajpoot polygamist. He has been true to one love—so true indeed that he has been wedding her over and over again—to make assurance doubly sure. He said that Mrs. Rampal Sing is an English lady, married to him according to Hindu law, and that in 1891 he once more married her before the Registrar. We are not told whether the witness was asked to explain the nature of the first union. Perhaps the counsel did not stand in need of information, like ourselves. Lawyers are not so ignorant as Editors. To us we confess the idea of an English lady, presumably the daughter of Christian parents, being united in holy wedlock to a Hindu gentleman in the Hindu way, is so strange and grotesque as scarcely to be a possibility of thought.

By marriage "according to Hindu law" is no doubt meant marriage according to Hindu rites. These rites are some of them onerous enough to the natives themselves, and Raja Rampal must be gifted indeed to have persuaded an English lady to submit to him. The lady herself must be endowed with extraordinary powers of patience and endurance. It is no ordinary trial. After going through the greater part of it, the European, man or woman, who has accepted Hindu rites, may, after all, fail to complete the process, flying from the torture of the Kushandika, as some widows rush out of the burning pile to which they voluntarily submit themselves to be bound. Oh the torture of the Kushandika! If Hindus knew what was in store for them they would take the vow of celibacy. Hindu rites of course must be performed before Narayan, the symbol of Deity, and by the priest. We wonder what Brahman the Raja got to unite him to his British spouse. Is there a Hindu Greta Green unknown to us?

THE Hindus and Mussulmans are at war at Pind Dadan Khan. For once the police, however, are not asleep nor averse from pouring oil over the troubled waters. They have even caught two city lads sticking up posters inciting the Hindus and Mussulmans to fight. This seems such a departure from the practice of civil defenders of the society in the Panjab, that people are in ecstasy and showing the most extravagant appreciation of minute mercies. The Press itself is off its head. While rewards are called for for the singular policemen who caught the boys posting up objectionable notices, all the vengeance of the law short of the capital is invoked for the heads of the two juvenile bill-stickers, who are probably as innocent as the infant unborn. We really have cause for anxiety regarding the fate of the two lads when even the Lahore Tribune, under the present management, can talk wildly as to call the boys "dreadful criminals." Dreadful criminals, indeed! Says our contemporary:—

"These dreadful criminals, by capturing whom the police have saved the country, perhaps, from serious political disturbances, will shortly be sent up for trial. Nothing short of transportation will meet the ends of Justice. The constables have been no doubt recommended for promotion."

If constables are to be rewarded for seizing poor bill-stickers, the Police may as well be abolished.

Journalists in frontier provinces ought to cultivate stronger nerves than those that are upset at any local or tribal contests, however desperate, in out of the way places.

WE take the following from the Resolution of the Government of Bengal on the Report on Public Instruction in Bengal for the year 1891-92:

"For the last 17 years the Central Text-book Committee (which now consists of 17 members with Babu Bhudeb Mookerjee, C.I.E., as President) has been entrusted with the duty of selecting school-books out of the very large number of publications offered by private enterprise for its acceptance. It is composed of the best scholars available, all of them men of some distinction, and 16 of them Fellows of the Calcutta University. As Mr Tawney observes, their position is such as to make them entirely independent, and there is not the smallest ground for any suspicion that they ever subordinate their duty to private influence. He gives an account of the procedure followed by the Committee in respect of every book submitted to them for examination. There are six Sub-Committees for the various branches of literature: the publishers and authors generally furnish sufficient copies of their works for the use of each member of Sub-Committee concerned: each member reports on the work on certain definite points: these reports are tabulated in a book and duly considered at a meeting of the general Committee, after notice given: each book is then accepted either unanimously or subjected to further examination, and approved or rejected after fair discussion, or it may be referred back for re-examination. The proceedings of the meeting are printed and circulated and confirmed at the next meeting. The Director annually revises the list of text-books in accordance with the Committee's recommendations, and managers of schools are restricted to the use of the books named therein. It would be difficult to devise a system giving a better guarantee of fairness in original selection. At the same time, as Mr. Tawney points out, books which have been entered on the authorised list may become obsolete, or are superseded by later works, and for the purpose of revising the list of 690 passed books, a special Sub-Committee was lately appointed: their labours are not [sic] nearly concluded, and will be subject to the approval of the general Committee. The above remarks refer to their duties in connection with text-books for middle schools, but they have also undertaken to prepare similar lists of books for high and primary schools. In this connection they dealt with 476 works, approving 153 for school use, 82 for prizes and inclusion in school libraries, and declared 233 unsuitable for schools; nine were still pending. The numerous authors disappointed doubtless resent the unfavourable verdicts of the Committee. The Lieutenant-Governor is, however, satisfied that the General Committee, the Sub-Committees and the Branch Committees for Bihar and Orissa, have done a great deal of very useful work for which they deserve the thanks of Government. The only suggestion that it occurs to him to offer—and its principle is perhaps already acted upon—is that, when a book comes up for examination and discussion, a member of any Committee who is in any manner connected with the publisher or author should withdraw from the consideration of the particular work."

The book constitution may be all right. But are the disappointed authors only to blame? Have not some of the fortunate ones exceptional cause for merriment?

We take the suggestion of the Lieutenant-Governor in the concluding sentence to mean that the Committee should be free of any influence in the consideration of any book, that unprejudiced or disinterested minds should determine the eligibility or otherwise of a publication. If this rule were acted upon, there would be no cause for complaint. Yet good authors have good cause to be aggrieved. The hint thrown out in the Resolution for thus purging the Committee of its bad element is suggestive. The good opinion in the statement of the case for the Committee is nullified by the doubts by way of advice in the end.

DEVI SAHAY and Chamba Mull, of Amritsar, have just finished four fine woollen carpets for the Chicago Exhibition. The Viceroy also has just had prepared for him two very handsome carpets (26 x 20) on an ancient Persian design. This firm has not only kept up an interesting and important industry, but has had the firmness to this day to resist the temptation of cheap chemical dyes, if not also the inroads of outlandish patterns.

THE Royal Botanic Garden of Calcutta is increasing in its richness of newly introduced plants from different parts of the world, chiefly from the Royal Herbarium of Kew. From its director, the botanical garden received during the year 1891-1892 collections of plants from Florida and other places. Baron Mueller sent some beautiful Australian plants. There was also an accession from Thibet, China, Mexico and the Saharanpur Herbarium of the north-west Himalaya plants. Dr. Prain, its curator, visited the Andaman Islands, Mount Parashak, and the Khasia hills in the interest of this garden.

THE Viceroy made an important speech at Hyderabad which we publish elsewhere. It was in reply to the toast of his health proposed by the Nizam in a neat little pregnant speech. After going through the round of festivities magnificently prepared in the Nizam's dominions, the Viceroy is now at Mysore, which was reached at 4-30 P.M., on the 10th. The Maharaja attended by the Resident, Colonel Henderson, and the principal officers of State, European and Native, received the Viceroy at the railway station. The Dewan had welcomed him in advance at the Seringapatam station. After the welcome by the Maharaja at the station, the Resident introduced the principal State officials to the Viceroy. The Viceroy then drove to the Government House. The whole city was out to receive Lord Lansdowne. At the north gate of the Fort, the Municipal Commissioners were ready with an address and floral offerings. In his reply Lord Lansdowne was glad that they were able to bear witness to the general progress achieved not only in the capital but throughout the Mysore State. He concluded by saying that he would carry away with him nothing but pleasant recollections of his visit to Mysore.

TRIAL BY JURY.

THE EXPLANATION WHICH DOES NOT EXPLAIN.

AND this is your Brummagem man of blood and iron! The Civilian coup d'état has condescended to explain. Sir Charles Elliott is constitutional after the event—out of season. This is not despotism under the forms of constitutionalism. It is simply the bravery of bureaucrat careful of his skin. Fifteen days after the mischief done, the Bengal Government issued on Thursday, the 10th November, a Gazette Extraordinary containing some papers in justification of the revolutionary notification withdrawing the jury trial in 91 offences, from murder downwards, in seven districts of these Provinces. If it was necessary to attempt a vindication so soon after the perpetration of the proud administrative outrage, where was the wisdom in notifying a peremptory immediate order, sweeping away a valuable privilege of British subjects, without any previous intimation, without the ordinary decency of notice which both the law of man and God enjoins? The country was charged behind its back with culpable neglect and gross incompetence, convicted unheard and punished without an opportunity for appeal. If it was necessary, in the interest of justice and of perfect criminal administration, to suppress in seven districts the trial of the highest offences by jury, the growth of more than a quarter of a century, was it necessary, in that interest or any other, to surprise the people of a vast tract of country, one fine morning, with the withdrawal of the right? It was British statesmanship that had granted the privilege, and it was unEnglish to withdraw it in a moment as it were, after thirty years, when it had already taken root in the country. It is no palliation of the retrograde policy that the order is not thorough and wholesale. It is a vain contention that jury trial has not been abolished in Bengal. The axe has been laid at the root of the tree. The trial by jury has been abolished in the higher offences, including the capital. If a man can be hanged or transported for life without that safeguard of British justice, it is of minor, if any, importance, that he is not to be punished for marital offences unless convicted by his own peers. If that trial is a necessity in England, it is doubly so in India. The evils of the system—its inherent weaknesses—lie on the surface and are confessed; they exist in England as in India. Notwithstanding, the privilege is so valuable and valued that even the extreme abolitionists in India who declare the system a total failure, do not advise its extinction. Nor has the Bengal Government made out any case for going against the consensus of its advisers. The justificatory opinions published recommend certain modifications, if modifications are wanted. The reasons given in support of the change, are so many arguments in favor of the extension and continuance of the system. But nothing comes amiss to the arguer in favour of a foregone conclusion. Every conceivable Indian sentiment and feeling is set down as contributing to the failure of the system. Are none of these feelings and sentiments of any account? One would have thought that wise alien rulers would consider them specially valuable and worthy of respect. It is said that the Judges have declared against the trial by jury. Indeed, there are cases in which they have found that the verdict of the jury has been against the weight of evidence. But that is only the Judges' impression, and judges are neither infallible nor above human frailties. The present question itself supplies the argument against the infallibility of Judges. The High Court Judges themselves, after more than one attempt, could not agree to the opinion they should submit as that of the High Court. It is notorious, again, how evidence is manufactured in India. The present cry is that criminals escape punishment and therefore trial by jury must give way to trial by Judges. Yet, if the truth is told by the people, it will be discovered that more innocent men have been capitally or otherwise punished than criminals have escaped the administration of the bloody Indian Penal Code. The opinions published tend to confirm the general belief that the Police needs reform. The Police, on the other hand, denounce the popular trial and cry for protection against the verdicts of the jury. And Government, in its wisdom, take up the cry of the Police and take the cases out of the hands of the jury, without reforming the Police. No wonder that the country is in alarm.

It is not in official publications that the true origin of official measures is usually found, and it would be foolish perhaps in the just published papers carefully compiled for the exculpation of Government to trace the genesis of the blow on popular privileges. This compilation, steering as much as possible clear of offence, shifts the responsibility on the Supreme Government. So far as the official correspondence is laid before the public—and it is not in official communications, in numbered letters carefully copied and docketed, that the fates of individuals and states are sealed—the initiative was the Government of India's. But the Supreme Government at the worst simply instituted an inquiry. It was Sir Charles Elliott who, in reporting to the higher authority, interpreted the results into a condemnation of the Jury System as prevalent in Bengal.

The history of the Notification as disclosed in the papers published, is this. The Government of India, in considering the working of the Police and the machinery for the repression of crime, was advised that the jury system had, in some degree, favoured the escape of criminals. They, therefore, on the 31st May 1890, requested the Local Government "to consider and report how the system has worked in the Lower Provinces, what opinion is entertained as to its merits as a means for the repression of crime, and what improvements, if any, are called for in its application."

The Government of India also consulted the Chief Justice and the Judges of the High Court, who, at request, furnished a copy of their opinion to the Lieutenant-Governor.

The Bengal Government, on the 23rd June 1890, called for reports on the three points, from (1) the Commissioners of the Presidency, Burdwan, Dacca and Patna Divisions; (2) District Judges of the 24-Perganas, Hooghly, Burdwan, Murshidabad, Nadia, Dacca, and Patna; and (3) Inspector-General of Police.

The last report received by the Bengal Government from its officers, is dated the 18th February 1891.

After an examination of four months, the Lieutenant-Governor summarizes these reports in the view he takes of the question and makes his own suggestions which we publish elsewhere. They astutely make for practical Abolition. We have no space this week for the detailed views of the Government of India. We only give the conclusions. "The Governor-General in Council has no doubt that the action which His Honour proposes to take for the revision of the list of offences triable by jury in Bengal, as described in paragraph 6 above, is fully justified by the results reported." This we unhesitatingly beg leave to deny. The allegation is not borne out by the papers unless by reading them in a peculiar way. Still His Excellency is not prepared to effect any change in the law as suggested in the Bengal recommendations. "It is not clear to His Excellency in Council what advantage there would be in retaining the jury system at all, if it is to be reduced so nearly to the level of a trial with assessors; and he is reluctant to abolish the distinctive feature of trial by jury, the comparative finality of the verdict, until all other available methods for the improvement of the system have been exhausted." With these and other remarks, the Government of India "commend the subject to the consideration of the Bengal Government, and suggest that such action as the Lieutenant-Governor may consider necessary should be taken under sec. 269 of the Criminal Procedure Code."

Sir Charles Elliott reconsiders the matter for nearly two months and then decides to hurl on the country the Notification of the 20th October 1892.

The Jury system in Bengal is thus improved in Bengal by being improved out of the country as regards 91 graver offences, including murder.

The enquiry started with an initial mistake—a fundamental misconception of the function of trial by jury. The mistake and misconception was to regard that mode of adjudication as a special means for the repression of crimes. It was not as such a mode that the institution arose in its original home—it was not as such that it is prized there or anywhere else. Trial by jury is not a complement to the Police. It was not founded on the belief in its efficacy as an organ for hunting down criminals. It is rather a safeguard against the tyranny of the king and his minions—the state and its agents. It is in the interest of justice to the accused that it everywhere exists. It is more necessary in India than in England or the United States. It is an indispensable protection in this country with a notoriously corrupt Police and a timid ignorant population unable to help themselves and to claim, far less to defend, their rights. It was in this view that the truer statesmanship of the past grafted this beneficent institution of the mother country on to the judicial constitution of this country. There has been nothing to justify the cutting it down. These papers certainly disclose no sufficient ground.

That the alien authorities of a dependent country should sympathise with an alien constabulary which is one of their chief weapons of civil government, is not to be wondered at. But that they should echo the Police view of the great institution of Trial by Jury, is remarkable. A more preposterous blunder surely was never made by Englishmen than to regard that Trial as an efficient method for the punishment of criminals and the repression of crime.

That such an idea should be not nursed in secret but boldly and officially enunciated and proclaimed as the foundation of administrative policy by the Government of India, and that it should be appreciatively accepted by the Government of Bengal, proves how little our Anglo-Indian rulers are in touch with British notions. It is this unEnglishism of the initiative and of the final determination of the Government of India which fixes the whole business as a pet of the Indian Bureaucracy. We discern not in it the personality of the Viceroy himself. A Lansdowne could scarcely sympathise with a policy so retrograde. All the same, the outrage has been perpetrated. The object of having a Viceroy and Governors every five years out fresh from England, was by these griffins to check the absolutist tendencies of the acclimatised Qui Hyes and Ducks and Mulls. In allowing the old Indians the carte blanche in such a grave matter, Lord Lansdowne has impaired the raison d'être of his high office.

THE CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACT.

SURGEON-GENERAL Sir William Moore, in his paper read at the Sanitary Congress, thus expresses himself in favour of this abrogated law, with less show of reason than of feeling. "It is therefore to be hoped that the Contagious Diseases Act may be again employed and that there may be a prompt reversal of the policy imposed upon the House of Commons by certain misguided enthusiasts." His ground for the re-introduction of the Act is that venereal diseases are gradually increasing in the army of India. To make more forcible his own statement, he thus quotes from a letter of a soldier published in the Times of India of 12th June, 1891: "Day after day the evil increases; day after day the death march wails over the victims of legislative imbecility, while the triumphant influence of the bigot howls forth the neverceasing pæan 'Thank God I am not as other men are.' The Doctor's conclusion is "that its abolition was calculated to produce more evil to the soldier than all the other sanitary measures in India can compensate for."

In the annual report of the Sanitary Commissioner with the Government of India, 1890, the strength of the European troops in India is given at 69,266 and 67,823 for the years 1889 and 1890 respectively. The strength of the native troops for the same period is 128,642 and 127,746. So the number of native troops was nearly three times that of the European ones.

The same report gives a comparative statement of the years 1866 before the introduction of the C. D. Act, 1884 while it was in force, and 1889 and 1890 after it was abrogated, with respect to the European army of India affected by the disease. The venereal disease is made to include primary and secondary syphilis, gonorrhœa, &c., and the ratio is per thousand. The table is as follows:—

	1890.	1889.	1884.	1866.
Bengal ...	504	491·2	290·6	217·7
Madras ...	491·2	451·6	306·7	236·1
Bombay ...	515·5	481·1	291·6	not known.

This clearly indicates that before the introduction of the Act, the venereal disease was much less and that it gradually increased in spite of the law. It went on increasing even after the repeal. At any rate, there is nothing to show that the law had much deterrent effect.

As to the native troops,

	1890.	1889.	1884.
Bengal ...	39·7	39·8	31·3
Madras ...	48·9	33·6	22·6
Bombay ...	47·5	51·7	32·1

The proportion for the year 1866 is wanting. The ratio of secondary syphilis of the two armies has also been compared:—

	1890.	1889.	1884.
European ...	66·3	51·2	21·4
Native ...	6·9	6·3	4·8

This shows the comparative morality of the two different races placed in the same situation.

The Surgeon-General and Sanitary Commissioner with the Government of India, Mr. W. R. Rice, M.D., thus remarks on the increase of syphilis:—

"It shows that though there is an increase in the secondary syphilis ratio of native troops, it is slight, and runs at an altogether lower level than the corresponding increase in the ratio for European troops. It is, of course, but natural that the ratios of the native troops should be much lower than those of the European troops, considering the very different environment of the two bodies of men."

We are at a loss to understand why there should be so much difference between the two when they are placed within the same regulations, and we do not see why they are in different environment, as it has been taken for granted by Dr. Rice.

Syphilis is a European importation in this country. It has no Indian name. In Bhabaprakasha it is named as Feringhee disease. It was not known before the age of this book which is taken to be about two hundred years, and this name does not appear either in Charaka or Susruta. Upadansa may be mistaken for syphilis, but the symptoms as stated are quite different from those of syphilis. Syphilis has been mentioned as contagious and productive of secondary eruptions, while upadansa is not. To some extent we may make it synonymous with primary chancre, but primary may run into secondary while Upadansa does not. Rheumatic pain may follow the last mentioned disease, but there are no skin eruptions of any kind. This differentiates it from the Feringhee disease which is the present form of syphilis. It may therefore be assumed that this form of the disease was at first introduced by the Europeans and that the spread was generally due to them.

There would have been some show of reason for the re-introduction of the Act, if Sir William Moore could show that the spread of this disease rests principally with the prostitutes. But the fact is that both genders are responsible for it. It will be quite a one-sided measure if the Act is to be for women only as before. Such an enactment would be a complete failure, like the land quarantine, and it proved to be so during the time it was in force. It would be quite unreasonable, nay a moral perversion if any step were taken to re-introduce it. There are many evils which flesh is heir to, but the suppression of every one of them by legal force is quite an impossibility. Sir William Moore's statement as to the deterrent effect of this Act, is after all his own creation and is not borne out by facts. In 1866, when the Act was not in force, the disease was less and it gradually increased notwithstanding the legislative remedy against its spread since adopted. It proved on the contrary an instrument of oppression to the poor destitutes and a source of gain to the underlings of those reputed gentlemen who still advocate its cause. It not only filled the pockets of these underlings and the myrmidons of the police, but it also placed within their clutches the destitutes who dreaded them as more than infuriated beasts. It was a mighty engine in their hands who had no hesitation in crushing any woman who would not satisfy them. Its abolition has not been a legislative imbecility, but its introduction would be a legislative insanity.

A SHOCKING OUTRAGE.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Allahabad Morning Post gives the details of the recent assault in Cashmere on Miss De Bourbel, a daughter of General De Bourbel. They are most harrowing. The assailant was a menial in the household, one of the four syces who, with an Ayah, attended Madame De Bourbel's three children, their governess and another lady and child staying with the Bourbels, on an invitation to a children's party at the Munshi Bagh, Srinagar. It was when taking leave of the party they were about starting on their return journey, that the onslaught was made. It was at once a treacherous, cowardly, and a savage attack. After the final leave-taking, Miss De Bourbel called for her jacket. It was handed to her by the syce in attendance. She proceeded to put it on. Introducing herself into the piece of clothing, when she had got both arms pinioned in the sleeves, the jacket being neither on nor off—in that moment of perfect helplessness, her manly enemy made war on the poor girl. Indeed, there was nothing manly about the matter, nor was it war but assassination that was aimed at. While entangled in the sleeves, Miss De Bourbel received a blow on the head from behind. She instinctively turned round, calling out to her syce—the same who had handed her the jacket—for protection. The appeal was responded to with a blow in her face causing a wound from below the brow of the left eye, narrowly avoiding the destruction of that delicate organ, to the roots of the hair on the forehead. Discovering that her own servant was bent on murdering her, the poor lady attempted to run, but she received a blow at the back of her knees which brought her down on them. She was still in the meshes of her jacket. As soon as she could shake it off, she seized her horse's tail and, notwithstanding the blows still levelled, with more or less success, at her, rose on her feet. And now she made another effort to save herself by flight. It was in vain. The enemy soon overtook her and stabbed her in the throat, close to the wind-pipe and again in the head, cutting the scalp three inches long down to the skull. The poor thing fell, dropping like a flower torn ruthlessly asunder by a high wind. Still, like the blind wind battering away at its fallen victims, that cruel insatiate man went on delivering blow upon blow upon the devoted child, who, with a presence of mind and a pluck which heroes have not surpassed, received them on her back and shoulders until, feeling alarmed, she by desperate effort obtained a crouching position, and thus contrived to receive them on her arms. This could not go on long. Luckily, one of the other grooms entered appearance and grappled with Wahait, as the miscreant is called. Miss De Bourbel now ran in the direction of the other children all trembling with fear, but she fell down unconscious on the way, exhausted from loss of blood. By this, however, help came, and she was removed and surgical aid procured. Meanwhile, Wahait had freed himself from the grasp of his brother-groom and disappeared. Although General De Bourbel gave prompt information all round, the man has not been traced to this day.

This is a shocking outrage of the most dastardly diabolical kind. We trust the strictest measures are being taken to find the man.

THE VICEROY AT HYDERABAD.

The Nizam entertained the Viceregal party at a State Banquet at the Chowmahal Palace on the 5th November, at which there were present about 300 guests, representing the leading members of the official and non-official community at Hyderabad, Chuddergat, Secunderabad, and Bolarum. The Nizam dined with the company and proposed the health of the "Queen Empress" and afterwards of the "Viceroy" in the following terms:--

"I cannot express to your Excellency with what pleasure I rise this evening to welcome Lord and Lady Lansdowne to my capital. The historical friendship that has existed between my State and the British Government, has not been confined to mere mellifluous words, but has been tested by deeds, in which the best blood of Hyderabad has been shed in the defence of British interests; deeds too, in which British blood was spilt in the defence of the throne of their faithful ally. This friendship is a most precious legacy left to me by my ancestors, which I am not only most anxious to maintain, but to increase by continuous deeds of loyal amity. I will not detain your Lordship and Lady Lansdowne with further expressions of my happiness in welcoming you. I therefore conclude by proposing your Excellencies very good health." The toast was duly honoured.

His Excellency the Viceroy, in responding to the toast, said:-- "I have listened with the keenest interest to the forcible words in which your Highness has borne witness to the hereditary friendship by which, in past years, the Hyderabad State and the British Government have been united. That precious legacy, as your Highness has well described it, is one of which you and I are the joint trustees, and I feel sure that, on your side, as upon mine, no pains will be spared in order to keep it intact. Your Highness has welcomed Lady Lansdowne and myself to your capital in the kindest possible terms. Let me take the opportunity of saying that I have, ever since my arrival in India, looked forward to a visit to the Hyderabad State, and to making the personal acquaintance of its Ruler. Within a few days, I am not sure that I should not be correct if I were to say within a few hours of my landing in Bombay, in the autumn of 1888, I received from your Highness a very cordial invitation to Hyderabad. If I have, hitherto, been prevented from availing myself of that invitation, it has been due to engagements and calls upon my time, which it would have been difficult for me to avoid, but I may say that I have never for a moment contemplated allowing my term of office to come to a close before I had complied with the wish which your Highness had so kindly expressed. I desired to come here not only on account of the personal regard which I feel for your Highness, but also because, believing as I do that it is one of the duties of the Queen's representative in India to see something of the principal States which form a part of her Indian Empire, I should certainly have felt that duty had been very incompletely performed so long as I omitted to accord to this State that recognition which is implied in a visit from the Viceroy. I dwell upon this consideration because I yield to none of my predecessors in my desire to treat, with the respect which is due to them, the Indian States in subordinate alliance with her Majesty the Queen-Empress. I have always recognized the advantages of the arrangement under which a considerable portion of the Indian Empire continues to be governed by its hereditary rulers and to be subject to forms of administration, differing to a considerable extent from our own, but inspired by our proximity and stimulated by our example. No one would be more averse than I should be to any changes in our relations with the Native States inconsistent with the measure of local autonomy which they now enjoy. It is because I entertain these feelings so strongly, that I am anxious to see the Government of these States carried out upon sound principles, and in such a manner as to place it beyond the power of any one to say that the Government of India, in arresting, as it has striven to arrest, the process by which the greater part of the territories of India were passing under the direct rule of the Crown, has shown itself unmindful of the welfare of the millions of people who still remain outside the limits of British India. Nowhere is it more important that the government of an Indian State by an Indian Ruler should be successful than it is at Hyderabad. His Highness the Nizam is Ruler over an area of 100,000 square miles and a population of over eleven millions of human beings. It is, perhaps, instructive, in order to give ourselves a correct idea of the importance of the State, to recall the fact that its population is about five times that of the kingdom of Denmark, and considerably more than double the population of the Netherlands, that of Norway and Sweden, and that of Turkey in Europe, while it is also considerably more than double that of the whole of the great island continent of Australia, and of that of the vast Dominion of Canada in which I had, for some years, the honor of representing her Majesty. His Highness's territories comprise some of the richest districts in natural resources of any in India, and it is not too much to say that, given a Government founded upon justice and personal security, there is no reason why the State should not be what his Highness, I am sure, desires it to be--an exemplar to the rest of India. And if it be true to say this of the State, I think I am justified in adding that there is no Ruler whom, upon personal grounds, the Government of India is more desirous of supporting and encouraging in the discharge of his onerous duties than his Highness the Nizam. I have had the advantage of meeting several of those who have had official relations with his Highness, and they are all agreed in bearing witness to the personal qualities which have attracted to him the sympathy and good will of those with whom he has been brought into contact. It is satisfactory to know that he has, on more than one occasion, shown by his acts that he is sincerely anxious to do his duty as the ruler of this important State. I may refer, in illustration of my meaning, to the liberality with which the support of the State has been given to such useful measures as the improvement of the water-supply of Secunderabad, and to the public spirit shown by his Highness in connection with the appointment of the Chloroform Commission, so ably presided over by Surgeon-Lieutenant-Colonel Lawrie--an enquiry which has already produced scientific results of importance, and which shows that his Highness is prepared to recognise the claims of a philanthropy transcending the limits of his own possessions. His Highness is, however, only at the beginning of his career as a Ruler. Those who have watched over its inception and are now awaiting its development, will be the first to admit that during the first years of his rulership it was natural, and in accordance with the dictates of prudence, that he should proceed cautiously and familiarise himself with the circumstances of his people before taking more vigorous strides along the path of reform. We may, however, be permitted to look forward to the time when his ideas having been matured, he will be in a position to impress them upon others, and to undertake measures which will leave their mark upon the State and entitle him to the lasting gratitude of his subjects. I have the best reasons for knowing that his Highness has lately bestowed much earnest thought upon the position and affairs of his State, and that our expectations are no likely to be disappointed. I believe I am right in saying that his Highness was advised, at the time of his accession, by one of my predecessors to look carefully to his finances. That was a very sound piece of advice, not because large cash balances or vast hoards of treasure are in themselves productive of good, but because a solvent exchequer is the indispensable condition of fruitful and beneficent administration. No Government, from the Government of India downwards, can succeed unless its liabilities are punctually fulfilled, unless it is able to remunerate adequately the services of those whom it employs, and unless it can devote an adequate part of its finances to the development of the natural resources of the country. But this is not all. It is one of the misfortunes to which we are exposed in India, that income derived from land revenue is, owing to the climatic conditions of the country, and to other causes, always liable to serious fluctuations. Your Highness's State is no exception to the rule. This is a point which your Highness and your advisers cannot, any more than the Government of India, afford to lose sight of. It is a fact which obliges you, as it does us, to regulate your expenditure in such a manner as to ensure one year with another, a reasonable margin of income over expenditure. The temptation to which we are all exposed under such conditions, is that of allowing expenditure to rise to the level of the full revenue of the best and most prosperous years. I need not dwell upon the perils by which such a policy must be attended. The expenditure of the Hyderabad State amounts to a very large sum. Whether that sum, in view of the elements of uncertainty in the revenue, is in excess of what the State can afford, or whether the whole of it is expended in the best possible manner, are questions which merit, and which are, I know, receiving the earnest consideration of your Highness. I have heard with the greatest satisfaction that your Highness has in contemplation considerable reforms in the military administration of the State. Your Highness's decision to take up this question is interesting to me for several reasons, and for one reason in particular. We are all aware that several of the Indian States have placed a portion of their forces under special discipline for purposes of Imperial defence. Now I believe I am right in saying that it was from Hyderabad that the first offer of a contribution towards the defences of the empire proceeded, and I am aware that comments have been made upon the fact that although this was the case, nothing real has yet been done by Hyderabad in this direction. It has, I believe, been supposed in some quarters that the fault lay with the Government of India, and in others that it lay with the Hyderabad State. Now I am glad to have this opportunity of stating publicly that I do not believe that it has ever been in your Highness's contemplation to recede from the offer which you made in 1887—an offer which, let me say, undoubtedly produced a very considerable effect upon other Indian States. But I am able to go further and to say that since my arrival here, your Highness spontaneously, and without any reference to the subject from me, has made me an unconditional offer of a regiment of cavalry, specially selected from your existing troops, for purposes of Imperial defence, an offer which your Highness is ready to supplement after a suitable interval of time by the contribution of a second regiment. There is no mystery whatever as to the circumstances, in consequence of which no action has yet been taken in connection with this matter. I have on several occasions publicly explained the policy of the Government of India with regard to these Imperial Service troops. We found that there were certain States in which it was possible to substitute, for a portion of the State troops, a body of men recruited within the State and officered by natives of the State, so well trained, so thoroughly equipped and under such a good discipline, as to render them fit to take their place, in time of war, alongside of our own battalions. Such a substitution was clearly of advantage both to the State concerned and to the Government of India. It was of advantage to the Government of India, which obtained a small addition to the forces available for mobilisation in time of war; it was also of advantage to the State concerned, because an opportunity was afforded for getting rid of troops who were often of very indifferent quality, in spite of the expense involved in their maintenance, and replacing them by properly trained and disciplined soldiers. In the Hyderabad State, however, the position was unlike that obtaining in any other State. In the first place, we had the fact that that distinguished corps, the Hyderabad Contingent, as well as the Secunderabad force, are practically maintained at his Highness's expense; and in the next place we had to consider that his Highness's military forces already amounted to more than 30,000 men, involving a military budget of some 70 lakhs of rupees. Of this large sum no less than 52 lakhs is, I understand, spent upon the irregular troops. Now in the face of these circumstances, and while this large body of comparatively untrained and indifferently disciplined soldiers continued to be maintained at the expense of the State—to say nothing of the large bodies of men included in the ranks of the regular army—the Government of India did not feel justified in encouraging your Highness to add still further to your military expenditure by providing additional troops for Imperial defences. The only condition on which, in view of what I have just said, we could accept an Imperial Service corps from Hyderabad, was that its creation should be coupled with a sufficient reduction of the military expenditure already incurred. That is, I understand, for all practical purposes the very policy which, after giving the matter your personal consideration, your Highness has determined to adopt. It is in your contemplation that your Imperial Service cavalry should be selected from the existing force of that arm, and the change will, I hope, be carried out in such a way as to occasion no additional expense to the State, which will, I trust, gain in the reductions which it is proposed to effect what it will lose by the increased charges incurred on account of the new cavalry regiment. I do not, of course, for a moment intend to suggest that such reductions should be carried out in a sudden and violent manner, and without due regard for the interests of those concerned. The matter is one requiring careful treatment, and the methods to be adopted should, if sure, be gradual and cautious in their operation. I have spoken with absolute frankness upon this subject, because I am most anxious that there should be no misconception as to your Highness's position and ours with regard to the formation of a Hyderabad Imperial Service corps, and next, because I believe that whether such a corps is to be formed or not, the question of the military expenditure incurred in your Highness's State is one which your Highness is doing well to examine carefully. What is given to superfluous military expenditure is taken away from such objects as the improvement of communications, the development of railways, the extension of irrigation works, and other forms of expenditure, which are reproductive and which will add to the well-being of your Highness's subjects and to the wealth and reputation of the State. I rejoice to know that these matters are already engaging your Highness's attention, and that it is therefore not necessary that I should press them upon your consideration. In dealing with them your Highness may count upon the support of the Government of India and upon the assistance and advice of the British Resident. You will find in Mr. Plowden a sagacious and trustworthy counsellor, who will not fail to merit your confidence. It has fallen to my lot on two occasions to select a British Resident for the Hyderabad State, the late, Resident Sir D. Fitzpatrick and Mr. Plowden. Your Highness will remember that at the time of the appointment of the former he held the high office of Chief Commissioner of Assam; but so anxious was I to place here a British officer whose position and antecedents would entitle him to your confidence and respect, that I did not hesitate to transfer Sir Dennis Fitzpatrick from his important charge, in order to bring him here. Now that he has been removed to the distinguished position which he is at present filling, as head of the Punjab Government, he has been replaced by a gentleman who has been selected, after the most careful consideration, as being specially fitted for the post. He has had experience of a varied and exceptional character, both in the Secretariat of the Government of India, in important Indian States, and as a local administrator: he enjoys the unstinted confidence of the Government of India, and I know that nothing will give him greater satisfaction than to feel that he is able to assist your Highness in the discharge of the arduous duties which fall to your lot as the Ruler of this important State.

WITHDRAWAL OF THE JURY TRIAL.

No. 122J—D, dated Darjeeling, the 22nd June 1891.

From—Sir John Edgar, K. C. I. E., C.S.I., Chief Secretary to the Govt. of Bengal,

To—The Secretary to the Government of India, Home Department

I am directed to acknowledge your letter No. 742, dated the 31st May 1890, asking the Lieutenant-Governor to report how the jury system has worked in the Lower Provinces, what opinion is entertained as to its merits as a means of repression of crime, and what improvements, if any, are called for in its application.

2. This Government has consulted the Sessions Judges and the District Officers of the districts in which the system is in force, as well as the Commissioners of the Divisions in which these districts are situated, and the Inspector-General of Police. Copies of the reports received are enclosed. The Lieutenant-Governor has also considered the seven minutes of the Judges of the High Court, which were forwarded to you with the Registrar's letter No. 540 of the 9th February 1891.

3. It will be seen from the reports and the minutes of the Judges of the High Court above referred to, that the majority of the most experienced Judges and officers consulted emphatically condemn the system as at present worked in Bengal, and that all are of opinion that it is capable of improvement. The Chief Justice, though unwilling to express any opinion unfavourable to the existence of the system, thinks that an extension of the right of appeal from the verdicts of juries is desirable. Mr. Justice Tottenham is of opinion that, looking at the system as a whole, the results as tested by figures are not satisfactory, and that the system should be reduced nearer to the level of a trial by assessors only. Messrs. Prinsep, Wilson, Pigot and Macpherson state that the system has not been altogether successful in its results and that improvement is necessary. Messrs. Amir Ali and O'Kinealy write that the system has not satisfactorily answered the object for which it was devised; that in cases of homicide even when the crime is of an atrocious character, Indian jurors are averse from bringing in a verdict which would subject the accused to capital punishment; that in other cases, e.g. dacoity, rape, &c., race-feelings and popular prejudices play a great part, with the result that gross miscarriage of justice has often been occasioned by trials by jury; that in certain kinds of cases conviction, in others quittal, is a foregone conclusion; and that the system of trial by jury requires considerable improvement in its application, in order to become an efficient agency in the investigation of facts. Mr. Justice Trevelyan thinks improvement necessary in allowing appeal as of right and in compelling the Judge to refer to the High Court cases in which he differs from the jury. Messrs. Norris, Ghose and Banerjee, quoting the same returns as Mr. Justice Tottenham, say that they venture to think the facts and figures warrant their saying that the system has worked well on the whole, and that the results of their experience lead them to the same conclusion, but that some of the references which have come before them have disclosed cases of verdicts which they could not but think were opposed to the weight of the evidence. Mr. Justice Beverley thinks that although the system in the mufassal has worked fairly well on the whole, instances of wrong verdicts occasionally occur, especially in certain classes of cases. The four Divisional Commissioners consulted are entirely opposed to the system. The Commissioners of the Presidency and Burdwan Divisions would abolish it altogether, and the Commissioner of Dacca would substitute assessors for jurors. The Commissioner of Patna states that he concurs with the general opinion that the system is not suited to the country. The Inspector-General of Police thinks that it is not worth continuing the system even under restrictions. Of the nine Sessions Judges consulted, seven pronounce trial by jury to have been a failure. Of the two Judges who express themselves favourably of the institution, one states that it is difficult to get juries to convict in capital cases, whereas there is a tendency to convict old offenders and dacoits on the slenderest evidence; and the other says that many a verdict of acquittal is given simply because the jury consider that the prisoner has suffered sufficiently before trial, and because they are afraid that a verdict of guilty will be followed by a punishment out of all proportion to the offence. None of the Magistrates of jury districts—except the Magistrate of the 24-Parganas—speak at all favourably of trial by jury: some of these officers express themselves very strongly against it: thus Mr. Romesh Chunder Dutt, Magistrate of Burdwan, writes: "During the short time I have been in Burdwan, the jury system has worked in a manner most detrimental to the interests of justice and the repression of crime."

4. The statistics before Government, which show the results of jury trials, are of great significance. In an article published in the January number of the Calcutta Review for 1888, Mr. Beighton, now Judge of Dacca, points out that of 1,060 jury trials in Bengal in the four years 1882-85, the Sessions Judge dissented in 249 cases, or 23·5 per cent. From the minutes of Mr. Justice Tottenham and Messrs. Norris, Ghose and Bannerjee, it appears that of the 1,708 cases tried by jury in Bengal and Assam in the five years 1885-89, the Sessions Judge disapproved of the verdicts in 325 cases, or about 20 per cent., and referred 114 cases, or 6·7 per cent., to the High Court, who set aside the verdicts in 63 cases, or 3·6 per cent. A very remarkable fact is stated in Mr. Justice Prinsep's Minute, that six cases were referred from five different districts during the last vacation, and that Mr. Justice Wilson and he refused to accept the findings of the juries in any of them, holding that "in none of these cases could there be any doubt that the jury obstinately refused to commit of murder against the clearest evidence." The Officiating Judge of Dacca shows that in the years 1887, 1888 and 1889, the Sessions Judge of that district disagreed in part or whole with the findings in one in three of the 124 cases tried by jury, but he only ventured to refer 12 of these, in seven of which the High Court reversed the verdicts given. The Commissioner of Dacca refers to a scandalous case tried in 1884 in the Dacca district, and notices four cases in 1888 in which the High Court set aside the findings of the juries. In Nadiya, where the system has not been so condemned as elsewhere, the Sessions Judge disagreed in 177 or 11·3 per cent. out of 1,563 cases tried since 1862. A large number of figures has been given showing the proportions of acquittals and convictions by juries, as compared with acquittals and convictions in non-jury districts; but the Lieutenant-Governor does not desire to lay much weight upon these. He thinks the verdicts should be judged by the proportion of cases in which the Sessions Judges have dissented or the High Court interfered, and in considering such cases, it is necessary to bear in mind the reverence with which the system of trial by jury is regarded in England, and the consequent bias which exists in the minds of English Judges against disagreeing with the verdicts of juries. This feeling is given expression to in the ruling of the Calcutta High Court in the case of Sham Bagdi, 20 W. R. 74, as follows:—"If the High Court is to interfere in every case of doubt in any case in which it may with propriety be said that the evidence would have warranted a different verdict, then it must be held that trial by jury is absolutely at an end." Taking this in consideration, the figures given above are much more telling than they at first appear.

5. A careful consideration of the opinions and figures now obtained leaves no doubt in Sir Charles Elliott's mind of the failure of the jury system in these Provinces in its present shape. It would be scarcely possible to obtain opinions from a large number of men more nearly approaching to unanimity than is the condemnation of the jury system in Bengal contained in the reports and minutes above referred to; and it appears to the Lieutenant-Governor that there can be no more convincing proof of its failure than this. His Honour thinks that if the result could have been foreseen, no advocate would have been found for the introduction of this Western institution into India. But as it has been introduced, and is prized as a rudimentary beginning of giving power to the people, Sir Charles Elliott deems it inadvisable on political grounds that it should be abolished altogether, but he would take early steps to make such changes in its working as seem best calculated to limit the injury to justice which it entails.

6. All the Judges of the High Court are agreed upon one point, viz., that some extension of the right of appeal should be made.

Messrs. Prinsep, Wilson, Pigot, and Macpherson recommend that there should be an appeal on the facts, at least against a verdict which is not a unanimous verdict, whether it be for a conviction or not. This is much the same as a suggestion made by Messrs. Norris, Ghose, and Bannerjee, and none of the other Judges seem opposed to it. The Lieutenant-Governor accepts with a slight modification the recommendation on this point in Mr. Justice Prinsep's minute, and would amend the law so as to provide that there should be an appeal on the facts whenever the jury is not unanimous, unless the Judge records his agreement with the majority.

7. Still more important is the proposal that section 307 of the Criminal Procedure Code should be amended so as to make it incumbent on the Sessions Judge to refer to the High Court every case in which he differs in opinion from a jury. This is the opinion of Messrs. Prinsep, Wilson, Pigot, Macpherson, Trevelyan and Beverley. There can be little doubt that if the reference in such cases were made obligatory by the law, one effect would be to counteract the tendency of the High Court "to refuse to interfere with verdicts unless satisfied that they were altogether perverse or otherwise insupportable." These are the words of Mr. Justice Tottenham; and Mr. Prinsep's minute, which is concurred in by three more High Court Judges, shows that the practice of the High Court in dealing with references is still unsettled, that the uncertainty prevents Sessions Judges from referring cases in which they think that the verdicts are contrary to the weight of the evidence, and that consequently failures of justice not unfrequently occur. Sir Charles Elliott entirely agrees to make references compulsory in all such cases.

8. It has also been suggested by several of the most experienced Sessions Judges that section 303 of the Criminal Procedure Code should be altered so as to make it incumbent upon the Judge to ascertain and record fully the reasons of the jury for their verdict. It is pointed out that as long as the right of interference with a verdict exists, the reasons which guide a jury to a certain finding are among the most important elements in arriving at a conclusion whether a verdict is reasonable or not. His Honour is disposed to favour the proposal, because it is a simple but reasonable way of enabling the Judge to be sure that he ought to disagree with the jury.

9. Several of the Hon'ble Judges and the great majority of the officers consulted are of opinion that the system of trial by jury in Bengal is particularly unfitted for certain classes of cases, especially those relating to murder. Sir Charles Elliott is aware that the power of withdrawing classes of offences from juries rests with the Local Government; but as the Government of India has referred the question specially for the Lieutenant-Governor's opinion he deems it better to submit his views, and not to give effect to them on his own authority. His Honour would withdraw the whole of Chapter VIII of the Indian Penal Code, offences relating to public tranquillity, the whole of Chapter XVI, offences against the human body, except those triable by jury in the North-Western Provinces, viz., kidnapping, abduction, and rape, and also the whole of Chapter XVIII, offences relating to documents and trade-marks. He would leave to juries all Chapter XVII, offences relating to property, and would add to their power Chapter XX, offences relating to marriage. Sir Charles Elliott considers the evidence adduced clearly points to the necessity of making the withdrawals proposed.

10. A great deal has been said by Sessions Judges and local officers concerning the personnel of jurors, and suggestions have been made that some qualifications as to property, education, and respectability, should be laid down by law. The Lieutenant-Governor conceives that it is possible that suitable men have not been selected for jurors in many districts; but His Honour thinks that this is due to the failure of the Judges and of the other officers associated with them under section 321 of the Criminal Procedure Code, to take care that only qualified persons are entered in the jury lists prepared by them, and he proposes to impress strongly on all Judges in jury districts that under the law they are primarily responsible in this matter. In some districts where suitable men are difficult to obtain the local Government might with advantage fix the number of jurymen at a trial at three instead of five as at present. This matter will be separately considered. His Honour thinks it neither necessary nor desirable to reserve any class of cases for special jurors, especially if capital cases are no longer to be triable by jury. Careful calculations should be made of the number of jurymen likely to be required in a jury district every year, and care should be taken that the most suitable men up to that number are entered in the lists. The Lieutenant-Governor would raise the limit of age to 25, but cannot see his way to advising that any rules as to qualifications should be prescribed by law.

11. Sir Charles Elliott hopes that if the various improvements suggested in this letter are adopted, the almost universal complaints of failures of justice in some of the most serious cases under the criminal law will cease, and that this reform will be effected without much outcry from the educated classes.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

YESTERDAY COMES NOT.

I HAD a diamond ring,
Radiant with love's bright promise long ago;
But ah! it could not bring
Fulfilment—love and life alike lay low!

I gave it to a friend—
Its sparkle seemed so mocking 'mid my tears—
A tried and faithful friend,
And lived a dim gray life through lonesome years.

Then lately hope began
To throb within me feebly once again;
Each morrow had its plan,
And memory was not altogether pain.

And with this new-found life
Came a great longing for the radiant ring;
My fancies aye were rife
With what of olden joy it yet might bring.

My friend the wish had guessed,
And sent it back, right generous, to me.
How shall I tell the rest?
Look at my hands; their story you may see!

With widow's toil rough grown,
The ring could clasp my finger now no more;
Ah, youth and joy have flown!
And earth can never hopes once lost restore!

The past comes never back!
Thank Heaven for the old glamour—though 'tis o'er—
Something the days to come must lack;
The ring will fit the finger nevermore!

HYACINTH.

LOVE'S EXCHANGE.

THERE is a pleasant void within my breast—
It is the place where once my heart did dwell
Ere thou hadst stolen it from its peaceful rest
By witchcraft-goodness and by beauty-spell.
Restore it not, but let my blissful loss
Be sweet remembrance of my pilfering fair;
I would esteem it as but less than dross
If thou returned it from thy bosom's care.
Mayhap I did abet thee in the deed—
My heart without thee were an empty toy;
I will not chide if thou but hear me plead,
O give me thine, and great will be my joy.
Or if, alas, thy heart be given away,
Grant mine a tomb where thine so lately lay.

MISSED.

A SILENCE like the hush of fear
Fills all the house this summer day;
Familiar accents startle near,
Or fade in murmurs far away.

And breaking as from distant gloom,
A face comes painted on the air;
A presence walks the haunted room,
Or sits within the vacant chair.

The lightest wind that shakes the glass,
The sound that stirs awhile the street,
Seems to the listening heart, alas!
Like footfall of beloved feet.

And every object that I feel
Seems charged by some enchanter's wand,
And keen the dizzy senses thrill,
As with the touch of spirit hand.

At morning in the rosy flush,
At noontide in the fiery glow,
At evening in the golden hush,
At night as pass the minutes slow,

A form beloved comes again;
A voice beside me seems to start,
While eager fancies fill the brain,
And eager passions hold the heart.

NIGHT.

DARK shadow 'twixt to-morrow morn and me!—
If but a shadow, my heart shrinks from thee;
If but a heavy gloom on vale and height;
If but a black shroud for the sun's sweet light,
Earth like his widow lying love-forgot—
O Night, I love thee not!

If but a passage to the coming day;
If but a waiting for the morning ray;
If but a silence, when the solemn hush
Is moved, as if the wings of angels rush
Over the babes with a cradle-song—
O Night, I did thee wrong!

If but a respite from the toil of day;
If but a pause, to ponder on the way;
If but a time to shut the eyelids tight,
Wresting with evil in a deadly fight;
If but a pillow where white wings descend—
O Night, thou art my friend!

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given, any other being unnecessary and likely to cause confusion.

If but a time of promise of the Far ;
 If but a waiting for the morning star ;
 If but dreams brightening of a gorgeous morn,
 Where life and love and joy are newly born ;
 If but a yearning for eternal light—
 Thou teachest well, O Night !

WEEKLYANA.

THERE arrived from Aden at the Bombay harbour on the 4th instant the Saida, an Austrian man-of-war, under the command of Captain Sachs. She had left Pola on the 1st September on a cruise in the Mediterranean. She has on board eleven big and four small guns, and a complement of 368 men, all told. She was to coal at Bombay and remain there for a fortnight and then to visit Colombo, Calcutta, Singapore, Bangkok, Java, Australia, New Zealand, Japan, China, &c., before returning to Pola. On arrival at Bombay, she fired a salute of 21 guns which compliment was returned from the Saluting Battery. She had a visit from the German Consul who was received with a salute of nine guns.

WE read lately in an Overland paper :—

"Among the Asiatics studying at the University of Oxford is a native of Afghanistan named Fida Mohammed Khan. He is the only Afghan in England, and intends to become a barrister before returning to his country. The Ameer takes an interest in Mr. Fida Mohammed Khan, and wishes, the Manchester Guardian states, to secure his services on the completion of his studies in Europe."

What will he do with it? one involuntarily asks. What can the Amir want an English barrister for? A gunner would be more to his purpose.

THE sacred fire brought by the Parsis to India is preserved at Udwarda, now enshrined in a temple, the gift of Sir Dinshaw Manockjee Petit, Bart. They have just added to the temple a portrait of that charitable gentleman at a cost of Rs. 1,628 subscribed by his friends and admirers. The portrait was unveiled by the High Priest in the presence of all the Parsis of Udwarda and a few from Bombay. There was a jassan or thanksgiving ceremony in the morning. The Priest then descanted on the many charities of Sir Dinshaw. The ceremony concluded with a special prayer for the health of the benefactor, the whole assembly standing. Sir Dinshaw was present and thanked the assembly for their good wishes and was specially thankful to God for enabling him to do good to his community.

THE Bombay papers record the death of a Parsi lady, by name Avabai, of Barkote Mahla, at the age of 105 years in full possession of her senses. She was not alone long-lived of her family though she beat all previous record. Several of her paternal ancestors were centurians at their death, her paternal grandmother being an ultracenturian, having attained the age of 103 years. The deceased leaves a large family, the eldest of whom, her eldest daughter, is 85 years of age.

THE Hindoo Patriot would send away Sir Charles Elliott from Bengal on six months' leave. The Times of India now transports him from Bengal, or at least alters the geography of the Province. Under the head of N.-W. Provinces and Punjab, our Bombay contemporary gives the following information :—

"The sum of Rs. 12,000 has been given at Hazaribagh by the local Zemindars for the Dufferin Fund, to celebrate Sir Charles Elliott's visit, Raja Ram Narain Singh, of Ramghur, having given Rs. 5,000. The town was illuminated on the evening of the 7th. His Honor and party left for Ranchee on the 8th."

THE Madras Times writes :—

"In anticipation of the visit of H. E. the Governor to Madura, the Rajah of Ramnad purchased a house in that station for some Rs. 20,000, which he furnished for his Excellency's reception, through Messrs. Oakes & Co., at a cost of some Rs. 30,000, having entered into arrangements also with Messrs. D'Angelis & Co., for supplying his Excellency's table. Almost at the last moment, however, a person at variance with the Rajah laid a criminal charge against him in the Madura Court, whereupon Mr. Turner, the Collector, wired to the Governor, announcing this fact. His Excellency at once replied, informing the Collector that, under the circumstances, he must decline to accept the hospitality of the Rajah of Ramnad."

ACCORDING to the Jewish Era, the quarterly organ of the Chicago Hebrew Mission,

"up to 1884 only 303 Jews were permitted to live in Jerusalem. Since this one restriction after another has been removed, and the last four or five years they have been literally flocking to the old city and land. The number now at the city is estimated at 30,000, and in the land 70,000. This is greater than the number that returned from the Babylonian captivity."

WHILE our Pran Nath Saraswatis are dying within their thirties, in Europe men at that age pass from youth to manhood. Talk of dying in the thirties! why men are hale and hearty at eighty and upwards! Here is a string of veteran working bees still laying in honey for the Hive :—

"Kossouth, who has just celebrated his 90th year, is still busy on his memoirs, and is also preparing a collected edition of his works. M. de Lesseps, who is yet hale and strong, is 87. Marshal MacMahon, Duke of Magenta and ex-President of France, is a year older than Mr. Gladstone and has also just written his reminiscences. Pope Leo XIII. is 83, and is one of the busiest and most powerful statesmen in Europe. Even Belgium has its G. O. M. in the person of the veteran Parliamentarian M. Frere Orban, who has just entered his 81st year."

WE read :—

"Many of the Kulu people aver that a cobra only lives, in the shape of a cobra, for twelve years. On its twelfth birthday it ceases to be a snake, and is transformed by some mystic process that they do not profess to explain, into a partridge—a modern version of the pterodactyl."

WE had in Bengal Mrs. Bellie, the Judge of Rajshahi. They have in the Hyderabad Residency Mrs. Bosanquet, Second Assistant to the Resident. The Advocate of India of the 14th November in its Hyderabad News column reports—

"The Resident and his staff, with the exception of Mrs. Bosanquet Second Assistant, have removed from Chudderghaut to Bolarum."

HERE is news of matrimony in old Fogeydom. Near Feltham, Twickenham, there was married David Macnamara aged 78 to Rebecca Marling of the age of 72 years. Both had been in the service of the Queen. Macnamara is a pensioner who had served in the Inniskilling Dragoons 60 years ago, and is quite hale and hearty. The bride had had three husbands in succession and was half a century ago employed in the kitchen at Windsor Castle. The bridesmaids were three maiden relatives of the ages respectively of 60, 68 and 70. The best man was a brother of the bridegroom aged 75, and an octogenarian priest united the couple. These seven counted between themselves as many as 503 years.

RECENTLY the Secretary of State reminded the Government of India of excessive military expenditure thus :—

"The extreme importance of the subject of exchange renders it necessary that the utmost economy should be exercised in every branch of the service, and I desire especially to enforce this view with reference to the military expenditure. While the established strength of the army has remained practically unchanged since the budget of 1887-88, the charges for the effective service are now higher than at that date by Rs 9,38,400 in India, and by £511,200 in England; and, including exchange, the net payments for the army, effective and non-effective together, now amount to more than 24 per cent. of the total net revenues of India. In my despatch of the 9th July, 1891, I drew the attention of your Government to the great increase which had taken place in recent years in the military expenditure; and I have again to beg that your earnest attention may be given to this subject."

Accordingly, the Government of India direct that

"the expenditure on military services generally, shall be carefully considered in detail by Governments and Departments concerned, and that early reports shall be furnished as to what measures of reduction are practicable, and the amounts involved therein. The Governor-General in Council also desires that no proposals involving increased military expenditure shall be submitted for consideration, unless it can be clearly demonstrated that the measures are of primary importance in improving the efficiency of the army for war."

ACCORDING to the Civil and Military Gazette :—

"The Ameer appears to have been in fear of a general Shia insurrection owing to his proclamations in which the Shias were denounced as infidels; for he has been recalling them, and purposes, it is stated, to issue another proclamation contradicting the former and explaining that only Hazara rebels were referred to as 'infidels.' It is also believed to have been through fear of Shia disturbances in Cabul that the Ameer caused certain Shia officers condemned to death for cowardice and misconduct in the Hazara campaign to be brought to Paghman to be executed. The feeling of the Shias generally throughout Afghanistan is such that any spark might kindle a widespread revolt."

MOULVI Mahomed Yousuff Khan Bahadur, the wellknown Pleader of the Calcutta High Court, has been robbed of his gold lota or lotia. It was a sort of jug like our Hindu garon, weighing about 2 seers of pure gold, and valued at upwards of Rs. 4,000. The Khan Bahadur took his potations out of this pot and out of this pot only. We mean no offence, and a Persian and Arabic scholar will forgive the alliteration. The pot, deposited in a box, was of course taken upstairs and brought downstairs, and carried about in his landau or brougham wherever he went. It did not strike our Moulvi, although a lawyer, that his precious goblet was a source of infinite temptation to many. Probably, as a good Mussulman his faith in predestination supported him in his unconcern. Thus years passed away, confirming his trustfulness, when one evening a fortnight ago, on opening the box, he discovered that the gold jug had disappeared and a piece of wood lying in its stead.

There was a great commotion. The Police were at once called in, and on their arrival, the gate of the Khan Bahadur's castle was closed, egress and ingress being completely stopped, and a search made throughout the extensive place. The premises were watched the whole night as well as the whole of the next day, servants were repeatedly examined and cross-examined, but no trace of the missing article could be discovered. One of the servants, who was suspected from having been employed in taking upstairs and bringing down the precious box, and was in the hands of the Police, was discovered the following day to have a knife wound in his throat. This was in a lumber-room within the premises. He charged the police with striking him with a knife, whilst the police accused him with attempting to commit suicide. He was immediately removed to hospital. It is still a mystery why and how he was wounded.

In connection with this case, we have heard that the Khan Bahadur habitually dines off golden plate, and that his food is cooked in silver pots and pans. What superb *pilau*s and kabobs must our Lucullus have! And what must be the pay of his cook and abdar and hooka-burdar? Perhaps, any pot-luck would be delicious taken off gold. We know that many wealthy noblemen and princes have golden dinner sets, but these are displayed on special and festive occasions. For instance, we read in the European papers that the Royal relatives of the King of Greece, recently presented him with a service of gold plate on the occasion of his silver wedding. But this is the first time that we have come across a native gentleman using golden services in his every day life. It is something to have a man of such elevated tastes in our society.

While so many in this country are talking of gold and discussing its advantages as a medium, Mr. Yousuff has given a practical example of appreciation of the more precious metal and contempt for the "mean white." He has grappled valiantly with the Currency Question, anticipating the state solution, as it were.

NOTES & LEADERETTES

with
OUR OWN NEWS.

THE Governor of Madras is on tour. He has now been to the extreme South. We hope he will with his own eyes realise the importance of the railway extension from Madura to the island of Rameswaram. This section is a natural complement—the proper completion—of the grand system of triangulation of India. Under a national Government, that line would have long since been taken up and opened, if only in deference to the religious feeling of the Hindus who have one of their principal shrines situated in the channel between India and Ceylon, where they proceed in vast numbers every year for the purification of their sins and the salvation of their souls.

LEAVE and free passage to Marseilles have been granted to Lieutenant-Humfrey of the 12th Cavalry, who being bitten by a mad-dog, applied to go to Paris to place himself under the treatment of Mr. Pasteur?

THERE is no end to the enormities of Brahmanism. There is scarcely an evil in Indian society which has not been ascribed by one European writer or another to the influence of those demons incarnate the Brahmins. Still there remained some few exceptions. These, however, are being swept away, one after another. At length, it is proclaimed that Brahmanism and the Brahmins have been the cause of the decline of arts and the industrial fall of India. The credit of this discovery belongs to Mr. Gostling, who announced it in his address as President of the Industrial Conference at Poona.

THE Calcutta correspondent of the Times places Mr. Conway's ascent of the Himalayas near Hunza to be the highest that has been recorded. He climbed up to 23,000 feet above the level of the sea, while Mr. Schlagintweit could accomplish only 22,230 feet. We believe Babu Sarat Chandra Das attained to not less a height in the Himalayas during his journey from Darjeeling towards Thibet.

WE regret to record the death of Rai Bahadur Babu Juggadanund Mookerjee, junior Government Pleader, High Court. He is one of the victims of the late eclipse, having joined the concourse of bathers at Benares on the occasion. He died on Thursday, of smallpox caught in the Holy City. He was brought down to Calcutta a week before he expired. He was a well known, not to say prominent, member of Calcutta native society. One of his chief achievements was to invite and fitte the Viceroy. He will always be remembered as the only native whom the Prince of Wales visited. But he got nothing by these ruinous services of loyalty, except the envy and abuse of his countrymen.

THE Bombay Tramway Company sued an Englishman Mr. Soundy for defamation for having written to the papers that the Company carried lepers. Mr. Justice Farran has decreed the suit against the defendant for Rs. 50 but without costs. The Judge holds that the defendant was justified in the exercise of his right as an Englishman in writing to the newspapers in reference to a grievance, which had been proved. At the same time, he thought that it was also proved that the Company had not voluntarily allowed such people to ride. The Judge further held that the publication of the letters had done some good, and that it would be cruel to saddle the defendant with the costs of the plaintiff. The decision is too nice. Nor is it calculated to encourage honest men to agitate for removal of a public grievance.

A CORRESPONDENT under date Sholapore, November 1, writes to the Times of India :—

"A meeting of the Kasha Ward voters and others, numbering over 2,000, was held last evening, under the presidency of Rao Bahadur Deshmukh, in Mallikarjun's Temple, with a view to call upon their three elected Commissioners to explain why they voted for an outlay of Rs. 1,11,385, which the Municipality at their recent meeting sanctioned almost with indecent haste. Only one member attended, and said he was not present and did not vote, and would not have voted. The other two did not appear though duly invited. After a long discussion a vote of censure on the two absenting members and a resolution condemning the action of the Municipality were unanimously passed. The meeting also condemned the motion brought in by the managing committee for increasing the halalkhore and water taxes, which are already oppressive."

It would be interesting to know why the other two Commissioners would not attend the meeting of the ratepayers called to examine their conduct. Had they no explanation to give or did they consider themselves not bound to attend and explain? That raises an important question as to the rights of the two opposing parties—the ratepayers and their representatives. How far, in the absence of specific instructions, is a representative bound or free to exercise his own individual wisdom? Unless the two Commissioners in question were elected with the distinct understanding that they were not to vote for the outlay complained of, did their election bind them to act in the manner the meeting after the event wished them to have done? How were they to anticipate the wishes of the electors and was their own conscience no factor in the voting? No methods of government can transcend human nature and there is a tyranny of the elective system worse than monarchical or oligarchic oppression. Such meetings as that of the 31st October at Sholapore, are a mistake and a nuisance. Candidates, like other men, are bound by their pledges. Pledges or no pledges, they are responsible for their conduct generally, subject to explanation. But electors should be careful not to carry their rights too far.

THE problem of aerial navigation is no longer confined to men of science, like Mr. Maxim, Mr. Edison and Professor Langley. It is attracting the notice of States and Governments. Already a million roubles has been expended by Russia on experiments after an aerial man-of-war. Less ambitious or chimerical, the French ministry is satisfied with constructing a steering balloon which will probably stand the French in better stead than the Czar's aerial war ship. The Germans are still at the threshold of the experiment. And the practical British?—nowhere!

A COLOSSUS of curd!—such will be among the appropriate contributions of the Land overflowing with milk to the coming Mela. Mr. Robertson, the Dominion Dairy Commissioner, has just made for the Chicago Exhibition the largest cheese in the world, weighing over 22,000lbs., out of the curd of one day's milk of 10,000 cows. Formidable as this enormity of delicacy is, it is pronounced to be perfect in texture, flavour and colour. The ultimate destination of the cheese, after the Fair, is England. The lucky British! How their bards will be inspired to sing the glories of the welcome consignment whose minutest fragments are delicious!

THE following paragraph from the British press at Home, is being reproduced all over the East:—

"In China, the oldest weekly newspaper in the world—really the oldest, A. D. 911—is now issued three times daily. It is not merely three editions, but three issues, all presumably full of news. This publication is under the immediate superintendence of the Emperor, and the staff is exceedingly active; their principal stimulant being the bastinado. There are no less than six editors (all members of the Academy of Sciences), so that when one of them is, so to speak, 'prostrated,' there are plenty to go on with the publication."

It is a pity that the name of the newspaper is not given. Is it the Pekin Gazette? Nor is it quite clear whether the oldest weekly is now a daily, or simply gives three different issues at three different hours of the one day of issue. That is so preposterous an idea that we are forced to the conclusion that the ancient hebdomadal has turned a diurnal and no mistake. Yea, it has turned a daily with a vengeance, making three different appearances every day, each time with new matter. This would be a bore in Europe perhaps, and is no ordinary infliction on the public, we may be sure, in the Land of the Lotos-eaters.

A WELL-WRITTEN little communicated article in the Rust Gostar laments in feeling, though not in exaggerated, terms the death of one of Bombay's amiable and worthy, if not prominent citizens. Mr. W. E. Hart, the subject of the obituary, after a distinguished academical career as a Cambridge Bachelor and prize-man, was called to the bar and came to the East where he began as Professor of History of the Elphinstone College and an advocate of the High Court, Bombay. With the moderate opportunities open to him, he soon gave such an impression of his abilities as a lawyer that he was appointed to the chief seat on the bench of the Small Causes Court. For thirteen years he discharged the duties of his difficult situation, in the busy bustling commercial community of the Western capital, with the highest credit. Thrice he acted as a Judge of the High Court, embracing in the aggregate a period of nearly 12 months. In retiring recently from the bench, he did not mean to retire from active life, but rejoined the bar on purpose to practise again. But, though he did not suspect it, his health had utterly broken down, and in two months of the commencement of his profession again as an advocate, he was seized with paralysis and died at sea immediately after leaving Bombay. He was a modest shy man, genial and pleasant in a select circle, kind to friends, and honourable with all. A good lawyer and a ripe scholar, he did not obstinately hide his light under a bushel, but was ready to give out his stores of thought and information. Bombay so rich in its men of letters, native and European, who are always enlivening the tedium of Indian life with their edifying addresses and discourses, will long remember the late Mr. Hart as one of its most impressive lecturers. The bar will always be proud of his Lays of the Law.

THE civilized world has pronounced against imprisonment for debt and even in India it has been generally abolished by law. But the Government of Bengal still sticks to the barbarous method and imprison defaulters of rent, income-tax and excise duties. Sir Charles Elliott is, however, alive to the shame and we find him thus discouraging the practice in his Resolution on the Board's Land Revenue Administration Report for the year 1891-92:—

"There was a satisfactory decrease in the total number of cases in which compulsory measures of sale were necessary from 6,593 to 3,552, but the Lieutenant-Governor regrets to see that there was an increase from 63 to 71 in the number of persons imprisoned, who were eventually released without payment of the debt. In the Resolution on the Land Revenue Report for 1890-91, it was laid down that imprisonment should be discouraged and only resorted to when the officer ordering it is satisfied that the defaulter is concealing property. The Board have now called the attention of Collectors to this order, and His Honour hopes that very different figures will be shown for the year 1892-93. The same remarks apply to the case of persons (of whom there were 45) imprisoned for non-payment of Government demands, such as Government rent, income-tax, and excise duties."

IN another part of the same Resolution we read:—

"Sections 2 and 3 of Act VI (B. C.) of 1862, and sections 90 and 91 of Act I (B. C.) of 1879, empower the Court to award damages in rent-suits to the non-suited party at the rate of 25 per cent. on the amount of rent decreed or claimed. In the year under report, Rs. 41, 140 were decreed under these sections in 4,280 cases. This seems to Sir Charles Elliott to be a very objectionable provision, and in the course of his inspections His Honour formed the opinion that the penalty was awarded with very little consideration. There is nothing corresponding to this provision in the Bengal Tenancy Act, and the Lieutenant-Governor would like the Board of Revenue to consider whether the power, which is permissive, to award such damages should not be withdrawn by executive order."

Bentham drew attention to judge-made law. Here we have a fine example of official-made law.

Sir Charles Elliott is fond of exercising the discretionary powers vested in the Governor, until he has so far demoralised himself as to override the law altogether, prepared to govern by ukase. The next step will be to assume the knout, we apprehend. If the law empowers judges to grant damages, is that power to be pronounced inoperative by any executive authority? On more than one recent occasion the Lieutenant-Governor has been profuse in pledging his honor for the good behaviour of his administration, in order to prevent the establishment of legislative safeguards. And now he is for constituting the Secretariat into a supplementary Legislature under the rose, unhampered by responsibility and safe from criticism. His indiscretion is becoming proverbial. He will pass down to history as the hasty and indiscreet, if not erratic, Sir Charles.

AT Samarang, a store-keeper named Cores de Vries, to put a stop to constant theft of petroleum from his premises, set in the store house a musket loaded with small shot. A string tied to the trigger was so fastened to an oil tin, that the musket would assuredly go off on removal of the tin. The contrivance took and a thief, on opening the door at night with a false key and raising the tin, received the full charge of shot and died. Cores de Vries was charged with murder of the thief. The Assize Court thought that the facts disclosed nothing punishable, and discharged the accused. The Public Prosecutor appealed to the High Court, which found the accused guilty of murder under extenuating circumstances, and sentenced him to two years' imprisonment. There is much public sympathy at Batavia for Cores de Vries.

These Batavians are all dunderheads, more or less, and their hearts are no better than their heads. This too clever by half petroleum owner is, as the High Court has found, a clear murderer, or, in the language of our law, a culpable homicide. But that Court loses all merit by ascribing extenuating circumstances. There was none such in the connection. The man coolly and deliberately laid a murderous man-trap, and bagged his man. He had no more right to shoot his victim with his own hand if found lurking or even caught in the act of committing larceny than to kill him by means of an infernal machine of a man-trap of any kind.

RUSSIA is not behind other Powers of Europe even in its scientific progress. The Imperial Institute at St. Petersburg is in full swing. It has physiological, pathological, chemical, bacteriological and epizootological sections. There is also a department where Pasteur's treatment is carried out with a small hospital for infectious cases. The sections are arranged on the newest principles on a very large scale. The Institute has its report published every two or three months by the directors. Professor Neucki's researches into the microbe-producing inflammation of the mammary glands of milch cows and goats reflect great credit, though similar investigations are being made by Dr. Klein in England. Professor Winogradsky's paper on the various nitrifying organisms discovered by him in the soil of different countries, is the most important that has ever appeared on this subject.

Pasteur's treatment also proved a great success.

The institution owes its origin to the liberality of Prince Alexander Petrowitch of Oldenburg. In November 1885, a Russian guard was bitten by a rabid dog. He was sent to Paris and the prince at his own expense established this laboratory. But it was found to be too insignificant and it stands as one of the laboratories in Europe. The expenses are defrayed partly by the prince and partly by public subscriptions. England is yet wanting in an institution as this.

Russia has some of the best chemical laboratories in Europe, and yet she is to have a new one at St. Petersburg.

THE Hyderabad Pamphlet scandal prosecution has been resumed. A charge has been framed against the accused Mr. S. M. Mitra who has pleaded not guilty. The prosecutor Mr. Mehdi Hassan seems to have grown weary of the investigation and is anxious to withdraw. He would, against the advice of his counsel Mr. Inverarity, be satisfied with an apology and have done with the case and Hyderabad.

THE native community cannot be sufficiently thankful to Sadyk Dost. He has taken up his vigorous pen against the Jury Notification, and in a series of able letters in the Indian Daily News is preparing the ground for a thorough and satisfactory agitation against the order.

"We clip the subjoined interesting item," says the Times of India, and then prints something more formidable than Greek in Roman characters, and not only makes no comment but declines all explanation. A pretty "interesting" business this, to be sure. We were about passing it over in despair, when the name of Mr. Alexander Russell Webb arrested us, and looking into it we discovered other proper names which enabled us to identify the person. The word "Fahometaniaid" occurring in it, we were prepared to regard it a misprint for Mahomedan, but then we found the same form repeated. Further search disclosed the word "Mahometaniaeth." Fahometan.....or Mahometan.....which is the genuine form and which the—devil's deed? Then we have India and Bombay and Hyderabad. The occurrence above all of "Ynysoedd [whatever that may mean] Phillipia"—doubtless, a classical form of a modern designation of a Pacific archipelago—pointed to Mr. Webb, late Consul of the United States at Manilla, as the subject of the gibberish. Further confirmation is given by the name of "Budridin Abdulla Kur, (sic.) Bombay." What it is all about, in particular, Heaven knows, and, under Heaven, the naughty Bombay journalist who coolly launches at our heads the strange lingo without translation, note or comment! Of course we may, without hazard, roundly take it for a notice of the conversion into Islam of the American Consul at Manilla, who was lately among us in Calcutta and who is still in India, the guest of Her Christian Majesty of Great Britain's Mussulman subjects or allies and feudatories. It is by no means a bland colourless notice, we are afraid, judging from the single word of English with which it concludes, to wit, "Mr. Budruddin has of course the right of reply." Surely, that is ominous. Mr. Budruddin is clearly on his trial and trial without notice.

The case, indeed, is worse. Mr. Budruddin Kur though he sent one short covering letter to the Times of India forwarding one of Mr. Webb's letters from the Philippines, is quite innocent of English. He went to fetch Mr. Webb, to be sure, from Manilla, but accompanied by an interpreter. But the extract in the Times of India, taken as it is acknowledged from a Welsh newspaper, is not English but Cymric. How is poor Abdulla Kur to get an interpreter of that obscure patois? Under the best circumstances, a man is very much prejudiced by calumny in a foreign tongue. Here this Bombay Mussulman has practically been not simply accused but judged and condemned behind his back. This sort of thing cannot be fair. The Times of India is not only unkind to Abdulla Kur, but not at all considerate to its readers, the generality of whom have not, we take it, taken honours in Celtic in its different varieties. It is all very well in Cardiff papers to reserve a column or two for native gibberish, but there is no excuse for Cambrian in Bombay. Anything else would be more to the purpose—Sanskrit or Pali—Pushto or Pehlvi—Himyaritic or Coptic.

SIR Charles Elliott has justified his Notification about the Jury trial, as best he could, by publication of certain opinions in the last week's Calcutta Gazette. But there is no explanation yet as to why no time was allowed the country to understand the situation as to the altered position by the withdrawal of trials by jury in 91 serious offences in the most important and advanced districts of Bengal.

THE ravishing hand has been extended to Assam. But Mr. Ward is considerate enough not to give his order immediate effect. It comes into operation with the new year.

OTHER Presidencies must now prepare to be divorced of the right of trial by jury.

IT is time therefore also that all the papers in connection with the raid against a cherished institution should be published by the Government of India.

THIS news comes to us by way of Europe:—

"It has been reported that the Thakore Sahib of Ghondal has entered the ranks of the medical profession, having passed his examinations for the degree of Bachelor of Medicine in the University of Edinburgh. He is the first of the Indian native princes to have identified himself with medical work. His subjects propose to signalise this unusual event by erecting a statue to their ruler in his capital at Ghondal, in which the newly-made medical Prince will be represented in the gown and hood of his degree worn over his full native costume."

European example has undermined all the simplicity and truth of Indian life, until our very princes are hankering for addresses and testimonials. Let Thakoorjee and his people make fools of themselves if they choose by raising and allowing to be raised a statue to commemorate the success of his Quixotic enterprise. But he is not the first Indian Prince to identify himself with medical work. Several of our Chiefs are and have been interested in scientific experiments, and many are zealous in affording medical relief to their subjects. The intelligent interest of the Maharaja of Tipperah in science and art, is well-known. The Maharaja of Kuch Behar is another notable instance. But there are many others, from great sovereigns like the Nizam of the Deccan, the Ram Raja of Travancore, the Gaekwar of Baroda and the Holkar of Indore, down to lesser Chiefs like the Maharajas of Vizianagram and Darbhanga. Of course, no body has taken up the study of medicine as a profession like the Thakore Sahib. But short of that, the late Maharaja of Khettri, a feudatory of Jeypore, did everything. That Chief's enthusiasm for science, and medicine in particular, has never been excelled.

TRIAL BY JURY.

THE OPINION OF THE HIGH COURT JUDGES.

THE points of reference are:—

- (1) How has the system worked?
- (2) What opinion is entertained as to its merits as a means for the repression of crime?
- (3) What improvements, if any, are called for in its application?

To follow the discussion, it is necessary to know the law on the subject. We give it below as summarised by Mr. Justice Prinsep in his opinion:—

"The system of Trial by Jury outside Presidency towns was first introduced by the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1861, and was extended to some selected districts in Bengal, in regard to certain offences only, in 1862. By that law the verdicts were conclusive, even on appeal, except on a point of law, and it was further provided that there might be a verdict by a majority, provided that that majority was not a bare but an absolute majority of the jurors depending on the number of the persons constituting the jury. Thus, if the jury consisted of five, seven or nine persons, a majority of four, five or six respectively was necessary for a verdict (section 328). If the verdict was not unanimous or of such a majority of the jurors, a re-trial was necessary.

The Legislature, in the amended Code of 1872, altered the effect and also the constitution of the verdict of a jury. It provided (section 203) that if a Sessions Judge disagreed with the verdict, and considered it necessary for the ends of justice that he should do so, he should not record judgment on that verdict, but should submit the case to the High Court. It further provided that the High Court should deal with a case so submitted as it would with an appeal convicting or acquitting the accused person on the facts as well as law on the charges regarding which the reference might have been made. At the same time, however, the Code of 1872 also enabled a Sessions Judge to receive and pass judgment on the verdict of any majority of the jurors, if he did not so disagree with it. The actual responsibility was thus taken from the jury and placed on the Sessions Judge, and through him on the High Court. In appeal or revision, the verdict of a jury was final except on a point of a law; but in a case submitted for confirmation of sentence of death, it was always open to the High Court to consider and find on the facts, notwithstanding the verdict of a jury.

The Judges of the High Court, however, on any reference so made, refused to consider the case on its merits unless they were first shown that the verdict, which the Sessions Judge had refused to accept, was a perverse or unreasonable verdict; that is to say, they attached more weight to such a verdict than to the opinion of the Sessions Judge who had refused to accept it, because he considered it to be against the weight of evidence. The first case, I believe, in which this view of the law was not adopted, is the case of Empress versus Mukhan Kumar, I, Calcutta Law Reports, 275, decided on June 23rd, 1877, but the practice was not completely changed; it varied according to the inclinations of individual Judges.

The Code of 1882, section 307, provided that if a Sessions Judge should disagree with the verdict so completely that he considered it necessary for the ends of justice to submit the case to the High Court, he might refer the case to the High Court and abstain from passing judgment upon such verdict. It also provided that, in dealing with a case so submitted, the High Court may exercise any of the powers which it may exercise on an appeal; but it may acquit or convict the accused of any offence of which the jury could have convicted him upon the charge framed and placed before it.

The practice in this High Court still varied. The matter was fully considered and discussed in the judgment delivered on 29th August 1887, in the case of Empress versus Itwari Saho, Indian Law Reports, XV, Calcutta, 269, but the practice is still unsettled.

The statistics prepared in the High Court, show that in the five years 1885 to 1889 there were 1,708 cases tried by jury in Bengal and Assam. "References were made to the High Court under section 307 of the Code of Criminal Procedure in 114 of these cases, that is to say, in 6·67 per cent. In 63 of these references, that is to say, in 55·26 per cent. (or in 3·6 per cent. of the whole number of jury cases), the verdict of the jury was set aside. In 211 out of the above 1,708 cases, the Sessions Judges, although they disagreed with the jury, made no reference to the High Court under section 307." The extract is from the joint opinion of Mr. Justice Norris and the two Bengali Judges.

The Judges of the High Court are divided in their opinion. They met more than once to agree but could not. "Owing to considerable divergence of opinion among them, they have been unable to formulate any reply to the reference which would satisfactorily represent their views as a body." The thirteen Judges accordingly recorded seven distinct minutes. Sir Comer Petheram, and Messrs. Justices Tottenham, Trevelyan, and Beverley, recorded each a minute of his own. The longest minute is that of Mr. Justice Prinsep to which Messrs. Justices Wilson, Pigot and Macpherson generally agree. Next comes Mr. Justice Ameer Ali's in whose opinion Mr. Justice O'Kinealy concurs. This is followed by the joint opinion of Messrs. Justices Norris, Chunder Madhub Ghose and Gurudas Banerjee.

By far the wisest deliverance on the subject, is that of the Chief Justice. Sir Comer Petheram is still English lawyer enough to be unreconciled to the system of government by fools and foolscap bequeathed by the East India Company. He has no literary vanity—no temptations in the direction of long-windedness. He is outspoken and to the point. He has disposed of the reference with a multum in parvo. To our mind, his is the best essay not only of the High Court but of all the numerous competitors, though it requires very intelligent reading of the few lines and between them to appreciate their full force and far-reaching import. Sir Comer Petheram has resolutely set his face against the official intrigue for abolishing a valuable civil institution. His minute may be disappointing to those who look out on such occasions for literature, but as an expression of opinion it is neither vague nor inadequate. The antecedent circumstances of its production ought to be remembered. It is possible that the present head of the Bengal High Court does not think laws are best made in consultation with Judges. We, the present writer, certainly incline to that view. Be that as it may, the Chief Justice may well regard the calls of the Executive for opinion a bore, and from their frequency, a nuisance, as demoralising to the Judges and diverting them from their proper vocation—the interpretation of the law and the dispensation of justice. Still, according to practice, he loyally received the reference and took the usual steps for honouring it. He invited his colleagues to a conference at which "the important questions raised by the Government of India" were discussed, but to no purpose. The Chief doubtless took his full share in the discussion and did his best to bring the different views to a focus, but the Judges could not agree. He spoke as well as listened to his Puisnes separately and together, but in vain. After repeated fruitless efforts to come to a united understanding, the High Court had no other alternative left than to make the humiliating confession to the Government of India of the Judges' fundamental and irreconcilable difference between themselves. There they might have ended, with strict propriety. The opinion of the High Court is far more valuable than the opinion of any individual Judge, not exceptionally gifted and recognised by the public as an authority. It was the opinion (on each point) of the High Court that was required, and as there was no such opinion to give, it was only necessary to tell the Government of India so, explaining how it was so, with the usual expression of regret. It was not only a work of supererogation but almost a piece of officiousness to send a parcel of essays by eminent hands in lieu of the deliberate deliverance of united wisdom of the High Court of Judicature in Bengal. Surely, the gods of Simla are human enough to anticipate the possibility of difference among the Judges, so that if they cared to see how the highest Judges might be at sixes and sevens, holding opposite views on points of the highest importance touching the administration of justice, they would have said so. It is strange that the grave and reverend seigniors of the Bench did not think of the danger of thrusting uncalled for things. They certainly incurred the risk of inviting rebuke for their pains. Is it possible that some of them have not yet been cured of the ambition of school and college days? The Chief Justice has shown that he, at any rate, is above all puerility of sentiment. When there was no opinion of the Court to deliver, he rightly conceived his duty in the connection over. And as for sending without being asked individual opinions, anything was a superfluity. The least said, the soonest mended. Certainly, the less said the less offence. Thus Sir Comer Petheram gave his opinion as briefly as possible, leaving his arguments more to the inference of the knowing. We shall not be surprised, though, to find him misunderstood. Those who should imagine that he has shrunk from responsibility, would miss his meaning altogether.

The Chief Justice is "unwilling to express any opinion unfavourable to the existence of the system of Trial by Jury, as it is called, in these Provinces, or as to its merits as a means for the repression of crime." It would be a mistake to suppose that Sir Comer is afraid to give his opinion. The Chief ought not to be taken too literally at his word. There is no real unwillingness at all in the matter. This is a mere mode of language—a form of refined expression. In declaring his unwillingness to express an opinion, he really manages to express it most effectively, that is for the higher order of English minds or minds accustomed to think in the higher English dialect. As we take it, Sir Comer with an eye to the discussions with his colleagues, speaks with resolute sympathy for the institution in danger, saying the he, the Chief Justice, for one "is unwilling to express an opinion unfavourable to the existence of the system.....or as to its merits as a means," &c. As much as to say, that he would not utter one word that might be taken advantage of to discontinue the system. That is to speak like a Briton and an English Judge. Sir Comer in that pithy remark has a quiet sneer at the jury trial in this country as modified by Indian Civilian statesmanship—"Trial by Jury, as it is called, in these Provinces." It is so much different from that in its home in England. It is so much vitiated in this country. Yet, he has such an enlightened sympathy for it that he will not in any way swell the cry raised against it with a view to its ultimate abolition in this country. As for improvements, if any, called for, he is "of opinion that some extension of the right of appeal is desirable." At the same time, he is "not prepared to offer any further suggestions." In fine, Sir Comer has treated the institution tenderly, though without any sentimentality. Practically, therefore, the Chief Justice has nothing to say against the system in the present connection, and he sees no ground for its curtailment, much less its abolition. Not that the Chief does not remember any wrong or perverse verdicts, but he knows that such miscarriages occur in every land and must occur under every system. Therefore he declines to talk of the merits and demerits of Bengal juries. It is enough for him that he sees no sufficient reason for condemning the system here.

According to Mr. Justice Tottenham, "in particular districts the system has seemed to work well in the majority of cases tried: but, looking at the system as a whole, I do not think that the results as shown by the figures (compiled by the Registrar and quoted above) are satisfactory." He seems to base his opinion on the change in the law made by sec. 307 of the present Code of Criminal Procedure. That change must be taken as "a proof that the system could not be continued in the unrestricted form in which it was set going in the Code of 1862." Thus reduced, to his mind, the Jury system has no great advantage over the Assessor system, while "it is to some extent anomalous and productive of inconvenience and of dissatisfaction." Why not then revert, say we, to the old unimpaired system? As regards repression of crime, it is immaterial to him whether an accused is tried by one or the other system, for he does not believe that "an intending criminal would be deterred by the knowledge that if detected he would be tried by a Jury and not merely by a Judge with Assessors." And he does "not suppose that his conduct would be influenced one way or the other by the probable mode of his trial." All that is true enough. No wonder that Mr. Justice Tottenham does not believe that the system as a means for the repression of crime, has, per se, any merits. But that is not the object of the system. For improvements in the law, he is for reducing the jury trial further, and that "in capital cases it would be well to do away with the trial by Jury in the mufassal." Altogether, Mr. Justice Tottenham takes a mild view of the situation, and no body would think of basing on it any considerable change.

Mr. Justice Trevelyan is as brief as the Chief. He has very little experience of the working of the jury system in the mufassal, and from what little he has seen, he is of opinion that "in cases of conviction there should be an appeal as of right. In cases of acquittal the Judge should be compelled to refer whenever he differs from the jury."

He seems to think that as the highest Court, the High Court should have the final voice.

Mr. Justice Beverley is of opinion that the system "has worked well on the whole, but that instances of wrong verdicts do occasionally occur, specially in certain classes of cases," but that section 307 C. P. C. guards against such miscarriage of justice. As to Mr. Justice Tottenham, it seems to Mr. Justice Beverley that, as a means for the repression of crime, it is quite immaterial whether an accused is tried by a jury or by assessors. He would, however, prefer a jury trial, not that it is the English method, but that "the employment of juries to try criminal cases does tend to disseminate a knowledge of the Criminal Law, and such extended knowledge, it may be presumed, must have a tendency to repress crime." Thus, instead of proving a failure in repressing crime, according to this Judge, the jury trial is an efficient method for indirect repression of crime. To guard against any failure of justice, he thinks with Mr. Justice Prinsep that "it should be made compulsory on Sessions Judges under Section 307 to refer to the High Court every case in which the Judge is not prepared to accept the verdict of the jury, and that it should be distinctly laid down that it is the duty of the High Court in such references to determine the case on the merits in the same way as on an appeal from a sentence passed in a trial by a Sessions Judge with assessors." He is for no other change.

Too much is made by Government of the opinion of Mr. Justice Prinsep. But what does he say? His utmost condemnation of the jury trial is that "the system has not been altogether successful," as if any body thought it would. What human measure is successful throughout? There is not a system which is not without its defects and is not capable of improvement. This Judge lays stress on the uncertainty of practice which he points out in the statement of the law quoted by us at the commencement. He does not advocate fresh legislation to set the difficulties he points out at rest and to which he attributes the failure of justice complained of. His experience in the mufassal and in the High Court is that "in cases of homicide the jury are prone to acquit or take an unreasonably lenient view of the conduct of the accused, while in cases of offences against property they are too ready to convict on weak and doubtful evidence." His suggestions are that every case in which the Judge and Jury do not agree or the Judge does not approve of the verdict should go up to the High Court, and that "the powers of appeal should be relaxed and that there should be an appeal on the facts, at least, against a verdict which is not an unanimous verdict, whether it be for conviction or acquittal." To these conclusions, Messrs. Justices. Wilson, Pigot and Macpherson "generally agree."

The Mahomedan Judge's evidence is most damaging to his countrymen. Its value may be estimated from the fact that it is based on his experience at the Bar and not on the Bench. The experience of the lucky briefless or of the lucky barrister in his briefless stage of existence is, "In certain kinds of cases conviction, in others acquittal, is a foregone conclusion. Verdicts are not arrived at upon the evidence, but upon prejudices and predilections, and upon what is heard outside the court." But there are those who think that the advocacy of lawyers goes a great way in moulding the verdicts of jury, and that perverse verdicts are not unoften the result of clever advocacy of counsel. If the opinion of Mr. Justice Ameer Ali be correct, it is useless to employ expensive counsel in jury trials. The accused must be feeling their counsel only to know beforehand what the verdict of the jury would be. Regarding the merits of the system of trial by jury, Mr. Justice Ali is, from his large experience as counsel, "able to say that the system in question has not satisfactorily answered the object for which it was devised." That object is thus explained: As Mr. Justice Ameer Ali "understands the matter, trial by jury and trial with assessors were introduced as a means for the investigation of the real facts of a criminal case. In certain districts juries were introduced, in others assessors, to assist the European Judges, who were supposed to be unacquainted with the customs of the country, in the consideration of particular kinds of cases. These two systems were in substitution of the old system, under which English Judges were assisted by Mahammadan Muftis." The systems were modified by section 307 of Act X of 1882, and now he would modify them further by allowing an appeal to the High Court in every jury trial "in order to safeguard the liberty of the subject, as well as to meet the requirements of justice." Mr. Justice O'Kinealy concurs in this opinion.

The last in the batch of the High Court minutes is in every respect the most important. It is the joint opinion of the three remaining Judges—Messrs. Justices Norris, Ghose and Banerji. They think that "the system has worked fairly well on the whole—a conclusion which is based upon statistics furnished to us by the Registrar of the High Court, and upon our individual experience, gathered from our having from time to time sat as members of the Criminal Bench." The statistics are the same which we publish in the commencement of this article and on which Mr. Justice Tottenham bases his opinion. While the Civilian Judge "does not think that the results as shewn by the figures are satisfactory, the Barrister and Pleader Judges "venture to think that these facts and figures warrant our saying that in our opinion the system has worked fairly well upon the whole." While Mr. Justice Prinsep makes the non-reference by Sessions Judges under section 307 a peg whereon to hang his condemnation of the system, these three Judges construe the omission in its favor. "This, we think, we may well presume was owing to their not having so completely disagreed with the verdict of the jury as to lead them to consider 'it necessary for the ends of justice to submit the case to the High Court.'" Their own experience too confirms the conclusion. They also bear testimony that "No doubt some of the references which have come before us have disclosed cases of verdicts which we could not but think were opposed to the weight of evidence, but their number was small: and the instances in which such verdicts were so entirely opposed to the weight of evidence as to justify their being looked upon as perverse were rare." They further find a complete remedy in section 307 for the rare cases. To what are the rare perverse verdicts due? The reasons are not so plain to these three Judges as to others, chief among them Mr. Tweedie, Judge of Patna, who lays down every conceivable cause, possible or impossible, numbering them from one to thirteen. They speak throughout humanly and as sober Judges. "They may have been due," say they, "in some instances to prejudice on the part of the jury, or to their inability to grasp the numerous details of complicated cases." The fault is not entirely the jury's. "On the other hand, some of these verdicts may have been due to the Judge's charge being defective." Just so! In the haste to condemn native jurors, no body stops to inquire into the influence of untrained European judges on their mistakes.

The third reference somewhat puzzled these three Judges. They are not sure of what it aimed at. They therefore divide the question into two parts and answer it accordingly. "If, as we suppose, it is intended to ask our opinion as to whether the system has favored the escape of criminals, we should, putting aside exceptional instances, answer in the negative; but if we are asked whether in our opinion the system has been successful in obtaining the conviction of guilty persons, our answer would be in the affirmative." That is candid.

As for improvements, they would seem rather to leave the law untouched. But if anything is to be done, they would extend the system in the first instance. If practicable, let the offences punishable with death, and others which the Sessions Judges may direct, be tried by a special jury. The next suggestion is that, where practicable, let the number of the jury be seven, and that no verdict be received unless concurred in by five, and where the jury consists of five, let no verdict be received unless four agree. These failing, as the last remedial measure, if the law about bare majority is to remain unaltered, an appeal on both law and facts should be allowed against all convictions where the jury are not unanimous.

The whole opinion is honourable alike to the head and the heart of the Judges who sign it.

And what is the net result? All the "improvements" suggested by the Puisne Judges make for larger powers of the High Court. Of the three Native Judges—while one condemns the two others not only argue for the retention of Trial by Jury, but also recommend its extension.

THE ADDRESS TO THE NIZAM.

[Translation.]

To—His Highness Asaf Jah Moozufferool Moolk Moozufferool Moomalik Nizam-ud-Dowlah Nizam-ul-Mulk Nawab Meer Mahboob Ali Khan Bahadur Futeh Jung, G.C.S.I.

We Jagirdars, nobles, munsuddars, and gentry, your Highness's most ancient and devoted servants, beg most respectfully to address your Highness in the matter of our ancestral rights.

The history of our country testifies that the Jaghirs granted by the Sircar to our ancestors were bestowed upon them as the reward of blood shed by them in the conquest of countries and for onerous services worthily performed. There is no tract of land in these dominions which does not in its archives bear record of those achievements. Only recently it was ordered that the ancient interests and honors which had been conferred by beneficent sovereigns and handed down to us by inheritance and succession were not transmissible by us to our descendants. The condition of your devoted servants was like that of a man half dead, but one look of favor and regard from your Highness as our sovereign endued us with life, and we are further strengthened since it has pleased your Highness to choose for promotion and increased honor our countryman, Imad Jung Bahadur. For from this we are full of hope for ourselves for the future. What power have we to—what tongue can express—our gratitude, now that we have hope that our services will be recognized. We have no more fear that we shall not enjoy the favor of our sovereign. Even had we ever such fear it is now dispelled.

For us there are only two places, no third. First in this world the court of your Highness, in the next the door of the Almighty.

It must be known to your Highness that whatever was granted by the Sircar has descended to us through increasing generations and that now owing to our numbers it is difficult for us to maintain ourselves properly, but because we are the ancient retainers of your Highness' house and because it is impossible that either we or our children can go to other countries or take possession of the rights of the nobles of those countries, we desire to pass our lives in contentment under the shadow of your Highness, and we earnestly hope and fully believe that by one sign of your Highness' finger we shall be freed from the terrible position in which we now find ourselves and that for the future we shall enjoy that favor and protection under which our ancestors passed their lives. Now with one mind and from the bottom of our hearts we pray to the Almighty, "Oh God may it please thee long to preserve to benignly reign and rule over us such a just, equitable, upright, sincere, liberal and benevolent sovereign and administrator nor allow us for one moment to be forgotten or to be separated from his blessed shoes. Amen! Oh Almighty God!

Dated 11th Rabiussani, 1310 Hijri (2nd November 1892.)

THE NIZAM'S REPLY.

[Translation.]

Ashruf-ud-Dowlah and those present,

I have listened to your expressions with much pleasure, although I do not consider the occasion of such an importance as to require an address from you. The matter is one of ordinary administration in which my Prime Minister and the officers of State are quite agreed. The administration is one of harmony and pure intention—the best that is possible.

I am fully aware of your ancient rights as expressed by you and as far as my knowledge extends, I know that my advisers and my officers of State have at all times not only watched over those ancient rights but have also in every way preserved and protected them, and you need not fear that such protection will be wanting in the future.

If any mistake has been made, as shown by your manner of expression, by any of the servants of the State, you must know that such mistakes are possible in all administrations and in every State. And it is good and necessary that mistakes should sometimes occur as their rectification brings about reforms.

You know that the constitutions of Western States, particularly those of the European States, are based upon three pillars or orders. First the aristocracy, second the gentry, and third the people generally.

The great duty of an administrator is not to allow the dignity of any one of these three orders to be detracted, but to conserve them in such a way as to enable them to help in the administration of the State. Of all these orders that upon which the work of education and civilization most depends is that of the nobles.

You have demanded attention to your rights from me. Now I shall speak to you about your rights and your duties.

The first is that you educate your children and their education should be such that they may not only be ornaments to my court but be the pillars of my State and permanent members of my Government, loyal and faithful servants of my dynasty, civilized and abstinent, honest to their nation and fellow countrymen. If after attaining this much you ask for help against the foreigners who are employed in the Government, it might be proper.

The second point which deserves more consideration is that it is your duty to be obedient to my present Government, so that I may have an opportunity of saying that my dear subjects are the true and loyal friends of my Government. The question as to the employment of foreigners or your fellow countrymen, rests with me. In conclusion I have to express my pleasure upon the fact that the Jagirdars of my Dominions have laid the solid foundation of mutual esteem and friendship and that they have formed an association with that object. I trust that the association will render much aid and assistance to the Government by its views for the improvement of the country.

WITHDRAWAL OF THE JURY TRIAL.

No. 1107, dated Simla, the 25th August 1892.

From—C. J. Lyall, Esq., c. i. z., Secretary to the Government of India, Home Department,

To—The Chief Secretary to the Government of Bengal.

I am directed to reply to Sir John Edgar's letter No. 122J.-D., dated the 22nd of June, 1891, forwarding, with enclosures, a report on the working of the jury system in Sessions Courts in the Lower Provinces of Bengal. Your confidential letter No. 4675J., dated the 21st of December, 1891, is replied to at the same time.

2. It is understood that under existing orders the jury system is in force in Bengal in the districts of Burdwan, 24-Pargannas, Hooghly, Howrah, Murshidabad, Nadia, Dacca, and Patna, and that all offences under the Penal Code which fall within Chapter VIII. (offences against public tranquillity), Chapter XI. (false evidence and offences against public justice), Chapter XVI. (offences against the person), Chapter XVII. (offences against property), and Chapter XVIII. (false documents and offences against property marks), and also attempts to commit and abetments of these offences (Chapters V. and XXIII.) are triable by jury before the Court of Session.

3. The result of the recent inquiry, so far as as Lower Bengal is concerned, is to show that the system of trial by jury as hitherto carried out, has worked in an eminently unsatisfactory manner. The opinions of District Executive and Judicial officers and of Divisional Commissioners are almost unanimous in its condemnation. In this conclusion the Local Government concurs. On such a question, however, the Governor-General in Council has felt bound to attach the greatest importance to the opinions expressed by the Judges of the Calcutta High Court. The Judges have been unable to formulate a reply which would represent their views as a body, and have recorded separate minutes on the subject; but the balance of opinion, as given in their minutes, is distinctly unfavourable in regard to the manner in which the system has worked in Bengal and Assam. The only opinions at all favourable are embodied in a joint minute recorded by the Honourable Justices Norris, Ghose, and Bannerjee, and in a separate minute by Mr. Justice Beverley. The Honourable Justices Amir Ali and O'Kinealy condemn the system. Mr. Justice Tottenham considers that it has worked unsatisfactorily, and suggests that capital cases should be withdrawn from juries. The Honourable Justices Prinsep, Wilson, Pigot and Macpherson also consider that the system, as at present in force, has worked unsatisfactorily, but think that it is capable of improvement if certain substantial changes of law and procedure are made. The Hon. the Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Trevelyan have abstained from giving an opinion on the merits of the question. It is observed that even those Judges who report favourably on the system rely to a great extent on the provisions of section 307 of the Criminal Procedure Code as a safeguard against failures of justice, and that practically all the Judges are inclined to the opinion that some action should be taken in the direction of granting a right of appeal on the facts or of adopting other measures for rendering the verdicts of juries less final than they are at present.

4. The Government of India have also observed that the Committee (Messrs. John Beames, President, J. F. Stevens, J. C. Veasey, E. Macnaghten, Raja Peary Mohun Mookerjee, c. s. i., Mr. H. H. Risley, c. i. z., members) recently appointed under the orders of the Lieutenant-Governor to enquire into the question of police administration in the Lower Provinces have unanimously condemned the jury system in the mufassal. In paragraph 209 of their Report are the following remarks:—

"The conclusion seems inevitable that the jury system is responsible for a not inconsiderable number of failures of justice. We think that some restriction of the system in Bengal is desirable in the interests of public justice, and we would suggest that cases of murder and culpable homicide, in which its failure is notoriously most conspicuous (as also it is most serious in its results), should be excluded from its operation."

5. The Lieutenant-Governor's general conclusions are summed up in paragraph 5 of Sir John Edgar's letter under reply, in which it is stated that "a careful consideration of the opinions and figures now obtained leaves no doubt in Sir Charles Elliott's mind of the failure of the jury system in its present shape. It would scarcely be possible to obtain opinions from a large number of men more nearly approaching to unanimity than is the condemnation of the jury system contained in the reports and minutes above referred to; and it appears to the Lieutenant-Governor that there can be no more convincing proof of its failure than this. His Honor thinks that if the result could have been foreseen no advocate would have been found for the introduction of this Western institution into India." As, however, it has been introduced, Sir Charles Elliott would not abolish it, but he would take steps to make such changes in its working as are essential to secure the due administration of justice.

The proposals of His Honor the Lieutenant-Governor for amending the law with a view to remove the defects which exist in the present system of trial by jury are, briefly stated, as follows:—

(1) that a reference to the High Court should be made compulsory in all cases in which the Sessions Judge thinks that the verdict of a jury is contrary to the weight of the evidence;

(2) that it should be made incumbent upon the Sessions Judge to ascertain and fully record the reasons of the jury for their verdict; and

(3) that a right of appeal should be granted on the facts against the verdict of a jury, when the jury is not unanimous, unless the Judge records his agreement with the majority.

The first and third proposals are based on the minutes recorded by Mr. Justice Prinsep and other Honourable Judges of the Calcutta High Court; and the second on the suggestions of experienced Sessions Judges. The result of the changes recommended by the Lieutenant-Governor would be to extend the power of modifying or reversing the verdicts of jurors, and thus to reduce trial by jury more to the level of trial by assessors as regulated by the Code of Criminal Procedure.

6. His Honor further proposes to withdraw from the list of cases triable by juries the whole of Chapter VIII. of the Penal Code, offences relating to public tranquillity; the whole of Chapter XVI., offences relating to the human body, except those which are now triable by jury in the North-Western Provinces, viz., kidnapping, abduction, and rape; and the whole of Chapter XVIII., offences relating to documents and trade marks. On the other hand, he would add to the list offences under Chapter XX. relating to marriage. The list of offences which would then be triable by jury would apparently include the following classes of cases:—Chapter XI, false evidence and offences against public justice; the offences of kidnapping, abduction, and rape, sections 363-369, 372-373, and 376 in Chapter XVI. (all other offences in this Chapter being omitted); Chapter XVII., offences against property; and Chapter XX., offences against marriage; and also abettments of and attempts to commit any of the above offences (Chapters V. and XXIII.) It is within the competence of the Local Government to make these changes on its own authority under section 269 of the Criminal Procedure Code, but His Honor the Lieutenant-Governor has thought it best in the first instance to place his views before the Government of India.

7. I am now to communicate the conclusions at which the Governor-General in Council has arrived after careful consideration of the entire question. In the opinion of His Excellency in Council, derived from a review of the reports from other Provinces as well as from Bengal, the defects of the present system of trial by jury appear to be mainly attributable to two causes—

(1) to the extension of the jury system (a) to areas to which it is unsuitable, and (b) to classes of offences which, as the experience now gained has shown, ought not to be cognisable by juries;

(2) to the fact that the provisions of section 307 of the Criminal Procedure Code, which were intended to give Sessions Judges and the High Courts power to remedy and correct wrong verdicts, have failed to fulfil this intention.

8. As regards the first of these causes, section 269 of the Criminal Procedure Code confers on Local Governments and Administrations complete liberty of action in respect of the determination of the areas within which offences shall be tried by juries, as well as of the classes of offences which shall be so triable. The Governor-General in Council has no desire to interfere with or to limit by legislation or otherwise the discretion entrusted to Local Governments in the matter; but he is constrained to express his concurrence in the Lieutenant-Governor's view that cases of murder and culpable homicide should be withdrawn from the cognizance of juries, and he is further inclined to agree in the view that cases of rioting under Chapter VIII. of the Penal Code should be withdrawn. His Excellency in Council has no doubt that the action which his Honor proposes to take for the revision of the list of offences triable by jury in Bengal, as described in paragraph 6 above, is fully justified by the results reported.

9. The difficulty under the second head seems to arise from the interpretation which Sessions Judges and Judges of the various High Courts place or have placed on their duty in making or dealing with references under section 307 of the Criminal Procedure Code. In many instances a strong disinclination has been exhibited by the High Courts to interfere with the verdicts of juries, and as a consequence Sessions Judges are often reluctant to make references under this section. It has been proposed by the Governments of Madras and Bengal that the law should be so amended as to make such references compulsory in every case in which a Sessions Judge disagrees from the verdict of the jury. The Governor-General in Council is, however, unwilling to adopt this course. Section 307 in its present form prescribes that the Sessions Judge shall refer such cases when he considers that there has been a substantial failure of justice, and it confers on the High Court the fullest power to deal with such references. It does not seem to the Government of India to be desirable that the Judge should be bound to refer cases in which the failure of justice is not quite clear—such as cases in which he differs from the jury on some minor point, or those in which the evidence is possibly so nearly balanced that even trained Judges might differ in their conclusions on it. His Excellency in Council has not overlooked the fact that there is a strong body of opinion among the Honourable Judges of the Calcutta and Madras High Courts in favour of the proposal in question; but on the whole he would prefer not to make an alteration in the law which might have the effect of encouraging unnecessary references. If the practice of the High Court is based on the principles laid down in 1887 by Prinsep and Pigot, JJ., in the case of Itwari Sasu (I. L. R., 15 Calcutta, 269) no such alteration of the law is required; while, on the other hand, if a different and narrower practice is allowed to prevail, the mere fact of a reference under section 307 being obligatory on the Sessions Judge would probably not affect the view which the High Court is likely to take of its duty in dealing with these references.

10. It has however been suggested by the Bengal Government that in order to facilitate the disposal of references under section 307 of the Code, the Sessions Judge should be specifically empowered or required to ascertain and record the reasons of the jury for their verdict. The Governor-General in Council admits that the present system is defective in so far as the Judge, although bound by the Code to refer to the High Court cases in which he considers this course to be necessary for the ends of justice, is not in a position to place before the High Court in a proper shape materials for determining whether the verdict is a wrong one or not. His Excellency in Council, however, is averse to requiring or authorizing Sessions Judges to question juries as to the reasons for their verdict, except in cases already provided for by section 303 of the Code. In the first place no room should be allowed for anything approaching to a cross-examination of the jury. Besides, not only would it be difficult for untrained men, such as the jurors would be in most cases, to formulate their reasons in a satisfactory shape, but it is doubtful whether a mere statement of their reasons would help materially towards the disposal of the case. It seems to the Government of India that a statement of the facts found by the jury, rather than of the reasons for their finding, is what is desired for the purpose of enabling a satisfactory decision to be arrived at as to the correctness of their verdict. His Excellency in Council would therefore adopt the alternative proposal made by the Judges of the Bombay High Court, (Mr. Justice Birdwood, Mr. Justice Telang, and Mr. Justice Candy) and amend the law so as to empower the Sessions Judge, if he thinks fit, whether before or after a general verdict has been taken, to require special verdicts from the jurors on particular issues of fact, and perhaps on the general credibility of particular evidence. Such an amendment of section 303 would be sufficient both to place the Sessions Judge in a position to decide whether a reference should or should not be made to the High Court under section 307, and to furnish the High Court with proper materials for determining whether the verdict is one which should be upheld or not. This point has accordingly been noted for further consideration when the Criminal Procedure Code may next come under revision.

11. Lastly as to the question of allowing an appeal on the facts from the verdict of a jury. The concession of a right of appeal in one form or another is advocated by the Bengal Government, by a strong majority of the Judges of the Calcutta High Court, and by some of the Judges of the Madras High Court; and it has been forcibly contended that mistakes on the part of a jury, like other supposed judicial errors, should be left to be brought before the appellate Court by the parties concerned instead of by the presiding Judge. Accordingly, the Government of India have very anxiously considered whether section 418 of the Code should not be amended by allowing an appeal on the facts either when the jury is not unanimous and the Judge does not approve of the verdict of the majority, or when the opinion of the jury is unanimous but the Judge expresses a positive disapproval. The latter rule would be in accordance with section 307 as it now stands, while the former would do little more than extend to Sessions Courts mutatis mutandis the rule which prevails in High Courts under section 305.

But after due deliberation, and while attaching full weight to the expressions of opinion above quoted, the Governor-General in Council has come to the conclusion that it is not expedient, at all events without some further trial, to permit an appeal to be made against the decision of a jury. It is not clear to His Excellency in Council what advantage there would be in retaining the jury system at all, if it is to be reduced so nearly to the level of a trial with assessors; and he is reluctant to abolish the distinctive feature of trial by jury, the comparative finality of the verdict, until all other available methods for the improvement of the system have been exhausted. The Government of India are, moreover, of opinion that no such change in the law as that involved in the proposal under consideration will be really necessary if cases which have been shown by experience to be unsuitable for trial before juries are removed from their cognizance; and if, in addition to this, the safeguard against failures of justice already provided by section 307 of the Criminal Procedure Code is strengthened in the manner proposed in the preceding paragraph.

12. With these remarks I am to commend the subject to the consideration of the Bengal Government, and to suggest that such action as the Lieutenant-Governor may consider necessary should be taken under section 269 of the Criminal Procedure Code. The Government of India will be glad to be informed in due course of the action taken by His Honor in the matter.

Holloway's Ointment and Pills.—Rheumatism, Neuralgia.—It is sometimes difficult to determine which of these diseases is afflicting the sufferer, but this ignorance will not matter if Holloway's remedies be used. They alleviate and cure all muscular and nervous pains. In hereditary rheumatism, after bathing the affected parts with warm salt water, Holloway's Ointment should be well rubbed upon the spot, that it may penetrate and exert its soothing and regulating properties on the deeper vessels and nerves which are unduly excited, and cause both the pain and swelling. Holloway's treatment has the merit of removing the disease without debilitating the constitution, which was the inevitable result of the bleeding, mercury, and colchicum practice formerly adopted in these complaints.

CALCUTTA, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 26, 1892.

No. 550

SIR CHARLES ELLIOTT IN CHOTA-NAGPUR.

THE LAY OF THE KOLE.

1.

SIR Charles Elliott I welcome here,
In Dhangar's lowly home ;
Forget awhile proud Belvedere,
Its tow'ring height and dome.

2.

Come thou with thy beloved spouse—
A gentle lady she—
Your heart will melt, your feelings rouse
To see my wife and me.

3.

My son and daughter, sister dear,
My uncle, aunt and friend,
You 'll find them all devoid of cheer,
- None helping hand to lend.

4.

O dreary home ! with nothing bright,
No food wherewith to live,
No furniture would greet thy sight,
Nor aught to comfort give.

5.

A mat or two—few beds of grass—
A charpoy rude, perchance,
Hard rind of gourd—thin cups of brass,
The sorry scene enhance.

6.

Unglazed pots of earth, here and there,
A few, and black with smoke,
These chief engross my earthly care
And of my women-folk.

7.

Of living things, I boast of naught
Beside the crested train ;
To pass for rich if e'er I sought,
I should some pigs maintain.

8.

My yard is clean enough, though bare,
But for dunghills about.
If blam'd for this, what do I care ?
No food, manure without.

9.

No food, because no crop, without Manure. And crop or not,
I must pay for my field, no doubt :
Such is the Kole's hard lot !

10.

*From rising sun to fall of night,
I work for daily bread,
*Though all day long I stand upright,
My hunger's not allayed.

11.

- My children all—a starving group—
My partner—famished dame—
Sir Charlie ! see the luckless troop,
Have e'er you seen the same ?

12.

*A naked band ! the clothing coarse,
They wear to hide their shame,
Of death, disease, the fruitful source,
And hardly worth the name.

13.

The son must work, the father work,
The mother, all the same,
Nor daughter dear nor sister shirk,
No matter, blind or lame.

14.

"No work, no food," the motto plain,
Nor age nor sex exempt,
The wife and children weep, in vain,
Their cry but wins contempt.

15.

O chief of rulers ! kind of heart,
When thou hast come to see,
For Heaven's sake, do not depart
Till thou hast heard of me.

16.

My tale is short :—I want to eat,
I want to keep me warm,
To cool myself in summer-heat,
To sleep and do no harm.

17.

Self-government I do not know—
Although I pay the cess,
With rent—nor e'en Municip'l show,
Nor how present Address ;

18.

I know not what's the Consent Bill,
Nor court the Councils Aot,
*I care for only stomach's fill—
That is the sternest fact.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given, any other being unnecessary and likely to cause confusion.

19.

Grave matters leave to learned friends,
The lawyer, master, leech ;
For them the State such work intends,
'Tis mine to learn, not teach.

20.

I want my Bhag-wa * and my beads,
And wooden combs and flow'rs,
Such are the things a Kole-man needs,
And not Home Ruling pow'rs.

21.

The only lux'ry that I seek
Is home-brew'd paddy beer,
That feeds my body, makes me meek,
And gives my heart good cheer.

22.

My woman dear, she loves to pass
Her days in labour hard,
Wears bangles cheap and made of brass,
Nor knows she watch nor guard.

23.

At leisure hours, she dances free,
And sings immensely sweet,
Her friends all join with mirth and glee,
That serves us quite a treat.

24.

She cooks our simple food with tact,
She feeds us all, good soul !
And never cares to do an act,
Unless she does the whole.

25.

With muddy hands, she pastes our floor,
She sweeps our yard so clean,
She feels for beggars at our door,
Whenever they are seen.

26.

She takes good care of all our stock,
A house-wife rare of gift,

Holloway's Pills.—Cure for Indigestion.—Indigestion, with torpidity of the liver, is the curse of thousands, who spend each day with accumulated sufferings, all of which may be avoided by taking Holloway's Pills according to their accompanying directions. They strengthen and invigorate every organ subservient to digestion. Their action is purifying, healing and strengthening. They may be safely taken without interfering with ordinary pursuits, or requiring much restriction in diet. They quickly remove noise and giddiness in the head, and dispel low spirits and nervous fears. These balsamic Pills work the cure without debilitating or exhausting the system ; on the contrary, they conserve and support the vital principle by substituting pure for impure blood.

WEEKLYANA.

THE Abolitionists in their stress made too much of Mr. Justice Prinsep's supposed condemnation of Jury Trial in Bengal, until he looked more like an African Mumbo Jumbo than a British Judge. No wonder that this experienced Judge and text-writer has taken the earliest opportunity to set himself right with the public. Not much expenditure of breath was required for the righting operation. The misunderstood and misrepresented Judge had only to utter from the bench—"No Jury would accept the version of the" &c. In refusing an application for a rule to shew cause why the conviction and sentence of six months' rigorous imprisonment of three prisoners accused of rioting in a jury district, before a bench consisting of himself and Mr. Justice Ghose, Mr. Justice Prinsep remarked,

"No jury will accept it."

Whereupon, counsel for the prisoners,

"Mr. Hill.—The jury will have nothing to accept now, at least in the moment."

Prinsep, J.—Yes; but I think jurors are the best judges in determining the bona fides of claims like this.

Mr. Hill.—I hope this will be reported in the papers, as this opinion comes from one of the oldest members of the Bench.

Ghose, J.—I entirely concur with what my learned colleague has said. Their lordships, after hearing Mr. Hill, saw no reason to interfere, and rejected the application."

THE outrageous haste in which the Trial has been virtually abolished in Bengal, has roused English indignation. The Overland Mail, a well-informed Conservative paper, not enamoured of Trial by Jury, thus speaks of the Elliottic Notification:—

"We had not thought that the Indian authorities were sufficiently enamoured of Mr. Dadabhai Naoroji to present him gratuitously with a splendid opportunity for a parliamentary debut. They seem however to have done so. A Times telegram from Calcutta announces that trial by jury has been abolished by 'notification'—there is a charming simplicity about these Indian arrangements for suspending legal and constitutional rights which many a good English Radical in his haste for reforms must almost envy!—in Bengal District Courts. Now, we know that there is a good deal to be said against the manner in which native juries discharge their duties. They very often do not discharge them at all, but, as in the good old time satirised in Hudibras,

—give their verdict

As if they felt the case, not heard it.

There may be excellent reasons for proposing to do away with the jury system, especially in inferior courts. But what Indian official could have conceived the notion of issuing an order of this kind when a Radical Ministry was in power, and before the public mind at home had been carefully prepared for the reform by a demonstration of its necessity? We have often remarked how liable Indian officials are to fall out of touch with public feeling at home, and this is a peculiarly unhappy example of it. Mr. Dadabhai Naoroji must be dancing a saraband over this ill-advised order, and, unless the Secretary of State should meanwhile quash it, there will be a lively field day for the National Congress and the downtrodden Native 'on an early day' after next Sessions opens."

THE criminal charge against the Raja of Ramnad which dissuaded the Governor of Madras from partaking of the expensive hospitality of the Raja, is rape. It is being investigated by the Assistant Superintendent of Police. The Raja has applied that the Head Assistant Magistrate himself take up the enquiry.

A STATUTORY Civilian is under a cloud in the Madras Presidency. Mr. Rama Chandra Row, the Sub-Collector and Joint-Magistrate of Tinnevely, is charged with bribery and corruption in his capacity of Sub-Collector of Madura. Mr. Winterbotham, Collector of Tanjore, and Mr. Vencoba Charriar, Sub-Judge of Tanjore and a relative of the accused, have been appointed to enquire into the charges. The Native Commissioner has asked to be relieved of the embarrassing situation.

THE Englishman announces that "Rai Jaiprakash Lal, Dewan of Dumraon, has placed Rs. 25,000 in the hands of Mr. F. H. Skrine, Collector of Shahabad, to be expended in works of public utility in that District."

The Englishman leaves us in the dark—probably because, as we suspect, our contemporary itself does not know—whether it is the gift of the Dewan Sahab or of the Maharaja Bahadoor. The Dewan himself, we believe, is competent to do a striking act of beneficence, and when the time comes he will certainly not be found wanting.

THE Bengal papers were ringing for weeks with the praises of a titular Maharaja of this town for investing in the name of his mother a lac of rupees in charity, after no end of calculation extending over a series of years. But they hardly note the gift by a Parsi lady—the widow of the late Nusseerwanji Manockji Petit—to the Parsi Orphanage of twice that sum, on the occasion of the anniversary of the death of her husband. And this Rs. 200,000 over and above the magnificent donation made by her on the occasion of her husband's death. Too much cannot be made of such munificence. But court news-men, demoralised by "the rarity of Christian charity" or Heathen, have lost the sense of proportion in respect of gifts. They are silent where they should sing, and are copious where they might with better taste be brief.

THE Bombay Gazette learns from a correspondent at Hyderabad that

"the political changes which have recently startled that city by their apparent suddenness, are at an end. The rumours that the relations of His Highness the Nizam and Sir Asman Jah were strained, and that the position of the latter was insecure, have received a decisive contradiction from the Nizam himself. At the interview with the Resident on Tuesday last, His Highness stated that he desired it to be known that any difference which had existed was at an end, that he had entire confidence in the loyalty of Sir Asman Jah, and that he had no desire that there should be any further changes in the personnel of the Government."

Mere springes to catch wood-cocks.

THE Morning Post of Nov. 19 writes:—

"The Simla News has been taken to task by the Lahore paper for having written in an unseemly manner about an officer and sportsman of very high standing; and it retorts by thanking heaven that no Native State can produce against it 'a receipt for Rs. 5,000 signed by an indiscreet journalist, the policy in whose columns was too palpably plain in exposing the object of the subsidy.' To what particular paper does the Simla News refer? Our contemporary might throw a little more light on this remarkable transaction. The sooner the gutter journal in question is exposed the better."

THE Special Court, composed of Mr. H. F. Evans and Major Thornton, to try Ram Chunder and others for the murder of Kunj Behari Lal, a member of the Ulwar State Council, has sentenced Ram Chunder and Akhai Sing to death, Buddha to transportation for life, and Chandra to seven years' rigorous imprisonment. The Court thus disposed of the plea of justification:—

"They submit not only that the Maharaja assented to the conspiracy, but that he ordered the death of Kunj Behari Lal, and that they thus had legal warrant for taking his life in the manner that they did. The burden of proving this lies on them. They are not entitled to demand that any inference should be drawn from the letters and conduct of the Maharaja that is not strictly warranted by the language of those letters. The accused, Ram Chunder, has, while claiming immunity from punishment on the ground that he was acting under the orders of his sovereign, observed the completest reticence as to the course of events and the circumstances which led to the murder, although he must have personal knowledge of them. Even if it cannot be said that he was bound to lay before the Court the whole of the facts within his knowledge, yet he cannot take advantage of his silence. The burden lies on him to prove his defence affirmatively, and his silence, therefore, warrants the conclusion that nothing he can say would throw any further light on the matter which would be favourable to his case. There is absolutely nothing to show that the plan for the murder of Kunj Behari Lal originated with the Maharaja, and therefore the active part taken by Ram Chunder, both in the preliminary measures taken by him and in the actual accomplishment of the murder, points to him as the originator of the plot. It lay on him to show that it did not, and he has made no attempt to do so. Ram Chunder, who, whatever may have been the origin of the conspiracy against Kunj Behari Lal, was from first to last the mainspring of that conspiracy, is a man of undoubted ability and intelligence. The Maharaja was a young man, whose physical constitution had been ruined by his indulgence in drink, and whose moral nature, it may be safely inferred, had not escaped deterioration from the same cause. The close and confidential intimacy and friendship that existed between the two has been amply demonstrated. That Ram Chunder should have acquired ascendancy over the weaker character of the Maharaja can barely be doubted. That the latter, irritated by Kunj Behari Lal's actions and behaviour, should have felt, and given expression to a wish that he could rid himself of this officious stranger, would be natural enough; that he should have the strength of mind to deliberately plan his death, and of his own motion to authorize Ram Chunder to set on foot and carry out a scheme for his murder, is improbable, and cannot be assumed without positive evidence to that effect. For it must be remembered that there is no evidence to show that the Maharaja was in any way cognizant of the plot till Akhai Singh was brought before him on 16th April, and much had been done before that. On the other hand, it is far from improbable that Ram Chunder, the friend and confidant of the Maharaja, should be willing to take advantage of the weakness of his master and his hatred of Kunj Behari Lal, to obtain from him a promise of protection in a plot which would at once rid him of a rival and secure for the Maharaja a release from the restraint and annoyance which he resented so strongly.

To sum up, we are of opinion that the contention that the letters of the Maharaja furnished any such sovereign command from the ruler of the Ulwar State as was in fact, or was supposed by the accused in good faith to be binding on them, so as to warrant their committing what was an offence against the law of their country, is altogether untenable. It is hardly necessary to add that, in the absence of any such binding command, there is nothing in the law of the Ulwar State to render the act of killing Kunj Behari justifiable by that law. With this plea the defence set up by the accused Ram Chander and Buddha, falls to the ground.

Now for this utterly unjustifiable murder, for reasons which will appear from what we have already said, we hold the accused Ram Chander to be morally the most deeply responsible of all those, from the highest to the lowest, who connived at it. The influence that he undoubtedly exercised over the Maharaja was made use of, not, as it might have been, to prevent, but to secure the accomplishment of this crime. His guilt was, in our opinion, of the gravest character.

Akhai Singh was a hired assassin, a man who, to save himself from, it may be, imprisonment, but also to secure pecuniary advantages, was ready to take the life of an innocent man guiltless of any offence against him.

Buddha, though present when the murder took place, did not, there is reason to believe, strike any blow himself. By reason of his presence he was technically guilty of the substantive offence of murder, but he did not actually do more than abet the murder. Although he showed no scruples in using every effort to instigate Akhai Singh to commit the murder, yet we cannot ignore the fact that he neither received nor hoped to receive any pecuniary or other tangible reward or benefit to himself individually. We, therefore, regard his guilt, serious though it was, as less in degree than that of either of the two last-named accused.

As to Chandra, the evidence as to his conduct before the murder is inconclusive: that he was fully cognizant of and privy to the plot is clear from his conduct at the time of, and immediately subsequent to, the murder; but the part that he played was comparatively insignificant, and he also does not appear to have been influenced by any hope of personal advantage."

We cordially concur in the argument.

At the Incorporated Law Society's provincial meeting, Mr. G. R. Dod read a paper in which occurs the following:—

"Recently in France a lady has been called to the bar, and at Montana, United States, a lady also is practising as a Barrister, and is now seeking the appointment of Attorney-General. When ladies are admitted to the English bar, some serious questions will arise with regard to the forensic costume, and doubtless it will be necessary for a full Court to decide as to the nature of it. Possibly some ladies might be satisfied with a doctor's gown similar to that worn by the Princess of Wales, while others might prefer the parti-coloured gowns that were worn by members of the bar about two centuries ago. To any who may be interested in such matters, I shall be pleased to produce some illustrations copied from a law treatise written about the fifteenth century. By some it is stated that at the death of Queen Anne the bar went into mourning, and has never yet come out of it; by others it is asserted that the black gown came into use about the time of the Protectorate. However, it is probable that the ladies may not think black altogether becoming to them. Then, with regard to the wig, they might demur to the use of it, especially when they are informed that it was first worn to conceal the fact that the head had been shaven—for when priests were forbidden to continue to act as advocates in Court they took to covering the head with a wig that it might not be known that formerly they had belonged to the priestly order. Lord Abinger expressed a hope that the time would come when the wig and gown, which he described as "mummeries," would be entirely discarded—but there appears to be no such prospect at the present time, and I for one have no wish to see them done away with. The question of day or some other headdress would have to be fully considered by the Court. Many ladies who are favoured with good heads of hair may prefer wearing it uncovered in Court; but the Judges would probably have to decide as to the way it should be worn—that is to say whether perfectly plain, parted in the middle, or rough and wholly according to the present fashion, and whether ringlets are permissible, and whether or not the hair may be tied up in ribbons, and, if so, what colour; or it might be awkward, if the Judge upon hearing the voice of a lady advocate should be compelled to say that he heard some one speaking, but was unable to see any one addressing him. It might be necessary to set apart rooms at the Law Courts for the accommodation of coiffeurs for the ladies."

What time these enlightened British take in adopting the most obvious reforms! They still at home carry the burden of the wig "mummery." In India the severity of the climate early lashed the lawyers out of the nonsense.

THE following letter has been addressed by Mr. H. J. S. Cotton, Chief Secretary to the Government of Bengal, to the Inspector-General of Police, Bengal:—

"Sir,—I am directed to invite your careful attention to the discussion which took place in the Bengal Legislative Council, recorded in pages 1715 to 1718 of the Supplement to the Calcutta Gazette, dated 14th September, 1892, and especially to the observations of the Hon'ble the President of the Council, on the subject of an amendment proposed by the Hon'ble the Advocate-General in the Bill to amend the Village

Chowkidari Act, 1870, to the following effect:—

'Provided always that no chowkidar appointed under the provisions of this Act shall be employed by any Police Officer on his private concern, or on any duties not by this Act made obligatory on such chowkidar, and that any Police Officer so employing any such chowkidar shall be punishable with fine which may extend to fifty rupees.'

2. This proviso, with the exception of the penalty attached, met with the approval of the majority of the Council, and was ultimately omitted from the Bill on the express understanding that the Executive Government would undertake to give complete effect to the object which the Council had in view when they accepted the proviso. This object was to prohibit the use of chowkidars on menial employments.

3. The Lieutenant-Governor has observed with satisfaction that the following rule has been introduced into the instructions to police officers for holding chowkidari muster parades:—

'XV.—Chowkidars must not be taken away from their villages for miscellaneous or other work except in cases of special urgency, or when they are required to guard or escort prisoners. Police officers employing chowkidars on their own private business, or utilising them as menial servants in any capacity, will be severely punished and will be considered liable to summary dismissal.'

4. This subject has also been referred to in the 8th paragraph of the Government Resolution, dated 14th September, 1892, on your Annual Police Report for 1891, as follows:—

'Next to low caste and disreputable antecedents, one of the causes which has done much to degrade the village chowkidar in his own esteem and that of the public, and to lessen his influence for good, has been the habit, too common among the Provincial Police, of treating him as a beast of burden and a menial servant. The Government is pledged to do all it can to stop this custom, and special orders are under issue on the subject; but the Lieutenant-Governor takes this opportunity of giving publicity to his desire that Magistrates and District Superintendents of Police should set their faces sternly against the practice. When the chowkidar recognises that he is a servant of the State and bears a sanad of appointment under the Magistrate's hand and seal, it may be expected that he himself will refuse to submit to ill-treatment, and that the inferior police officers will understand that his status has been so raised that menial employment must not be thought of in connection with him.'

5. The Lieutenant-Governor now directs me to say that it is expected of every District Superintendent of Police that he will vigorously carry out these orders, and will make it a special subject of inquiry, when inspecting a thana or outpost, whether any improper use is made of the services of chowkidars, and whether the orders of Government on the subject are known and understood by all parties. He should also devote a special paragraph in his annual report to the mention of what he has done in this direction, and should give information regarding any instances he may find in which the rule on the subject has been neglected or traversed. You are also requested to devote a special paragraph to this in your own annual report, and both you yourself and the Deputy Inspectors-General should, on occasion of your local inspections, not fail to give your particular attention to the enforcement of these orders.

6. I am to add that the substance of these orders regarding the relations between chowkidars and the regular police should be posted up in every thana and outpost in the province in English and in the vernacular."

DR. Charles Page, in the Arena, is of opinion that typhoid fever, as at present treated by drugging and feeding the patient, is no better than the playing of a stream of petroleum upon a burning building. He says that until the crisis is past, food in typhoid fever is a drug, and a harmful drug, and the one thing that a typhoid fever patient needs is to fast. The Doctor has observed the effects of fasting from six to twelve days to be in the highest degree productive of health and comfort to the patients. He has a specific for cure of the disease. It is hydropathic. The treatment consists of immersing the patient in a comparatively cold bath when the temperature reaches 101 to 103 deg. F. (according to circumstances, including that of the physician's knowledge of the principle involved and—his courage.) Doctor Page has observed that while under the feeding system, the mortality is 20 per cent., under the cold treatment, it is only two or even less.

The learned of Europe are now gradually discovering for themselves truths familiar in the East to the good housewife and the experienced mater familias.

THERE has lately been at a municipal office in the neighbourhood of the metropolis a scene of more than usual excitement. The Vice-Chairman, seeing a bullock belonging to the municipality limping, enquired of a low-caste man (a chamar) in municipal employ how the animal had been injured. The man pleaded ignorance. Thereupon, he was struck. He took it quietly, saying nothing. He was asked again. He explained that he had been away on some other business on which he had been sent by the Vice-Chairman himself and that on his return he had found the bullock in that condition: Under the circumstances, how could he know? That explanation got him another blow. Thereat he said "Baboo! I am a low man and your servant, but you should not beat me for nothing." He got another and severer licking for his appeal. It was now time enough for the worm to turn, and the brawny, navy-chested Nonaryan rushed upon the civic magnate and attacked him. The latter is no typical Bengali, being indeed a Baboo of fortune and yesterday, but a strong-built, muscular man. He was no match, however, for the Pariah Hercules, who seized him by the neck and pounded him well—or ill, we should say perhaps. The municipal staff in attendance were, we are afraid, remiss in promptly rescuing the Vice.

HERE is the Isis Unveiled—of border life in America:—

"A notorious desperado, known as 'Commodore' Miller, who, it is believed, has been concerned in many dark crimes in the neighbourhood of Dallas (Texas,) was overtaken by a band of his pursuers on September 29th. Four bloodhounds led the sheriff's officers to the place where the robber was found, but the effort to capture him was unsuccessful. Miller killed three of the bloodhounds, and then ran to the underbrush for protection and shelter. Although four of the officers had been within 50 yards of him, as was afterwards ascertained, not one of them had the courage to attempt to capture the robber. Another pack of bloodhounds has been secured, and the exciting search is being continued. Orders have been given to shoot the robber on his appearing in sight."

We had no idea that Texas is still in that condition. Heathen savagery could scarcely match it.

NOTES & LEADERETTES

with
OUR OWN NEWS.

TODAY the Viceroy holds a Levée and Investiture at Madras.

Today is also the last day—as the unsophisticated public will be surprised to learn—for sending the cards for the Levée at Government House, Calcutta. The Viceroy being still far from the capital, it does not occur to the lieges that the day of bowing is near. Nor has any reminder been vouchsafed them. The fact is that the usual advertisements of the Levée and the Drawing Room have been withheld this year by our very economical Government. This is the right earnest way in which effect is being given to the Secretary of State's order for retrenchment in the Military expenditure of the Empire. As a consequence, many loyal subjects will miss the opportunity of paying their respects to Her Majesty in the person of her Representative. But salus populi est suprema lex. Or, is this playing at hide and seek with the poor public a dodge diplomatic for diminishing the crowd and relieving the Viceroy?

WE have so uniformly served good poetry to our readers that they are in danger of losing relish from surfeit. Accordingly, we to-day venture on laying before them a simpler dish—rudimentary verse, if so much—the genuine thoughts and aspirations of the Koles at the late visit of the Lieutenant-Governor in English metre.

A JOINT memorial against the proposed Cadastral Survey for Behar has gone up to the Viceroy from the British Indian Association, the Behar Landholders' Association, the Bhagulpore Landholders' Association, the Tirhoot Landholders' Association, the Zemindari Panchayet and the Indian Property Association. Where, we wonder, is the Indian Association, which was the first to lend its helping hand to the agitation against the Survey? No matter if it does not join the memorial. The associated Associations are strong enough by themselves to command a hearing. Each, indeed, is a power. And on this particular subject as authoritative as interest can make or unmake.

The memorial is a clever production so far as it goes. It does not content itself with travelling over beaten track but starts new opposition of its own.

The joint memorialists object to the introduction of the measure without sufficient previous intimation, to the adoption of survey, imposing heavy land taxation, without fresh legislation and without a public opportunity for discussing the measure. They contend that the entire cost ought to be a charge on the general revenues of the country. They point out that the order for survey makes no mention of its authority. Supposing it were the Bengal Tenancy Act, they argue that that Act gives not the authority, and that it would be illegal and ultra vires to proceed with the survey. Besides, it is carrying the Bengal Tenancy Act too far beyond its legitimate scope, to use it for mere statistical purposes—to draw out of it a complete and accurate organ for discovery of economic facts, for prevention of famine and for definite or authoritative registration of areas and fixing of rents. A survey under that Act can deal only with the respective rights of landlord and tenant. Nor does the Survey Act empower Government to order a cadastral survey. "It is difficult" for the memorialists "to conceive any measure that would work more oppressively and inequitably than that * * * an unwilling landholder should be forced to submit to be penalized over again in order merely to minister to a pedantic love of illusive administrative symmetry." Then the memorial lays stress on "the grievous proceedings and embittered feelings between landlords and tenants" as the inevitable results of the survey. The estimated cost of survey, it is advanced, does not include "the cost and harassment of the litigation to both the zemindars and the rayyets, much less of the inevitable disturbance of the amicable relations which ought to exist between a zemindar and his rayyets" and the encouragement of illegal combinations against payment of rent. The corrupt amin has a paragraph to himself. The cost of survey is next touched upon and its particular unsuitability at the present moment of scarcity. "To all zemindars and rayyets this would mean a land tax of a very severe character; to very many, it would mean absolute impoverishment, and in some cases even actual ruin." Whether "as a sort of compulsory benevolence" on both the zemindar and rayyet for their future mutual advantage, or as "a measure of relief to the rayyet," the memorialists believe, "it will be 'felt by all classes interested in land as a crushing and disastrous measure of gratuitous and wholly unnecessary penal exaction, without any countervailing advantage to the State.'" The measure is "utterly devoid of even a microscopical advantage—political or fiscal—to the State."

THIS is going round the globe, to show what fools Moslems are and how they would be better for being despoiled of their territories and placed under the heels of the orthodox Russians and enlightened Europeans generally:—

"There is an interesting story told as to how the Shereef came to his high position. He is said to have been the son of a previous Shereef by one of the female slaves. When this Shereef was dying he was asked whom he would nominate as his successor. He replied: 'My boy that is fond of playing with my gold-headed walking-stick.' The boy's mother, who was in the dying chamber, immediately left the room, and handing the stick to her child, told him not to give it to any one. After a short time the old man died. Search was made for the stick, when, to the amazement of the faithful, the heir was found to be a slave's child, and they were bound to accept him as their head."

The suggestion is that Christians would not have blindly acted on the letter but dived into the spirit. They would have taken evidence to identify the heir under the noncupative will. We are not so sure of all that. Such things happen in Christendom every day. The story of succession given above is a lamentable one, but it was a mere accident, and accidents, the Europeans always tell us, will occur in the best-regulated households.

The next suggestion is the absurdity of superstitious adherence to the hereditary principle! But are Mecca and Cairo and Constantinople the only places where this principle is observed? Is it unknown in the enlightened Christendom? Does not the English writer of the foregoing paragraph know that somewhere out of the pale of Islam the national recognition of greatness, goodness, and wisdom may result in the apotheosis of littleness, vileness, and folly, that the public reward of striking ability may make legislators of asses, that the success of a Heaven-born captain on land or sea may lead to the permanent ennobling of poltroons with right of interference in the state? In Mussulman polity the hereditary principle is, unfortunately, rather at a discount.

After all, we believe the whole is a yarn of the American kind.

THE Chicago Exhibition will flood the English language as used in the older hemisphere with a large accession of new words. Here in Mr. Sala's Echoes in the Englishman we have notice of the introductory importation of two:—

"Accommodation at Chicago would seem to be somewhat costly just now, and I read that many visitors from New York are paying ten dollars or two pounds a day for rooms 'which they would decline to reside in for nothing at home.' 'But,' says one sage journalist of the West, 'of course you couldn't have a celebration like this without a large amount of kicking.' Costly board and lodging are characterised as a kick. Then there is another kick about General Miles refusing to march a body of United States troops 18 miles a day, 'to be yanked round the city and looked at.' I have an idea of what a Yankee is, but what is it to be 'yanked?' Other 'kickers' are people who are left out of the invitation list. There were 11,000 Press applications for tickets, but only 1,700 were issued."

AN interesting glimpse into the workshop of several eminent men of letters is afforded by the following opening paragraph of a short paper:—

"Mr. Andrew Lang remarks somewhere that he believes he has not a single dictionary in his house. Browning, on the other hand, when it was definitely decided that he was to adopt literature as his profession, 'qualified himself for it,' as Mrs. Sutherland Orr tells us, 'by reading and digesting the whole of Johnson's Dictionary.' This fact explains his mastery of all the intricacies of the English language. By the way, a legal luminary has so high an opinion of that superseded work that he refuses to accept definitions from other sources. Tennyson is said frequently to consult that odd aid to poesy, a rhyming dictionary; and Wordsworth, like Byron, constantly made use of vocabularies. 'I never compose,' he once said to a visitor, 'without having a dictionary at hand, ready to turn to when I want a word.' In that case a dictionary must have been his inseparable companion, and it is not a bad one, either, even for the hypothetical 'desert island.' Lord Chatham told one of his friends that he had twice read from beginning to end Butler's Dictionary. He was rewarded for his trouble. Fox said of his great antagonist that he always used the word, and that each word had its own place, and was regulated, not by chance, but by law. In later life Chatham used to have the dictionary read aloud to him once a year. He said so many noble and useful words fell out of use, which is very true. Emerson also thought the dictionary 'not a bad book to read,' though for another reason: 'there is no can't in it, no excess of explanation, and it is full of suggestion—the raw material of possible poems and histories. Nothing is wanting but a little 'shuffling,' sorting, ligature, and cartilage.' We have a singular illustration of this proposition in the practice of one of our most eminent men of letters. This gentleman affirms that there is no book like a dictionary when anybody is in search of new ideas. If he is stranded when preparing a speech, he turns over a few pages of any dictionary, and there finds ample material for the longest oration."—Cassell's Journal.

INDEFINITE humanity in its unit, unconditioned by sex or size, colour or creed, age or race, has just been crystallized and got a name—by an accident. The other day a pair of boots was picked up on the beach at St Leonards by somebody—no need to enquire who. On looking about, he saw the dead body of a girl floating in the sea. He arrested the drift and brought it to the shore, when he was rewarded for his pains by the receipt of a letter to himself, which was found pinned to the clothing. The following are the terms of the touching note to the rescuer of her person—after death:—"Dear Somebody, —May God forgive me for what I am doing, I am tired of my life. God love you all and dear mother. It is no one's fault but my own.—Louis Davies. Don't grieve for me. I don't deserve it." The body was identified as that of an unmarried girl who lived with her parents in the neighbourhood. For all that, we have here another repetition of the ever recurrent tragedy of the Bridge of Sighs, and that little epistle may be taken generally as a prose version of the immortal verse of Hood.

SIR Charles Elliott has afforded relief to the Orthodox learned Mahomedans of Bengal by appointing Shamsul Ulama Moulvi Ahmad, Arabic and Persian Professor of the Presidency College, to the post of Head Moulvi in the Arabic Department of the Calcutta Medressah which becomes vacant on the 1st December, by the retirement of Moulvi Abdool Hai. There was anxiety in consequence of a report that Sir Charles was for a savant from the North-Western Provinces. Nothing could have been more welcome to the Bengal Mahomedans than the advent of a man like Shamsul Ulama Moulvi Abdool Huck, of Khyrabad in Oudh—reputed to be the most distinguished Arabic scholar and author in the whole of India—whom the late Sir William Grey had invited and brought down in 1870. The fear was, that Sir Charles being a personal friend of the Aligarh Reformer, Sir Syud Ahmad Khan, he might bring in a Naturalist.

Two undesirable candidates had actually appeared in the field—one of them a wellknown Wahabi, and the other a follower of the Aligarh school, who has besides adopted the English dress. The claims of both were being trumpeted in the newspapers, although the learned of Bengal were not satisfied that either of them had received a complete Arabic education, or was competent to teach the most difficult works in Arabic literature and science.

WITH Moulvi Ahmad's promotion to the head Moulviship in the Calcutta Medressah, his post in the Presidency College becomes vacant. In filling it up, the Director of Public Instruction cannot be too careful that no one is appointed who has not a thorough acquaintance with Arabic and Persian literature. A deal too much is made nowadays of a knowledge of English in the holder of this post. The result is that efficiency in Arabic learning is sacrificed to a superficial accomplishment. It is wellknown that true Arabic scholars seldom know English. And there is a good reason for this. A difficult language like Arabic can be mastered only by long and single-minded devotion. For Mahomedans the spur to that devotion is faith. Hence such devotees do not care for other languages than Persian, historically if not philologically allied to the Arabic. Accordingly as the educational authorities insist upon a knowledge of English, second-rate and third-rate men—no scholars—are frequently appointed to these chairs, to the detriment of the under-graduates, and the prestige of University education. Students who have taken up Arabic or Persian as their second language, unable to get satisfaction from their regular Arabic and Persian Professors, are driven to take lessons from private tutors possessed of genuine learning, at additional cost, in order to qualify themselves for their examinations. We do not think that a knowledge of English is a sine qua non in a Professor of Arabic and Persian, and we trust that the Director of Public Instruction will give due consideration to this point and thereby save the under-graduates from a troublesome necessity and superfluous burden.

THERE is no end to the exhibitions of Sir Charles Elliott. A pyrotechnist with a full stock, he is continually firing penny-crackers and bombs and throwing up rockets. As a provider of sensation, he has taken the shine out of Sir George Campbell himself. He has kept Bengal in a ferment. Many have suffered and no body is safe. There is no knowing what a day may bring forth. He is turning up every thing with his great toe. Neither men nor institutions can claim anything beyond a nominal consideration. He is certainly above superstition—perhaps above sentiment too. He gives no quarter—his sentence rarely admits of reprieve or respite. He is unquestionably an able man, an indefatigable worker, devoted to his charge and animated by the best intentions. What a proof he affords of the truth that without judgment and mercy everything is vain!

His views and methods are singular. His discoveries are no less queer. He is ever after will-o'-the-wisps. Guided by that spirit-lamp, he is continually coming upon—mares' nests.

Last week we quoted a paragraph from the Resolution on the Board's Land Revenue Administration Report for the year 1891-92, in which Sir Charles Elliott considers it objectionable that courts "award damages in rent-suits to the non-suited party at the rate of 25 per cent. on the amount of rent decreed or claimed." True, he says, that "Sections 2 and 3 of Act VI (B. C.) of 1862, and sections 90 and 91 of Act I (B.C.) of 1879 empower the court to award damages." That law, he considers, not only objectionable, but "in the course of his inspections His Honour formed the opinion that the penalty was awarded with very little consideration." And, as "there is nothing corresponding to this provision in the Bengal Tenancy Act," "the Lieutenant-Governor would like the Board of Revenue to consider whether the power, which is permissive, to award such damages should not be withdrawn by executive order."

The Resolution is under the signature of Mr. C. E. Buckland, who was himself, for many years, in the Board of Revenue.

The Board, we hope, will look before they leap, in the hurry to carry out the order of our precipitate and exacting Lieutenant-Governor. The Bengal Government Resolution on the Land Revenue Administration Report of the Board cites a later enactment to support the view taken of the objectionable character of two earlier ones. The Resolution distinctly says that the Bengal Tenancy Act does not empower the court to award damages. Who could suppose that such a statement in a grave document issued from the Secretariat and published by Government for general information as well as the guidance of the administration, should be open to contradiction? Yet so it is. It is not only a misleading but an absolutely wrong statement, and of course, a very foolish one into the bargain. It avers the non-existence of an existent fact. Is it possible that our copy of the Bengal Tenancy Act reads differently from the one reserved for Government? It certainly does not support the Government statement. Section 68 of Act VIII of 1885 runs thus:—

"(1) If in any suit brought for the recovery of arrears of rent, it appears to the Court that the defendant has, without reasonable or probable cause, neglected or refused to pay the amount of rent due by him, the Court may award to the plaintiff, in addition to the amount decreed for rent and costs, such damages, not exceeding twenty-five per centum on the amount of rent decreed, as it thinks fit:

Provided that interest shall not be decreed when damages are awarded under this section.

(2) If, in any suit brought for the recovery of arrears of rent, it appears to the Court that the plaintiff has instituted the suit without reasonable or probable cause, the Court may award to the defendant, by way of damages, such sum, not exceeding twenty-five per centum on the whole amount claimed by the plaintiff, as it thinks fit."

The old repealed law of Landlord and Tenant,—VIII. (B.C.) of 1869—an Act to amend the procedure in suits between Landlords and Tenants, also allowed damages, thus:—

"Sec. 44. In any suit hereafter to be brought for rent under the provisions of this Act, if it shall appear to the Court that the defendant has, without reasonable or probable cause, neglected or refused to pay the amount due by him, and that he has not, before the institution of the suit, tendered such amount to the plaintiff or his duly authorised agent, or in case of the refusal of the plaintiff or such agent to receive the amount tendered, has not deposited such amount in the Court before the institution of the suit in manner hereinafter mentioned, it shall be lawful for the Court to award to the plaintiff, in addition to the amount decreed for rent and costs, such damages, not exceeding twenty-five per centum on the amount of rent decreed, as the Court may think fit. These damages, if awarded, as well as the amount of rent and costs decreed in the suit, shall carry interest at the rate of twelve per centum per annum from the date of decree until payment thereof."

We wonder what are the Courts the Lieutenant-Governor visited which, since the passing of the Bengal Tenancy Act, could award damages under Act VI (B. C.) of 1862. Certainly no court would be justified in awarding any such damage under the said Act VI, since 1st November, 1885, when the Bengal Tenancy Act came into operation. For the Bengal Tenancy Act repeals the whole of the Bengal Act VI of 1862. All that reference to the Board of Revenue is Love's Labour Lost.

Sir Charles Elliott would seem to be an Oriental Prince, less his magnificence. He would have his finger in every pie. He would be the centre of all authority and power. He would interfere with the powers of the High Court. He would not leave the Church alone. He had lately been encroaching on the authority of the Bishop. He is now on his way to deprive the subordinate courts of the power of discretion in respect of damages in rent suits. He seems to think that the discretionary power exercisable by them is entirely at the option of the Lieutenant-Governor. When the law is not positive or imperative, he thinks that he has the power to withdraw it when he believes it objectionable, because, we fancy, the appointment of magistrates rests with him. And Sir Charles Elliott is a Moulvi—a learned man—among the officials. So much for the constitutional knowledge of the great Indian Civil Service!

SOCIALISM IN ENGLAND.

THE demonstration in Trafalgar Square, on November 13, to commemorate the "Bloody Sunday" of 1887, which Reuter would have ignored if he could, was a far more important event than the intrigues of minor royalty which he so religiously chronicled. This demonstration marks a distinct advance in democratic manners and morals. Unlike many of its predecessors, it was characterised by a total absence of violence, and may, therefore, be taken as an evidence of a more definite programme of action which the socialist party in England has adopted, guided by its past experience. Although England was the country last reached by the wave of revolutionary socialism, which had long before passed over the continent, often attended by such dreadful results of the disruption of the fundamental principles of government, it is not inconsiderably affected by the movement now that wilder visions of social transformation have been opened before the proletariat of the country. The foundation of the propaganda was practically laid in 1883, by men, many of whom had made their figures in the world, and four years later, when the movement had spread widely over the country, it was no longer mistaken as a political factor in the State. Its principal founders were Mr. William Morris, the poet; Mr. H. M. Hyndman, a journalist of standing and ability; Mr. J. Stuart Glennie, and Mr. Belfort Bax, both authors of repute; Dr. Aveling, a popular lecturer on science, and son-in-law of Karl Marx; Miss Helen Taylor, step-daughter of John Stuart Mill; and the Rev. Stewart Headlam. The programme of the Social Democratic Federation, by which name the organisation was called, demanded, among other concessions, the nationalisation of land and all means of production, direct legislation by the people, direct election of all functionaries by adult suffrage, gratuitous justice, gratuitous, compulsory, and equal education, abolition of standing armies, Home Rule for Ireland, an eight hours' day, State erection of workmen's dwellings, progressive income tax, proportional representation, abolition of the House of Lords, and separation of Church and State. At present the fortunes of English socialism depend, in a large measure, upon Mr. John Burns, whose firm determination and excellent organisation have established a new labour movement, which is likely to play a conspicuous part in the history of England in the immediate future. Various societies have, of late, sprung up, representing, in some places, a fanatic interest in socialism, but none of these revolutionary bodies has a complete organisation like those of continental countries. Nor is socialism in England gone to such an absurd length as to maintain that attitude of rank indifferentism, not to say absolute hostility, to religion, as it has done principally in Germany and Russia. Religion is exactly the rock on which many a movement of this description has stranded. "For my part," says De Tocqueville, "I doubt whether man can ever support at once complete religious independence and entire public freedom; and I am inclined to think that if faith be wanting in him he must serve, and if he be free he must believe." While the continental socialists have generally assailed the Church and religion, those in England have wisely followed the course of religious neutrality and toleration.

The "Bloody Sunday" of 1887 is memorable in the history of England as the day on which, for the first time, the law-abiding bourgeoisie were awakened from their supposed security by the insurrection of the unemployed mass of London. The events which happened on that day were but sequels to those of the 8th February, 1886, when a monster meeting was held in Trafalgar Square, under the banners of the Fair Trade League and the Revolutionary Social Democrats. At the close of that meeting, the mob marched by Pall Mall, St. James's street, and Piccadilly to Hyde Park, breaking and plundering the club houses and private residences which lay on their way. The damages done were estimated at £50,000. Stringent measures as regards the holding of public meetings in Trafalgar Square were shortly afterwards passed by Sir Charles Warren, the Commissioner of Police. This, however, more excited the mob, and they proceeded to organise another attack on the city. Mr. Cunningham Graham, M.P., and Mr. Burns, the principal ringleaders of the riot, were sentenced to equal terms of six months' imprisonment. The rules about meeting in Trafalgar Square were strictly enforced, but they were subsequently relaxed on particular days of the week. What the agitators now demand is the unrestricted right of meeting in the Square, together with the control of the police by the County Council.

There are some who prophesy that we are within measurable distance of most stirring social agitation, and, in proof of their assertion, they cite the number of socialist organisations—democratic, anarchist, dilettante—which have sprung into existence in London recently. There are already four small anarchist clubs in London, and some of the principal anarchist leaders—for example, Prince Krapotkin and Victor Dave—live there. Besides, there are various amateur societies—such as the Christian Society, the Fabian Society, the societies formed under Ruskinian inspiration—which take an appreciative, if not an active, interest in socialism. The large body of men, eking out a hand-to-mouth existence—the “submerged tenth”—have found that on a well-timed rising alone they could count for the amelioration of their condition. Among the employed, also, “strikes” are but mild manifestations of the furious spirit which may break out into open violence, should occasions arise. That we are on the eve of a gigantic social revolution—a revolution, which will immensely alter the relations of society—none who has carefully watched the tide of events for the past few years, will venture to contradict. Where previous revolutions have left behind them an unquiet and turbulent spirit—a “valetudinary habit,” as Burke calls it, “of making the extreme medicine of the State its daily bread,” it is unlikely to expect a peaceful termination of the issues proceeding from that cause.

HINDU MUSIC AND A MAHOMEDAN POET IN BENGALI.*

[FIRST NOTICE.]

THIS is a most respectable looking Bengali book with every mechanical and outward recommendation. Printed, carefully and well, in large type, with good ink, on good English paper (from John Dickinson) with liberality of margin, of a handy size encased in stout boards, it wants but some expenditure in gold leaf and muslin or morocco to make it an editio de luxe. Old eyes in especial will bless the author for his bold uncrowded typography. The whole get-up is appropriate to a work on a Fine Art. Neither the Great Master who gives name to the book, nor his imperial master himself, if either could see, would have cause for grumble.

In another external respect this publication—we use the word

* A Treatise on the Science of Hindu Music. Edited by Harish Chandra Datta, Professor of Oriental Languages to the Foreigners, Sangita Tānatana. &c., [in Bengali] Calcutta; 1299 Bengali Era (corresponding with the Christian year 1892.)

advisedly—is somewhat unique. Indeed, in more than one respect, it is a bibliographic curiosity. In the first place, it is not one book but two books by different authors not merely bound within the same cover but linked together, almost organically. The title page which we transcribe below denominates one—the main—performance and the performer, but another book is quietly carried as a stowaway in the hold at the back, and the name of the bookwright is just mentioned, confidentially as it were, in the Preface. And thereby hangs a tale. Partnership in book-making is nothing singular. It has always existed and is now more than ever common. In these days of division of labour and specialisation of studies, we often see, more than one man of letters saluting the public from the same title-page—nay more, sometimes the productions of half a dozen or even a dozen writers stitched together by the same thread. But there is a peculiarity in the present case. The circumstances and authorship of the book ignored in both the Oriental and the English little, supply ground for suspicion. As we have said, it is a curiosity of literature, which differentiates it from not only its greater, more prominent fellow, but from all other literary efforts. While the book is the production of a Hindu, the booklet is the production of a Mahomedan. Now it is not the writing of a book by a Mahomedan that is provocative of a stare as the writing of the particular book. Had it been a Persian or Urdu work, there would have been no question. But a Bengali book by a Mussulman—even a Bengali Mussulman—is still uncommon.

There is a dialect of the Bengali to which the lower classes of Islam in the far East are partial, called Mussulman Bengali, in which there is a small and insignificant literature. A publication in that platois would be no great thing, but the subsidiary book before us is not in that lingo. Under the late expansion of popular education and vernacular studies, this Cambrian anomaly has more than ever been pushed to a corner, and Hindus and Mussulmans alike are learning the same standard Bengali from the same books, and under the same system. There have recently been some attempts by Mahomedans to start vernacular newspapers under Mahomedan conduct. But as yet hardly any Mahomedans have ventured on the field of authorship. Not but what a few books have appeared with Mahomedan names on the title-pages. But they are of the books that are no books, according to Charles Lamb. We do not remember any strictly literary publication. This, we believe, is the first appearance in a durable referencable form in print of Bengali poetry in Bengali. We remember metrical contributions to some of the Mahomedan newspapers. There were Mahomedan impressarios of Kobi bands and possibly they had Mahomedan composers and song-writers to give them tunes and words to the music. But those songs have not been preserved. Strange as it may sound, we have seen Hindu hymns by Mahomedans, but except a few specimens unearthed by that excellent Bengali enquirer Baboo Koylas Chunder Singh, they are unknown and (speaking in no Hamiltonian sense) unknowable. Here, then, we have at length the first contribution to Bengali literature by a Mahomedan in the shape of the first productions of the Mussulman Muse in Bengali.

TRADING WITHOUT A LICENSE.

A CURIOUS AND INTERESTING CASE.

(From the Calcutta Daily Papers.)

A somewhat curious case came on before Dr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee, Honorary Presidency Magistrate, on the 25th ultimo. The Calcutta Municipality through their License Inspector charged one Juggobundhu Dass, of 82, Cross-street (Burra Bazar), for carrying on trade in Calcutta—purchasing goods in Calcutta for transport and sale beyond the limits of Calcutta—without a license under Class IV, section 87, Act II. (B.C.) of 1888. The hearing of the case lasted for two days.

The municipal pleader appeared for the prosecution, and two vakils of the High Court appeared for the defence.

The following judgment was delivered:—

This is a curious and interesting case. The defendant Juggobondhu Dass has been regularly fined year after year for trading without a license. The Corporation has put in certified copies of the judgments of this Court convicting and fining him Rs. 38 for not taking out a license for carrying on his firm in the year 1889-90, and again fining him Rs. 37-8 for the same offence in 1890-91. After that, one would have thought that the defendant would take care not to come in again before the Court on any such charge. But he has been brought up again. Familiarity seems to have rubbed all feeling of discredit out of him. Any decent-minded man would rather lose a few rupees than permit an unbroken continuity of annual fines to be recorded against him. This defendant was not of that mind. Of course, if he has any substantial legal grounds for doing business within municipal limits without the expense of a license he will have their benefit, notwithstanding the appearances against him. Unfortunately he cannot show any valid reason. The onus lies with him of showing very strong grounds, indeed, for exemption, and he has only the flimsiest plausible excuse. It appears that two other persons on the same premises have been summoned on the same charge; and according to the defendant they all—including himself—constitute one concern. That would make them liable to one license. But they have not taken out a single license between them. From the amount of money they have been spending during all these many years on pleaders and solicitors of the High Court, they are perfectly well able to pay—only they are determined not to give a pice if they can help. They themselves are intelligent, smart men, and they have clever advisers. They have presented a queer situation to the Municipality and the Court. Their case is this. They are cloth dealers of Maldah, where they have different shops on different accounts. They sell European piece-goods as well as country dhotees, buying in Calcutta. They have no business at Calcutta, but they have combined to hire a house between them for the accommodation of the agents they severally send to buy for them severally, to store the goods bought, pack them and despatch them. They keep an establishment in common for these agents or themselves, for not uncommonly each man comes to Calcutta to buy his own investments. There is no sale here—no business as they contend, there being no profit or loss here. Such is their story. The whole seems to me a brilliant device for carrying on business and making profit without paying one's dues. It is an original plan by which any number of persons in the inland export trade may deprive the Town Corporation of its license fees. The objection of the defendant to pay is simply technical—and technical of a very curious kind—so that he must make it out to the fullest, in every particular. It is curious that the defence now alleges a joint and again a separate business each time that any kind of status is suited to evade payment. A unit at Calcutta they are three entities at Maldah. Such a diversity of relations between the same persons is not impossible. But it requires proof. The convenient allegation of it is nothing. I must say that it has not been made out to my satisfaction, that Juggobondhu Dass or Sree Churn Dass and Co., or whatever the names of the firm are, of 82, Cross-street, is a single business at Calcutta which branches out into three separate concerns at Maldah, notwithstanding the evidence of Rajoni Kanta Dass and the Marwarce cloth-dealer, whom the defendant's jamadar brought with him, and notwithstanding the single book in which the transactions carried on on the premises are entered. The thing has been managed with great ingenuity, and we must not allow ourselves to be arrested by these appearances. To me it has all the aspect of three firms unified for the nonce to evade fiscal visitations. The plea that the several Maldah firms have no business at Calcutta is a mere pretence. It seems to me that Calcutta is the most important place of business to them. Everything depends upon buying good things, buying them cheap, and godowning them for safety, packing them carefully, and sending them properly and quickly at the least cost. All these things are the look-out of the Calcutta agency of which each of the Maldah firms has one. I think every man of the world will see, and every honorable man of business will admit, that they are three firms carrying on business at 82, Cross-street, belonging to relations and kinsmen who mess together here, and have other conveniences in common. Even on the defendant's own contention he ought to be able to show a license in any one of the names. But they have none of them taken out any, and have instead—for years—been paying fines. It is a pity that the law does not provide for any fine that might be felt by prosperous tradesmen. The whole game which the defendant and his conféres have for a series of years been playing is most discreditable. It is a pity that the hand of lawyers may be traced in the plan of operations. I convict the defendant under section 90 and sentence him to pay a fine of Rs. 75.

In imposing a fine of Rs. 75, the Court awarded the highest sentence open to it under the Municipal Act. Similar convictions were pronounced against the defendants in the other two cases referred to in the preceding judgment and the same penalty—the highest—imposed on them.

THE WATER-WORKS AT BENARES.

SIR AUCKLAND COLVIN'S SPEECH.

In reply to the address of the Municipality, Sir Auckland Colvin said :—Babu Ram Kali Chaudhri and members of the Benares Municipality,—It is, as you have said in your address, a matter of no common satisfaction to me that, before leaving India, I should have been enabled to open the Benares Water-works. I have taken occasion recently, at Lucknow, to speak at such length on the objects of the administration in furthering Water-works in our great municipalities, the cost at which the end would be accomplished, and the incidence of taxation, that I need not dwell further on those matters to-day. But let me thank the members of the Benares Municipality for the aid and encouragement which they have given to the Government so far as their city is concerned, and let me especially recall the name of one who is no longer with us, but whom you will expect me to speak of to-day, now that the work in which he took so much interest is accomplished. In the late Babu Bireswar Mitra the Municipality of Benares and the Administration of these provinces, in whose Legislative Council he filled a chair, have lost a most capable adviser and a most valued colleague. It was he who mainly guided the project through the difficulties of its earlier days, and it very materially lessens the pleasure of us all that he is not here to assist at its completion. That men like Babu Bireswar Mitra and Babu Ram Kali Chaudhri should have given their adhesion to the Water-works scheme is matter of especial satisfaction. Neither of them were men who would be for a moment suspected of subservient compliance with the wishes of any authority whatever. They both entertained views which, though differing widely from one another, are not the views which are currently supposed to be those most favoured by the authorities; but while they have never scrupled firmly, loyally, and conscientiously to maintain and express their several convictions on such matters, they have always given their entire support to the Water-works and drainage projects of Benares. It has added to the strength of our enterprise, and has gone far to silence objection, that it should have received their active approval. Let me next thank Mr. Wilson, the Engineer in charge of the Works, whose energy and skill, and whose supervision of his business has been the subject of frequent mention to me by all who were administratively his masters. I am greatly indebted to him for his exemplary labours; and when recently I felt myself compelled, owing to press of time, due to my own approaching departure, to refuse him a short period of leave which he had so amply earned, I think that the regret which I felt in issuing the order must have been greater than what he himself experienced on the receipt of it. To Mr. Friend, of Messrs. Easton and Anderson, and to Messrs. Walsh Lovett, who have carried out their contract with their habitual punctuality and thoroughness, I wish to express my thanks. And as this is the last opportunity which I shall have of doing so, let me here say how great is the debt of obligation which I am under, to Mr. Hughes, the Supervising Engineer for Municipal Water-works. For the last five years his resource, his skill, his energy, and his courage—for it requires courage, gentlemen, let me tell you, to carry out these large and difficult schemes—have never failed me; and if I have been able to carry them so far forward during a period of five years' administration, it is mainly owing to Mr. Hughes. His position in the Department forbids the hope that he will much longer occupy his present post, but when the "Village Sanitation Bill," now before the Local Legislative Council has passed, so long as he remains with us I hope there will be found fresh fields of usefulness for his energies, and further scope for the experience which he has gained in all matters of Indian sanitation.

A GANGES WATER-SUPPLY.

The Benares Water-works scheme is interesting from several points of view. In the first place it is the first occasion on which we have been able to take water from the Ganges. At Agra and at Allahabad the supply is taken from the Jumna, and at the latter place some disappointment was at one time expressed that preference should not have been given to the more favoured river. No one can take exception to the source from which your water-supply is drawn. In the next place, no works have hitherto been carried out on so large a scale as these works. Finally, they have never been introduced into a city so conservative and so devoted to the usages of ancient custom—usages confirmed by prejudice and allowed by religious sanction—as Benares. We make ourselves no illusions in this regard. We are perfectly aware that it will be long before filtered water is universally used here. It will be by slow degrees only, but by slow degrees universally used it will be. Here, as in Calcutta and elsewhere, convenience will prevail ultimately over prejudice, and the experience gained by observation of the effect of filtered water on the health of those who use it will prevail over custom hallowed by religious sanction. Meanwhile we are well aware that this will take time, and are quite prepared to find that a very considerable time must elapse before filtered water becomes really popular.

Now that the water-supply is opened, let me advise you to look to your wells. In Agra and Allahabad, when the filtered supply was introduced, the Municipalities concerned at once commenced, and are now engaged in carrying out a systematic survey of their wells, public and private, section by section of the city, and an analysis of the water of each well. How greatly such analysis is needed may be gathered from the fact that of 66 wells of which the water has been analysed in Allahabad, twelve only were pronounced to have fair water, twenty-five were pronounced unsafe, and of 29 the water was pronounced to be unfit for human consumption and dangerous to human life. In Agra, of 16 wells analysed eight were declared unfit for human use. The water may have been bright and clear and sparkling; but the analysis detected and declared the poisonous properties contained in it. When we hear so much of constant cholera in our cities, of fever, of bowel complaints, and of a general low state of health—though I do not think that my medical advisers would say that in the presence and habitual use of such impure water we had discovered all the causes of such a state of things—I think I am not far wrong in answering that at least they would admit that we had laid our finger on one of the chief, if not the chief, among them.

THE DRAINAGE SCHEME.

You have spoken of the proposed drainage scheme for this city. It will be actively pushed on, there being especial reasons here why it should follow as soon as possible on the completion of the water-supply. A Committee has been appointed to meet here this cold weather and to study the question of the disposal of the sewage which has already much occupied the attention of this Government. They will have to reflect on the expediency of depositing it on a sewage farm and to explain the objections, which present themselves to such a course. Other suggestions will be examined by them with especial reference to the convenience of this city and consideration to the health of adjoining tracts of the provinces. Some funds have been, it is stated in your address, collected for the drainage of Benares by the "Ganga Prasadini Sabha."

This movement, as you will remember, was set on foot some time ago, and first Lord Dufferin, and afterwards Lord Lansdowne, was asked to be patron to the Sabha. Several leading Native noblemen and gentlemen promised large subscriptions, and the movement was headed by the late lamented Maharaja of Benares. We were all hopeful that a movement set on foot with so much enthusiasm and supported by so great and varied influences would be successful. But before much time had passed it became evident that our hopes were premature, and that my expectations were doomed to disappointment. One subscriber after another withdrew his adherence to the scheme; and the wealthiest and most prominent Hindu nobleman in the adjoining province of Behar, who had promised aid to the amount of one lakh of rupees, has declined to fulfil that engagement. I have been told that the reason why so many subscribers have withdrawn is that when it was seen that the Municipality and the Government had taken a drainage scheme in hand, Hindu benevolence and the liberality of the leaders of the Hindu community becomes superfluous. If this is so, the matter is subject of misapprehension. The Municipality and the Government have doubtless provided a water-supply, which is a preliminary to any drainage scheme, and is indispensable to flushing drains. But if the Hindus who are members of this Sabha wish to furnish the funds and to carry out the project of a drainage scheme, neither the Municipality nor the Government wish to put obstacles in their way. On the contrary, they will place at the Sabha's disposal all the skill and staff available. You are aware that of late years the Hindu community have lost no opportunity of expressing their resolve to maintain their allegiance to the requirements of ancient faith and of defending it against even the semblance of attack. But unfortunately, it has so happened that on each occasion lately on which they have felt bound to illustrate their devotion or to display the depth and the breadth of their religious zeal, they have been forced (reluctantly enough no doubt, but still they have been forced) into direct conflict with a considerable body of public opinion. When the Government of India desired to save young girls, still in the stage of childhood from the indignities of child marriage, the Hindu community, or a large section of it, felt it due to its tenets to protest. When more recently this Government, in order to avert the spread of an epidemic of cholera over its own and adjoining Provinces, found itself, to its great regret, bound to disperse, in the interests of the general community, some thousands of Hindus who had assembled at Hardwar, and to prevent their numbers being swelled by fresh arrivals—when it intervened in the interests of the public safety and the public health,—the Hindu community felt it due to its tenets to protest. I repeat that it was unfortunate that on either occasion the Hindus, for whom I entertain a deep and true regard should have been forced into a position in which they encountered much public criticism and incurred no little censure. But here in this matter of draining their holy city, and purifying the stream of the sacred Ganges within its limits, they have an opportunity of showing the depth of their devotion and the length, the breadth, and the depth of their religious zeal (an opportunity selected by themselves and forming indeed, the especial bond which has brought together the "Ganga Prasadini Sabha") which can attract no possible disapproval, and raise no considerable censure. If they wish to give practical proof of the sincerity of their desire to maintain their traditions and to resist all innovations, let them give the best practical effect possible to it by subscribing the sums which they have severally spontaneously promised to, purifying their Holy of Holies as they have declared that it is the desire of their hearts to do. The Government will most assuredly not oppose them; and after all the untoward incidents of late years, they will have the satisfaction that, while they are fulfilling the sacred and self-imposed duty which they have voluntarily taken on themselves, they are giving unanswerable proof of the sincerity of their convictions and commanding the respect and regard of all members of the Hindu community throughout India, and of the Government with whose aim they will in this instance have so completely identified themselves.

THE RIOTS AT BENARES.

Gentlemen, you will expect me on this occasion to say a few words in regard to the little disturbances which unhappily took place last year here in Benares. It is time that it was shown incontrovertibly that they in no way arose out of objections entertained to a water-supply project, but from mistaken apprehensions of religious alarm.

I am willing to believe that those who were principally interested in the safety of the Bhadaini Temple were really alarmed about it, though I regret that they should have given themselves over to impulse, and instead of proceeding by recognized channel (for there was no cause for haste; the apprehended danger to the Temple could not have occurred for the next four months, that is to say, till the rains) should have lent themselves to more violent methods. I gave practical proof of the indulgent view which I took of their conduct by releasing them from jail, with the knowledge and approval of the Hon'ble Chief Justice, not many months after their appeal had been rejected on its legal merits in the High Court. I did so because I felt that it was not they but he who pulled the wires which moved them who was chiefly to blame. It was the man Vigianand who was chiefly to blame, who, after leading his principals till they found themselves face to face with the tribunals of criminal law, absconded and hid himself, and is still in hiding.

Gentlemen, there is a class of men of whom he was a type, who make it their business to fish in troubled waters; they bring no qualifications to their task beyond an unparalleled assurance, a brazen insolence, and a vocabulary gathered from the gutter. Only two days ago I received a telegram from a man of this class (I will not mention his name here, but Mr. Brereton, the Magistrate, has my authority to mention his name) demanding to see me on what he described as most important matters connected with the Benares Water-works. I asked in what character he addressed me and whose authorised representative he was? Receiving no reply which I could in any way regard as definite, I informed him that if he called on my Chief Secretary, any communication which he might make to him would be duly laid before me. The answer this silly and ill-advised person sent me was, that it was the Lieutenant-Governor he wished to see, and that if I would not see him, any consequences which might hereafter ensue would be my fault. Now, gentlemen, that man is, I understand, engaged in congenial occupations here in Benares, and let me if I may, warn those whom he would make his dupes against employing him, for two very excellent reasons. In the first place no agent more certain to ruin his client's business could be engaged. No man with an ounce of fact or grain of sense or that modicum of commonsense which one expects to find even in a simpleton, would hope to advance his client's interests by endeavouring at once to intimidate or to browbeat the Government. The adoption of such tactics show the measure of his capacity for undertaking the charge of the interests confided to him. In the next place, so surely as his intemperate counsels, his appeals to your most inflammable emotions, and his reckless disregard of facts, probabilities or certainties will bring you ultimately into conflict with the Magistrate; so surely, when he has led you there will he abandon you, making off with the proceeds of his enterprise, and leaving you to meet the consequence of your acts. If you have any question in dispute with the Municipality, any question, for example, such as I am told has arisen of rating of temples to a water-rate, consult duly authorised advisers (there are many of them competent, responsible, and entirely reliable here in Benares or elsewhere) and be guided by their advice. If you think the Magistrate is not doing you justice, go to the Commissioner; if he rejects your appeal, take your case to the Local Government. If the executive authorities disregard you, and you are advised that the law has been infringed, go to the civil tribunals. You know as well as I do, that they are absolutely impartial. Carry your case if you so wish it to the highest judicial authority in the Province. But as you value your liberty, your reputation, and your safety, avoid like poison the stirrer up of grievances, the unqualified adviser, and the professional agitator.

I will detain you no longer adding only that before very long I shall hope to learn when in England that the water to-day for the first time given you has succeeded in becoming generally popular, and that the drainage works are a fait accompli.

CALCUTTA UNIVERSITY. NOTICE.

HIS Excellency the Chancellor has decided to allow the Masters of Arts or holders of higher degrees in some Faculty and Bachelors of Arts who graduated before the year 1867 to fill up three vacancies in the Senate by election. Of the three Fellows to be elected, one must be a Medical Graduate of the University who is either a Bachelor in Medicine of 10 years' standing, or the holder of a higher degree in Medicine, and the other two must be Masters or holders of higher degrees in some Faculty or holders of the degree of Bachelor of Arts who took that degree before the year 1867.

The election will take place on Monday, the 2nd January, 1893.

Every candidate for election must be nominated by a graduate holding one of the above named degrees, and no graduate will be allowed to nominate more than one candidate. The written nominations of candidates must reach the Office of the Registrar not later than the 7th of December.

On and after the 15th December voting papers containing the names of all the candidates nominated will be supplied on application by the Registrar. These papers must be filled up in the presence of the Registrar at the Senate House on the 2nd of January 1893 between the hours of 10 A.M. and 5 P.M., but graduates who are not able to appear in person before the Registrar, may fill up the papers in the presence of a Magistrate, by whom the papers will be countersigned. All such voting papers must reach the Registrar by the 2nd of January 1893. Graduates who are not personally known to the officer in whose presence the voting papers are filled up must bring with them their diplomas, or other satisfactory proof of identity.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

DE MORTUIS.

(TWO TEXTS AND A COMMENT.)

I THANK ye, O my Dead ! that in my dreams
Ye still are present with me,—all my loved
And lost, not unremembered 'mid the press
And whirl of day, but ever, with the night,
Sure visitants of slumber,—Mother, Sire,
Brother and Sister, Friends,—mine own again,
The old familiar faces,—linked, perchance,
With forms and features of a younger date,
In scenes your life's experience never knew,
'Mid circumstance grotesque, ridiculous,
Impossible,—but never with a frown !

I thank ye ! or—for I must speak my thought—
I thank the love I bore ye that evokes
Your pleasant phantoms : for ye come not thus
Of your own will upon the wings of sleep :
The dream is from the dreamer, not from Jove ;
And save in dreams ye visit me no more.

What did he say who, twenty summers since,
Twined, o'er the tomb of one too early lost,
The saddest, sweetest posy ever culled
By poet-hands for garland to an urn ?
"There must be wisdom with great Death ! The Dead Shall look me through and through !" If honestly
He spake (and he is one who speaks with show
Of meaning what he speaks), I envy him
His self-assurance, courage, confidence,
Hope, faith,—what will you ?—But 'twas safely bold,
A challenge whereunto no answering trump
From the far darkness of the spirit-world
Sounds faint acceptance. Else why come they thus Mere manifest puppets, flitting o'er the stage
Of that all-shadowy theatre of Dream,
Through scenes for ever shifting, with no plot,
No moral in their piece, wherein ourselves
Take part, half conscious of its hollowness
Even while we seem to act,—perceived with dawn
Mere stuff that waking memory not retains,
Or but recalls to find not worth recall ?—

Death—"the great teacher !"—If the Dead be wise
(And none than I more firmly holds them so),
If they do see "with larger other eyes
Than ours,"—their wisdom is for higher ends,
Their clearer vision for a wider sphere,
And not for us. What'er they did and said
Of great and good remains, our heritage
For evermore : they left us all they could
In precept and example : more than these
How should we look for ?—Lazarus himself
That died, was buried, stank, and, at the call

Divine, arose, and cast corruption off,
Came forth, and lived again,—what tale had he
For Martha and for Mary ? None ! or none
Recorded for our profit : 'tis most strange !
Did he bring back no message from the pit ?
See nothing in that travel worth report,
Worth teaching to the sons whom he begat ?*
Was't not worth while to shame the scoffing sect
That said men died and rotted and no more ?
Were there no curious souls in Bethany
Eager with question, hot to probe and pierce
The awful mystery of that four days' sleep ?
Which is more wonderful—that one who saw
The secret of the Grave, if he had power
To speak, to warn, to comfort, to assure,
Should live, and die again, and hold his peace,—
Or, if he spake, that of such utterance
No record, no tradition keeps a word ?
The dead will come no more as Lazarus came.
No !—when we see them now,—(I fling aside
The tales of Ghosts, creations of disease,
Remorse, or superstition,—) 'tis ourselves
Who summon them. I see ye in my dreams,
My loved and lost, because I loved ye well ;
Because your memory fills my waking hours ;
Because I dwell, all lonely as I am,
Chiefly with memories, and the night returns
Blurred echoes of the day. Your images
Throng round my pillow, shift, and blend, and change
In metamorphic puzzle,—seem to be
Yourselves, yet all the while seem something else,
Seen without wonder, though most wonderful,
Void of volition as the dancing spots
That flick with gold the turfage of a grove
Rippled by summer-breezes.

And 'tis well

For you ye come but thus,—“The happy Dead
Gone to their rest—the Dead who are at peace !”—
We love to phrase it thus. Could Death be rest,
Could Death be peace, could Death be happiness,
If they who loved us so had baren power
To watch and weep without the gift to warn,
To see the sin they cannot check, to read
The shameful secret entries that defile
The tablets of our souls ? That were a pang
Beyond imagining !

I love to greet

Your fleeting, shifting, pleasant shapes,—my nights
Are happy with your presence ; but I look
On a mere empty pageant, purposeless,

* "Jallalo'ddin mentions three persons whom Christ restored to life and who lived several years after, and had children, viz : Lazarus, the Widow's son, and the Publican's (I suppose he means the Ruler of the Synagogue's) daughter."—Note to Sale's Korân, chap. iii.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given, any other being unnecessary and likely to cause confusion.

Furnished from some dim cranny of the brain,
 Its saner function dormant: but I know
 That you and I have no communion more
 Till the last trumpet-summons reunites
 At God's right hand the souls Death sundered here,
 All stain of Earthly vileness blotted out
 In Heaven's great amnesty.

I trust the Dead
 Yet love us, yearn for, hope for, pray for us,
 Knowing what need out nature hath of prayer,
 What perils block our path, how they themselves
 Succumbed or conquered. But, till they can help,
 Guide, counsel, rescue, for their own dear sake
 I could not wish their bliss eternal vexed
 With that sad gift, to know us as we are,
 To "look us through and through."

It is not so I
 Thy word was wiser, midnight moralist!
 "Heaven's sovereign spares all beings but Himself
 That hideous sight, a naked human heart!"

J. A. BOURDILLON,
Offg. Secy. to the Govt. of Bengal.

It is hard to discover what the collection of income tax in Cuttack has to do with the fixing of the public holidays in the whole of Bengal or the opening of the excepted offices.

It has been decided at the India Office that 'the furlough pay and pensions of all Civil and Military officers, and of members of the Ecclesiastical, Marine, and Pilot establishments, will henceforth be issued at the Home Treasury, monthly in arrear.

The quarterly dates to which Military (including that of military officers in civil employ), Medical (including annuities), Ecclesiastical, and Marine pay, pension, etc., will be made up, will, for the future, be 15th February, 15th May, 15th August, and 15th November; whilst the quarterly dates to which civil pay, annuities, and pensions will be made up will be 15th January, 15th April, 15th July and 15th October, respectively. Payment will in each case be made on or after the day following.

Advances (omitting shillings and pence) of one-third, approximately of the net quarterly amount will be payable on the 16th of the 1st and 2nd month of each quarter, and the balance of the three months, less income-tax and other deductions (if any) on the quarterly dates on which the pay will in future be payable as specified above."

THE Inspector of Schools, Presidency Circle, gives notice that

"The Syndicate of the Calcutta University having published a regulation to the effect that 'no private candidate will be admitted to a test examination unless accompanied for the purpose of identification by some person known to the officer conducting the examination,' it is hereby notified that the test examination of private candidates, which was to have been held on the 1st and 2nd December 1892, has been postponed, and will be held on the 13th and 14th December 1892. A candidate, who has already paid the fee for the test examination, will now be required to fulfil the condition above laid down, failing which he will not be admitted to the examination."

Will he be entitled to the return of fee paid by him before the publication of the regulation by the University?

THE antiquated zemindari dák cess in the 24-Parganas for the year 1893-94 has been fixed at 8 annas per cent. per annum on the Sadar Jama of estates paying revenue at Rs. 50 and upwards, to be paid in two instalments on the 1st June and 16th December 1893.

THE Government of Bengal is willing to allow to the Patna Municipality, for drainage works, a loan of Rs. 3,18,000, repayable in 30 years at 4½ per cent. interest.

THE little Railway, yclept the Bengal Provincial, has progressed so far that, of the capital of 8 lacs, Rs. 7,10,000 has been taken up, that three-fourths of the earthwork has been completed and a retired State Railway Agent secured, in Rai Bahadar Ramgotty Mookerjee, as its Managing Director, on a pay of Rs. 250. The shareholders, finding themselves fortunate in that cheap bargain, grudge to enhance the pay of the Secretary from Rs. 100 to Rs. 200—forgetting that he has hitherto been the soul of the enterprise. Baboo Amirtalal Roy has generously offered to forego the addition, in the interest of the undertaking for the regeneration of his countrymen.

THE Secretary to the Government of India, in the Home Department, has addressed the following letter to the several Local Governments and Administrations:—

"It has been represented to the Government of India that the Indian Legislature has not made any distinction, so far as regards the treatment of prisoners in jails, between persons convicted of crimes necessarily involving moral turpitude and those sentenced to imprisonment for acts declared to be offences on grounds to which a moral stigma does not always necessarily attach. It has accordingly been suggested that some means should be devised, based on the principle of section 67 of the Statute 28 and 29 Vict., Cap. 126, for the differential treatment in Indian jails of prisoners who would under the English Act be regarded, not as criminal prisoners, but as misdemeanants of the first division. I am to request an expression of opinion of * * * whether the discipline of simple imprisonment as at present carried out in the jails of the

* * * does not sufficiently meet the case of the class of prisoners referred to, and at the same time to enquire what the regulations in force in providing for simple imprisonment are, and whether, in the case of respectable persons sentenced to that form of punishment, some arrangements could not be made by rule (if none already exist) which would permit of their being accommodated separately, if they desire it, from other prisoners.

2. In this connection I am to refer to the recommendation, contained on page 51 of their Report, of the Indian Jail Conference of 1877 regarding the conditions which should be prescribed for Division A—persons sentenced to simple imprisonment—which is extracted below:

'Division A.—To be subjected to a minimum of severity; to wear their own clothing unless insufficiently provided, in which case Superintendent may issue jail clothing at discretion; not to be shaved as a part of prison discipline, or undergo any penal treatment; to be allowed books and any other indulgences consistent with jail discipline; to be allowed to work if they wish it, and to select the kind of work and to receive the corresponding diet, but not to be entitled to any remuneration for their labour; may receive visits from friends once in three months or oftener at discretion of Superintendent; may not buy their own food; should they elect to work, may come under the mark system. Nothing in the above is to be held to exempt this class of prisoners from the observance of general jail rules regarding order, cleanliness or sanitation.'

In paragraph 7 of the orders of the Government of India on the Report (No. 534, dated 30th April 1878) these recommendations were accepted, and I am to enquire how far they represent the existing practice in

3. The question of amending the Prisons Act is now in contemplation, and it would be convenient, in the event of any modification being deemed necessary in connection with the question herein referred to, that it should be considered before the Act is amended. The Government of India therefore hope that a reply to this reference may be despatched within one month from the date of its receipt."

It is a pleasure to see such manifestations of tenderness in the bureaucracy. Between the Draconian Penal Code and the democratic jail system, the people of India, specially the respectable classes who are more numerous here than in any other part of the globe, are in a perpetual purgatory of mild anxiety. In the more important and advanced countries of Bengal proper the virtual abolition of Trial by Jury, as the people are learning to understand it, is turning that anxiety to alarm.

ON the morning of Nov. 9, the Duke of Marlborough was found dead in bed at his Blenheim Palace, near Woodstock. An inquest was held on the 11th November at which the valet of the deceased deposed to his master having enjoyed good health and spirits up to the day preceding his death. Joseph Camp, the valet, continued:—

"I went to his room at five minutes passed eight on Wednesday morning, as it was my practice to do every morning, taking a small tray with chocolate and milk. I left the tray with the chocolate by the bedside as usual. At half-past eight I went in again. I do not know whether the Duke was asleep when I placed the chocolate there, as the room was in darkness. When I went in the second time I thought that his Grace's appearance was strange. There was no one else in the room and the chocolate did not appear to have been touched. The Duke was lying on his back in bed and his eyes were closed. I did not do any thing to ascertain whether all was right, but I went out of the room into the sitting-room and waited. In about five minutes I returned to his Grace's bedroom for the third time, and I found him still in the same position. I was not quite sure whether he was asleep, so I made a noise with the door by banging it to see if I could wake him. But it had no effect whatever. I then went out of the room and told the maid Maclean, and she went into the Duchess's bedroom. The Duchess then went into his Grace's bedroom and found that he was dead by touching him. Dr. Caldwell was sent for and came very quickly. When I used to take the chocolate up I never woke the Duke or disturbed him. He was generally awake early in the morning. The following verdict was then returned: 'That the said George Charles Spencer Churchill, Duke of Marlborough, did die very suddenly at Blenheim Palace on Nov. 9, 1892, from sudden failure of the action of the heart arising from calcareous degeneration of the aorta and the Duke was a Peer of Parliament of the age of forty-years.'"

THE Presidency Commissioner's office seems to be a rolling stone. It seems singularly devoid of local attachment. Formerly it was located in Theatre Road, then it was removed to Alipore, then brought back to 14 Hare Street and now is housed at 24½, Dalhousie Square, West.

THERE have been largely attended indignant public meetings in the Jury Districts condemning the Jury Notification of Sir Charles Elliott. The last—of the 24-Perganas—has been postponed to allow of an unhindered reconsideration by Government of the order which has been promised. We hope there will be no "concordat" against the people.

WE take the following from the Liverpool Review of Nov. 5:—

"Among the passengers who left Liverpool by the Anubis were three lady members of the local Moslem Association, who, we understand, are en route to visit various Eastern Moslem cities. The ladies are Mrs. Fatima E. Cates, Mrs. Amina Mokaiesh, and Miss L. Zulieka Bankes, and, no doubt, on their return they will have many interesting reminiscences to relate.

On Wednesday evening last, Mr. W. H. Quilliam, at the invitation of the Manchester Geographical Society, delivered a lecture in the Memorial Hall, Albert-square, Manchester, on 'Moslem Constantinople.' The Rev. S. Steinhall, (Unitarian minister), presided, and there was a large audience, who listened most attentively for two hours, while the lecturer, with the aid of an oxy-hydrogen lantern and some sixty slides, gave illustrations of the principal buildings and scenery in Constantinople."

NOTES & LEADERETTES

with
OUR OWN NEWS.

THE Viceregal Levée is said to have passed off well. There was no accident. The barricades were closer and more numerous and the pressure of crowd less felt than in previous years. The list is not out yet, and there is no knowing whether the attendance was larger.

The most noticeable fact in connection with the Levée is that the usual advertisements were withheld. We commented on it week before last and, as we feared, the omission caused many loyal citizens to miss the last day for sending in their cards. The Levée is an occasion for every admissible subject of Her Majesty to make his bow to Her Representative, and the failure of those who were kept out of their duty by any action on the part of Government, must not be construed as an intentional disrespect on their part. On the contrary, they may well feel aggrieved that they were not properly apprised of the how and when Her Representative would receive their loyal salutations.

The hour, again, for holding the Levée at 10 of a chill December evening is another bar to a multitudinous loyal demonstration. It is at once an inconvenience and infliction. To old men and those who live far in the suburbs or at Dum-Dum, it is prohibitive. It is time that the former practice of holding the Levée in day-time should be reverted to. At any rate, the exposure of the attending gentlemen on the open grand-stair-case awaiting their carriages, must be prevented. It is a scandal in December mid-night to discharge devoted loyalty of all ages, from eighteen to eighty, burdened with many of the illnesses that flesh is heir to, into the open air, to the keen night-dew, to wait under those conditions on the chance of getting one's carriage and the certainty afterwards of walking home the following morning.

ON the nomination of the Chief Justice, the Governor-General in Council has appointed Mr. R. D. Mehta Sheriff for the next year. The shrievalty is still a position of honor—with its responsibility though without its poundage, and Mr. Mehta has well earned the distinction. He is the second Parsi selected for the post. The first appointment was made when the holder had almost worked out his career. The present is exactly in time. Mr. Mehta is young and in full swing of activity. Our cordial congratulations to him.

THE public have grown weary of the Hyderabad defamation proceedings, and the Indian Daily News cries truce! The parties to the trial, however, seem not yet exhausted. The most damaging evidence for the defence was reserved for the last. James Lauchlin has been followed by Yusuf Uzzeman, Zamindar and Honorary Magistrate, Banda, who had known Mrs. Hassan when she was within her teens, both in her house and in his at Lucknow. He had lent her Byron, of which she, of course, liked Don Juan the best, and her sister (the Mrs. Hodges of this drama)—with more prudence avowing a less outrageous preference—Lalla Rookh.

THE personation case in the Serampore Magistracy has fallen through. The contending parties seem to have made up their differences and the Deputy Magistrate finds nothing wrong in the whole course of the transaction. The court is of opinion that Benode Lal Roy had actually advanced the Rs. 35,000 to a pretender in the honest belief that he was the real and not false Protap Chunder Bose, he being introduced to him by Baboo Bhoobun Mohun Dass, an attorney of the High Court; that Baboo Ashutosh Dhur, the attorney, who had acted as such in the transaction, and his clerk Peary Lal Haldar who had identified the false executant of the mortgage at the Sub-Registration office, had no other motive than the best interests of their client, the money lender. There is therefore not the slightest doubt as to the bona fides of the accused. The judgment is said to be a long and elaborate one. It ought to be published with all the proceedings in court as a warning to the public.

THE American Railway Jay Gould died on Saturday last, unhonored and unsung. He was the Shylock of the stock exchange. He insinuated himself into the direction of affairs of new lines, encouraged wastefulness, till the concern wanted, urgently and immediately, funds, which he was prepared to lend on suitable terms on short time notes, which, periodically renewed, involved the Company more and more, while the management and shareholders thought they were getting on swimmingly without a hitch. At length, the opportune hour arrived for the final coup. So far from paying the heavy accumulations of his dues, the Company could not pay its way without constantly borrowing from him. So, as he was careful of the law of his transactions, the line came into his hands—to be economically and profitably worked by him. Thus, one after another line fell in the tempter's snare, until the remorseless financier owned or controlled ten per cent. of the railway mileage of the United States. He died worth £30 millions or over 40 crores of rupees.

A DUPLICATE tragedy of a dramatic kind is reported from Eastern Europe. While Senator Bonachi, of Jassy, was absent at Vienna, his son, twenty years old, passed his examination with distinction. In honour of the joyful event, he invited a party of fellow-students to celebrate it. The people of those parts are fond of music, and the young men got up a small concert for the occasion. Bonachi himself was a good musician and played the violin. Indeed, at this his last party as he knew—because he had determined—it to be, he played with great spirit and much expression. Before reaching the end of his solo, when the effect was highest, he dashed the bow and, drawing a revolver, fired it into his mouth and fell down dead. His father followed him from Vienna, falling dead on the spot as he heard, at the same moment, of his son's brilliant examination and the young fellow's cruel death.

WE notice with very great regret that the honoured Mathuswami Iyer has at length bowed to the evil spirit of the age. This distinguished Tamil Brahman had preserved the integrity of his national costume. While his Hindu brethren about were slowly but surely anglicising on the sly, in the most ridiculously anomalous ways, he alone was among the faithless faithful found, carrying his characteristic amgostum and dhoti even to the bench of the High Court and leaving his slippers without the "Sublime Porte" of Justice, unttempted by the allurements of European or Europeanish inexpressibles or expressibles, coat or cuff. It was a most interesting sight, and one creditable to all sides concerned, to see the brave Brahman dharmadhikar, loaded with the lore of East and West, and drawing his diction from the pure well of English undefiled, dispensing justice under laws, Indian and English, from the bench of one of the highest courts of Her Britannic Majesty who is also Empress of India, in the simple uniform of his race. Such was Mathuswami Iyer, and such we would fain have seen him to the last—an example of manliness and sincerity to the last. But it was not to be. But yesterday as it were, when he visited Malabar on the Marriage Commission, as the local Spectator records, he was in his Hindu robes—his dhoti and chapkan, as we would say. It is no longer so. At any rate, on the occasion of the late viceregal visit there was a distinct departure. It is said that our Holiness the Brahman Dharmadhikar stooped to appear before the Sovereign's Representative in trousers and coat of English cut and a pair of boots. It must have been under extreme pressure that our illustrious compatriot touched leather and adopted articles of European costume. The friends, official and officious, who applied it were not entitled to be heard on such a difficult and delicate point. It is a pity that the Judge did not remand the case to his own adjudication. How hideous natives look in European costume goes without saying. An accepted object of public respect like Mr. Justice Iyer, whose figure and drapery and every surrounding are well-known, forming a part and parcel of the mental fund of the people, is necessarily lost under a new disguise, and Pandit Iyer was exceptionally ridiculous in that disguise. But the moral objection to the departure is much greater than the æsthetic.

THE Saturday Review did not shine in its article on the death of the late Poet Laureate. And no wonder. That is an occasion of sentiment, and gush does not well become the Great Reviler, as John Bright nicknamed the Review. The writers on our London contemporary's staff are more familiar with the language of sarcasm and reproach than the vocabulary of admiration and sorrow. Expert in all the practices of cutting, quattering, hacking, and the rest, they are accomplished literary butchers for sacrificing authors instead of priests learned in the mysteries for the canonization of genius and apotheosis of Poets. It would be unjust to suppose, as it is popularly supposed, that the secret motto of the paper is Nil admirari. It admires, and admires well, when a clear and unquestionable opportunity occurs. But, then, it spares not trash or pretension and is unrelenting to "humbug." And its very appreciation is not of the agitating kind, either to itself, to the object, or to the public at large. Indeed, it regards enthusiasm a weakness. The truth is, the Saturday Review is too judicial to be satisfactory. Standing as it were over the unclosed grave of the greatest genius of the age, the public could not but regret the inadequacy of the measured terms of tribute of one of the leading organs of English thought and criticism.

There is no room for any such complaint in respect of the same journal's treatment of the questions about the office of the Poet Laureate which the death of Lord Tennyson has raised. Here the Saturday Review is at home in its element. It has written an exquisite little article of equal wisdom and wit. Whether the office of a court poet or national bard (just as it may be regarded) should be maintained as an interesting and even useful institution, or abolished as a relic of the monarchy of the Middle Ages, and, above all, if it is to be kept up, who is the man for it, are questions interesting to not the literary caste only but the whole civilized world. Accordingly, the whole world is ringing with them, and answers are being attempted not only by the organs of public opinion throughout the globe but in private society, by every educated man of the least pretensions. They are difficult questions, of course, specially the second. For British critics at home it is peculiarly delicate too, being personal. How deftly, in the space of a column, the Saturday Review disposes of it! We have not space to quote it entire and content ourselves with extracting the cream, in the following:—

"The post does not seem very enviable, because, among other reasons, it provokes comparisons. But, like the title of R.A., or like membership of the French Academy, the laureateship, we presume, has a certain value. Innocent people, because poets have been laureates, will infer that a laureate must be a poet. And it would certainly be most absurd to abolish the position because there is a difficulty in getting the right man to fill it at a given moment, or because certain persons have wit enough to be ashamed of their own candidate. The best laureate, alas! must die; the worst, thank Heaven! will. Nor could there be anything more childish than to throw the wreath of Johnson, of Dryden, of Wordsworth, and of Tennyson into the dustbin, instead of letting even some new Pye serve as a big block to keep it ready for a happier day."

THE next or Eighth Indian Congress will be held at Allahabad. The session will commence on Wednesday the 28th December. It was previously fixed for Monday the 26th, but that chronological arrangement has had to be abandoned, we believe, in deference to the convenience of the more distant supporters. The Congress has from the first been timed with an eye to the Christmas and New Year's Day holidays, that the members might avail themselves of the pretty long vacation to attend from any distances and return without any sacrifice of business. But to open the sittings on the 26th would have involved an injustice to the more distant members. It would have been a slur on the zeal of the patriots of Madras and the extreme South who, with a score or so of Bombay, constitute the backbone of the great movement. They could not conveniently start before the 24th, and travelling as Hindus they could not well reach Allahabad in time for the meeting of the 26th. That day would be more convenient to the busy men of the North and it was to suit them that it was fixed. But a gathering from far and near necessarily causes waste to some and trouble and expense to others, and the Hindostanis and Bengalis must make sacrifice to suit their compatriots of the Western and Southern Presidencies.

The political Congress will be held for three days—Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday—from the 26th to the 28th December. The Social Congress may be held on the 29th, unless that too is postponed in deference to the great Southern heroes of the social movement, in which case it will come off on the 31st.

As yet no President has been found. Dadabhai Naoroji would have made a president of ideal perfection for this year. His countrymen would have rejoiced to see him back among them with his new honour and to hail in triumph first Member of Parliament. He would have been received with an enthusiasm such as no other man ever evoked. The demonstration would have gladdened the heart of the old patriot and been some compensation for a life of struggle in the service of his country. He would have talked Finsbury of course, but he would have interpolated in his "shop" some useful results of his long experience. Unfortunately, Mr. Naoroji was not free to come. He was arrested by an ugly monster in the shape of a petition against his pretensions to membership of the House of Commons. Captain Penton, his rival candidate for the suffrages of Central Finsbury, challenged the validity of the election which returned the Black Man. In a moment, all of a sudden, poor Naoroji was prohibited from enjoying his great and unprecedented success and called to a life and death struggle in defence of his membership. At this very moment he is absorbed in his own trouble.

THE bloody Indian Penal Code has bloodier magistrates to execute it. Once a man was convicted of theft of shadow—by removal of a tree. Only recently the Sub-divisional Magistrate of Hajipur found another guilty of criminal misappropriation of a tree. The High Court on appeal set aside the conviction and sentence, by the following judgment of Mr. Justice Prinsep:—

"The petitioner has been convicted by the Magistrate, and this conviction had been affirmed by the Sessions Judge on appeal, of criminal misappropriation under section 403 of the Indian Penal Code. He being a tenant of the land in which the tree grew cut down that tree and used it for fuel, the right in the tree being found with the landlord. Now the offence clearly does not amount to criminal misappropriation, as the property appropriated, the tree, was not removable property. We have had under consideration whether on the facts found in this case the petitioner could properly have been convicted of any such offence. But it seems to us, however, that having regard to the facts found, that the tree actually grew on land let to the tenant, this is not a case which is properly cognizable by a Criminal Court, and under no circumstances could we approve of so severe a sentence for such an act which the Magistrate considered to be punishable by a fine of Rs. 200 and the Sessions Judge of Rs. 100. The conviction and sentence must accordingly be set aside, and the fine, if paid, must be refunded."

MR. R. C. Sterndale has succeeded Mr. Kilby as Collector of Income Tax in Calcutta. Mr. Sterndale had officiated as full Collector of Calcutta before the Collector of Calcutta had ceased to be the Collector of Income Tax.

CAPTAIN Hayes, the wellknown Anglo-Indian sporting litterateur, is on a lecturing tour through the globe. He lately appeared at Aldershot before the local Military Society and delivered a discourse on his favorite theme of Horse-flesh in connection with the cavalry, under the presidency of Sir F. Fitz Wygram. It was at once an opportune and a wise deliverance. It was also an authoritative one into the bargain. Captain Hayes is evidently a favorite on both Continents. The leading professional organ—the Army and Navy Gazette—makes of its notice of the Lecture the opening "leader" of the week. In this our English contemporary gives the lecturer a most enviable character. It speaks of him as "wellknown," "a most interesting and instructive writer on horses," adding that "his education and experience have thoroughly qualified him to lead in horse matters."

His subject was the selection, training, and management of cavalry horse.

IN the middle of last month, there died at Moorsheadabad, an old lady of rank in the Nizamut Family—Sultan Gaitee Ara Begum Sahibah, the only sister of His Highness the late Nawab Nazim of Bengal. Her husband died about seventeen years ago rather suddenly at Benares. She was in receipt of a large pension, which probably reverts to Government, as we are not aware of her having left any children.

ABOUT the same time the Nizamut Family suffered another and a much severer loss, in the death of Nawab Syed Ata Hosain, the well-known Zemindar of Khagrah, in Zillah Purneah, who had married the second daughter of the late Nawab Nazim by his first wife. Nawab Shams Jahan Begum, otherwise known as Firdous Mahal Sahebah. He was comparatively a young man and the title of Nawab was conferred upon him by the Marquis of Dufferin and Ava on the occasion of the Jubilee of Her Majesty's Reign. He belonged to a most ancient, historical and wealthy Family, and was the owner of a large Zemindary in the District of Purneah. At the Durbar held by Sir Stuart Bayley at Patna on the 26th August 1887, for the presentation of sanads, the Lieutenant-Governor addressed Syed Ata Hosain thus:—

"As the representative of a distinguished family of the Purneah District, where your ancestors enjoyed seats under the Moghul Government, of distinguished notability, and for your public spirit and loyalty—you have been selected by my predecessor, Sir Rivers Thompson, and recommended to His Excellency the Viceroy, to enjoy the title of 'Nawab,' which I have much pleasure in now conferring upon you."

The Nawab established an annual agricultural mela at the head-quarters of his Zemindary, at his own expense. He has left a couple of young sons, and his estate passes, as a matter of course, to the Court of Wards during the minority of his heirs.

DURING the short time he has been in the country, the Law Member, Sir Alexander Miller, has, on more than one occasion, shown that he is not only a liberal-minded servant of the Crown disposed to do good to the people, but also one who has strength of character and the courage of his opinion. Luckily, he has no ties in India, and he avoids cliques. He was free from all taint of the Bangabasi prosecution, and he has, we believe, not touched the pitch of the infamous Jury business. In fact, he still remains thoroughly English, and maintains with peculiar dignity that independence for which the profession of Law is renowned. He has not many opportunities of making his personality felt. But wherever we discern it we find it amiable. Last year, when a native barrister was appointed on the staff of the Indian Law Reports, we offered the thanks of the native community to the authorities for recognition of the claims of the Indian section of the Bar in the distribution of patronage in the High Court. We are glad that the same gentleman has again been appointed to officiate as a Reporter this year. It is a little matter, good only as a symptom. It has pleased the Government to admit natives to the Bench of the High Court, to the benches of the Presidency Small Cause Court, and the Presidency Magistrates' Court and to other high public offices, and it is time that a native Barrister should be permanently attached to the staff of the Indian Law Reports.

THE wise and virtuous men who rule the land are shocked at the turbulence and truculence of the people in general and the Bengalis above all. Alarmed at the signs of the times, they are essaying their might and main to check the waxing spirit of evil. It was in this righteous spirit that the Police Committee was appointed to enquire and that the most revolutionary proposals of that conclave have been given effect to. It is expected that the virtual abolition of jury trial in the best part of Bengal will have the effect of repressing every aspiration, criminal or other, of the Bengali soul. If it do not succeed, we may expect a notification under the signature of Mr. H. J. S. Cotton—which can easily be got passed by the portable Government legislature—giving the control of the courts to the Secretariat. If after that an occasional cry of "stop thief!" or a hue and cry against a highway man or murderer still disturb the ruling ear, we must be prepared for a Notification requiring us to report ourselves every midnight at the nearest Police station. A pretty pass to come to, for the Illeges of Her Majesty, one hundred and thirty-five years after the battle of Plassey!

It is a cruel mockery to talk of the viciousness and criminal propensities of the mild Hindu and the sober and polished Indo-Muslim. The Bengali alas! is simply incapable of crime. Otherwise, even Sir Charles Elliott himself, reckless as he is, would not insult the whole people as he has done by his sudden withdrawal of a prescriptive right.

Sir Charles Elliott and his brethren, the seniors of the Civil Service, do not know what is criminal propensity in a population and progress.

of crime. They have been too long in this land of mildness and respectability. We will give him a glimpse of life in a civilized and Christian country. Here is a Western hero :—

"One of the most remarkable escapes known in the annals of Auburn Goal, New York State, has just been effected by the notorious railway robber named Oliver Perry, who, after shooting a conductor and rifling the express car, attempted to get away on an engine, and was only captured after an exciting chase. Perry made a determined attempt some months ago to murder a fellow-convict, after which he was confined in a screen cell. On October 22nd the keeper was absent for about an hour. On his return he found the cell empty, and on entering the room discovered that a hole had been dug in the wall, thus establishing communication with another cell. The instrument used by the convict was a small tin spoon which had been left in the cell, and with this feeble implement Perry had dug through a foot of mortar and a wooden partition an inch thick. But the prisoner did not get far. When he endeavoured to pass one of the outer doors of the prison he was stretched unconscious by a guard's club."

And here is a taste of life in the great Moffussil of the United States :—

"A band of masked men, 150 in number, surrounded Dalton (Georgia) on October 25th and took entire possession of it. They captured and locked up the small force of police without resistance. Then they proceeded to shoot one negro and fatally flog two others. Other negroes were driven from the town and notified that they would be shot if they returned. The rising is due to the high-handed way in which the negroes have been acting of late, and the invincible determination of the whites not to submit to their domination however they may outnumber their former masters, in voting power. Among the mob were many respectable citizens according to report."

Such is the state of things in America, under the great Republic of the German race in which the liberal institutions of England have received their utmost development ! And what of the jury system there ? Has the Secretary of State quietly telegraphed to the Viceroy that the right of trial by jury has been abrogated in not Georgia only but also New York ? It would be news indeed, for which the Englishman and the Pioneer would pay their best prices.

We too have our criminals and even our criminal classes, but they are to their Western prototypes as the Neva to the Amazon. There is scarcely stuff left in the people by British administration for such feats of dare-devilry as those of Oliver Perry and the raiders on Dalton. The Kookees are up to that kind of thing. Even the Tipperahs might do it yet ; but no thorough British Indians.

More than thirty years ago there was here a burglar of Perry's order who disdained to attack the houses in Black Town and robbed in Chowringhee and lifted the great jewellery shops and deposited his loot on board. He was sent to jail but he challenged the authorities to keep him. He was as good as his word, notwithstanding the utmost vigilance. In fact, he repeatedly came out, we believe, working out his way much the same way as Perry. But then he was no Indian of any description, nor any subject of Her Majesty. He was a black man, and no mistake, his was no Indian black, however, nor Japan, but African. He hailed from Perry's country and bore, doubtless among many aliases, the name of Douglas.

Some of brave Douglas' remarks may be remembered with advantage even at this day. They are more wise and valuable than many a Government Resolution. He had tested many towns and he declared Calcutta to be the most defenceless of Great Cities. About the natives, he said that they were so good and so ready to give up their all to any bold man who might demand, that it were a shame to molest them. Need we point to our good rulers the moral of this reference ?

GOVERNMENT BY PERCENTAGE AND THE VICTIMIZATION OF THE SUB- EXECUTIVE SERVICE.

FOR different reasons, Sir Charles Elliott's Resolutions are very anxiously looked for both by the general public and the officials. They often afford amusement to the former and cause shame and disgrace to the latter, who are held up to public contempt. Thus the most sensational official literature is having a larger circulation among all classes who never cared before for this sort of cut and dried Secretariat essays. For every little fault or irregularity and particularly for adjourning cases, the poor Deputy Magistrates are not only publicly censured but also threatened in different ways in these manifestoes of the Bengal office. Copies of the remarks against their character are forwarded to them for their gratification, and district officers are repeatedly pressed and sufficiently warned to keep a tight hand upon this unfortunate lot of bad old boys, some of whom are too old and unfit to be worked in this new mill-hand fashion. In the Resolution on the Administration Report of the Rajshahi Division, Sir Charles agrees with the Commissioner in condemning the Deputies for their weakness in posing as judges instead of converting themselves into investigating Police officers. He evidently wants that his deputy should be a many barrelled magazine gun combining the functions of a Judge, a Magistrate, a detective, and a hangman too if possible, and all because such a combination of multifarious functions means economy and centralization of work. But economy is not necessarily efficiency, and centralization may be obtained at too high a price. Something may no doubt be said in favour of such a concentration of authority. But the world is growing distrustful, and it is well for men that they are not made too formidable. Be that as it may, what we especially object to, in this connection, is the unjust and hasty manner in which a class of officers is condemned. It may be quite true that the Commissioner of the Rajshahi Division found some cases tried by the unfortunate Deputies in which the enquiry was incomplete and some links of evidence were wanting, resulting in acquittals. This is no new discovery which this Commissioner only has made. This must now be the case all over the country, and there is no help for it. The deputies are not a set of fools who do not understand the law or their work, but all these flaws in their proceedings are wholly and solely due to the recent measures of the Lieutenant-Governor who is restless and impatient to see that his orders, however unpractical, may be strictly carried out at any cost. If the returns are all right and the percentage of conviction and average time of disposal satisfactory, the Magistrate is declared officially most efficient and successful, and if they are bad in those respects, he is condemned and publicly censured. The only points which all the trying Magistrates now keep in view are these, and they care little for the thoroughness of their enquiry or the soundness of their judgment. They are simply murdering their conscience in order to save their bread. Each officer is under terror of suspension or stoppage of promotion lest he fail to dispose of his cases as quickly as the Lieutenant-Governor wants. He is neither a prophet nor an investigating Police officer that, as soon as a case is placed before him, he should know all the evidence that might be required to obtain a conviction. This is possible sometimes after perusal of the Police papers ; otherwise it requires time. Ordinarily, as the enquiry proceeds and evidence is recorded new light is gradually thrown on the case, and the court is then in a position to find out what link or links of evidence are wanting. It may find out the omission of one link on the second day of hearing or some time on the third day. Each witness's evidence may suggest new points and different links, and accordingly the enquiry should be continued and fresh evidence taken. Now on the face of the existing orders can a Deputy dare adjourn a case on his own responsibility and call new witnesses from day to day, if he thinks it necessary for a conviction ? Besides those orders, he is on one side pressed by the Magistrate to dispose of the case quickly, and on the other tormented by the District Superintendent—who also has now become his superior officer in every practical sense. Thorough careful enquiry requires time and peace of mind, and without them it is mad to expect good results. Nor is that all. In the Elliottic hurry and overwork, these native magistrates have in most cases ruined their health and endangered their lives in their fear and anxiety to carry out the orders of Government. And although they work till 9 or 10 P.M. at the risk of their lives, they cannot, strictly speaking, finish their work. And what is the result? All these poor officers cannot satisfactorily perform their duties, and their work is declared careless and perfunctory, and a large number of them have become incapacitated for active work. Witness the number of applications for leave! From one district alone in the very Rajshahi Division, four officers have gone on leave within the last four or five months, three with entirely broken health and one declared quite unfit for further service, indeed it is believed by medical men that he will soon die. We have reason to think that a large number of applications has also been rejected, but when strengthened by medical certificates Government could not reject them so summarily. Under such circumstances, to complain of want of thoroughness and care in their work, is the greatest injustice that could be done to a class of hard-working and deserving officers with such bright traditions as the Sub-Executive Service boasts.

Sir Charles Elliott wants to override even the law laid down by nature. Let him consult his medical officers as to the hours an officer can work under such stringent rules and perform this sort of duty, and then see what is the state of their health. Before these orders came into existence, officers of the Judicial and Executive Services were already groaning under the weight of work, with the deplorable result that dozens of them were subjects of gout, dyspepsia, diabetes and heart disease. We can cite instances of valuable and comparatively young officers succumbing under the pressure of unusually heavy work which they were obliged to undertake, and their number will soon multiply if the present state of things continues.

Sir Charles Elliott has distinguished himself by two notable charities. He can never do a more urgent or more timely act of real benevolence than just now to found a general hospital at Calcutta for the native victims of his high pressure administration.

The effects of these revolutionizing orders are far reaching and not confined to native judiciary. The Lieutenant-Governor's own young and energetic Secretaries are taking leave of him, one after another, and there are reports that some of them have injured their health by hard work.

Government by percentage is ruining the administration of justice. We find Magistrates grumbling and making themselves miserable in the absence of a sufficiently large number of nuisance and municipal cases in order to show a large number of convictions, and repeated as it is at the end of each quarter, the thing becomes not a little scandalous. They have also to depend upon the favor of the legal practitioners in order to dispose of cases according to the wishes of the Lieutenant-Governor. Instances have happened in which Magistrates asked the mukhtears to prevail upon the accused to plead guilty in simple cases of assault and nuisance on condition that his ing out that their postponement for defence would be far more expensive! Legal practitioners are always accommodating, and between them and a funk-stricken magistracy, what scenes are enacted in some mofussil courts, on the last day of the month! Some Magistrates disregard the evidence for the defence and do not at all give an opportunity to the accused for calling rebutting evidence. Everybody has not the means to move the appellate Judge's Court, to say nothing of the High Court.

Government is responsible for the proper administration of justice, but, according to the present rules and orders, justice and repression of crime means filling up the jails and increasing the criminal population. The larger the number of convictions, the more satisfactory the return. No one takes the trouble to see or to enquire if these convictions are all correct or justified. Conviction's the thing, no matter how obtained. Acquittals are visited on the judge. If their number is more by one than that of convictions, then there is a hue and cry all over the official world, and every superior officer comes down upon the Subordinate Magistrate, and until he submits a full and satisfactory explanation there is no rest for him. We may ask in the name of fairness if the Government's only function in connection with the administration of justice is to obtain conviction by demoralising the whole judiciary of the province? Is the supervising agency's work only to punish the Deputy Magistrates for acquittals? Explanations for acquittals are called for without any reference to the records. Who cares to go through them? The order-sheet and the returns are the best criterion of the merit of judicial work and upon them officers are condemned and rewarded.

Old officers have been forced to vacate their posts, and within the next two years we would hardly find the old class of men left. The most experienced and best officers—the back-bone and pride of the service—are being virtually hooted out.

The present is a Government by percentages and statistics. Why not then publish the number of deaths in the Subordinate Executive Service and the number of applications for leave as the result of the activity of the present rule in Bengal?

THE JURY SYSTEM.

A GLIMPSE OF ITS HISTORY.

FROM every point of view, the raid on the Trial by Jury is condemned. An essentially vicious idea has been carried without the most ordinary care. It is no small reproach to the Bengal Government, that in his important Jury Notification Sir Charles Elliott left untouched abetments of and attempts to commit the offences withdrawn from trial by jury. But he is not without defence. The practice of the former heroes of the Service keeps him in countenance. The history of the Jury System in Bengal is a record of the perfunctory way in which the Indian Bureaucracy is wont to work. The first notification regarding the grant of jury trial was issued by Sir John Peter Grant. It is dated the 7th January 1862, and runs as follows:—

"Notification.—The 7th January 1862.—It is hereby notified, that, in conformity with Section CCCXXII of the Code of Criminal Procedure, (Act XXV of 1861) the Lieutenant-Governor has been pleased to order that in the Districts of the 24-Pergunnahs, Hooghly, Burdwan, Moorshedabad, Nuddea, Patna and Dacca, the trial by any Court of Session of all offences defined in chapters VIII, XI, XVI and XVII of the Penal Code shall be by jury.

E. H. LUSHINGTON,
Secy., Govt. of Bengal."

On the 24th April Sir John laid down his office. About 5 months after the above Notification, another Chapter of the Penal Code was added to the offences triable by jury, by order of Sir Cecil Beadon, thus:—

"Notification.—The 27th May 1862.—It is hereby notified, in contiuation of the Notification of the 7th of January last, published in the Calcutta Gazette of the 8th idem, that, in conformity with Section CCCXXII of the Code of Criminal Procedure, the Lieutenant-Governor has been pleased to order that in the districts of the 24-Pergunnahs, Hooghly, Burdwan, Moorshedabad, Nuddea, Patna and Dacca, the trial by any Court of Session of the offences defined in chapter XVIII of the Penal Code shall be by jury.

E. H. LUSHINGTON,
Secy. Govt. of Bengal."

It was not till after another four months, that abetments of and attempts to commit the offences triable by jury were thought of! The next publication runs in the subjoined strain:—

"Notification.—The 13th October 1862.—It is hereby notified, in continuation of the Notification, dated the 7th January and 27th May, published in the Calcutta Gazette of the 8th January and 28th May last, that, in conformity with the provisions of Section CCCXXII of Act XXV of 1861, the Lieutenant-Governor has been pleased to order that in the Districts (the 24-Pergunnahs, Hooghly, Burdwan, Moorshedabad, Nuddea, Patna, Dacca) therein named, abetments of and attempts to commit any of the offences defined in chapters VIII, XI, XVI, XVII, and XVIII of the Penal Code shall be tried by jury.

A. EDEN,

Offg. Secy. to the Govt. of Bengal."

So there need be no despair about the completeness of the order of Sir Charles Elliott. His fraternal predecessors have left his path smooth. He may yet take it into his head, and may yet be allowed to issue another notification about abetments and attempts. He is yet in time, according to precedent. Sir Charles Elliott has, however, been already anticipated by a Sessions Judge:—

"Bhonda and Birsha Dhangor were yesterday tried before the Additional Sessions Judge of Alipur on a charge of having committed murder by stabbing one Buddha Dhangore with a knife at Barrackpur. The 2nd accused was charged with abetment, and Babu Hem Chandra Rai, who appeared for the defence, claimed a Jury trial on his behalf, as the recent Government Notification had not included abetments of and attempts to commit offences in the list. The Judge remarked that although that was not the case yet the intention was quite clear.

Pleader.—This objection has been allowed at Moorshedabad.

Judge.—With deference to Mr. Beveridge, I must follow my own intuition. I make a note that the second claims to be tried by a jury. Of course, it would have considerably lightened my responsibility if I could have allowed your prayer.

The evidence being unsatisfactory, both the accused were pronounced 'Not Guilty' by the assessors. The Judge, agreeing, acquitted them."

THE first appeal arising out of the Jury Notification has come up to the High Court. It was admitted by the Hon'ble Justices Prinsep and Ghose:—

"Empress vs. I. C. Laha and others.—Baboo N. R. Chatterji, on behalf of the accused, applied for the admission of an appeal from the decision of the Sessions Judge of Burdwan, for the reason that the Judge had disagreed with the assessors, and had convicted accused, sentencing him to five years' rigorous imprisonment.

His Lordship, Justice Prinsep, asked what was the offence, and on learning that it was forgery, said that it was a jury case, and further asked why they were not tried by a jury.

The pleader stated that by the recent notification of the Government of Bengal on the jury system, they had been tried by assessors and not by jury, and that this order had been issued early in November.

The appeal was granted by their lordships."

Mr. Justice Prinsep would have perhaps spoken differently to Government, if he could know that his opinion on the reference would be construed into an approval of Sir Charles Elliott's policy. The learned Judge seems to be much in the position of Sir Alexander Arbuthnot, the member of the Viceregal Council in charge of the Vernacular Press Bill during the Lytton regime. But will he, like the other, at length speak out freely? He has given more than one indication that he could not believe that the Jury Notification would take the present shape.

THE introduction of jury trial was thorough in the Assam Division. Witness the following:—

"Notification.—The 28th March 1862.—It is hereby notified that, in conformity with Section CCCXXXVII of the Code of Criminal Procedure, the Lieutenant-Governor has been pleased to order that in all the Districts comprising the Assam Division the trial of all offences by the Court of Sessions shall be by jury.

E. H. LUSHINGTON,
Secy. Govt. of Bengal."

But it is not to remain so. The following notification appeared in the Assam Gazette of the 15th October, 1892:—

"No. 4662].—In exercise of the power conferred by section 269 of the Code of Criminal Procedure (Act X of 1882) and in supersession of the Notifications dated the 28th March 1862 and the 17th September 1868, published at pages 1286 and 1614 of the Calcutta Gazette of the 5th April 1862 and 23rd September 1868, respectively, the Chief Commissioner directs that the system of trial by jury before the Court of Sessions in the districts of Goalpara, Kamrup, Darrang, Nowgong, Sibsagar, and Lakhimpur, which constitute the Judgeship of the Assam Valley Districts, shall, from the 1st January 1893, be limited to the following offences under the Penal Code:—

Sections 363—369, 372, & 373 (kidnapping and abduction).

Section 376 (rape)

Sections 379—382. (theft).

" 392—395, 397—399, & 401 (robbery and dacoity).

" 403 and 404 (criminal misappropriation).

" 411—414 (receiving or possessing stolen property).

" 426—432, 434—436, and 440 (mischief).

" 448 and 450—462 (house trespass, &c).

" 493—498 (offences against marriage)."

In Assam, the aid against Jury trial does not begin till 1st January 1893. In Bengal, it has already commenced. Mr. Ward does not put into execution as soon as he conceives an idea. Our Governor is differently constituted. He allows himself no rest and his body and brain are always on the move.

Mr. J. Tweedie, Judge of Patna, has no end of objections to the continuance of jury trial in that district. Hear now what a well-known Sessions Judge of the same District spoke of that trial in 1862. Here is the celebrated Mr. Lautour's mature opinion:—

"No. 159 dated the 1st August 1862.

From—E. F. Lautour, Esq., Officiating Sessions Judge of Patna,
To—E. H. Lushington, Esq., Secretary to the Government of Bengal.

Adverting to my letter No. 94, dated the 16th May 1862, remarking on the system of trial by Jury, I have now the honor to report, for the information of the Lieutenant Governor, that I have reason to modify my previously expressed opinion as regards the working of that system.

2. It is not necessary for me to enter into a discussion on the political bearing of the question, but I will narrow the issue as much as possible.

3. I find, after trial of a certain number of cases, that the evidence of witnesses to the fact is given in a very straightforward manner and is perfectly free from exaggerations, whereas the evidence recorded by tutored witnesses is given in such a faulty manner and the demeanour of the witness in the box is such as enables the Judge and Jury to discern at once the worthlessness of the deposition recorded. I have found that tutored evidence invariably breaks down.

4. I have tried many cases with the aid of the Law officer, but the difficulty under the old system was to pick out the truth from the statements recorded by witnesses, who were always, more or less, prone to exaggerate facts, of the truth of which there could be no doubt. Such is not the case in cases tried by a Jury, as I find the witness to the fact sticking to the part and not deviating from the truth in any way, the witness manifestly knowing that exaggerations would be immediately detected by his countrymen. I am also of opinion that dishonest verdict will be rarer in the Mofussil than in Calcutta, as we have no antagonism of race in the Mofussil, but at the same time we cannot expect every verdict to be in accordance with the opinion of the Judge.

5. When the system becomes better understood, and jurymen know they are required to judge of facts only, and not to interpret the law applicable to the case, I doubt not the system will become more popular; but I think a small remuneration should be paid to jurymen for their travelling expenses, as a payment of this kind would do away with the assertion that the Government treated jurymen as so many beggars, and therefore it would lessen much of the unpopularity of the system among the natives of respectability.

6. I was opposed to the system when I addressed the Government in May last, but I now find I can get at the truth minus exaggerations and I find that false evidence breaks down; and observing how infinitely superior the present system is to the old system in the matter of evidence, I have no hesitation in expressing my opinion in its favor, and I should like to see it extended to all the Districts within the Province of Behar."

THE PERSECUTION OF THE PRESS.

TO THE EDITOR OF Reis and Rayyet.

SIR,—Permit me to invoke your aid on behalf of the compositors working in the office of the Superintendent of Government Printing, India. Since the departure of Mr. Dean, the late Superintendent, this office is being managed in a way that is simply astounding. The present Superintendent, Mr. Ross, was formerly Superintendent of the Alipore Jail Press. Both he and his young Deputy,—a boy of 21 or 22 years,—are conducting themselves towards the compositors, impositors, examiners, and pressmen, as arbitrarily that it is a wonder that the Financial Department of the Government of India abstains from interfering even when put in possession of all the facts. Oh, for an hour of Mr. Chapman! is the universal cry of more than a thousand men over whom the Superintendent and his Deputy are now playing such pranks before high Heaven and the deities of the Financial Department.

Goaded to distraction, the men have appealed to the Government of India. The petition of the impositors has been rejected. That of the compositors is still before the Financial Secretary. When the question, however, is about the trampled rights of poor men, what frequently occurs is that perfect impunity is offered to those powerful men that trample upon them.

In consequence of more work of an urgent character having been done during the last financial year, it would seem that Budget estimates under the head of Printing were exceeded. There was nothing extraordinary in this. Estimates are frequently exceeded in other departments. But then the present Superintendent, Mr. W. Ross, is a man of genius. He has invented a new method of recouping the excess. That invention consists in withholding from the hands working under him their just dues! He has calculated the excess and dividing it into portions has apportioned a share to each department or section, directing that the amount so apportioned should be made up by a system of regular or rather the most irregular mulcts. Accordingly, if a compositor works for 7 hours, he is credited with having worked for only 3 or 4 hours. If he works overtime, overtime allowance is not to be paid to him. Have the days of Bagar (impressment), everybody asks, returned?

Most of the compositors are old hands, serving for periods varying from 15 to 25 years. It is impossible to suppose that the efficiency of every man has, all on a sudden, deteriorated. Then again what other explanation need be sought on the face of the Superintendent's order directing the recoupment of the excess of last year by these mulcts? In rejecting the petition of the impositors who daily see themselves credited with only half-a-day's work after working with unflagging diligence for the whole day, the deities of Olympus do not know what mischief and wrong they have committed. That petition, it is said, has been rejected by the Hon'ble Sir David Barbour, because it was represented to him that these men frequently loiter away their time in hopes of getting overtime work with overtime allowance. The Hon'ble Member does not know that every hand in the Superintendent's office has to work under the immediate eye of persons called Section-holders who would promptly report every loiterer if loitering away from the "case." Alas! was the Hon'ble Member imposed upon by the specious reasoning of the Superintendent? Did he, while disposing of the petition, call for the order apportioning the excess and directing its recoupment in the strange way already adverted to? In the face of that order how could he believe in the theory of loitering away? Or, did he act upon the consideration that hands employed in a printing office are really all "devils" that must be kept down under iron heels, refusing them simple justice even when justice is their due? On any other theory, the rejection of the petition is inexplicable. The petition stated nothing but facts, incontestable and undeniable facts, supported by evidence of the strongest kind. It was an irksome business to attend to. The truth was ugly in the extreme. The Superintendent's beseeching and besieging could not be got rid of. The easiest course, therefore, was a good Dhamkoo (threat), telling the "devils" that they should think twice before disturbing the peace of the gods.

Meanwhile, will the Hon'ble Member learn what the result has been of the rejection of the petition? The Superintendent has been emboldened beyond all limits. Formerly, he used to credit 3 or 4 hours for a full day's work of 7 hours. Since the order of rejection, the mulcts are made more heavily still. After working for full 7 hours a man finds that he is to be credited with only 2 hours. If he ventures to complain, there is the order, the Dhamkoo, that has come down from Olympus. The Superintendent tells the murmurer, with cutting irony,--Man, you have the Financial Department to appeal to. Go there, you will have your remedy.---Sir, it is intolerable that he should be allowed to thus lord it over more than a thousand poor men upon the fruits of whose hard labour some more thousands of Her Majesty's subjects depend for bread. The lot of the Indian compositor is very hard. If the Hon'ble Sir David Barbour had himself to work for a full day and receive his pay for only half a day, and if when he appealed in agony of heart to the Secretary of State, a good Dhamkoo were wafted to him from England, he would then know what the distress is that has overtaken the compositors and other hands working in the Government of India's Press. Yours truly;

A SUFFERER.

Calcutta, December 2, 1892.

CAPTAIN HEARSEY AND SIR AUCKLAND COLVIN.

When Captain Hearsey presented his application on the 29th November to the Magistrate of Benares, Mr. R. H. Brereton, for the arrest of Sir Auckland Colvin for libel, the Magistrate said: You ought to get the sanction of the Secretary of State before you can prosecute the Lieutenant-Governor.

Captain Hearsey: Will your Honor kindly give me permission to say a few words in support of this petition?

The Magistrate: Certainly.

Captain Hearsey: Your Honor will be pleased to remember that Sir Auckland Colvin having given over charge is no longer Lieutenant-Governor of the North-Western Provinces and is no more in the service, and is, therefore, only a private individual like myself, and that your Court has every right to issue a warrant without applying to higher authority. I, as an Englishman, would urge your Honor as an Englishman to uphold that keystone of an Englishman's liberties, the Magna Charter, which states Nulli negibamus nulli differemus justitiam. I gave Sir Auckland Colvin no provocation whatsoever that he should defame me in the gross and malicious manner that he has done. His defamation was infinitely worse than that of the Pioneer, and there is a rule regarding that case ordering the arrest of Messrs. Dare and Chesney on record in the High Court of Calcutta. In simple justice, I believe, I am entitled to a warrant, especially as the accused is still in the country and about to leave it.

The Magistrate passed the following order:--This is a petition by Captain Hearsey charging Sir Auckland Colvin with defamation on the ground of a speech made by him at the opening of the water-works on November 18th in which remarks were made concerning a certain individual whose name was not mentioned. To begin with a Lieutenant-Governor cannot be prosecuted without the sanction of higher authority. Captain Hearsey should have procured such authority before presenting the petition instead of waiting till Sir Auckland Colvin had left for England, if he wished to make a charge against him. I see no reason whatever to take action in this complaint. Ordered that the petition be filed.

APPLICATION TO THE HIGH COURT.

At the Allahabad High Court, Criminal Revisional Jurisdiction, on Friday (Dec. 2.) the following petition of Captain Andrew William Hearsey in the matter of the complaint of the said Captain Andrew William Hearsey against Sir Auckland Colvin in the Court of Mr. R. H. Brereton, Esq., C. S., Magistrate of Benares, was presented to the Hon. the Chief Justice and the Hon. Mr. Justice Tyrrell:--

Humbly sheweth,--That your petitioner on the 29th day of November applied to R. H. Brereton, Esq., C. S., Magistrate of Benares, for a warrant for the arrest of Sir Auckland Colvin on account of criminal offences committed by him under Section 499 and 504 as accompanying document marked A. will show.

2.---That the said R. H. Brereton, Esq., C. S., Magistrate of Benares, refused to take any action on this petition by your petitioner as is shown by the certified copy of his order on the application herewith appended.

3.---That the said R. H. Brereton, Esq., C. S., Magistrate of Benares, is wrong in the reasons assigned by him in the order he passed on the 29th of November as follows:--

I.---That R. H. Brereton, Esq., C. S., Magistrate of Benares, states in his order "remarks were made concerning an individual whose name was not mentioned"--facts go to show that Sir Auckland Colvin the accused did mention the name of the individual (your petitioner) to the said Mr. Brereton as in his the accused's speech of the 18th November he says "I will not mention his name here, but Mr. Brereton, the Magistrate, has my authority to mention his name."

II.---That R. H. Brereton Esq., C. S., Magistrate of Benares, states in his order--"To begin with a Lieutenant-Governor cannot be prosecuted without the sanction of higher authority." That at the time your petitioner made his application to prosecute the accused in the Court of the Magistrate of Benares, that is on the 29th of November, Sir Auckland Colvin the accused was not the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-Western Provinces, he having assigned or surrendered his official appointment and offices on the 28th, the day before, and was therefore on the date in question only a private individual like myself, your petitioner, and this contention of the Magistrate either in fact or principle was no valid reason for refusing to issue the warrant applied for.

III.---That R. H. Brereton, Esq., C. S., Magistrate of Benares, is incorrect when he states in his order (for reasons assigned in foregoing paragraph) that Captain Hearsey should have procured such authority before presenting the petition instead of waiting till Sir Auckland Colvin had left for England. That at the time and date your petitioner made his application to the Magistrate of Benares, Sir Auckland Colvin, the accused, was still in this country and a warrant could have been issued for his arrest, that considering the emergency of the case and the impossibility of communicating with His Excellency the Viceroy in time to obtain his sanction if such sanction to prosecute was necessary, which your petitioner as explained in para. II denies, the Magistrate of Benares was wrong in not issuing the warrant applied for and by so doing permitting a criminal to evade the action of the law.

IV.—That no unnecessary delay on the part of your petitioner as implied by the order of the Magistrate of Benares, occurred in your petitioner's filing his charges and applying for a warrant for the accused's arrest from that official's court. Your petitioner only heard of the speech on arriving at Benares on the afternoon of the 26th November and only obtained the copy of that paper containing the speech on the 27th, the writing of the plaint and the printing of that document took up the whole of the 28th, so that it was impossible to file the application till after 2 P. M. on the 29th as it was at that hour the Magistrate of Benares received the petition.

V.—That under all these circumstances which conclusively prove that R. H. Brereton, Esq., Magistrate of Benares, is wrong in all his facts as stated in his order,

Your petitioner most humbly and respectfully prays your lordship to grant a rule and issue a warrant that may be despatched by telegraph after Sir Auckland Colvin so as to enforce his return to India for the purpose of appearing before the courts of this province for trial on the charges made against him under sections 499 and 504 of the Indian Penal Code.

Mr. Reid, Barrister-at-law, objected to Captain Hearsey's application being received until after all the applications had been filed by members of the bar.

The Chief Justice: You must wait till the members of the bar have filed their petitions.

Captain Hearsey: I was unaware my lord that there was any law on this subject.

After all other petitions had been filed, Captain Hearsey presented his petition and commenced to address the Court as follows:—My lords, this is an application in Criminal Revisional Jurisdiction against the order of Mr. R. H. Brereton, C. S., Magistrate of Benares, refusing to issue a warrant for the arrest of Sir Auckland Colvin. My lords, the original application was against the accused on account of a defamatory speech made by him at the opening of the water-works at Benares on the 18th November. In this speech Sir Auckland Colvin describes me as an insolent scoundrel, an uneducated, vulgar boor, a cheat and a coward, and also of being disloyal. My lords, before Sir Auckland Colvin arrived in India I had shed my blood in defence of my country whilst serving under Havelock in his cavalry which people have done us the honour of terming Havelock's Ironsides.

The Chief Justice: Are you Captain Hearsey?

Captain Hearsey: Yes, my lord, I am.

The Chief Justice: I will read the documents. On reading para. 4 of the original complaint in the Benares Magistrate's Court, Sir John Edge said: I see you describe the word dupe as a common cheat.

Captain Hearsey: Yes, my lord. The word in the dictionary bears the construction of cheat.

The Chief Justice spoke to Mr. Justice Tyrrell who seemed to coincide with that reading of the word.

The Chief Justice: I see that you state that Sir Auckland Colvin's speech would be liable to cause a breach of the peace. Surely you would not think of assaulting a Lieutenant-Governor.

*Captain Hearsey did not reply to this question but, says the reporter, there was a very expressive smile on his face.

On completing the perusal of the documents, the Chief Justice said: Captain Hearsey, what proof have you got that Sir Auckland Colvin alluded to you?

Captain Hearsey: My lord, it was the common report when I returned to Benares on the 25th of November, that the individual indicated in the speech of Sir Auckland Colvin was myself. I had no option for the purpose of clearing my character but to file a criminal charge and endeavour to prevent Sir Auckland Colvin from leaving the country till he answered the charge made against him, and this could only be done by obtaining a warrant for his detention.

The Chief Justice: But you have not shown anywhere in the evidence that Sir Auckland Colvin alluded to you. Many others from Benares might take it upon themselves to say that Sir Auckland Colvin alluded to them and ask for a warrant.

Captain Hearsey: My lord, Sir Auckland Colvin in his speech of the 18th says, "Only two days ago I received a telegram from a man of this class." I telegraphed to Sir Auckland Colvin only two days before and asked for an interview. It was on a matter important to the State. I would ask your lordship to peruse the lines in this letter. It is a matter I do not dare to utter publicly as it might be the cause of danger to the Empire itself.

The Chief Justice: I cannot read the letter. Up to the present you have given no proof that Sir Auckland Colvin alluded to you, as he might have received telegrams from many others.

Captain Hearsey: My lord, it was well-known by a considerable number of people that he did allude to me. In fact a gentleman gave me a copy of the Morning Post and said, "See what Sir Auckland Colvin has said of you." It was also known in Benares, Allahabad, and Calcutta to whom Sir Auckland Colvin alluded.

The Chief Justice: That may be, but we have no proof that it was you to whom he alluded.

Captain Hearsey: I see the mistake I made, my lord. I ought to have got a letter from Mr. Brereton in which the name of the person alluded to was mentioned. I cannot call evidence to the fact, nor can I, as Mr. Brereton never took my evidence on oath—

The Chief Justice: You do not have that fact down as one of your objections to the proceedings of the lower Court and this is a court of revision not original jurisdiction, and therefore cannot admit of any fresh evidence, but is there anything else in the speech that showed that it was intended for you? Where does the cap fit? Are you a professional agitator?

Captain Hearsey: No, my lord, but when I hear of injustice either to my countrymen or to the poor natives of India, and there are many cases in India, I cannot help feeling for them as I have suffered much from official injustice myself. I will concede to no one the loyalty of myself and the members of my family towards my Queen and country.

The Chief Justice: I am very glad to hear you say so; but anyhow Sir Auckland Colvin has left the country and I don't see how our warrant could run on the high seas.

Captain Hearsey: My lord, that is why I wanted a warrant for his arrest, a Ne exeat regnum; yet I think if your lordship was to grant one now, it would bring him back, for if any one quits the country who has been guilty of theft, embezzlement, or forgery a warrant would bring him back. Sir Auckland Colvin has been guilty of a criminal action, and a warrant would stop him although he had got as far as Suez. Sir Auckland Colvin's conduct in this matter puts one in mind of the disreputable little boy who writes a naughty word on a wall and then runs away.

The Chief Justice: Captain Hearsey, you must not employ this Court to make use of abusive language.

Captain Hearsey: I beg your pardon, my lord; it was only an absurd simile that rose up in my mind at the cowardly Parthian shot Sir Auckland Colvin took advantage of his official position to aim at me as he was leaving the country.

The Chief Justice: I'm afraid under the circumstances that our warrant, even if it were issued, could not touch Sir Auckland Colvin as he is on board one of the Austrian Lloyds steamers, and therefore to all intents and purposes on foreign territory and under foreign jurisdiction.

Captain Hearsey: I was unaware of that fact, your lordship. I believed that he was on the English mail steamer. I quite understand the point your lordship has raised, but my lord, I simply came into these courts as Sir Auckland Colvin would wish the world to believe that I was Nulla virtute redemptum, therefore, your lordship, I as an Englishman come to you as an English Judge to uphold that glorious Charter the keystone of an Englishman's liberties, the Magna Charter, which lays down Nulli negibamus, nulli differemus justitiam.

The Chief Justice.—You come to me in Revision, and as a Court of Revisional Jurisdiction, I can only deal with the records of the court below. This is an application for revision against an order of the Magistrate of Benares, refusing a warrant for the arrest of Sir Auckland Colvin, under sections 499 and 504, Indian Penal Code. Before a warrant can be issued in this case there would be many questions of law to be considered. But the fundamental primary answer to this application is that the words complained of are not shown to have been applied to Captain Hearsey. According to the words set out, the applicant states that the Magistrate of Benares had authority to mention the name of the person of whom Sir Auckland Colvin was speaking. There is in the application before me nothing to show that any application was made to the Magistrate of Benares for the information. It is stated in the application that many persons present at the time were able to arrive at a knowledge that Sir Auckland Colvin was alluding to Captain Hearsey. If that be so, the statement on affidavit of those persons should have been forthcoming. Reading the words which have been set out, and which were alleged to have been spoken by Sir Auckland Colvin, I feel unable to form an opinion as to whom these words were intended to apply. Under such circumstances, even if there were no other questions of law to consider in the matter, it would be my duty, as it was the duty of the Magistrate of Benares, who had no more information than I have, to refuse to put the criminal law into motion. A person is not entitled to put the criminal law into motion under sections 499 and 504, Indian Penal Code, on a mere bare suspicion that the applicant may be the person referred to. Before the Magistrate could issue a warrant on charges as framed, it would be necessary for him, on evidence furnished by affidavit or otherwise, to be reasonably satisfied that the words complained of not only came within the sections, but were words spoken of the complainant. Whether these words were spoken of the complainant or not, is a matter as to which I can form no judgment. I accordingly reject the application.—The Morning Post.

* We should very much like to know what Captain Hearsey really thought on this point.—Ed.

Holloway's Pills.—The Female's Friend.—So soon as the human functions are disordered they should be rectified. It is a hopeless delusion to leave the malady to its own course. A few appropriate doses of Holloway's Pills at the proper period will prevent many a serious illness. They arrest all morbid influences, and prevent disease from extending and affecting more distant organs. Their primary action is upon the blood, stomach, liver, kidneys, and bowels. Their secondary action strengthens the nervous centres. No drug can be at once so harmless, yet so antagonistic to disorders affecting the other sex. The most perfect reliance may be placed upon their purifying, regulating and renovating virtues. They may be safely taken by females at any age.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

CUPID SCHOOLED.

I.

WHEN she was as gay as a linnet,
And I was as fresh as a lark,
Never a day but some minute
We met betwixt dawning and dark.

II.

"Katie, and when shall we marry?"
"Marry?" she said, with a sigh,— "That's cake and ribbons on Monday,
And sorrow ere Saturday's by.

III.

"You are as lean as a lizard,
I am as poor as a mouse;
Nothing per annum, paid quarterly,
Hardly finds rent for a house.

IV.

"'Love and a crust in a cottage,'
Capital! just for a pair:
What if the hut should grow populous?
How would the populace fare?

V.

"Oh, ay! the uncle you reckon on,— Gouty, and rich, and unwed,—
Dick! they wait ill, says the adage, who Wait for the shoes of the dead.

VI.

"Ah! if I loved you, I'd risk it!
That's what you're thinking, I guess:—
Why, I would risk it to-morrow,
Dick, if I cared for you less!

VII.

"Love's apt to fly out at window
When Poverty looks in at door:
Rather I'd die than help banish him,
Dick, just by keeping you poor.

VIII.

"Kiss me! you'll look in on Sunday?
Won't my new bonnet be brave?
Jene at its longest and leafiest—
My! what a ramble we'll have!

IX.

"Bye-bye! There's grandmother waiting
Patient at home for her tea:

Dick, if you wouldn't wed both of us,
You must be patient for me!"

X.

Showers, if they ruffle its foliage,
Freshen the green of the grove:
True lovers' tiffs, said old Terence, are Only fresh fuel to Love.

XI.

If I flung off in a passion—
If she crept in for a cry—
Sunday came smiling and settled it,
Katie was wiser than I.

XII.

Love's but a baby that, passionate,
Cries to be mated at birth:
Time isn't lost if it teaches you
What a good woman is worth.

XIII.

What if the waiting was wearisome?
What if the work-days were drear?
Time, the old thief, could't rob us of Fifty-two Sundays a-year.

XIV.

How long was Liberty coming?
Long enough—ever her way:
Lustrum, or Decad, or Century,—
What does it matter to-day?

XV.

Nunky died single at sixty,
Granny at eighty or so:
Well, if we didn't weep long for 'em—
'Twasn't in nature, you know.

XVI.

Grannies and uncles are liable
All to die some day, that's clear:
Sorrow finds wonderful comfort in Five or six hundred a-year.

XVII.

And lovers may marry at forty,
Ay, and live happy to boot,
Though Phillis be grey as a badger,
And Corydon bald as a coot.

WEEKLYANA.

THE Black Man has triumphed. Mr. Dadabhai Naoroji's trouble is over. The scrutiny of the voting papers of the Central Finsbury elections so captankeously started and pertinaciously pursued by Captain Penton, his defeated rival for the honor of representing the constituency, has been closed. On Tuesday, the Captain came to terms with Mr. Naoroji and withdrew his petition, each party, by mutual agreement, paying his own costs. The result is a great relief to us in India. Mr. Naoroji's seat is now safe. There will be a native Indian Member of the British House of Commons all through this Parliament.

THREE days after the ceremony, on Monday last, the Englishman published the Levée List. The next day, the Statesman gave another said to be complete. Here is our analysis of the List :—

Private Entrée ...	110—Asiatics	20, Europeans	90
Public Entrée ...	797—Asiatics	197, Europeans	600
New Presentations ...	138—Asiatics	29, Europeans	109
Unavoidably Absent...	361—Asiatics	130, Europeans	231

The total number of gentlemen who answered the Levée notification by sending in their cards, was therefore 1406, 1030 being Europeans and 376 Asiatics, the former outnumbering the latter by about 2½ times. The actually present were 1045, Europeans 799 and Asiatics 246, or 3¼ to 1. The unavoidably absent numbered 361, Europeans 231 and Asiatics 130, or in the proportion of over 1 4/5 to 1. The presenters were 92 Europeans and 18 Asiatics or 5 to 1.

Since last year, it has been ruled that, as in the Drawing-Room for ladies, gentlemen presenting others at the Levée must themselves be present, but we find in the present list several presenters absenting themselves. So many as 10 Europeans and 4 Asiatics are guilty of this breach of court discipline. The list published is necessarily semi-official, but there ought to be a full official publication for general information and guidance and future reference.

No care seems to have been taken to eliminate the List of objectionable "gentlemen."

Our apprehensions have proved true. Except in the Private Entrée, the numbers have fallen off both of the Public Entrée and the New Presentations as compared with the last year. The quotations of 1891 are :—

Private Entrée	101
Public Entrée	856
New Presentations	175
Unavoidably Absent	386

THE Drawing Room analysis is :—

Private Entrée	51
Public Entrée	148
New Presentations	104
Total number who sent in their cards	319
Actually present	203
Unavoidably absent	116
Presentresses...	66
Presentress absent	4

HERE is a brief notice of the past Russian Famines :—

"The British Consul at St. Petersburg, in his report on the trade in Russia for the past year, says of last year's famine that it was only remarkable for the magnitude of the area of the country over which it spread. Famines are no strangers to Russia. The first considerable one in the present century occurred in 1833, and it is said to have cost the Government and people £10,000,000, many thousands of the population becoming hopelessly involved in debt, and numerous landed proprietors being ruined. A disease broke out in the southern parts of the country closely resembling scurvy, produced by the consumption of acorns, chaff, and the insufficiency of sour cabbage and kvass, which are anti-scorbutics, and constitute regular articles of diet of the Russian population. Beggars and vagrants spread over the country, and theft of grain attained serious proportions. In the provinces of the Taurida, Ekaterinoslav, and in some of the districts of the province of Saratoff, as also in the country of the Don Cossacks, from two-thirds to nine-tenths of the cattle died from want of fodder. The area of the winter crops was reduced to one-third of its previous proportions, owing to a scarcity of seed, which the Government only supplied in the course of the following spring. This famine was succeeded after an interval of only seven years by a similar calamity which affected as large an extent of the country. The famine of 1843 spread over twelve provinces, the chief sufferers being the provinces of Tamboff, Riazan, Tula, and Kaluga. Its origin was again attributable to a drought of long duration. In the previous year the crops had been bad ones in the same localities, so that assistance was required on a large scale. The Government was more active on this occasion in affording relief in the shape of food and seed. The four provinces which had suffered most, the population of which amounted to more than 2,000,000, received a sum in all of £1,700,000. The other provinces, Orel, Smolensk, Moscow, Poltava, Penza, Valadimir, Kursk and Kharkoff, received in the shape of loans about £2,178,615. The price of grain rose from 6r. 50c. per sack to 3fr. 37c. and even 50r. A serious famine visited the provinces of Vitabsk, Moghilev, Minsk, Pskov, Vilna, Kovno, Smolensk, and Petersburg in the years 1844 and 1846. The measures taken for relief were the same as those adopted in previous famines, and the cost to the Government was £1,000,000. During the last thirty years more or less considerable famines took place in 1867-68 and 1872-73. On the former occasion a failure of the crops took place in the southern Steppe provinces, and in the latter on the lower Volga and Trans-Volga provinces. The zemstvos during both these periods were charged with the sustenance of the distressed districts, the Government limiting its activity to making advances out of the general sustenance fund of the Empire. Since the establishment of the zemstvos, or territorial bodies, these have in time of want aided the peasantry to the extent of £1,145,021. A more serious famine than the last two took place in 1890 in some of the Trans-Volga provinces when the Government advanced money to the peasantry out of the general sustenance fund, and expended large sums in works of irrigation and on the construction of the Baskuchinsk Railway. The comparatively frequent occurrence of famines in Russia is now engaging the serious attention of the Government. The question of these famines has been discussed at length in the Russian press, and the general conclusion is that they are not so much due to droughts and other natural phenomena as to the general backward state of agriculture in Russia, the unmerciful deforestation of the country, and last, but not least, to the ignorant condition of the peasantry."

THE Maha-aja of Tippearah is on a visit to Calcutta. He arrived early this week. The Burra Thakur had preceded him by three weeks.

MR. H. J. Mc. Intosh has been confirmed as Under-Secretary to the Government of Bengal in the Financial and Municipal Departments, and Mr. H. C. Streetfield transferred in the same capacity to the Judicial, Political and Appointment Departments.

MR. H. Holmwood having been allowed one month's leave, Mr. H. B. Bames, Officiating First Inspector of Registration Offices, will, in addition to his own, perform the ordinary duties of the Inspector-General of Registration to the dismay of the Department. The other duties have been entrusted to the Under-Secretary to the Government of Bengal in the General, Revenue, and Statistical Department. Mr. J. W. Richardson will have the tedium of his regular work diversified, though for a month, with the sweets of the offices of Senior Marriage Registrar of Calcutta and Registrar of Parsee Marriages beyond the local limits of the ordinary civil jurisdiction of the High Court, and Registrar-General of Births, Deaths and Marriages.

BABOO Behari Lal Chandra, Sub-Registrar of Calcutta, goes on three months' leave from 1st January 1893. Kumar Ramendralala Mitra, Special Sub-Registrar of Alipore, 24-Parganas, comes in his place and Baboo Hem Chunder Kerr from Sealdah goes to Alipore.

FROM the 1st January 1893, no shipping-bills or bills-of-entry will be received at the Calcutta Custom House unless they bear on them a stamp or signature showing that the toll payable to the Commissioners for the Port of Calcutta has been paid in full.

"UNLESS good reasons are shown to the contrary, within one month" from the 14th December 1892, the Lieutenant-Governor intends to include, for the purposes of the Calcutta Hackney Carriage Act II of 1891, the Howrah, Bally, South Suburban, Maniktola, Cassipore, Chitpore, Baranagore, North Dum-Dum, and South Dum-Dum, Municipalities within Calcutta.

WE read :—

"On September 9, about 6 P. M., the sailing cutter of the Swallow, while cruising off the south end of the Zanzibar Islands, anchored off Uzi Island, when half the men landed, leaving Mr. M'Dermott, John Sadler, H. Payne, Charles Lawford, and W. Rendle (able bodied seaman) in the boat. Lawford and Payne jumped overboard and were bathing when a large shark was seen making towards Lawford. The fish was only 4 ft. or 5 ft. off when, without any hesitation and not divesting himself of any of his clothes, M'Dermott plunged into the sea 'right on top of the shark,' and with the plash he made frightened it away for a short time, while the men were quickly drawn into the boat. M'Dermott suffered nothing from the immersion, and but for his prompt action Lawford must have lost his life."

The Admiralty have brought M'Dermott's heroism to the notice of the Royal Humane Society which will award its silver medal to him.

A TROJAN SONG.

I.

O MEN of Troy! Will you still cry
Like children that are hurt?
Danger ahead! Will you not ply
The oar, and make a spurt
To save the bark? Will sighs and tears
In peril's hour avail?
Fling off unmanly doubts and fears,
And boldly face the gale!

II.

Cowards will fail, but not the brave,
Who to themselves are true;
Stout hearts will rule the wind and wave,
But ne'er a dastard crew.
The guerdon ever is the due—
Jove still the labour crowns—
Of earnest souls that dare and do,
In spite of Fortune's frowns.

III.

Ho, warders, to the ramparts swift!
The foe is at the gate!
See, the Palladium's seized, the gift
Of pow'r's benign and great!
If ye are men, from ruthless hand
Oh! strive the boon to save;
A bold front, yet a manly stand,
May rescue what they gave.

IV.

Treat not for truce, sue not for grace,—
The time for that is past;
The honor, manhood of your race,
Now bids you dare the blast!
Shoulder to shoulder move ye on,—
A phalanx close and bold;
Flinch not, shrink not, till you have won!
Press on, both young and old!

V.

Flinch not, shrink not, till you have won!
The gods your cause befriend;
And all the world from sun to sun,
Approves your noble end.
Fling down false Hope's Circean cup!
'Twere fatal to delay;
Up, up, all resolutely up!
Speed to your posts away!

VI.

Within the fortress' well-marked round—
Before a strong-soul'd band,
No foeman's footstep should be found,
Nor foeman's rifling hand.
Quick, Trojans, to yon wall repair!
The foe a breach has made!
Gather your strength, O gallants, there!
Stay there his fatal raid!

VII.

One step backward, and Ilion's lost!
Relentless is the foe;
Defend your own at any cost;
No time for parley now!
Up, Trojans, up! go, man the wall,—
A brave, devoted train;—
Victory, or the shroud and pall!
But ne'er as slaves remain!

RAM SHARMA.

NOTES & LEADERETTES

OUR OWN NEWS.

"NOTHING aggravates tyranny so much as contumely," says Burke. And there is this aggravating element in Sir Charles Elliott's action in the Jury business.

The notorious Notification is a bad measure badly determined upon and worse introduced. It wrested from the people one of their most valuable safe-guards in the most provoking manner. By this sudden swoop the present administration have unmistakably proclaimed their utter contempt for the people. The country was taken by surprise. It was at first difficult to believe that Government could be serious. Then there burst a chorus of indignation from all sides. All parties were united and individual rivalries sunk in general consternation. Meetings in protest were held in the country, at every important centre. The crowning demonstration of the metropolis will come on on Tuesday, the 20th, at 4-30 in the afternoon.

THIS meeting would have, as it ought to have, been held much sooner. But hopes—idle hopes as they have proved—were entertained in influential and honourable circles of the native community, and it was resolved that, before committal to agitation, an opportunity should be given to the Lieutenant-Governor and the Viceroy to reconsider the subject with a view to the withdrawal of the obnoxious Notification. Accordingly, while meeting after meeting was held in the Districts, commencing with the great meeting at Krishnaghur, followed by no less important ones at Hooghly, Midnapore, Moorshedabad, and other towns, there was no sign of activity in Calcutta, although public opinion here, as expressed in the press, showed an unanimity such as was never observed on any previous question within the last forty years. In due course, both the Governor and the Governor-General came to the metropolis and Maharaja Jotindro Mohan Tagore and Maharaja Doorga Charan Law together waited upon them one after another. Smiling they went—to return with long faces. Only valuable time has been lost in this waiting game for nothing, giving the officials opportunities for better and more careful preparation for their justification. It is strange that experienced men of the world could imagine for a moment that high functionaries of state could discredit themselves irretrievably by such fickleness as was expected of them.

WAS it seriously expected that Sir Charles Elliott would eat his own famous Notification, with H. J. S. Cotton—we mean the Chief Secretarial signature, and all?

As for the Viceroy, it was not necessary to wait for him, specially after his declaration in the South.

In their address of welcome to the Viceroy when he was at Madras, the local Mahajan Sabha thus alluded to the Jury Notification in Bengal:—

"The Sabha has noticed with grave apprehension the retrograde step taken by the Government of Bengal in regard to the system of trial by Jury, and, if it be a fact, as is given out in public prints, that the Government of India has accorded its sanction to such a step, the matter assumes a general importance and justifies the Sabha in inviting Your Excellency's attention to it."

Lord Lansdowne only replied:—

"The whole of the correspondence has lately been published, and I venture to think that, when you have read it, you will be of opinion that the step was amply justified by the facts and need not be regarded with the apprehensions which you have expressed."

And he still sees no reason to interfere.

As will be found in another column, the outgoing Sheriff has called a public meeting on Tuesday next, the 20th December, at the Town Hall, at 4-30 P.M., to express the community's dissatisfaction and alarm at the Jury Notification. The new Sheriff will open the meeting. That is like Mr. Mehta. Not only has Fortune lifted him to the Shrievalty but she accompanies him there and enables him to celebrate his accession to office in the forenoon of Tuesday with a triumph as it were in the afternoon by opening a great historic demonstration at the head of all his fellow-citizens of all races and classes. In his new elevation we hope Mr. Mehta will not desert the other citizens in their hour of danger. The meeting has not been called early enough for the outrage committed in the dark, but we hope there will be a grand show and vigorous protest to make up past lapses. Every citizen is bound to attend. It is as much the duty of the promoters to see that the front seats are not occupied by mere early comers.

LAST week we quoted the opinion of a former Sessions Judge of Patna on the Jury Trial in that district, recommending its extension within the Province of Behar. We this week give the opinion of another famous Sessions Judge as to the satisfactory working of the system in the 24-Pergannahs and his preference of Jury Trial to Trial by Assessors:—

"No. 161, dated the 19th April, 1862.

From—E. Lautour, Esq., Sessions Judge of the 24-Pergannahs,

To—E. H. Lushington, Esq., Secretary to the Government of Bengal.

The Government of Bengal was pleased to direct (Notification, dated 7th January 1862, published at page 87 of the Calcutta Gazette), that trials under certain Chapters of the Penal Code should be by jury.

2. An inconvenience arises from the restrictions which will be best explained by an illustration.

3. During the present Sessions a prisoner was committed for the theft of a bank note, and was triable by a jury. Another count charged him with forgery, he having endorsed the note in the name of the real owner. This was not triable by a jury under the present rules.

4. I consider that this inconvenience requires to be met; and I would suggest that trial by jury be extended to all the sections of the Penal Code, powers reserved to the Sessions Judge to hold any trial with assessors. I am of opinion, however, that trial by jury should be extended to all cases without reserve.

The system is working very well, and I would much rather work with a jury than with assessors."

THE late lamented statesman Sir Henry Durand had an important conversation with the eminent Hindu minister Raja Dinkur Rao, which he took care to record in his Journal, under date the 12th January, 1866, thus:—

"Dinkur Rao called and had a long talk. He told me of Lawrence having asked him what was the real cause of the mutiny, and that he told Lawrence it was only a pretence, the greased cartridges, &c., and that the real cause was discontent of the people, reflected only by the army as alone able to show and give force to its feelings; that our 'kanoon' and laws and regulations were the true cause. He told me roundly that in all quarters our rule was hated and unpopular, though the people never had had, and never would have, such a government. He blames our police as the source of much evil, and of filling the jails."—Life of Sir H. M. Durand, vol. I., p. 346.

Those remarks of the great Hindu are not without application to the present occasion. The Police is the source of much evil, and of filling the jails, and it is the Police at whose instance Trial by Jury, deliberately granted to the people, has been unceremoniously withdrawn, the better to fill the jails.

MR. Justice Banerjee has resigned the Vice-Chancellorship of the Calcutta University. Dr. Gurusdas Banerjee has had three years in continuation—three years of active uninterrupted usefulness—and now gracefully retires of his own instance, before the second term is complete.

AND now we trust the Hon'ble Mahendra Lal Sircar will be appointed to the office. We are not given, either in private life or journalistically, to recommend men to offices or titles because, for one reason, such recommendations have often a contrary effect. Dr. Sircar in especial is our doctor and our friend from a long time, and we would certainly not have named him if we thought the least possible rational objection might be started against him.

The sum total of distinctions open to a pure Indian is but small, and it were a pity to withhold any one or part of one. Dr. Sircar is not only our most distinguished man of science but one of our principal public men and a gifted orator. As founder-Secretary of the Science Association his services to the cause of education go without saying. He would be the right man in the right place.

Of late his health has been bad. We hope there are yet many years of work in him. There is now no margin for waste. We natives in this climate do not live so long, with our faculties in full force, as Europeans at home. Opportunities are apt to come to us too late. We only trust the call upon Dr. Sircar to fill the chief place in our University—under the Chancellor—will come in time.

A SUIT has just been filed in the ordinary original civil jurisdiction of the High Court of Judicature at Fort William in Bengal, which, if allowed to go on, is calculated to rake up the buried history of a Calcutta millionaire, of half a century back. The Mullicks of Andul and Ramkrishnapore on the opposite side of the Hooghly, owned valuable properties which have passed out of their hands. That passage from them to the present owners is the subject of the plaint. We shall try to obtain and give hereafter a résumé of the plaint.

THE Maharaja of Travancore is resolved to maintain the reputation of his kingdom as the model state of native India. He has taken the shine out of other Princes by a large measure of enlightened liberality. He has sanctioned a general increase of pay to the servants of the State. By one stroke of his pen His Highness has endeared himself to his people. We say his people, for though it is the officials who are directly interested, the whole country will be benefited. Adequate and good pay to Government employés means less oppression to the public. The incurably bad may still continue to fleece the people, but the motive being distinctly abated, corruption will be necessarily reduced to a minimum.

The new order imposes on the ministry a difficult and delicate responsibility. The new Dewan will find it no easy task to hit upon a scheme to satisfy the large expectations necessarily raised. We can advise him only generally. He should avoid nice distinctions.

We hope the other Chiefs will not be slow to profit by such good example.

THE Commission consisting of Mr. H. M. Winterbotham, C.S., acting Collector of Tanjore, and Mr. Srinivasa Charlu, Sub-Judge of Kumbakonam, to investigate the charges against Mr. Ram Chandra Row, C.S., commenced their proceedings at Tanjore in the Municipal office, on the 9th December. Mr. Willie Grant prosecuted and V. Bashyam Aiyangar defended the accused who was also present. The charges are:—

"That you being a Public Servant as aforesaid did, on or about the 6th November, 1889, accept for yourself from or on behalf of Bom-machi Naicker, the Zamindar of Ammayanickanur, a present, to wit, a silk umbrella, contrary to the provisions of Section 24 of the Statute 13, George III, Chapter 63.

That you being a Public Servant as aforesaid did, during enquiry carried on by Mr. Turner, the officer appointed by Government to inquire into certain charges, made against you as such Public Servant, and on or about the 24th of March, 1892, use as true, or genuine evidence, which you knew to be fabricated, to wit, a private account-book, such use amounting to misbehaviour and being matter of inquiry under the provisions of said Act XXXVII of 1850.

That you being a Public Servant as aforesaid, did during the said enquiry so carried on by the said Mr. Turner, the officer appointed as aforesaid, to inquire into certain charges made against you as such Public Servant did on or about the said 24th March, 1892, fraudulently and dishonestly use as genuine a document, to wit, your said private account book in the second charge mentioned, which account book you knew or had reason to believe to be a forged document, such behaviour being matter of inquiry under the provisions of the aforesaid Act XXXVII of 1850."

From a telegraphic report, it appears that

"At the conclusion of the proceedings on the 14th the Commissioners said that on the evidence already recorded there was no prima facie case made out against the defendant. In regard to the charge of having received a silk umbrella the Crown prosecutor applied for summons for the recall of one of the chief witnesses, the tailor who made the umbrella. Application was granted, and the case adjourned to the 21st."

THE Commissioner of the Presidency Division, Mr. Beames, has found a remedy for the want of good drinking water in the country:—

"The question of securing a good supply of drinking-water is undoubtedly a very serious one. The task is beyond the power of any Government to accomplish, but it is by no means beyond the power of the people themselves. Unfortunately the people of India are very slow to help themselves; their only idea is to cry to Government to help them. Educated Bengalis profess great attachment to the principle of Local Self-Government, so long as it is confined to spending money supplied to them by Government. It is time that they should be taught that Local Self-Government means local efforts to help themselves. District Officers should direct their Engineers to impress upon the people how much they may effect by local subscriptions and personal exertions. If the owners of tanks would throw them open for public use, and the labouring classes, who sit idle for a large part of the year, would give a certain number of days of gratuitous labour, much might be done. But so long as zamindars will not allow their tanks to be touched, and the peasant, though suffering from want of water, will not dig, unless he is paid for it, progress must necessarily be slow. Both these difficulties might in time be overcome if Collectors and Sub-divisional Officers would devote themselves to the task of persuasion and organising local effort."

The Government Resolution on the Commissioner's report for the year 1891-92, quotes the above passage with the remark "The crying want of the division is good drinking water. The Commissioner writes": Has Sir Charles Elliott given up his idea of the remedy by legislation for which he held a conference at Belvedere?

COLONEL Dr. Mahomed Shakir Bey Effendi, a medical officer in the Turkish Army, who had been travelling for some time in the North Western Provinces and the Punjab, in search of information regarding the causes of cholera, has just arrived in Calcutta. He has been deputed by the Sublime Porte to make a thorough enquiry into the subject, on the spot, viz., in India, which has been declared by the entire medical authorities of Europe to be the home of cholera. He intends to pay a visit to Jessore, from which place, as the Doctor learned from a medical work in the French language, cholera originated in the first instance.

THE Native Chiefs who are expected in the metropolis sooner or later in this season, are their Highnesses the Maharajas of Mysore, Gwalior, Patiala, and the Prime Minister of Nepal. His Highness of Tipperah has already arrived.

THE vacancy caused in the post of Persian and Arabi Professor in the Presidency College, by the promotion of Shamsul Ulma Moulvi Ahmad to the head Moulviship of the Calcutta Medressah, has just been filled by the appointment of Moulvi Mirza Ashraff Ali, Head Persian teacher in the Anglo Persian Department of the Calcutta Medressah—to the satisfaction of the Mahomedan community.

THOSE who grieved the most the death of the late Pandit Iswara Chandra Vidyasagar, and were the loudest in his praise, had evidently exhausted themselves on the melancholy occasion. At any rate, they had no sympathy left for the son or the monumental educational establishment left by the deceased. Soon after the anniversary of the demise, they have begun dispraising the institution in consequence of some changes found necessary, and have even gone so far as to abolish it altogether. A rumour has been started that the Metropolitan Institution is to be sold. A purchaser too has been selected in the owner of a rival college, and the consideration money fixed. The whole is a neat little romance, not very creditable to those concerned, or the newspapers which have lent themselves to its dissemination.

HAS the Gaekwad during his visit to Europe been straying to Liverpool? Was he there tackled by that dangerous man Mr. Quilliam and operated upon, to the loss of his integrity as a creature and devotee of Brahmá? Has he, wild young fellow, established a haram and filled it with Mahomedan Peris? Such, at any rate, is the suggestion in an English journal—not darkly hinted at, but openly and unmistakably expressed, without the least periphrasis. In an elaborate account of the last Lord Mayor's Show in London, occurs the following:—

"Just as I arrived Lady Salisbury drove by in an open carriage, going westward: and then up drove the Gaekwad of Baroda. Turbanned and superbly attired, blazing with jewels, his Highness alighted and stood until her Highness the Maharani Chinnabai Gaekwad and two little princelings preceded him. I had the opportunity of seeing a sight which is, I believe, rare—the unveiled features of a Mahomedan Maharani, and beautiful features they were, with black lustrous eyes which fascinate with a passing glance."

That is unimpeachable testimony—the report of an eye-witness who has no interest to misrepresent and who wrote as he saw. So, Maharaja Siyají Rao has been inatrimonialising on the sly en route and populating his household. He left home and his country accompanied by his consort—a regular Hindu princess. He did not take with him any Mussulman Rani, having none in stock. This Mahomedan Maharani the writer on the London Star assigns him, is altogether a new departure—an addition as well as a curiosity—which has to be explained as well as accepted—which has not only to be enrolled but also understood.

The London correspondent of the Indian Spectator seizes on that passage in the Star newspaper and dances in delight at the opportunity for merriment at the expense of the English writer. After quoting it, "There's for you!" cries he,

"There's for you! Imperial pride and chivalry in the humble breast of a patriotic descriptive reporter! It was, indeed, 'a rare sight' that of 'a Mahomedan Maharani—' and, 'unveiled' too! Who shall say, after this, that your Indian dignitaries are unknown to our popular scribes?"

But is the case of the Star scribe so bad? It is by no means hopeless. Is the Indian Spectator's Correspondent sure that, in making fun with another, he is not tempting others to make fun with himself? We are afraid that, in citing the blunder of another, he has incurred the risk of exposure himself. Certainly, his own knowledge is not so extensive and deep that he can afford to jest at his neighbour's ignorance. A "Mahomedan Maharani" is not the rara avis that he thinks. Perhaps he has heard of the Sultan of Johore. That Chief is a brand new Sultan, his proper title being Raja or Maharaja, which in an hour of weakness—of himself, of his Hindu neighbours and the Hindu world in general, and of the British—he abandoned in favour of the present Moslem distinction. We wonder how he calls his Maharani now. She cannot be called Sultana. Has she become the Begum of Johore like our Indian Nawab Shah Jehan? Or, does she retain her old designation? The people, we suspect, specially in the country, still speak of the Raja and Rani of Johore. All that is in the Archipelago, our contemporary's London correspondent will contend, demurring to the instance, all the more because it is, after all, obsolete. But there are plenty of analogues on the continent. Several of the Hill Chiefs, specially on the frontiers of Cashmere, bear the title of Raja, though Mahomedan. So in the plains. The writer may have heard of Raja Ameer Hasan Khan, and he is not the only Mahomedan baron of Oudh with the Hindu title. Nor is Oudh the only province in which the anomaly exists. There are Mahomedan Rajas and Ranis in Bengal and the Panjab, and in the Central Provinces Ranis specially abound. Nor is this a monster birth of to-day, unknown to literature or politics. Raja Mewaram, brother of Maharaja Balkishen, the Finance Minister of Oudh when Oudh was a kingdom, retired to Mecca where he died. Even more historical was the celebrated Raja Kamgar Khan of Behar who invited Shah Allam to Bengal.

THE HARDWAR FAIR AND KUMBH MELA.

BASE and luckless as is this Iron Age—the Kali Yug of the Hindus, it is not throughout a cycle of despair. There are oases in the worst desert, and there are occasionally bright spots even in the accursed Kali Yug. There are in this final age before the destruction of the world, seasons well-known, though few and far between, when poor humanity can easily lay in stores of merit for the day of Judgment. Pilgrimage is one of the cheap methods of salvation in this Age, and the merit of it is enhanced by the time at which it is undertaken. The most popular form of pilgrimage is bathing and worship at particular spots on the banks of sacred streams or at holy pools. These ablutions are timed to particular conjunctures of the heavenly bodies, the merit being in proportion to the rarity of such conjunctures. The most important is the bathing in the Ganges of Hindu theological geography on the Ardhadaya Yoga, which occurs once in a generation, perhaps two. The last such Yoga occurred after thirty years in 1890, when several millions of Hindus washed their sins in the great river from Hardwar to Saugar Island. The next in importance is the Kumbha Yoga which takes place every twelve years, when the merit is restricted to ablution in the Ganges or the Jumna at one of three places on the entrance of Jupiter in the constellation of Aquarius. On these occasions, immense is the concourse of people at the particular shrine, and the gathering is utilized for traffic on a large scale. Such is the famous Kumbh Mela or Fair. It is held at different places in different months, according as the great planet enters into Aquarius. In February it is at Allahabad, in March at Brindaban, and in April at Hardwar. The Hardwar Kumbh Mela takes place when the Jupiter being in Aquarius the sun is in Aries. This period has been sanctified from time immemorial and the Brahma ghat otherwise called Har-ki-Paari ghat has ever been the chosen spot for bathing on the occasion. In a stone slab near the ghat, Hari's holy foot is imprinted and a similar mark is found in a stone in an adjoining wall. The present ghat was constructed in the year 1820 by Captain D. Beud, after a disaster in the previous year when many lives were lost on account of the rush for bathing. This ghat has sixty steps and a width of about one hundred feet. Within an adjacent temple is the famous well called Bramha-Kunda. About half a mile from Hardwar is a small tank called Bhim-gada, where the pilgrims present offerings, the water of which is used for bathing and drinking purposes. At the suggestion of Dr. Hutcheson, the present Sanitary Commissioner, N.-W. P., this tank was deepened and paved. A syphon was placed to bring a supply of fresh water from the Ganges. All these improvements cost about rupees five hundred and thirty three. Had not this been done, this tank alone would have been the sufficient cause for the origin and the spread of cholera.

The name Hardwar is comparatively a recent one. It was anciently called Gangadwar, Kapila Bat, &c. There are other places of religious importance near Hardwar, as Máyápur and Kankhal. Mayápur was one of the recognized great cities of ancient India, and embraced at one time Kankhal and Hardwar. It was the capital of Daksha, father of Uma or Doorga, consort of Siva. Near the present Máyápur are the remains of a fortress and some old buildings, temples, and so on. The fortress, which is almost in ruins, is said to have been erected by an ancient potentate, called Vena Raja. The temples are in better preservation, and are dedicated to Narayan Sila, Máyá Debi, and Bhairab. A little beyond them, is the more modern temple of Sarvanath, with the image of Buddha. The Government Archaeological Surveyor General Cunningham found in the remains of all these buildings distinct Buddhist traces. Indeed, it is pretty certain that many of the gods and goddesses of Hindu worship found their ingress into these temples at a period subsequent to that when Buddhism was at its height. Kankhal is celebrated as the site where dropped the waist (Kankha) of the quartered body of Uma after the destruction of the royal ceremony—Jajna—by the diabolical followers of the insulted Siva.

The controversies of the present year lend a special interest to the N.-W. P. Sanitary Commissioner's report of 1891. By itself, too, it is an interesting account of the steps taken for the prevention of the origin and spread of cholera, steps which were very successfully carried out. Only three suspected cases of cholera and two of small-pox were reported during the fair. The credit of all these sanitary precautions is principally due to Dr. Hutcheson, the Sanitary Commissioner of Upper India, and Mr. Patterson, the Magistrate of Saharanpur. Mr. King, the Executive Engineer of the Ganges Canal, was in charge of the minor arrangements, the most important of which was the letting in of a current of fresh water into the sacred pool so as to carry away the decaying flowers offered by pilgrims and other matters of an offensive character. The principal sanitary reforms undertaken for the fair were the division of the whole area into eight subsections, erection of a hospital in each of them, and employment of sufficient men to carry out the following details: (1) Prevention of over-crowding, (2) Attention to surface cleanliness, (3) Removal of nuisances after notice, (4) Reporting offenders, (5) Prompt and careful removal of sufferers from infectious diseases, (6) Proper location of baggage and beasts. The other measures of importance were (1) the construction of eight bridges to facilitate communication between the islands of Rori, Laljiwala and the mainland so as to make easy way for approaching the sacred pool, (2) the employment of a sufficient number of permanent sweepers and mehtars from municipalities within reasonable distances and (3) the removal of the horse fair from behind the Mayapur Dak Bungalow to the well-shaded and well-watered spot close to the Jawalapur railway station. So the whole area of the fair included the town of Hardwar and the villages of Kankhal and Jawalapur.

The great bathing day was the first of Bysack 1298 or the 13th of January 1891, when the sun entered Aries. About seven hundred thousand people assembled. The gathering was not excessive till towards the end of the fair. During the last six days, however, every available space was occupied. Luckily, the greater portion of the people slept in open spaces allowing sufficient ventilation. Under the circumstances, the rule of six hundred cubic feet of air space allotted for each individual or double the quantity for lodging houses in England, was not enforced. At Calcutta, eight hundred cubic feet are allowed for each person in lodging houses. But nothing like the open air.

Much of the scenic effect of the fair is due to the attendance in great force of the sturdy beggars. They are not by any means a homogeneous lot, belonging as they do to various sects between whom mutually no love is lost. To prevent confusion they are marshalled and led in separate groups, under their respective chiefs.

On the great bathing day the procession of the sadhus and fakirs by akharas, that is, the religious mendicants according to their convents, lasted from 9 A.M. to 6 P.M., in the following order of precedence: (1) the Jhunas and the Airanjanis, (2) the Nirbanis, (3) the Bairágis, (4) the Bará Akhára Udásis, (5) the Chotá Akhára Udásis, (6) the Nirmallas. Though different and often conflicting among themselves, there was one cry with all, Jay Ganga mayi ki jay. The reason for observing this strict precedence arose from a desperate battle between the Goswamis and Bairágis in 1760, fought on holy ground on this question of precedence. Altogether, the arrangements were excellent. There was not only no complaint but there was positive general satisfaction. It was common to hear the pilgrims of the various orders remark "what a good bandobust the Sirkar has made!"

The record of the previous Kumbh fairs of 1867 and 1879 tells a tale of disease and death. In 1879 the epidemic of cholera carried off many hill people returning to their homes in Kumaun and Garhwal. One cause assigned for this epidemic spread is that the majority of the pilgrims, after bathing at Hardwar, go on to worship at the temples of Kedarnath and Baidyanath at Garhwal. With regard to the gathering under notice, that of 1891, the Commissioner of Kumaun timely dissuaded the hill people from attending the fair, and successfully. Of the three suspected cases of cholera, the first was with an ndasi living alone at Chota Lalji, who was attacked on the 6th April and died the next day. He had come from ~~Chondi~~ near Nabha, in the cis-Sutledge states, and been at Hardwar for eight days. The second, a fakir from Raipur, Patiala, was living near Kankhal in an exhausted state. He was sick on the 8th April and died on the 11th. He had stayed at Hardwar from the 20th March. The third, an aged woman from Multan, was ill on the 10th and died on the 14th. She had been at this place only two days before. Dr. Simpson, the Health Officer of Calcutta, was present at this fair. In the first case he failed to detect the presence of comma bacillus in the excreta and in the intestinal secretions, considered by some as pathognomonic of cholera. Of others he writes:—

"The history of the two last cases gives one the impression that the symptoms of vomiting and purging had been caused rather by indigestible food and bathing in snow water in the early morning rather than by any specific cause such as obtains in Asiatic cholera."

In that opinion Dr. Simpson is followed by Dr. Hutcheson. For ourselves, we confess we do not know as yet any specific cause of cholera. As for the pathognomonic sign of the presence of comma bacillus in cholera evacuations, there are many difficulties in the way of the acceptance of this theory. There are bacilli and bacilli. The injection or inhalation of tubercular bacillus produces tubercle in the lungs, but it is not so with cholera. In most of the cases, the injection of comma bacillus produced other effects than cholera.

The occurrence of all these cases of cholera clearly points to the fact of their origin de novo at Hardwar instead of their importation from any other place. It is noteworthy that during the whole of the cold weather the outbreak of this disease occurred in the North-West, with special severity in the Kumaun hills along the pilgrim routes. It was so severe that the Civil Surgeon of Saharanpur recommended that the fair should be stopped. The Local Government, after consultation with the Sanitary Commissioner, declined to interfere. Even during the fair, cases were reported from the pilgrim centres at Benares, Fyzabad, Ajodhya, Allahabad and Brindaban. Other cases of cholera, though very few, were in the eastern districts of the N.-W. Provinces during the month of April. Not a single case was reported from the western districts on or after the dispersion of the crowd during this month.

Here, then, is at least one satisfactory experience—a particular instance of sanitary success, which makes for a cheerful view of the matter. It tends to show that cholera is a preventable epidemic. This was insisted upon by Dr. Hutcheson in 1887. There must be a suitable soil for the reception of the germ, and if the germination and growth can be prevented, cholera loses much of its horror. Most diseases are epidemic in some sense or other, under certain conditions, and cholera has no particular epidemicity not shared by the rest. Sporadic cases generally take their rise at first, and if proper precautions are taken the germs are aborted then and there. It has no particular home, being a citizen of the world, and it is most unfortunate that, by the consensus of the faculty, India has been fixed as the habitat of the fell disease. China, Egypt and a few other countries also, have the same tale to tell: sporadic cases of cholera having a suitable medium for propagation spread the disease in all directions. Everywhere the origin of epidemic is the same.

The observation of sanitary rules prevented the spread of cholera, though the danger of an epidemic was apprehended by many persons of repute. Dr. Jackson, with reference to the fair of 1879, pointed out that cholera does not owe its rise to the vast concourse of people but depends on a prevailing epidemic influence.

This epidemic is always preceded by cases of cholera in the commencement of the preceding cold season. Such was the case in 1867, 1879 and also in 1891. It was for this reason that both the Civil Surgeon and the District authorities of Saharanpur were alarmed and wanted to stop the gathering altogether.

After the outbreak of 1879, the Government of India, in a Resolution dated the 7th February 1880, stated that the advisability of the prohibition of the fair in future would be considered on the approach of another such occasion. On the 4th November 1890, the Lieutenant-Governor called for a report to be furnished before the end of February and it was accordingly submitted by Dr. Hutcheson. In this he advised the use of every endeavour to dissuade the general public from proceeding to Hardwar, inasmuch as cholera had appeared among the pilgrims at Allahabad during the Mag mela and it was on the move towards Hardwar itself. A Government order was issued, on the 5th of February, on all Magistrates and Deputy Commissioners to use their influence to dissuade the public from visiting the sacred shrine. On the 28th of the same month, in another report, Dr. Hutcheson advised the Government that "it would be highly inexpedient for many reasons to prohibit the assemblage, a gathering which, while it is attended with great risk and danger, is, and had always been a religious function of great importance to almost every section of the Hindu community."

The Lieutenant-Governor was also of opinion that only on extreme emergency such a step would be justifiable. Such opinions, no doubt, reflect great credit on men whose slight hint on the contrary could put an end to this religious gathering, considered so essential by the Hindus and held from time immemorial. That such a suggestion should have been under serious consideration of Government, is most disheartening and exposes the frail tenure of our rights and institutions.

This suggestion was due to the Constantinople Congress of 1864. The object was not to save India, but to prevent the spread of cholera from this country to Europe, the Indian shrines being taken for granted as the producers and promulgators as well, of cholera. The Congress recommended the regulation of Indian pilgrimages by sanitary cordons, in addition to the steps to be taken by the Sanitary Commissioners, but a subsequent commission appointed by the Government to consider the recommendations, would not advise its adoption. The measure was abandoned not only for the hardship that must be entailed by it but also for its inefficacy. It was a dangerous game to follow even for safety. Simply the obstruction to traffic which must have been caused, would have increased the price of food, and this itself would have been a sufficient cause to generate cholera from the people being compelled to a bad diet, with the consequent increase of mortality. To save somewhat the honour of the Congress, some rules and regulations were published in the direction which already existed. They consisted of precepts for the improvement of the "sanitary condition of the town near which the fair is held, and of the lodging houses in the town especially as regards overcrowding and in some instances in improvement in the shrine itself; warning issued to the people of the danger they incurred, systematic preparation of the sites to be occupied before the people arrive, the provision of temporary latrines and urinals, and of sweepers and carts for cleansing, and the enforcement of cleanliness; protection of the water sources, supervision of the food for sale, the orderly arrangement of cattle, medical subordinates with the necessary medicines at different points, and the establishment of temporary hospitals; a watch over pilgrims arriving, not only at the locality itself, but at various distant branch roads and railways, with the view of detecting at once any contagious disorder."

The Congress of Rome in 1885, which leaned more in this direction, declared land quarantine useless. For sea quarantine, it was determined that no vessel was to be detained for more than five days unless cholera had actually occurred or there was a great suspicion of it. The period during which the cholera germ may remain latent was ascertained to be not more than two or three days. So of a ship proceeding to the Hedjas, this period is not to be taken in account, as the vessel takes longer time to reach its destination. Therefore, the fear of transmitting cholera to Europe from the Haj pilgrimage is entirely without any foundation. It was not so with the Indian pilgrimages. Some of the medical dictators without any hesitation urged the Indian Government to put a stop to such trifles, lest cholera may be conveyed to Europe from Indian shrines. They were so blind-folded as not to see the obvious. If cholera could not be transported to Europe by persons proceeding to Mecca, how was it possible for the same disease to be transported to Europe, when it was confining itself to India alone? The Indian pilgrimages are resorted to by the Hindus who have practically no shrines outside the limits of the Indian territories. To make their proposition more absurd they found out a clue for such transmission. The route for the travels of the cholera germs to Europe is now said to lie through land and not by sea.

The recent spread of the cholera epidemic in Europe, has been asserted by many of the doctors to have proceeded through Cashmere, Turkistan, the Transcaspian provinces and thence to Europe. This bold assertion was made as if with the full knowledge of the broad and easy means of communication from India to Russia, without reflecting that the vast tract of country north of Cashmere, the greater portion of which yet remains unexplored, and the mountainous roads, are not easy of access.

We are glad to find that this view of ours is in consonance with Sir W. Moore's written in the October number of the Asiatic Quarterly Review. He says,

"that cholera occurs in Persia, or on the Caspian, or in some country west of India, is no reason that it must have been imported from India. While experience shows that cholera may be imported, there is equal reason for the statement that it may occur irrespective of importation. It often breaks out in localities and villages, where communication with infected places could not possibly have taken place. Notwithstanding the many theories, the precise cause of cholera, as of various other diseases, is yet unknown."

The suddenness of the attack of cholera without any ascertained cause, is also described by Sir Joseph Fayrer in his book on "The Natural History and Epidemiology of Cholera." In the case of a ship of the late East India Company while proceeding up the China Sea, men fell on deck as if struck by lightning, and the attack suddenly ceased three days after. The water for drinking purpose was quite safe from contamination and was used for three months just after leaving England. The outbreak on board H. M. S. Undaunted occurred also when it was passing down the China Sea. The number of cases were gradually increasing, and at the end of three days it suddenly ceased as soon as the course of the vessel was changed. All these facts clearly illustrate that there is something in the outbreak of an epidemic which is yet ill understood, and still there are many who are so prejudiced that they pretend clearly to see the cholera germs travelling from one place to another. With their prejudged opinion they do not hesitate to lay the fault on another's shoulder. Anyhow they must trace the mischief home to India, without thinking that there are worse places in Asia, and even in Europe, in point of cleanliness. They do not hold to the air-borne theory of cholera as it is now, out of fashion, and except human intercourse nothing is left for them to ascertain its communicability. As yet there are no preventive measures against its spread excepting local sanitary arrangements.

The land quarantine has been pronounced to be useless by Sanitary Congresses. Still there is the supposed danger from Indian shrines, so pilgrimages must be put a stop to. This kind of dogmatic assertion ill comports with men who profess to be scientific and to keep their conscience clear from surrounding influences. Freedom of thought in science is in name only. It is unfortunate enough that India is the scape-goat in matters political, but now, it appears, she must submit to suffer in all others, not excepting measures of sanitary reforms. They dread to put a stop to the Haj pilgrimage, but Hindu is weak, and to stop the Hindu pilgrims visiting Indian shrines, is easily decided upon.

So far so with the Kumbh Mela of 1891. It remains to be seen why there was the epidemic spread in the Maha Baruni Mela of the 26th March 1892. This fair took place twenty seven years after and it did not occur after any regular interval, and no particular care was taken by the sanitary authorities beforehand. As a consequence, cholera broke out and resulted in the dispersion of the crowd. We are not entering into the alleged arbitrary proceedings and high-handed oppressions that followed, but it is to be pointed out that, notwithstanding this act of segregation, the prevention of the spread of the epidemic proved a failure. No doubt, it would sound very well that for the sake of India, the adoption of such a step was necessary, if the principle of isolation could be effective. By the dispersion of such a large gathering we only prevent the outbreak in a particular locality, but thereby spread the source of contagion in different directions. Persons who are already attacked with cholera will each form a focus of its outspread towards all sides. Segregation is very good indeed when we can sufficiently take care of men who have already got the disease, so as to prevent its dissemination, otherwise it is useless. It is only possible when the number is limited. Everything has its proper sphere of action, and the principle of segregation ought to have its limit.

A TURKISH DIGNITARY IN LIVERPOOL.

MOSLEMS IN CONGRESS.

Liverpool has just been visited by Ibrahim Hakki Bey, Imperial Commissioner from the Ottoman Empire to the Chicago Exposition. His Excellency, who arrived in Liverpool on Thursday evening by the Teutonic, is an accomplished linguist. On Friday morning he visited the local law courts, and was much interested in the English forms of legal procedure, differing so much as they do from the mode adopted in continental nations and in the Ottoman dominions. Subsequently at the invitation of Mr. Baron L. Benas he visited the Athenæum Library and Newsroom, and in the evening had a private box at the Circus, West Derby-road, where Professor Norton B. Smith is giving an exhibition of horse taming. On Friday morning he visited the Moslem School College, and was introduced to the masters and chief pupils. He also attended the Zuhar Nimuz, at which service Mr. H. H. Yayhar, late of the Imperial Naval College, Constantinople, officiated as Imaum. The afternoon was devoted to visiting the Underground Railway, Birkenhead Docks, New Brighton, and driving through Prince's, Sefton, and Newsham Parks. In the evening his Excellency attended the Jumma service at the Mosque, where he was received by a large number of Mahomedans, both natives of Liverpool and visitors. After the Isha Nimaz, at which Hadji Said Adam officiated as Muezzin and Mr. Ali Mokiash, of Damascus, as Imaum, a meeting was held in one of the rooms of the institution.---Mr. W. H. Quilliam, who presided, said, on behalf of the local Moslem fraternity, that he had great pleasure in welcoming a gentleman so thoroughly possessed of the confidence of his Sovereign as Hakki Bey did to Liverpool. Islam was a deep bond of brotherhood, and they had only to look round the room that night to see followers of God and His prophet from countries most remote, from nations and races most dissimilar, speaking different languages, but one in Islam. They had all just knelt together in prayer, the Turk, Russian, Syrian, Arabian, Moor, Indian, Egyptian, and members of every nationality in the British Isles, and had uttered the words and followed the ceremonies taught 13 centuries ago by the Son of the Desert, the last and greatest of the prophets. (Applause.)

Mr. Mustapha Karsa, the president of the institute, moved the following resolution:---"That this meeting of Mussulmans welcomes our distinguished brother, Hakki Bey, to Liverpool, and wishes him a safe return to Constantinople." He (the speaker) was a Syrian Arab, but had long dwelt in England, and had become acclimatised, but though he had got used to the climate, manners, customs, and dress of the English people, he had never forgotten or changed the faith in which he was born. In Liverpool now they had over 80 Moslems, and in Manchester nearly 50. Through the labours of their president they had become united for work and usefulness, and he believed even a greater success would come in the future. Liverpool and Manchester combined had given the first railway system and had thus benefited the whole of Great Britain, and Liverpool and Manchester were the pioneers in the English Moslem movement, which would be of equal benefit to the country. (Applause.)

Mr. Yeliya M'Quinn seconded the motion. He had been brought up as a Scotch Presbyterian, and what had first disgusted him with Christianity was the alcoholic drink question. Islam denounced intemperance and gambling, and taught men a practical religion, and that was what was required nowadays.

Mr. G. Mitchell moved "That this meeting desires to express to his Imperial Majesty the Sultan of Turkey and Caliph of the Faithful and Defender of the True Faith their best wishes for his long life and prosperity."

Mr. G. Khalid Smith, in seconding the resolution, said, as one of the first converts, he was astounded at the progress they had made. He remembered when Mr. Quilliam could not get an audience of even a dozen to listen to a discourse on Islam, and now inquiries were made right and left as to what Islam was, and their explanatory pamphlets were distributed by hundreds.

Mr. L. R. Nabakoff (who spoke in Russian) said it would appear strange that a Russian and an old Crimean soldier, who had fought against the English and Turks at Sebastopol, should support a resolution like this, but Islam knew no distinction between nations. The Czar was his political Sovereign, but the Sultan was the Caliph of the Faithful and a worthy successor of Abu Bekr and Omar. Islam was spreading rapidly even in Russia, and they had mosques in St. Petersburg and other large cities.

Mr. Thomas Omar Byrne said he was an Irishman, but could not speak Irish like the last speaker could Russian, but, however, wished their visitor a "Cead mille failthe."

Mr. Syed Hasan, of Hyderabad, then delivered an address in Urdu. The Moslems of India held the Sultan in the highest respect, and were much interested in the welfare of the Turkish empire. They were loyal to the Queen as Empress of India, but to the Sultan as Caliph of the Faithful.

Hadji Said Adam (who spoke in Arabic) said that as a native of Mecca, the birthplace of the Prophet, he could assure Hakki Bey, the representative of his Imperial Majesty, that the whole of Arabia cried "Wara-a-Sultan" (long live the Sultan).

Other speeches were delivered in support of the motions (which were carried) by Mr. H. H. Johnson, in classical Greek; Hadji Ibrahim, of Cairo, in the Egyptian dialect of the Arabic; Mr. Hedley Wilde, on behalf of the school; Mr. L. A. E. Thomas, in Welsh; Mr. H. H. Yehya, in Turkish; Mr. H. E. Gnesus, in Moorish; and Mr. N. Actophobus, in modern Greek.

His Excellency Hakki Bey, in replying, said that he thanked them for their kind wishes, and would take care that their second resolution was duly forwarded to his Imperial Majesty through his chamberlain. It would be out of place for him to eulogise the Sovereign he served, and who was a worthy successor of the mighty Othman, the great Mahommed the conqueror, and the gracious Suliman. His Majesty, and in fact all Turks, were interested not only in the movement in England but throughout the world. As Caliph His Majesty's heart beat in unison with all true Mussulmans wherever they dwelt. In Liverpool they saw history repeating itself. Every incident of the propaganda here was simply a repetition of what had occurred in Mecca centuries ago. The scoffs and jeers, the violence of the bigoted mob and the veiled hostility of others---all this had been endured by the first Moslems in the time of the Prophet. If he were to draw a parallel between these events he could easily do so. Their president (Mr. Quilliam) they regarded in Turkey as the Omar of England---the man who had dared to stand alone and to lead where others had feared to tread. (Applause.) Another happy augury, he thought, was the appointment of a negro as one of their muezzins. The first muezzin of the Prophet was a negro, and at the taking of Jerusalem by Omar the same negro gave the Azan. Perhaps the time was not far off when Abdullah Quilliam could open a mosque in the metropolis of England, and his black muezzin give the Azan. (Laughter and applause.) He (the speaker) had been most pleased with their institution, and more especially with their school. That was, perhaps, the most important step they had yet taken. Let their children be brought up as Moslems, give them a good all-round education, and the future of Islam in England was assured. (Loud applause.)

TRIAL BY JURY IN BENGAL.

At the same time it remains to be proved that any alteration was required in criminal procedure. On the face of it there are strong objections to anything of the kind. It has been truly said that in a country like India, a country despotically governed, frequent tampering with the law, whether the institution interfered with be good or evil, is a sign to the people of the sickle temper of the despot. It is true, no doubt, that Sir Charles Elliott, the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, regards trial by jury as most unsuitable to Indian conditions. It appears, moreover, that a majority of the officials serving under him are more or less of the same opinion. The Lieutenant-Governor declares that if the result of thirty years' experience could have been foreseen, no advocate would have been found for introducing this Western institution into the country. Yet more solid reasons than this must be adduced to justify the policy of tinkering; and it is not easy to discover such reasons. Juries will at times administer doubtful justice in England; it is hardly wonderful if they are occasionally at fault in Bengal. A reference to official returns elicits the fact that in the course of one year the sessions judges approved of the verdict of the Bengal jury in 230 out of 285 trials. In twenty cases a reference to the High Court was deemed advisable, and in thirteen out of these cases the verdict of the jury was reversed. There would not seem to have been any alarming miscarriage of justice. Where the verdict of a jury is patently wrong or perverse, the High Court can set it aside. We need not disguise the fact that of late years there has been rather an alarming increase of crime in Bengal. The number of murders in a twelvemonth rose from 319 to 360. There has been what the official report calls a remarkable recrudescence of dacoity, or gang robbery. Some people may be surprised to learn, too, that Lynch law is frequently resorted to in certain parts of Bengal. A housebreaker caught in the act has but a faint chance of escaping with his life. A pilfering rustic was slowly beaten to death by his fellow-villagers. A local bully who, for some offence or other, had been sent to prison by a sessions judge, and released on appeal by the High Court, was waylaid while coming home and murdered. The murderers set up a skilful alibi and got off scot-free. But there is nothing to show that either these particular cases or the increase of crime generally can be connected in any way with the alleged failure of the jury system. Adequate proofs of this failure are awaited with some interest.

What will perhaps strike the English reader as the oddest feature of the situation is the off-hand manner in which alterations can be made in criminal procedure in India---alterations which, though not to be regarded as revolutionary or extensive, are nevertheless sufficiently striking to arouse opposition in the country and more than a faint interest in England. Surely there were ways of preparing public opinion, if not of conciliating it. The measures now resolved on have been contemplated by the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal and his advisers for the past two years and more; yet the public hears nothing till the orders are actually in the Gazette. There are often, in a country like India, measures of State which need to be carried out with promptitude and decision, and without even a pretence of deferring to the popular voice. Nor is it always easy to ascertain beforehand what will be thought and said of a new departure till the reform is in operation. It may be added that the Bengal Government should be very careful just now to avoid any needless irritation of public opinion. Sir Charles Elliott is committed to a policy which will provoke, and is already provoking, the hottest opposition in Bengal. The revenue survey of Behar is regarded with angry suspicion and dislike by an influential class of the community; and it will tax the strength and resources of his Government to the utmost to conduct it to a successful issue.---St. James's Gazette.

CAPTAIN HEARSEY AND SIR AUCKLAND COLVIN.

Captain Hearsey applied on Monday for a warrant for the arrest of Sir Auckland Colvin for libel in the court of the Joint Magistrate of Benares, Mr. C. L. Porter.

On the Magistrate taking his seat and calling for applications Captain Hearsey said he had an application to make, and handed it in.

The Magistrate after glancing over it said: Have you any affidavits in support of this application?

Captain Hearsey: No, but I have sufficient other evidence by which I am in a position to make out a prima facie case. I claim under section 200 of the Code of Criminal Procedure to have my evidence taken on oath, and as the accused, Sir Auckland Colvin, has absconded and left the country that my witnesses should be heard under section 512 in corroboration of my statement.

The Magistrate: You presented this petition formerly to Mr. Brereton.

Captain Hearsey: I did; but as he did not comply with the provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code and examine me on oath, whatever orders he passed are null and void.

The Magistrate: On what date did you file this application before Mr. Brereton?

Captain Hearsey: On the 29th of November, I believe.

The Magistrate: As the Honorable the Chief Justice has refused your application I also refuse it.

Captain Hearsey: This court will be pleased to remember that the Chief Justice refused to grant the warrant as there was no evidence before him. I now come with evidence sufficient to make out a prima facie case against the accused. This is a perfectly fresh application and as Mr. Brereton took no evidence in the first instance, whatever was done in his court is null and void, and I am quite within my rights in asking to be examined on oath under section 200, which says: "A magistrate taking cognizance of an offence or complaint shall at once examine the complainant upon oath and the substance of the examination reduced to writing."

This was not done in the District Magistrate's court, and, therefore, the proceedings are invalid, and I call upon the court to do so now with regard to the witnesses. I have a right also to have them heard, as the accused has absconded and left the country, although he was aware that an application had been made for a warrant for his arrest. Vide section 512:—"If it be proved that an accused person has absconded and that there is no immediate prospect of arresting him, the Court competent to try or commit for trial such person for the offences complained of may in his absence examine the witnesses (if any) produced on behalf of the prosecution." The Chief Justice's order was that there was no evidence. I have now sufficient evidence to go on with, and I claim a hearing and a compliance with sections 200 and 512 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

The Magistrate: I will read my order:—"Order passed on the application of A. W. Hearsey, Captain, dated 12th December, 1892. This is an application identical with that presented to Mr. Brereton on November 29th last. That application was rejected. An application for revision of this order presented to the Honorable High Court was also rejected. Captain Hearsey now applies to be examined on oath. He informs me that he has no affidavits to support the allegations contained in his petition. That being the case, I do not see how I can be expected to take any further steps. The application is rejected."

On Tuesday Captain Hearsey made an application on the Criminal Revision side of the Judge's Court at Benares against the order of the Joint-Magistrate refusing to record complainant's evidence under section 200 and the testimony of witnesses under section 512. The Judge pointed out that section 197 required superior authority. Captain Hearsey replied that under paragraph four of the same section superior authority was not required. The defamation was against a private individual, and no one would be safe from defamation by a public servant if the law was not complied with. It would be a scandal to common justice if a warrant were not granted for Sir Auckland Colvin's arrest. The Judge, having taken the documents to peruse them, said he would pass orders to-morrow morning.—The Morning Post.

TO THE SHERIFF OF CALCUTTA.

SIR,—We, the undersigned residents of Calcutta and the Suburbs, beg to request that you will be so good as to convene a public meeting at the Town Hall on an early date to protest against the recent Notification of the Government of Bengal with reference to trial by Jury in the Mafassil.

Holloway's Ointment and Pills.—Sure Relief.—The weak and enervated suffer severely from nervous affections when storms or electric disturbances agitate the atmosphere. Neuralgia, gouty pangs, and flying pains, very distressing to a delicate system, may be readily removed by rubbing this Ointment upon the affected part after it has been fomented with warm water. The Pills taken occasionally in the doses prescribed by the instructions keep the digestion in order, excite a free flow of healthy bile, and regenerate the impoverished blood with richer materials, resulting from thoroughly assimilated food, wanting which, the strongest most inevitably soon sink into feebleness, and the delicate find it difficult to maintain existence. Holloway's Ointment and Pills are infallible remedies.

ASRUKANA is a collection of poetical pieces of singular pathos and beauty of expression * * * It is a series of mournful songs that the reader is here presented with and they must touch a sympathetic cord in every heart that can feel. There is a singular appropriateness in the title of the work and in its pious dedication to the memory of the husband of the fair writer.—The Indian Nation.

Bengal should be proud of this poem.—The Calcutta Review.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

LIVE IT DOWN.

'There is a future for all who have the virtue to repent and the energy to atone.'—BULWER-LYTTON.

YES, your fault has blighted your name;
Such disgrace is hard to bear;
Yet for you there is an aim,
Which should be your constant care—
You must learn to live it down.

True, the cloud is like a pall;
Error ever weaves such things;
But the sky is over all;
Morn has light upon its wings,
If you only live it down.

Yes, I know men look askance,
Dreading any stain to touch;
Women, with a wondering glance,
Fear to pity overmuch;
Still, I tell you—live it down.

Patient be; with spirit meek,
Bear rebuffs a little while,
Till true friends shall kindly speak,
Meeting you with sunny smile,
Saying you can live it down.

Lab'ring—Oh, the worth of work,
Chasing bitter thoughts away!
Never any duty shirk
Which arises day by day;
That is how to live it down.

Ask forgiveness—and forgive,
Yet indulge not memories dark;
For you still may nobly live,
Though for once you missed the mark—
If you strive to live it down.

'Tis not easy? That I own;
'What is easy that has worth?
'Life is struggle, hid or known,
Even from the hour of birth;
Yours the task to live it down.

I have cheered you? That is well;
You will ponder on my words—
So you say; and I can tell
They have reached some answering chords.
Yes, I know you'll live it down.

Till the wrong may be forgot,
Or remembered only be
Like a half-erased blot,
Which men do not care to see—
When indeed you've lived it down!

CAMILLA CROSLAND.

IT IS WELL.

'Is it well with thee, and with thy husband, and with the child?'
And she said, 'It is well.'—2 Kings, iv. 26.

YES; it is well! The evening shadows lengthen;
Home's golden gates shine on our ravished sight;
And though the tender ties we strove to strengthen
Break one by one—at evening-time 'tis light.

'Tis well! The way was often dark and dreary;
The night shrouded our hearts in gloom;
No sunshine came from skies all grey and dreary,
And yet our feet were bound to tread that road.

'Tis well that not again our hearts shall shiver
Beneath old sorrows, once so hard to bear;
That not again beside Death's darksome river
Shall we deplore the good, the loved, the fair.

No more with tears, wrought from deep, inner anguish,
Shall we bewail the dear Hopes crushed and gone;
No more need we in doubt or fear to languish;
So far the Day is past, the journey done!

As voyagers, by fierce winds beat and broken,
Come into port, beneath a calmer sky,
So we, still bearing on our brows the token
Of tempest past, draw to our Haven nigh.

A sweet air cometh from the Shore immortal,
Inviting Homeward at the day's decline;
Almost we see where from the open portal
Fair forms stand beckoning with their smiles divine.

'Tis well! The Earth with all her myriad voices
Has lost the power our senses to enthrall;
We hear, above the tumult and the noises,
Soft tones of music, like an angel's call.

'Tis well, O friends! We would not turn—retracing
The long vain years, nor call our lost youth back;
Gladly, with spirits braced, the future facing,
We leave behind the dusty, foot-worn track.

WEEKLYANA.

A MERRY Christmas to our Christian readers—one and all.
The Peace of the Season to our rulers.

THE Currency agitation has added to the costliness of the Christmas this year. A Bombay confectioner writes to a Quetta customer: "I regret that I have been compelled to raise the price of Xmas cakes this year owing to the rate of exchange. The price of ingredients has risen very high."

THE grand metropolitan demonstration on the Jury Notification, came off on Tuesday the 20th December, at the Town-Hall. Maharaja Doorga Churn Law, the President of the British Indian Association, presided, and the meeting adopted the following Resolutions:—

RESOLUTION I.

That this Meeting desires to enter its respectful but firm protest against the Notification of Government, dated the 20th October, 1892, by which the right of trial of the most serious offences by jury has been withdrawn in those districts of Bengal to which that system of trial was extended thirty years ago, this withdrawal being contrary to the principles which guide the administration of criminal justice wherever British Law is introduced, and tending to disturb the trust of the people in the good faith and intentions of the Government.

Proposed by The Hon'ble Dr. Mahendralal Sircar, C.I.E.
Seconded by Mr. L. P. Pugh.

RESOLUTION II.

That this Meeting also desires to enter its emphatic protest against the manner in which a valued right, that has been possessed for more than a generation, has been withdrawn from the people by an executive order of the Local Government taking effect after an interval of only five clear days, and to express its profound regret that no opportunity was afforded the public to consider a matter of such grave importance to them, and of submitting their views thereon to Government.

Proposed by Babu Jadu Lal Mullick.
Seconded by Mr. H. B. H. Turner.

RESOLUTION III.

That this Meeting is of opinion that Section 269 of the Code of Criminal Procedure should be so amended that Local Governments may not be able in future, in times of tranquillity and peace, to take away by an executive order one of the greatest safeguards of the liberty of the subject.

Proposed by Mr. Lal Mohun Ghosh.
Seconded by Mr. Wm. Jackson.

RESOLUTION IV.

That the Memorial now before the Meeting be adopted and forwarded under the signature of the Chairman of the Meeting to the Local Government with the request that it be submitted through the proper channel to Her Majesty's Secretary of State for India in Council, for consideration by Her Majesty's Government; and, that a Committee consisting of the following gentlemen, with power to add to their number, be formed to take such action as may be deemed necessary for the purpose of bringing about the ultimate withdrawal of the Notification.

Proposed by Moulvi Sirajul Islam, Khan Bahadur.
Seconded by Mr. Abu Reza.

We have no space for the Committee (which is a very large one, consisting of 165 Europeans and Indians,) or the Memorial (which is scarcely worth the honor).

At Sialkot, a goldsmith has been arrested on a charge of manufacturing and offering for sale old coins of the Muhamadan dynasty. A rather extensive manufacture of old coins goes on throughout the country.

FOR beating a prisoner in the jail to death, the Sessions Judge of Quetta sentenced a Pathan to transportation for life. He managed however to be admitted into the Civil Hospital for treatment of a self-inflicted wound on the neck. While there he effected his escape through a drain for escape of water.

THE Lieutenant-Governor has permitted the opening, in the Midnapore District, of separate accounts of cesses payable by registered holders of revenue-free estates.

AFTER a service of over quarter of a century, Mr. C. H. Tawney retires from the Educational Department from the 26th December. He came out as a Professor and ends as Principal of the Presidency College and officiating Director of Public Instruction. Dr. C. A. Martin, Inspector of Schools, Bihar Circle, will now officiate as Director of Public Instruction.

MESSRS. J. Gardner and Sons, surgical instrument makers, Edinburgh, have made a new Trephine to the order, and from the design, of a Singalese student prosecuting his medical studies at Aberdeen. This is Mr. A. Rujasingham, a son of Mr. A. S. Nicholas, Chief Clerk of the Chamma Kacheri. He has described the Improved Trephine and asserted its advantages in the British Medical Journal. Where are our continental inventors?

WE take the following from the last annual Report on small-pox of the Local Government Board for Ireland presented to the both Houses of Parliament:—

"In the month of January a young sailor R. M. came through Liverpool to Belfast from Newport (Monmouth) where his ship had been paid off on the 10th. This ship on her homeward voyage from Calcutta had touched at Genoa, and had remained for some days at Marseilles, where her crew spent much time ashore. R. M., on or immediately after, his arrival in Belfast on the 13th of January, was in the vesicular stage of the eruption attending an attack of modified small-pox, and in that condition he secured lodgings in Whitla-street. The house in which he took up abode was kept by three young women, sisters, and they were admitted into the Workhouse Hospital on the 4th February, suffering from small-pox. From that date to the 31st March, 22 cases of small-pox occurred in Belfast. On the 17th January, R. M., who appears never to have been so ill as to keep his bed, paid a visit to Ballymena and remained there until the 22nd. His visit to Ballymena was followed by 6 cases of small-pox. On the 20th of January, he went from Ballymena to Castledawson in Magherafelt Union and slept there for that night. This visit was followed by 9 cases of small-pox, of which two proved fatal.

"In the interests of the public health we desire to draw attention to the insufficiency of the protection afforded by the primary vaccination performed upon those who took the disease. From the report of Dr. Stafford (Inspector, Medical Board for Belfast, Ballymena and Magherafelt) submitted to the Local Board, it will be observed that amongst the 37 cases of small-pox recorded, the marks of primary vaccination did not in any single instance come up to Masson's standard of good vaccination. The recent outbreak of small-pox in Ulster shows that R. M. moved about amongst a population inadequately protected against small-pox. The protective influence of vaccination in infancy declines as years elapse, and adult members of the community presenting only two marks of primary vaccination can not with impunity (unless they have been re-vaccinated) come in contact with a person suffering from even the mildest form of modified small-pox. Masson's researches respecting post-vaccinal small-pox clearly prove that it is the duty of all vaccinators to perform the operation in such a manner as to produce four or five typical cicatrices and thus to afford to every infant the maximum degree of protection against the danger of contracting small-pox in adult life."

WE read the following in an Anglo-Indian journal, contributed by its London staff:—

"Those who know the member for Cardiff only as a vigorous, and perhaps somewhat expostulatory debater, will probably not be prepared to hear that he is a poet with a true poet's sensitiveness to metre. The other day Sir Edward Reed penned some stanzas upon the late Lord Tennyson, but in the published version the honourable knight was made to rhyme 'divine' with 'time.' Sir Edward seeing this promptly set the telegraph to work wiring 'For mercy's sake, relieve me of the opprobrium of having rhymed 'divine' with 'time.' The former word should have been 'sublime.' Pray correct—Sir Edward Reed." This manifests an alertness as to rhythmic accuracy which is quite commendable."

In commending the alertness to rhythmic accuracy of the Member for Cardiff, the writer himself shows his own failure in alertness in philologic accuracy. Indeed, there was no question of rhythmic accuracy in this matter. Sir E. Reed has a good ear, no doubt, and he was anxious not to pass a faulty rhyme. It was a matter of rhythmic accuracy, not rhythmic.

ANOTHER terrible engine of destruction has been invented—a gun whose firing and, of course, killing capacity transcends the record. The inventor is no other than the same Herr Ferdinand Ritter von Mannlicher whose celebrated repeating rifle is the pride of the Austrian Army. Reuter's literary representative at Vienna after describing the mechanism, says :—

"A touch of the trigger of the automatic repeater, and the breech-bolt flies back into its closed position. Then followed five piercingly sharp explosions, and the empty clip dropped ringing from the magazine on the floor. The explosions seemed instantaneous. Barely one and-a-half seconds to come down from the 'present' to the 'ready' position, to insert another clip; and then five more shots banged forth in the same limit of time. There is no more recoil than in the case of a rook rifle. The mechanism seems to absorb the 'kick.' The breech-bolt flies backwards and forwards at every discharge, ejecting the used-up smokeless powder cartridge, and pushing home a fresh one from the magazine. The eye cannot follow the movement, so instantaneous does it seem. And there is no escape of gas. In the hands of its inventor the rifle can discharge about 120 rounds per minute. The barrel becomes hot, but not so hot as to render the rifle useless for a time. According to Herr von Mannlicher, his automatic rifle is not at the present time suited for general use by the infantry, on account of the difficulties still encountered in supplying ammunition to the rank and file in the field in sufficient quantities. On shipboard, however, the rifle would be extremely serviceable."

To end the criminal prosecutions, arising out of the late general municipal elections, against Sheikh Bachu and himself, Baboo Preonath Mullick resigned his seat in the Calcutta Corporation. His resignation was followed by the death of Pandit Prannath Saraswati, another municipal Commissioner. At the bye-election for the two vacancies thus caused, Baboo Preonath offered himself a candidate and was elected at the head of the poll. This roused the indignation of those who wanted to keep, and thought they had succeeded in keeping, him out of the Board, at least till the next general elections. They looked about and decided upon revival of the old prosecution, if possible. But that being withdrawn, a newcomer was available to renew the old proceedings. An application was therefore made on behalf of Aukhoy Coomar Dutt, a rate-payer, to the District Judge of Alipore for fresh sanction to prosecute the Baboo and the Sheikh on the old charges of perjury and abetment of personation. The Judge refused the application saying it was too late. He at the same time thought that Baboo Preonath was not well advised in seeking re-election. We are afraid his pursuers will allow him no rest till he again submits to terms. We shall not wonder if the present applicant goes up to the High Court.

HAVING a pressing engagement at Plymouth, the Duke of Edinburgh came for the ordinary train at Port Eliot, but missed it. He then got into the next fish train, and was accommodated in the guard's van where he was quite at ease, "charming the railway man with his affability."

To secure to himself the fortune that was his daughter's, a rich landowner in Vienna, by name Foster, gave out, in 1860, that she was dead, while in fact she was confined in a dark cave on his estate. The Police has just come upon the place where the avaricious father had secreted his daughter and rescued her.

At Tonnerre, in August, Coulinge, a youth of nineteen, conceived a passion for his mistress, Madame Héralut, the wife of a nurseryman. One evening, in the absence of the master, the youthful servant opened his heart to the mistress which was not reciprocated. Incensed at the repulse, Coulinge took up a hatchet and hacked Madame Héralut to death. Next morning he gave himself up to the gendarmes. He was tried before the Assizes of the Department of the Yonne and sentenced to penal servitude for life.

MISS Eva Frear, of Poughkeepsie, New York, has sued the New York Central and Hudson River Railway Company for 50,000 dollars by way of damages for breach of marriage—by causing the death of one Bagnall who had promised to marry her. On that promise she was entitled to have him as her husband and supporter. Now that husband is no more, the company must find her the means of support.

RUSSIA manufactures annually 30,000,000 wooden spoons.

THE wealth of the world has been calculated at 60,000 million pounds sterling. The wealthiest country on the list is the United States with 12,000 millions. Next comes the United Kingdom with 10,000, France following with 8,000.

JUST before his death, the late Duke of Marlborough wrote an article for the Fortnightly Review, "On The Art of Living." "The Art of Dying" would have been a more appropriate subject for him who was such an exemplar of it.

NOTES & LEADERETTES

with
OUR OWN NEWS.

THE question of the hour in France is the Panama Scandal. The most eminent citizens, including members of Parliament of both Houses, are more or less openly charged with corruption in connection with the Panama Canal Company. A Committee of Enquiry was appointed which brought to light systematic bribery in high places. It was then proposed to confer judicial powers on the Committee. At the end of a stormy debate, the bill was by the utmost efforts of the ministry thrown out by a majority of six, after the Government promised to prosecute the Directors and others criminally. Young Lesseps and Fontane, Directors of the Company, are under arrest. Cottu, another Director, has fled. Old Lesseps has been left untouched out of humanity for his great age and low health. They are all charged with corrupting Deputies, one of whom Sensleroy has fled.

The telegram from Paris dated 20th December is as follows :—

"M. Cottu has surrendered himself here. Government has asked leave of both Houses to prosecute Senators Renault, Grévy, and Berul, ex-Ministers Thevenet and Deves, Deputies Proust, Arene, and Dugue, and ex-Ministers Rouvier, Rochi, and Proust.

A furious debate took place in the Chamber upon the Committee's report favouring the prosecution. M. Rouvier denied receiving bribes, but said that he took money from personal friends to supply a deficiency in the secret service funds, which were inadequate.

The Boulangists, M.M. Deroulede and Millevoys, vehemently attacked M. Clemenceau, accusing him of receiving money from the Panama Canal Company. M. Clemenceau denied the charge, and the epithets 'liars' and 'slanders' were exchanged. The meeting was adjourned without passing a vote."

The Chamber of Deputies have since agreed to the prosecution of the Senators and Deputies. Arrests are being made. M. Floquet was implicated, but he denied before the Committee receipt of anything from the Canal Company.

For the attack on himself, M. Clemenceau challenged M. Deroulede to a duel, which was accepted but proved abortive. Three shots were exchanged at twenty-five paces, neither of the combatants being hit or hurt. Thus honour was saved without a scratch, and conscience is—nowhere.

MESSRS. Limpman & Co., jute merchants of Dundee, have failed with a liability of £250,000.

THIS week, after the Town Hall demonstration, the Government of India mailed its first formal despatch on the jury business.

THE Englishman reports the result of what it calls the preliminary enquiry into the Magura schoolboys' case which was brought to public notice three months back :—

"A small steamer, it appears, plies on alternate days of the week from Nowapara, a station on the Jessore-Khulna Railway, to Magura, where it arrives late at night, mooring close to a boarding house for pupils attending the Magura Higher English School. The schoolboys seem to have been in the habit of going on board the steamer, and on one occasion a dispute occurred between them and the serang. At the next visit they appear to have stolen down to the bank and set the steamer adrift. The vessel was carried down stream for some distance, coming into collision with a country boat, which it sank; and although the khalasis were eventually able to secure the vessel, it had a narrow escape of being wrecked on the bank. On returning to its moorings, the steamer was attacked by the schoolboys with a shower of brickbats and clods."

Several of the boys have been rusticated. Another enquiry is going on. They are taking a scandalously long time about it.

MESSRS. T. T. Allen and A. H. Wallis have been re-appointed, and Moulvi Syed Fazl Imam, Khan Bahadur, appointed, Members of the Council of the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal for the purpose of making Laws and Regulations in the Bengal Division of the Presidency of Fort William. The new appointment is a surprise. The new member, though the Vice-Chairman of the Patna Municipality and the bearer of a good name, is fitted neither by social position, education nor experience for the post to which he has been called. He will neither add dignity to the Council nor be in any way useful. The choice of such a man is in keeping with the policy to keep out the best men, and is besides a humiliation to the Mahomedan community. There are far better Mahomedans in and out of the service, not only in these Provinces but in Patna itself.

THE Government of the N.-W. P. and Oudh has followed up its resolution on the Hurdwar Enquiry by another, which shews that it is not dead to the feelings of the Hindus. It is anxious to avoid any future dispersion of the fair, if possible.

"Considering the sacred character which attaches to the fair at Hurdwar in the eyes of the Hindoos, and the distress and annoyance which a sudden and premature dispersal of the pilgrims cannot fail to cause, the Government of these Provinces feels bound to take every possible precaution against such outbreaks of disease as occurred last March, and rendered it necessary to break up the fair. It has, therefore, been determined to appoint a committee who will meet at Hurdwar on 3rd January 1893, and whose duty it will be to advise Government on the remedies to be applied to the three evils above noted, and to make any other suggestions for the health, comfort, and convenience of the pilgrims at future fairs. Possibly, some special regulations are necessary to ensure that the food sold at the fair shall be wholesome.

The Sanitary Commissioner to this Government will be the President of the Committee. Associated with him will be the Magistrate of Saharunpore, an Engineer officer of experience, and the following Hindoo gentlemen, who have been requested to aid Government with their advice :—

1. Baboo Pramoda Dass Mitra, of Benares.
2. Kunwar Ram Singh, of Bara, Allahabad.
3. Lala Nihal Chand, of Mozuffernugger.
4. Baboo Durga Pershad, of Furruckabad.
5. Pundit Het Ram, C.I.E., of Bareilly.

The Committee are empowered to add to their number, from time to time, one or two of the principal residents of Hurdwar who have special knowledge of the subject immediately under discussion."

The late Hurdwar business will be carried to the House of Commons, after the Congress has had its say.

THE law for the acquisition of land for public purposes does not define what a public purpose is, but leaves to the Local Governments to determine if the land is so to be acquired. The bare signature of a Secretary is enough to give validity to a notification under the Act. But the Government has hitherto been better than the law and always announced the specific purpose when issuing such a declaration. That good old custom seems no longer to bind the Local Government. Witness the following declaration in the last Calcutta Gazette of the 21st December :—

"Whereas it appears to the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal that land is required to be acquired by Government at the public expense for a public purpose, viz., for improving the sanitary condition of the locality and conferring other public benefits in the village of Bally, pargana Boro, district Hooghly, it is hereby declared that for the purpose two plots of land measuring, more or less, 19 bighas 11 cottahs and 2 chitaks and 15 cottahs respectively of standard measurement, bounded as below, are required within the aforesaid village of Bally."

Sir Charles Elliott has improved the jury system in Bengal by abolishing it in many serious offences. He is now prepared to improve a locality by annexing it.

WE are not surprised to read in the Indian Daily News of the 13th December that "A marriage procession from Burrall's Bustee recently passed through College Street. The bridegroom and bride were seated in a barouche drawn by four horses. The spectators who thronged the quarter, were quite taken by surprise to learn that the bridegroom and bride were of an humble Mahomedan family, living in a tiled hut!"

That is significant of the times and of the dead level policy of British administration. Everybody, whatever his position in society, thinks himself free, when able, to ape the high and the great, and is permitted even to affect royalty without opposition or even disapproval. The wonder rather is that the truly high do not change their ways but allow themselves to be mixed up with the audacious vulgar.

THE great French civil engineer, Alexander Brisse, has just died at Rome, at the age of seventy-two years. He was Prince Torlonia's engineer in the colossal no less than costly work of draining Lake Fucino in Italy. The great enterprise was pushed through to a satisfactory conclusion, at a cost of about 2 crores of rupees (30 million francs.) It was a financial as well as an engineering success.

THEY order the matter better in Russia, if the following account of a regiment quartered at Okhta, a suburb of St. Petersburg, is to be believed :—

"A whole company considered that the discipline maintained by their commanding officer was unendurable, and resolved to desert.

Instead of shrinking away, however, in ordinary deserter fashion, the company paraded at Okhta, and started towards Moscow fully equipped. In an hour or so it became known that they had gone, and the officer on duty for the day started in pursuit. He came up with the delinquent company quietly preparing to bivouac for the night, with rifles stacked in a little camp formed on the high road to Moscow. On inquiring what was the meaning of this, the officer was told that the men were going home, and that they had had enough of regimental life. He asked them if they did not know that they were all liable to be shot as deserters within twenty-four hours. They replied that they did not care what was done to them, so long as they were not made to serve, and repeated their intention to go to their villages. A curious argument then ensued, which lasted for about an hour, at the end of which time the men gave in, resumed possession of their rifles, and falling in, marched back again to Okhta with their officer. A strict inquiry has been ordered, and it is probable that the superior officers, whose severity has led to this little mutiny, will suffer, as well as the actual ringleaders of the mutineers."

That is a neat and genial way of settling a grave difficulty. It is more rational and satisfactory than the desperate and stern British method, which permits wrongs and suppresses complaints of the rank and file, giving no redress and allowing no combination for representation, —which drives the men to fury and mutiny, and punishes them with savage rigour. Democracy will yet change all that and assimilate its way to that of autocratic Russia.

IT is said that the late Duke of Marlborough had a great aversion for dogs, inasmuch that, when he married Mrs. Hammersley, a great difficulty was created by an old pug belonging to her. After solemn discussion and deliberation, the dog was forced to retire on a suitable provision, amounting to upwards of £300 per annum. It was left behind in America, and has now its home in Philadelphia, where it lives like a superannuated exquisite. It is housed in a palace of a kennel with sumptuous sleeping, eating, and bathing apartments, with sides of glass. It is fed with chopped steaks and bathed every other day in hot milk, and it goes out dressed in a blanket. The Duchess receives weekly information of her pet's condition. A lucky dog is Woonwoon—as the Duchess' pet is called. Only we are afraid, in the great trans-Atlantic Republic it has no chance of being knighted on New Year's Day.

A MONTH ago the talk in the highest circles in Europe was the Emperor and Empress of Austria's acquisition of a sister-in-law from the stage. It is not six months yet that a report got abroad that the Empress' brother, Louis, Duke of Bavaria, widower of a few months' standing, had contracted to marry again. The haste was considered indecent, to say nothing of the merits of the particular engagement, involving as it did the hoary bridegroom's marrying beneath himself. Consequently, there was no surprise when an indignant contradiction appeared which went the length of suggesting that the Duke had had enough of it—too much and too long of double blessedness to tempt him again to the great Lottery called matrimony. The report has proved true, however, after all. The royal Duke indeed has not only wedded but wedded down. On the 19th November, the Duke was married at Munich—morganatically—to Fraulein Antonie Barth, a dashing danseuse of the court theatre. As the rumour of marriage had mentioned the lucky bride, the authoritative denial was of a piece with the mendacities prevalent in courts and cabinets, whether of the East or the West.

This marriage will be the death of the Duke, we fear. The poor sensualist seems determined to end as he began. In his youth's prime he sacrificed his position and prospects, including his claim to the family property, to his passion for an actress, subsequently created Baroness Wallersee, who died last year. The purity and love of his long married life may be imagined from the fact, that no sooner was one actress laid in her grave than this princely connoisseur was after another—the latest debutante on the boards of the court theatre. And now he has married her, one is involuntarily reminded of the question which gives title to one of the first Lord Lytton's stories, "What will he do with it?" The Duke is not more than sixty-two, but he has long since ruined his health and looks more of an octogenarian. And what are we to think of the poor accomplished artiste deliberately electing to embrace a death's head decked out in ducal robes? There is compensation, no doubt, and there may, perhaps, be relief from cicisbeism and such other accommodating customs of the European continent. Or, is there some such arrangement as the following in the background?

"In the village of Arreton, in the Isle of Wight, many years ago, there lived a young man who was betrothed to a young woman. Both were poor and in humble life; but the grandfather of the young man had money, and he fell in love with the young woman and proposed marriage to her. The girl naturally made her young lover acquainted with this offer, with renewed assurance of devotion to him alone. He was vexed, but having pondered over the same, saw a way to extricate himself and his sweetheart from the dilemma. 'Marry him,' said he to the girl, 'he is rich; he cannot live long; when he dies, you'll have his money, and I'll have you.' She took the advice. By the marriage she became the young man's grandmother. Not long after the old man died, and then she wed her first betrothed."

Here at last is Burke flatly contradicted. Here is answer to the great political philosopher more thorough than Tom Paine ever contemplated. The philosophical statesman taught that love and wisdom or prudence are irreconcilable. The untenableness of his assumption is exposed by the instance just quoted. It is possible to make love and be wise with a vile calculating prudence, deliberately surrendering your inamorata to a vile rival and calmly waiting upon his bursting a blood-vessel or dying from a fall in order to call his widow your wife and enjoy his wealth.

THE UNITED EUROPEAN AND NATIVE MEETING AGAINST THE ABOLITION OF TRIAL BY JURY.

It is impossible to exaggerate the strength and unanimity of the feeling which the Jury Notification of the Bengal Government has evoked. We are in the presence of a downright explosion of public opinion. It is perfectly spontaneous. If anywhere any professional agitators have been at work, they have been officiously spoiling a pure cause which stands in no need of their bolstering. Before there was time for intercommunication and interchange of thought, the country had spoken out its mind in no uncertain tones. Before anybody had time to interfere, the Press had pronounced the doom of the measure, so far as its chances of willing acceptance by the people was concerned. The question was so simple, coming to every man's business and bosom, that there was no need to consult experts. The people said as they felt and thought. There was no hesitation—no beating about the bush. The Gazette notifying the withdrawal of the right of Trial by Panchayet or Jury met, from the first, with an instant clamour of rage and alarm. From one end of the country to the other, there was a chorus of indignation.

As the blow begun in a corner came, from its very nature, to be recognised as a part and parcel of a general policy of retrogression applicable to all parts of British India, the grievance was taken up throughout the Empire. The press and public bodies in the other Provinces and Presidencies protested against the departure. The great Mahajan Sabha of the South tackled the Viceroy in Madras and taxed him with so illiberal an innovation. Meanwhile, Bengal has to reckon with it, to begin with. Not but that the people salaam to Sir Charles Elliott and scramble to his parties as before. For we are a truly loyal people. Nay, people may still be found of all ranks to swear that so long as he sways from Belvedere he is the wisest, brightest, most magnificent of rulers, and the Jury Notification is his highest performance in statecraft, and has endeared him to all Her Majesty's lieges. For nations cannot easily change, and we Orientals have been taught by the Bard of Shiraz,

"If the king at midday says, It is night, exclaim,
What fine stars I see!"

With this qualification, the feeling is thoroughly genuine and of the utmost consequence and concern. Accordingly, meetings have been held throughout the Province. The obnoxious Notification appeared in the Calcutta Gazette of the 26th October. Early in the following month the ball was opened with great spirit at Krishnaghur, the capital of Nuddea. Other towns in Bengal and Behar promptly followed. The Counties of Hooghly, Burdwan, Dinajpur, Barisal, Khoolna, Patna, Howrah, the 24-Perganas, Mymensing, Dacca, Midnapore, Moorshedabad, all rose in protest. Meetings against the measure have been held in no less than fifteen important towns, Krishnaghur, Serampur, Hooghly, Burdwan, Bali, Dinajpur, Bagirhat, Tangail, Chukda, Barisal, Kisorogunge, Midnapur, Patna, Kulna, Bhowanipore. Perfect unanimity prevailed as well as enthusiasm at all the gatherings. At most of the meetings delegates were appointed to attend the meeting which was expected to be held at Calcutta. The crowning protest of the metropolis was delivered this week. In response to a numerous signed requisition, the Sheriff called a meeting of the inhabitants in the Town-Hall, in the afternoon of the 20th December.

Regarded as a popular demonstration against the Jury policy of Government, the meeting of Tuesday was a complete and grand success. Many as have been the gatherings from time to time, for one purpose or another, in the Town-Hall since its erection, the last was the most striking and impressing, not to say the best,—the most multitudinous yet most orderly, the most representative, the most respectable. We do not forget the gatherings of the elect, presided over by a Lieutenant-Governor or a Viceroy, at which the gods have condescended to hobnob with mortals, or those at which native gentlemen of wealth have been associated with official and unofficial Europeans in work either of charity and grace or amiability. Such combinations, however, have no popular character or authority, and their political interest is nil or nominal—at least indirect. Here was a distinct and well-understood political occasion, and we boldly state without fear of contradiction that the inhabitants of the governed classes of this city and Province never before responded in such force to an invitation to meet for a political object. In a country of continental dimensions, with a vast population of endless varieties of race and colour and creed, with divided, perhaps, conflicting interests, public meetings, like the causes which move, are apt to be sectional. Such was the great meeting on the Ilbert Bill, and such the previous meetings against or in support of what was nicknamed the Black Act. Such was even the magnificent meeting of 1853 on the renewal of the East India Company's Charter.

Such was not this week's meeting. The question of the hour appealed to every class, more or less directly; every section of the community felt aggrieved at the departure taken by Government. Hence the extraordinary variety of the assembled elements. If sectional at all, it was a pan-sectional gathering. Not only was every section represented but the best men of most sections were present—all the magnates and men of light and leading, with scarcely an exception. The only exceptions, indeed, were officials and Government pensioners. The numbers which, from all parts of the metropolis, converged to the great house on the plain of Calcutta in the afternoon of Tuesday, were simply amazing. Many of them came away in disappointment, unable to find even standing-room in any part of the vast hall, having been anticipated there by a legion, while, like insects hovering around glass lamps in the eve of the cold weather in the Tropics, an ever-increasing crowd blocked up the stairs and the entrance below, who, from time to time, vainly struggled to effect an introduction and reach the arcana.

Calcutta is notorious for the absence of proper arrangements at its meetings. On this occasion the confusion was worse confounded by the extraordinary numbers. The meeting was timed for half-past four O'clock. As early as 1 O'clock the men engaged in clearing the Town-Hall of the decorations and other impedimenta—the flower pots and so forth—of overnight's ball of the Buffs, were hampered by the continual stream of people to attend the meeting, many of them from the country who had been waiting in town for days and who, having to report as eye-witnesses to their friends, could not afford disappointment. At 2 O'clock all the chairs were filled up in the body of the hall. By 3 O'clock all available space in the hall and corridors was occupied by its men, sitting or standing. After that it was a war against the law of impenetrability. The crush and compression was like that at an Indian fair or at a Hindu house on the occasion of the performance of a popular opera.

The aged and delicate and the more respectable were driven from the contest and made their way home, leaving the field to the enthusiastic to struggle as they might or bide their time till some buffeted insider limped out of the business. Thus hundreds, including men of high position, European merchant princes, Zemindars, signatories to the Requisition to the Sheriff, and so on, had to go away.

In a word, the meeting was phenomenal for numbers as well as for respectability and the combination of all classes and sections of the governed. Europeans and Indians were equally represented and equally well, as regards their respective numbers in the census—in their educated classes. On no public occasion since the Reconciliation meeting after the mutinies in that very hall, had the two races so cordially cooperated as in this demonstration on the Jury question. But the attendance on that occasion is not to be compared to that on this. The highest numerical success was reached in Calcutta by the Town Hall meeting of 1853—that at which the great Bengali orator Ram Gopal Ghose first exposed Sir Frederick Halliday for veracity—when the overflow of the attendance from the lower floor—in which the meeting was held—down the grand flight of steps into the street and around the colossal statue in front attracted notice from Government House. That success was eclipsed on Tuesday. The numbers have been variously estimated from five to ten thousand. The latter estimate may be exaggerated, but it is not a preposterous exaggeration counting the thousands who came and went away not finding admission. Under the circumstances, all criticism based on the capacity of the hall is irrelevant. One thing is indisputable that, all through the three hours of the meeting, men were continually coming in and going back in disappointment. One crucial instance may be mentioned. The brother of the chairman, himself a wealthy banker, a member of the Town Corporation, after hovering on the skirts of the crowd for more than an hour trying to get in, left in despair.

The Sheriff opened the meeting in the tones of a Stentor which were heard throughout the hall. He spoke, of course, in terms of graceful geniality, showing how much he wished to please the powers yet declaring in unmistakable language his adhesion to the cause of the people. Maharaja Jotendra Mohan Tagore followed in the same style, without the same locus standi as Mr. Mehta had to speak. He then proposed his brother Maharaja Doorja Churn Law to the chair. The motion being seconded by Raja Pearymohun Mookerjee and carried, Maharaja Law took possession of the chief seat in the centre and opened the proceedings with a short speech which was lost in the hum of many voices and the tread, tread, tread, of many feet coming or essaying to come. It was not till the Hon'ble Dr. Mahendralal Sircar, whom the Chairman called on to move the first Resolution, had got through his first sentences that the hum, as well as the uproar from shouts of Louder! from the distant regions of the hall, was subdued. His exordium was out of proportion to his speech. He conceived himself bound to justify his presence and he justified himself well and ingeniously. But it was a work of supererogation. A member of the Legislative Council whose services as a legislator have been rewarded by reappointment, he can never be regarded as an intruder in any public discussion of public affairs. Nor was this his first appearance on a political platform. It was his success as a public speaker and not his eminence as a man of science that opened for him the door of the Council. On the subject itself Dr. Sircar spoke without mincing, though with moderation and the finest temper, condemning the Notification and wondering how two such good men and true, his particular friends, could concoct such a piece of folly.

Dr. Sircar was followed by Mr. Pugh, who seconded the first Resolution. His first remark was about the wonderful meeting than which, many as had been the meetings he had seen in Calcutta, it had never been his lot to address a grander gathering of all sections of the community. It was well that Europeans and natives were there combined in such force, and he hoped it would ever be so, that they would be so alert in defence of their rights, and would so combine whenever any of their rights were attacked. Speaking specially to the European part of the audience, he made an adroit allusion to the Ilbert Bill. Now they were on the same platform on which they assembled in 1884 to protest against that Bill, he reminded them that they fought for trial by jury for themselves, and now they were fighting for the right for others, and he hoped that Englishmen would never be so selfish as to withhold their help to such causes merely because they were not interested. He then entered into the whole question, making a lucid statement of judicial calmness which it was a pity the Abolitionists could not hear. If anything could bring conviction home to them against the grain, it would have been Mr. Pugh's argument. And then it is a pleasure to hear him, he is a delightful speaker, calm, self-possessed, without any vices of action or manner, fluent, yet distinct. One could almost see that he was accustomed to public meetings and had probably sat in Parliament, as he had. In moving the next Resolution, Babu Jadu Lal Mullick expressed the obligation of the people to the European community, for its cooperation and help. For the rest, he said that it was intolerable to the people of Bengal, at the fag end of the nineteenth century, to be told that they were not fit for trial by jury. He was seconded by Mr. H. B. H. Turner, one of our leading merchants and a former Sheriff, in a short but incisive speech of emphatic protest against the strange Notification. He spoke in mournful earnest, regretted his finding himself in a meeting of opposition to a measure of Government, but then there was no help for honest men if Government should be so foolish. He still hoped they would retire from an untenable position. What could be the possible justification for such a blow? Was there a fearful increase in crime? Nothing of the kind. He finally attributed all this nonsense to Capua. It was Simla and Darjeeling that are at the bottom of all such unsympathetic administration. The rulers deliberately kept themselves out of reach of the governed. Of course, they lost all touch of them.

Then sprang the Tiger—the redoubtable William Jackson, whose monumental appearance above the surrounding level was the signal for a burst of cheering such as no other popular favorite got. He too commenced with noticing the vastness of the gathering, vaster than any meeting he had seen before. Avoiding the ground covered by Mr. Pugh, Mr. Jackson supplied his commentary on the others' argument. In one sense his was the speech of the evening. It was certainly the most diverting, the most tranchant, the most incessantly and loudly applauded. Of course, it was thoroughly candid and personal. It was one series of points and every point told. Mr. Jackson gave the genesis of the measure. It was but a symptom of the prevailing official jealousy of the educated Indians—Babudom as they are called. Thus the great assembly was fixed till a late hour by Mr. Jackson's vigorous onslaught until the audience was in no mood to hear any body else. The meeting came to an end after half past seven. It was ten before all the attending gentlemen came out and found their carriages or their tramcar.

THE JURY MEETING.

DR. MAHENDRALAL SIRCAR'S SPEECH.

Mr. Chairman and Gentlemen,—I do not know what interpretation you will put upon my appearance before you this evening. The question before the meeting is one of Law, and some of you, if not all of you, may be disposed to ask what right has one, whose line of life has been in a different plane altogether, to speak on an occasion like this. I admit, Gentlemen, it would be the height of impertinence and presumption and veritable charlatany on my part to address this assembly which is about to be addressed by men of acknowledged eminence in the legal profession, were it not for the fact that in every science however technical there is a practical side which is not only within the cognizance of the common sense of all men, but which it more or less concerns all men to be acquainted with. And it is my belief that had it not been for this practical side, no science could have made any considerable advance at all. There is nothing transcendental or occult in science. All science is but the organic development and growth of the common sense possessed by every man. And if I am not mistaken, and I speak with the utmost diffidence in the presence of the eminent members of the legal profession before me, Law is emphatically the quintessence of common sense as regards right and justice. Of course it has its technicalities, and formidable technicalities too, scarcely less formidable than the technicalities of mathematics and of the physical sciences, but they are such, and herein Law differs from the other sciences, the technicalities of Law are such that by one that has mastered them, they may be brought down to the level of the understandings of all but idiots. Had it not been so the administration of justice would have been impossible, at least there would have been no satisfaction from any administration of justice, however elaborate. This is the charming feature of Law of which I have had some experience during the time I had the honor of being your Sheriff, when it was to me a pleasure to see how both counsel and judge did their best, and succeeded, in unravelling the most complicated cases in plain language to the jury in order to enable them to arrive at just conclusions. And this very necessity of having to explain cases to the jury in untechnical language is, in my humble opinion, of great advantage to the judge himself, inasmuch as it prevents him from obscuring his mental vision by burying himself in technicalities. The other advantages of trial by jury are so obvious that it would be waste of time to dwell on them at the present moment, and before an audience like this. They are so obvious and so great that no conscientious judge would willingly dispense with the services of jurors. They are so obvious and so great that the system of trial by jury has been, from very early times of their history, looked upon as a sine qua non in the administration of justice by the nation, the most justice-loving and practical on the face of the globe. It is in the care of this nation that Providence has placed our destiny when, under a conjunction of the most adverse circumstances, that destiny was drifting away from its legitimate direction. And right earnestly and right nobly have the statesmen, who have been sent to rule over that destiny, been doing their duty. Gradually and cautiously they have been introducing into the administration of this country reforms and principles of government, the practical carrying out of which has rendered the nation to which they belong great in every sense of the word.

Gentlemen, the system of trial by jury is one of these reforms. It was introduced some thirty years ago in only seven districts in Bengal as an experimental measure. When first introduced it had given to it all the English character of no appeal and no reference. Subsequently, wisely or unwisely it is not for me to decide just now, the legislature deemed fit to deprive it of that character, so that now there is appeal by the Crown in cases of acquittal and reference by the presiding judge to the High Court in case of his disagreeing with the jury. These were deemed to be sufficient safe-guards against failure of justice from trial by jury, and it was believed that the system would succeed. The system has been working well, and to all appearances has succeeded in fulfilling the object for which it was introduced, and what is more, it has become very popular, as this immense gathering to-day eminently proves. But somehow or other the Government of the day has been seized with the conviction that serious and frequent miscarriages of justice are taking place under the system. It is my belief, Gentlemen, that this conviction is genuine and sincere both on the part of the Government of India and of the Local Government, and we are bound to respect it. It is under this conviction that both the Governments called for opinion from both the judicial and executive authorities. The opinions are before us. What is the conclusion to be drawn from them? Government could come to only one conclusion, and that is unfavorable to the jury system in the most important class of cases where the system is and ought to be most valued. It may be presumption, Gentlemen, to differ from such august bodies as the Government of India and the Government of Bengal, and from such high authorities as the Viceroy and the Lieutenant-Governor. But every one has a right to draw his own inferences, and unless one is a veritable coward or an idiot, one ought not to surrender one's judgment to the judgment of any authority, however high and great. I must frankly tell you, Gentlemen, that the conclusion I have come to from the opinions before us is directly at variance with that arrived at by Government. I am bound to say that the balance of genuine independent opinion is in favor of the jury system in every class of cases. Of course, the system has its faults, but what human system has not? No body would think of maintaining that the jury system in England is perfect, that no failures of justice take place under it. But would any body on that account think of inducing the English people to abolish or even to restrict it? I wish the experiment were tried by some of those gentlemen who have objected to the jury system in this country. And I cannot express my own opinion better than in the words of the Sessions Judge of Hooghly, that "it would be as unreasonable to do away with the jury system in India because it does not come up to all unreasonable expectations, as it would be to uproot a young tree because it did not grow so quickly as its planter desired, instead of cultivating, training, and sustaining it." It is true there is no question of abolishing the jury system altogether. But when the most important class of "Capital Cases," which under the law must include all cases of homicide for which the sentence may be death, or a few days' imprisonment or even a fine, when this most important class of cases is withdrawn from the cognizance of the jury, is not the system attenuated to insignificant dimensions, not worth having at all?

Yes, Gentlemen, I must say, though I do so with the utmost regret, regret because I have the highest respect for the present ruler of Bengal as one who has not only expressed the deepest sympathy for the people of this country but given numerous practical and substantial proofs of that sympathy, which few in his position have done, I must say, because duty compels me to say, duty not only to my country but to the Government as well,—I must say, that the recent action taken by the Lieutenant-Governor in this matter of trial by jury, would have been a retrograde one for any Government, and that it is decidedly and infinitely more so for the British Government in India, especially when at the helm of that Government we have such enlightened Englishmen as Lord Lansdowne and Sir Charles Elliott. Nothing short of a strong sense of duty compels me, against deep personal feelings, to move the first resolution which you have done me the honor to commit to my charge. Before I resume my seat I have only one observation to make, and that is, that most regrettable as has been the recent action of Government, it has done one good which, I fervently hope, will be a lasting one for this country, it has united under one bond of fellowship and allow me to say of brotherhood the European and the Indian sections of the community, and my countrymen! this meeting, this unique meeting has demonstrated, what in my heart of hearts I have always believed, that we have no better, no more faithful, no more sincere friends than our British fellow-subjects.

MR. PUGH'S SPEECH.

Mr. Pugh, in seconding the resolution, congratulated his hearers upon the wonderful gathering he saw before him. It had been his lot to address many meetings in Calcutta, but he had never seen, much less ever addressed, a meeting of this kind. (Hear, hear.) He entirely reciprocated what had been said as to its being a meeting at which all sections of the community were represented. He heartily rejoiced that it was so, and he hoped that whenever any attack was made on the liberties of any section of this people that they would all stand together. (Applause.) He also most cordially endorsed the view put before them, that this meeting had not been called in any spirit of hostility to the Government, but in order to let the Government know what were the views of the people of this country. He was sorry that they had not an opportunity before the notification was issued of hearing what the views of the people were; for if they had known the feelings of the people he believed the notification would never have been issued. He would confine his remarks very strictly to the subject of the first resolution, as other speakers would address them on how the late Notification came to be issued. The question had been asked why did European British subjects want to interfere in a matter of this kind? He had already pointed out one reason. They had all got a certain amount of sentiment in them, and that sentiment moved them when they saw the liberties of a neighbour attacked to go to his help. It might be said that the country could not be governed by sentiment, but he would reply that no wise ruler would disregard the sentiments of the people he had to govern. (Applause.)

Now they were on the same platform, to use the word in a very commonsense way, as they were on in 1884. They were then defending themselves in the matter of trial by jury and seeking its extension, and now they were again engaged in the same cause. Then they were fighting for their own hand, and now they were fighting for the hand of others. They would remember that in the great debate which then took place the Maharaja of Durbhunga had expressed a hope to see the jury system extended over the whole of India, and Lord Ripon held out hopes that the people of this country might climb up to this level. He also said that he would not vote in favour of the agreement which had been arrived at were it not that the prospect was open to the people of this country to rise to the same level. And speaking for himself and for the great mass of those who had fought on the same side as himself, they looked forward at that time to the extension of the jury system, and they held out hopes to the Native community that they would rise to the same level as that in which they themselves were more happily placed.

There was another point with regard to European British subjects. As they all knew, many merchants in Calcutta had charge of large industrial estates in the mofussil, and they felt that it was a duty on their part to look after and protect the liberties of those who were committed to their care. Then there was another point. The Europeans felt that if they were to follow an apostle of the gospel of selfishness, even then they would have to stand forward in support of this struggle. Trial by jury had been likened to a tree, and it was a good simile. But supposing you take one of those fine trees on the Maidan, and you cut off one side of it, and you cut off the top. How long would it be before that tree was cut away altogether? Every one would say it was of no use keeping a tree of this kind, it might as well be taken away altogether. He argued, therefore, that, supposing trial by jury was withdrawn in certain cases, any one might come forward and say, "you have withdrawn trial by jury in the case of offences against the person, it is useless to keep it on for offences against property."

Then they would go a step further. Supposing Europeans allowed trial by jury to be withdrawn in this way, in what position would they stand if they asked for the retention of the system purely for European British subjects? Sir William Jones had said that trial by jury was one of the three anchors of the constitution, and if it was true in his time it was equally true in the present day. Yet if they looked at the bundle of papers issued in connection with the Notification, they would find that four out of five Commissioners based their arguments on the theory that trial by jury ought to be given up in England and elsewhere. When people argued in this way, the keystone of their argument was wholly wrong. If one of these gentlemen went home and stood for Parliament, and told the electors that one of the great boons he was going to confer on them was the abolition of trial by jury, he would be hooted and hounded out of the place. Nay, a friend here [Mr. Pugh, looking at Mr. Digby,] who had experience of electioneering, tells me that he doesn't believe the man would get away with a whole bone in his body. It mattered very little whether the germ of trial by jury existed of old in panchayets, or whether it was granted by the British Government. Lord Cornwallis wrote in favour of it in 1793, and laid down the principle that it was desirable to associate the people of the country in every possible way with the administration of justice, and in 1827 a regulation was introduced in Madras the preamble of which was to the same effect. In 1831 a very large and influentially signed petition was presented to the House of Commons asking to have trial by jury introduced into this country. The result of this seemed to have been that in 1832 trial by jury in a very modified form was introduced into Madras. The juries had very little power, but the principle was recognised. In 1855 a circular order was issued by the Government of Bengal in which it was said that it was inexpedient to have juries composed of vakils and muktears, and recommending that something should be done to make the duties of juries less irksome, but since that time nothing in this direction had been done.

The point was this, that these things were said in 1855 which were being said in the present day, but before the Notification was issued nothing had been done to remedy these evils. They would find that defects had been pointed out as to the election of juries and other matters, but that steps had not been taken with reference to any of these points. One point which had been brought out with great clearness was that juries had an intense distrust of Police evidence, but what had been done to improve the status of the Police and to see that no persons below a certain grade should have the investigation of a case before sending it to a Magistrate? They were in the same position as formerly, and how were they to say that they should take up this tree and cast it away when they had taken no pains whatever to give it free growth? But even if they said that trial by jury was introduced in 1862, how did they stand with regard to it? Sir Cecil Beadon, then Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, was so pleased with it that before he left he was prepared to have extended it very largely in this country. Later still Sir Rivers Thompson, a man who had exceptional opportunities for judging, was so favourably impressed by trial by jury that he not only did his best to have it extended to Europeans but also the rest of the people of the land. (Hear, hear.) The Notification had been sprung upon the country when the people had no idea that anything of the kind was intended. It could only be justified on the ground that there was grievous failure of justice or for grave political reasons.

But there were no political reasons whatever, and no wise ruler should do anything to harass the people or cause distrust of its motives. With regard to the failure of justice he would point out that the reports to Government were on a totally different question. It was one thing to ask people what they thought of a system, and another to ask them if they thought it ought to be abolished. The Judges of the High Court had directed their attention to remedying the system. An attentive perusal of the reports showed that they did not afford any justification to Government for the action they had taken. But the Government ought not to act upon the opinion of these officers without ascertaining the opinion of the people. They should also produce statistics with regard to the results of trial by jury. Three per cent. is the total number of jury cases referred to the High Court, and if this was so, it formed a strong point in favour of jury trial. He could put no construction upon the withholding of these statistics except that Government were aware that they would be against them. He gathered that the Government now admit that the greater part of the Notification was without justification, and in that case these parts should be withdrawn. If they relied on murder cases alone they should give the statistics with regard to murder cases. Even in regard to the percentage of murder cases they were set right by the High Court, and so there was no failure of justice at all. The matter was still in the hands of Lord Lansdowne, and he trusted that that meeting would appeal to him to put a stop to the excitement which pervaded the people by withdrawing the Notification. They would give Lord Lansdowne and the Government any assistance they could to obviate any failure of justice.

MR. TURNER'S SPEECH.

Mr. H. B. H. Turner said:—Maharaja and Gentlemen,—It is with no pleasure that I take part in a meeting called to protest against the action of Government. It is only that I feel so strongly the mistake which the Government has made, and the hope that a protest couched in moderate language may induce a reconsideration of the whole matter that reconciles me to occupying this position of seeming opposition, but which I trust may come to be looked upon rather as one of loyal advice. I have considered the papers which have been published as the record upon which the withdrawal of certain jury trials has been determined, and I must confess my surprise that such a change in the administration of criminal justice should have been made upon the grounds which these papers disclose. And be it remembered in districts, many of which are the headquarters of Europeans, and where Anglo-Indians and Eurasians are most numerous. Had these papers shown that serious crime existed in those provinces, or that the alleged failure of justice following upon erroneous verdicts of the juries had resulted in an increase of crime—or that murders were more frequent, or murderers more often escaped punishment in districts where jury trials were held, than in those where there are no juries; had it been shown that special efforts had been made to improve the class of juries, and that nevertheless the system still failed, or if any emergency had arisen, then perhaps the action of the Government might have been understood. But there is nothing of this in the papers which have been made public. The utmost that is indicated is that the system needs improvement, but that there is no urgency for reform. And after all who are responsible for the quality of the juries empanelled? Have those to whom the duty of selection was entrusted done their part? My friend Mr. Pugh has shown that nothing has been done, and if not, is not the failure, if failure there be (and the facts stated in our memorial throw a doubt upon this point,) of the system attributable rather to this cause than to the system itself? Attention has often been called to the disadvantages under which both the Government and the public suffer from the fact that for the greater part of the year the Government are beyond the influence of public opinion, in regions so remote that the pulse of the public cannot be felt. It is to this violation that a good deal of want of sympathy must be attributed. So keenly has this been felt that over and over again has it been urged that Simla and Darjiling as seats of Government should be abandoned, and promises, not perhaps in the formal way needed to make them positive undertakings, on the part of Government, have been made that no large measure affecting public interests should be passed into law at Simla. This year has unfortunately witnessed a departure from this promise, and I feel sure that had the communications which have passed between the heads of Government and the gentlemen who have so worthily represented the public in this jury matter been possible before the Notification was issued, this particular question would, in all probability, not have arisen. Another point has also been frequently urged by the non-official public, and that is that before the Government is committed to any definite policy by the publication of a Bill or other document the opinion of at least the several Associations representing the public might be taken—so that any arguments which might have escaped the attention of the advisers of Government might have effect, without any appearance of the Government being placed in a false position. In this present case it is remarkable that, although inquiries have been made over a period of nearly two-and-a-half years, not a whisper has reached non-official ears, and so the Notification, with its sudden application, fell upon us as a bombshell, and no man knew for the moment what it meant, nor why it was discharged. Gentlemen, I do not pretend to be the mouthpiece of the commercial community of Calcutta, but I think I may say with assurance, that they and their motives have been misunderstood, and it is for this reason that I have spoken at such length. I wish it to be understood that it is not only the manner of the Notification, but also the principle of the whole thing, which I consider to be at fault. With these remarks, gentlemen, I beg to second this Resolution, and to commend it to your favourable consideration.

MR. JACKSON'S SPEECH.

Mr. William Jackson, who was received with cheers, said.—It was with some diffidence that he ventured to address an assembly larger than any that he had had the pleasure of seeing before. In rising to address the meeting upon this question, he intended to avoid to some extent any ground covered by Mr. Pugh. He could not honestly say that the withdrawal of the right of trial by jury was not maliciously and wilfully done. When they came to consider the circumstances under which it was done, the place at which the case was dated, and who were present there, they would see that everything pointed as conclusively as possible to the fact that this was intended to be a slap at Babudom, at the people whom they detested and hated for having a press that criticises everything they do. He would give them the dates. They would find that this matter had been creeping along its slow course between—he had better be exact in his dates, lest he should find himself corrected in the Englishman to-morrow morning—between the 22nd of June, 1891, and the 25th of August, 1892. Between this time—June, 1891, and August, 1892—there was time to obtain the opinion of almost every human being in India. What was done in the interval? Simply nothing. The two people certainly involved in the matter were Sir Philip Hutchins and Sir Charles Elliott.

They hated the whole system under which Bengal had been ruled. They forgot that the people had lived for years under the dominion of courts of justice presided over by men the pick of the Indian bench, that for years and years their liberties had been protected by the finest bench that the Empire had hitherto had. They go up to the North-West, and fancy they can tread along like Akbar going to his peacock throne. They come here and find their acts cavilled at and criticised and they do everything they possibly can to avenge themselves. They were not all idiots. They were suddenly persuaded by reading a mass of papers which proved nothing, and pretended to say that in consequence of the opinion of so and so they came to this conclusion. Did they honestly believe this? There was nothing in these opinions which justified the notification that had been issued.

Mr. Jackson entered into a long and forcibly worded commentary on the minutes of the Judges. The opinions of the Executive officers might, he said, be put in the waste paper basket. He pointed out that Sir Comer Petheram and Mr. Justice Trevelyan said nothing. Mr. Justice Tottenham was of opinion with regard to the respective merits of jurors and assessors that "the one was as good as the other, if not better?" The great panacea that was held out by the High Court was "Come to us; then you will get the best kind of justice. We dispense an article of a very superior kind." He had been unfortunately a very long time a member of the Bar here. He recalled the day when no Barrister Judge upon an occasion of this kind would have failed to record a separate minute. It was a matter of the utmost importance, and it showed to his mind some deterioration that the Barrister Judges were not able to record a separate minute in this case, but must go humbly behind their Civilian colleagues. There had, however, been no attempt to suggest anything with regard to abolition of trial by jury in these cases. The opinions quoted stated only that trial by jury had been not altogether successful. He would like the ordeal of justice in the High Court to be put to the public, and ask them whether the High Court would come out any better.

Mr. Jackson was at a loss to understand how any person of any common sense could dare to propose the revocation of section 307 of the Criminal Procedure Code. Could they conceive a section that could go lower than that? How was it possible? Was not the Sessions Judge allowed the most ample powers in the interests of justice to refer to the High Court? What in the name of Heaven did they want? If it was not in the interests of justice, what did they want this power for at all? And if they had the amplest powers of referring then why in the name of Heaven did they complain of the failure of the jury system?

The curse of the whole administration of justice in this country was the feeling with the Civilian that every decision reversing his own was a rebuff to himself. It was all a personal matter with him. "I have been offended: you have insulted me: you have reversed my decision." This practice of treating the reversal of the decision as a personal rebuff was one of the curses of the system under which we are governed. The speaker submitted that, where cases are improperly referred, the expenses should be paid by Government.

Turning again to the question of the High Court minutes, Mr. Jackson continued. Having recommended these improvements, none of which go to the extent of abolition of trial by jury, they now come to the two solitary opinions upon which the action of Government was based—the opinion of Justices Amir Ali and O'Kinealy. This was one of the most amusing minutes on which the Government of India had founded anything he had ever heard or read of. He quoted Mr. Justice Amir Ali's opinion that "in cases of homicide, even when the crime is of an atrocious character, Indian juries are notoriously averse to bringing in a verdict which would submit the accused to capital punishment. In other cases, e. g., dacoity and rape, race feelings and popular prejudices, besides other influences, play a great part."

The Government had, it would be noted, carefully eliminated the cases with regard to capital punishment which were the cases in which the Government was most interested, because it was the most convenient form in which it could entangle a great land owner. It was the one in which he was the most likely to be caught. Mr. Justice Amir Ali had said that race feelings and popular prejudices played a great part in cases of dacoity and rape; yet dacoity and rape had been most carefully left to the jury to play a great part in. Among other absurdities was this that the Government was most anxious about capital cases, nothing on earth would make it give in about that; but if murder were committed in a dacoity, that was still left to the jury under the Notification as it stands. Anything more absurd or ridiculous could not possibly be. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Amir Ali had said that this system of reference threw a heavy responsibility upon the Judge. What did he mean by the term? A man sitting there to administer justice is told by the Act that whenever he thinks it necessary in the interests of justice to do a particular thing he shall do it. That is the heavy responsibility which is thrown upon him. What was he paid for? But it was one thing asking a man to give his reasons and state why he:

does a certain thing, and it was another thing in the ordinary course to allow a case to flow in a smooth stream from the Sessions Court until it gracefully floated before the Appellate Bench.

The speaker quoted Mr. Justice Amir Ali's opinion on jury trials submitted in 1884, in which the latter stated that there were many assessor districts at that time quite as advanced and fitted to receive the jury system as the so-called jury districts themselves. The change in Mr. Amir Ali's views was, he pointed out, an illustration of the value of the High Court as a field for expanding one's mind. Though it was the hand of Esau, it was Jacob's voice. How could a man have changed his opinion in a period of time like that, and give no reason whatever for it, nothing having occurred in the meanwhile?

The speaker challenged the Government to show any statistics in support of their case. He would make a further challenge. Had they consulted a single one of their law officers on the subject? Had they consulted either of their legal non-official members of their Council? He would like, most of all, to know the name of the gentleman who first started this subject. The sun suddenly burst into Simla, and they were told at one particular moment that the Government of India had discovered so and so and so and so. He wanted to know the name of the man who started the thing in motion. If they could only find that, they would have the explanation of a great many things connected with the question. They had no information as to what suddenly struck the Lieutenant-Governor on the 20th October, 1892. What occurred to him to force him all of a sudden to carry out a measure of this kind? To his mind there was a great deal behind that had not been explained. It was the old old trick that had so often been tried in India, under the idea that when a thing was a fait accompli it was all over with it altogether. "Do it sharply; they will get accustomed to it, and let the matter slide."

He would ask them also to remember the state of the things under which they were living. He would not say that the present state of affairs arose altogether from the attitude of the whole body of the Civil Service. There were many men among them who would scorn to have anything to do with it, but there were men whose sole idea was to govern India on this footing. The speaker continued: "We had one of them years ago in Sir George Campbell. We have got this man now; and he will do entirely as he pleases, wholly irrespective of the opinions and the feelings of any one."

Referring to the attitude of the Civilian Judges, Mr. Jackson contended that they never forgot their own privileges. They had succeeded in evading the 35 years' rule just like barristers; they next succeeded in getting the pension of £1,200 a year, just like barristers; they then succeeded in not paying anything to the pension fund, but when it came to the next thing they want the Civilian cake as well. When it comes to the appointment of Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal or Member of Council then they are pucca Civilians. If the rule were adopted that the moment a Civilian went into the High Court, his career, so far as the public service was concerned, was closed, they would then have absolute judicial independence; but not until then. There are always some men looking out for something else. Mr. Jackson assured his hearers that they could never know whether one of the members of the High Court was not contemplating succeeding Sir Philip Hutchins himself.

Mr. Jackson raised the question whether, under the circumstances, the Notification was valid. Referring to Section 269 he doubted whether, under the general powers conferred therein, a privilege like this should be included. They had, however, a specimen upon the present legislative board of the style of trickery adopted by some of the Government officials in endeavouring to get their measures passed. They would find at Page 1300 of the Calcutta Gazette of July 27, a suggestion of Mr. Risley, one of the people who now adorn the Lieutenant-Governor's Council. This was the way in which legislation was conducted in India. The whole system was a sham. The mere fact of a Lieutenant-Governor or Government official saying anything must not delude them into the belief that it was necessarily true. They had to look after them. The passage in Mr. Risley's note was as follows:—"The point, however, that I would ask His Honor to consider is not that drainage is in itself more or less important than water-supply, but that the people, or rather that small section of the people which can make itself heard, believe very strongly in the former and do not care very much about the latter. Consequently, if there is any prospect of legislative action to enable us to compel people to provide good water, it would be judicious to include drainage in the same project de loi simply in order to gild the pill of compulsion." Gild the pill! And again "when once we had got the powers, it would rest with us to use them for drainage or water-supply as may seem proper." Mr. Jackson urged that in comparison with this the three card trick was an honest and open one.

Sir Henry Harrison, writing on the same occasion, had said:—"At the same time I submit that it is incorrect and injudicious to bring into prominence the compulsory character of it. What is primarily needed is 'enabling' legislation." Enabling legislation! These were the views of Sir Charles Elliott's advisers. Let us then see what Sir Charles Elliott himself had said. The only way of dealing with the man was to see whether his ordinary conduct was straight and above board. On page 1325 he had said: "There seems to be a general agreement of opinion that special legislation is necessary, but it is thought that the draft suggested in my note would bring into prominence the compulsory character of it. This criticism is, I think, a sound one." That is the modest remark of the Lieutenant-Governor. In dealing with a man like that he was sorry to say that he could not believe that Sir Charles Elliott had been in any way misled. He had simply, as a matter of fact, taken his own course from beginning to end. The speaker continued, "You have got to remember this, that throughout the whole of Calcutta and Bengal in particular, they hate you. In the first place as a matter of fact the Simla clique hate you, because in the present you form a majority of the people who succeed in competition for the Civil Service. It is no use disguising these things. They live in a place where no breath of public opinion ever reaches them and it is thus that they think that they can simply override everything. If your newspapers comment upon anything that they may do, the very fact is looked upon as an insult. It is people of this class who come down here with the intention that in every act that they do with regard to Bengal precisely the same course shall be adopted. As far as this great province is concerned, if you are to be confined to Civilian Lieutenant-Governors in the future they should be men who have lived in the province and no one else."

A man unaccustomed to this province forgets that the atmosphere here is different, and you have always some fads brought from one province to another. How many meetings for instance in Bombay have they ever had about anything? This is in every sense the metropolis of India, (applause) and, as a matter of fact, we go into matters of any kind, we express our opinion with the utmost freedom, and all these people cannot understand it. It is a matter that they hate and detest, and they think that, with the aid of these two working here, they will be able to carry it out.

Sir George Campbell, you will remember, was going on introducing fad after fad (applause)—Bengal municipalities—but the reins of Government were in a firm hand, and he was completely snuffed out by Lord Northbrook. In one year Sir George Campbell was on his way to England. At the present moment if we had a ruler who would take upon himself the discharge of his duties, the chances are that there would never have been any agitation at all or anything to speak about now.

They want to climb down, but they wish to climb down still adhering to the case with regard to capital punishment. You cannot give in on this point. If you do, you will stand stultified before the people of England. The mode in which the question has been dealt with is absolutely ridiculous. Who has ever heard of a system by which all cases in which Government is interested—treason and felony, cases of murder, everything in which the peace and tranquillity of a district are concerned—are left to be disposed of by Government? Government does not care how those cases are decided in which it is not interested. The fact of the matter is that it was not intended as anything else than as a slap at you. The Notification has been issued with such precipitancy that, as a matter of fact, it does not touch abatement of murder, and no attempt has been made to discriminate between certain offences.

With regard to the statement that juries are disinclined to return a verdict of guilty in capital cases, no Judge was compelled to sentence any man to death for murder. It was an entirely optional thing with him. Any man who chose to say "I have religious convictions against sentencing a man to death for offence of murder is justified by the law. The only case in which he had no choice was under the terms of Section 303 referring to murder by a person under sentence of transportation of life. It is true that if they imported into the Criminal Procedure Code a provision by which in any case where the Judge does so state he must give his reasons, he presumed what would be done would be this: The Lieutenant-Governor would discover that the services of that man would be wanted in another place. If, as a matter of fact, the prejudices of juries are due to the penalty of death, then in that respect they are also due entirely to the Judges who are always passing these sentences because by the law they are entitled not to pass them if they like.

On one occasion when this matter came on for discussion, Mr. Jackson had said to a very ardent supporter of the Government, one of the authors of these very minutes, "Would you be tried by any Civilian or any other Judge on the Bench?"—"Oh no," he said, "that is quite a different case."

The speaker continued: "I think, gentlemen, with regard to a matter of this kind that everything justifies us in the agitation which at present is going on. Agitate, not merely for the revocation of this Notification but in time to come for the finality of the verdict. This constant going backwards and forwards is of little good with regard to the State at large and is perfect death to the unfortunate man who is the subject of these numerous trials.

Holloway's Pills.—This cooling Medicine has the happiest effect when the blood is overheated and a tendency to inflammatory action is set up in the system: one Pill taken shortly before dinner does away with the indigestion, fulness, and flatulency—indications of a weak stomach or disordered liver. A few Pills taken at bedtime act as alteratives and aperients; they not only relieve the bowels but regulate every organ connected with them, overcome all acrid humours, and encourage a free supply of all the secretions essential to our well-being. Holloway's Pills thoroughly cleanse and perfectly regulate the circulation, and bestow a feeling of comfort in hot climates and high temperatures, which is most desirable for preservation of health.

ASRUKANA is a collection of poetical pieces of singular pathos and beauty of expression * * * It is a series of mournful songs that the reader is here presented with and they must touch a sympathetic cord in every heart that can feel. There is a singular appropriateness in the title of the work and in its pious dedication to the memory of the husband of the fair writer.—The Indian Nation.

Bengal should be proud of this poem.—The Calcutta Review.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

THE HAUNTED CASTLE.

ONCE upon a time I pondered,
Musing on things high and deep,
As my castle halls I traversed—
Lofly tower and donjon-keep.

Here, I cried, all is familiar ;
Many a year I've owned this place ;
Yet, methinks, some closer searching
Unknown mysteries might trace.

When I know each lofty chamber,
Pillared hall and shadowy cell ;
Yet, it may be, there are corners
Where dark things unnoticed dwell.

Here are galleries of beauty,
Where the glorious sunbeams fall ;
There are corridors expansive,
Tenanted by ghosts in thrall.

Haply yonder winding staircase
Leads to chambers unexplored ;
I would fain, my lamp re-trimming,
See what chattels there are stored.

What is here—a secret panel ?
Never this my gaze hath met ;
And I, pausing on the threshold,
Hesitate to enter yet.

Oft I've passed this very doorway ;
Smooth and perfect seemed the wall ;
But the lamplight, faint and waning,
Glanced not where the shadows fall.

Courage, Soul ! why so reluctant ?
Press the spring and enter in.
Ah, what fearful revelation
Meets my gaze—a Secret Sin !

Sorely is my spirit troubled
By this unexpected sight ;
But this most unwelcome inmate
Must be dragged forth to the light.

What, another—and another !
This must be the haunted room !
Hark ! I hear the spectres pleading
For a respite from their doom :

'Truly you mistake our nature ;
False intruders we are not.
Let us dwell in peace and quiet
In this dim secluded spot.

'Know that all our names are noble—
Self-reliance ; Dignity ;
Moral Worth ; Religious Duty ;
Prudence ; Zeal ; and Clemency.'

'False !' I cried, 'are all these titles.
Will they bear the searching light ?'
Then I turned the lamp full on them,
And they cowered with affright.

One by one they shrank and quivered
'Neath the fiercely blazing flame,
And I read upon each spectre,
Writ in fire—its real name :

Self-reliance was Presumption ;
Dignity, a proud flesh-worm ;
Moral Worth, Self-exaltation ;
And Religious Duty, Form ;

Prudence proved Convenient Falseness ;
Zeal, false energy, self-need ;
Clemency, a Sin Defender.
How I shuddered as I read !

Quickly then from out its scabbard
Forth my Spirit-sword I drew,
And this band of vile impostors
With its double edge I slew :

Cast them out, and cleansed the chamber,
Letting in a fresher air ;
And lo, seven other spirits—
Pure and lovely—entered there !

In that cell a lamp now burneth
With a light that ne'er shall cease ;
And the erewhile haunted chamber
Is a home of joy and peace.

ELIZABETH ROWBOTHAM.

THE SONG'S ERRAND.

O SONG ! go greet her whom I may not greet,
My tender thoughts outpour ;
Tell her that though so far apart we be,
I do remember evermore.

Ask her, O Song, if she hath quite forgot
That far-off, golden noon ;
'Twas the year's sweetest season, and my heart
Throbbled to the passionate heart of June.

Down in the garden where the birds and bees
Revelled, I wandered long ;
Till on mine eyes there fell the fairest sight,
And on mine ears the sweetest song.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given, any other being unnecessary and likely to cause confusion.

I gazed into the depths of wondrous eyes,
I clasped a soft white hand ;
And Love awaked, and a diviner air
Breathed low upon the sea and land.

And then I knew that Love transfigures yet,
As in the days of old :
The world was fair, and we were young—O Song,
Such hours are lived, but never told !

She dwelleth calm amid her cloistered shades—
I tread life's busy mart ;
She dreameth not, in murmuring prayers to Heaven,
Of restless head and weary heart.

O Song, 'tis summer, and the roses blow
Where winter's snow hath lain ;
But tell her, tell her that life's June of love
Will never come to me again.

HUGH LINDSAY.

WEEKLYANA.

THE news of news this week is the following by telegraph :—

"London, December 28.

The Times deprecates the withdrawal of trial by jury in India in the teeth of the very decided movement on the part of the natives against such withdrawal, and in the absence of any demand for it on the part of unofficial Europeans.

The Times goes on to say that it is unable to discover in the Government statistics any evidence whatever of the defeat of justice resulting from trial by jury. It declares our ideas of personal and political liberty to be identical, and that the withdrawal or restriction of trial by jury is only possible upon production of indisputable proofs that the system has been so perverted by extraneous influence as to have failed in attaining the primary objects aimed at, and rendering their attainment impossible."

THE eighth Indian National Congress opened on Tuesday, the 29th December, at 1 P.M., in the great pandal erected in the grounds of Lowther Castle. About a thousand delegates were present and more were coming in.

A great crowd of visitors thronged the visitors' galleries. The arrangement inside the pandal was excellent. Pundit Bishamber Nath, Chairman of the Reception Committee, read the address of welcome to the delegates, concluding with calling upon them to elect a president for the session. Rao Bahadur Ananda Charlu, of Madras, proposed, and Mr. D. E. Wacha, of Bombay, seconded that Mr. W. C. Bonnerjee be asked to preside. This was carried amidst great cheering.

The President then delivered a ringing address for two-and-a-half hours.

The various secretaries of districts were then asked to elect members to form the Subject Committee.

A SEPOY, Dhan Singh by name, put the muzzle of a rifle to the stomach of his Havildar while he was asleep, and fired ; he then ran amok, and getting under a bridge 300 yards from the native lines, commenced firing at all who showed. He then fixed his bayonet, and commenced promenading up and down, when a corporal's guard advanced to arrest him. While parleying, a brave sepoy dressed as a villager, rushed from behind and pinned the murderer's arms, when he was overpowered and arrested.

NAWAB Mehdi Ali Khan, of Hyderabad, has been lecturing his countrymen in Urdu at Chudderghat. His subject was the relation of religion to science. He held that science is not compatible with dogmatic religion, though it is with that natural or divine religion, the germs of which are to be found in the breast of every human being, whether white or black, red or brown, and that, as science must be true, it is so much the worse for the religion that is not compatible with it. He rejoined to think that Islam was among the least dogmatic of creeds. He, therefore, thought it strange that, during the last five hundred years in which Christendom has made such startling progress in science, there has been little movement amongst Mahomedan nations.

ASTROLOGY in England has not only its almanacs but also its periodical press. There is an Astrological Magazine which lately asked Mr. Gladstone to furnish, if he could, the precise hour of his birth on the 29th December. The great statesman promptly responded saying that he could not, but had heard that it was about breakfast time. Mr. Sala reminds the readers of the Englishman that Sir John Falstaff was more precise touching the chronology of his nativity—"about three of the clock in the afternoon."

AT Colombo, a woman was charged with stealing a "cock bird," and found guilty by the Magistrate of theft of a "fowl," but the more curious eye of the Supreme Court discovered a confusion of sexes. Such an error is bad in law as well as in grammar. The "cock" of the charge proved to be a "hen." The accused was discharged.

THE Governor has ordered English as the language of the Madras City Civil Court.

IT is said that the Governor-General of Portuguese India "has notified his intention to abstain from reading any newspapers published within his jurisdiction, and will return all that may be sent to him with an intimation to that effect." That is like Portuguese enlightenment at the end of the 19th century.

A SPLENDID example to misers has just been left in his will by a successful Scotch publisher. The late Thomas Nelson, publisher, Edinburgh, of Thomas, Nelson & Sons, Edinburgh, London and New York, was able and willing to provide, by a trust disposition and settlement, for the following charities :—

New Shelter Halls in poor districts in Edinburgh	...	£50,000
Free Church of Scotland	...	10,000
Royal Infirmary of Edinburgh	...	5,000
National Bible Society of Scotland	...	1,000
Edinburgh Medical Missionary Society	...	1,000
Edinburgh Sabbath Free Breakfast Mission	...	250
Edinburgh Society for the Relief of the Destitute Sick	...	250
Edinburgh Association for Incurables	...	200
Edinburgh Royal Blind Asylum and School	...	100
Edinburgh Deaf and Dumb Benevolent Society	...	100
Edinburgh Institution for the Relief of Incurables at their Own Homes	...	100
Edinburgh Carruthers Close Mission	...	100
Edinburgh City Mission	...	100
Fund for the Relief of Indigent Gentlemen in Scotland	...	100

£68,300

THE other testamentary dispositions are :—

"£5,000 per annum to his wife, but in the event of her entering into a second marriage the annual payment to her is to be restricted to £2,500. These sums are to be inclusive of, and not in addition to the £600 secured to her under their contract of marriage. She is also to have the use for life of his house, St. Leonards ; £50,000, upon trust, for each of his daughters for life, and then for their descendants as they shall appoint, but with power to confer upon any husbands who may survive them the income of £10,000 ; £50,000 to each of his sons, payable on their respectively attaining twenty-five ; £20,000 each to his sisters Mrs. Anne Brown, Mrs. Margaret Adams, and Miss Jessie Nelson ; £20,000, upon trust, for his brother James Nelson for life, and then for his said three sisters equally ; £2,000 each to his nieces and nephew, Mrs. Mary Evelyn Annandale, Mrs. Catherine Florence Macleod, Miss Heta Edith Nelson, Miss Alice Maud Nelson, and William Frederick Inglis Nelson, the children of his late brother William Nelson ; £2,000 to Mrs. Catherine Nelson, the widow of his said late brother ; and £250 each to George Watson and Robert F. McEwen if they shall accept the office of trustee. The rest, residue, and remainder of his whole means, estate, and effectable and movable, real and personal, of whatsoever nature or denomination and wheresoever situated, is to be held for his sons equally, and to be paid to them on their respectively attaining the age of twenty-five years. Full powers are given to the trustees, if he has not formed one in his life time, to form a jointstock company (limited) for the purpose of taking over and carrying on the publishing business of Thomas Nelson and Sons, of Edinburgh, London, and New York, which belonged exclusively to the deceased, and upon the younger of his two sons attaining the age of twenty-five years the trustees are to transfer to them, equally, the shares, debentures, and mortgages of the said company, which they shall then hold, in so far as they may not be required to provide the annuity for his wife."

If anything can atone for the sin of morbid acquisitiveness, it is such contingent liberality.

A RICH story is told of the horribly rich man who has just left his forty crores to take care of themselves while he went on the Great Journey "for good":—

"His minister came to him one morning and said to him: 'Mr. Gould, I am a poor man and I have a large family. I have managed to put by 10,000 dol., and if I could double it, I should not be anxious about the future of my family if I were called away.' 'Minister,' said Mr. Gould, 'I will tell you how to do so provided that you will tell no one else;' and he advised him to purchase largely of this particular stock for a rise. The minister did so, and the stock was in great demand. But a month or two afterwards the market price fell heavily. Again the minister called on Mr. Gould, 'I am ruined,' he said; 'you have deceived your pastor.' 'Pastor,' replied Mr. Gould, 'I told you to keep my advice a secret. Did you do so?' 'Well,' said the minister, 'I did mention it to a few of our elders.' 'So I thought you would,' said Gould, 'and I have got off the whole of the stock that I held on them and their friends; here are your 10,000 dol. back, and here are 10,000 more for your trouble in the matter.'"

IN the Calcutta Gazette of the 14th December, the Local Government appointed Mr. T. W. Richardson, sub pro tem. Under-Secretary to the Government of Bengal, in the General, Revenue and Statistical Departments, to act as Registrar of Parsee Marriages beyond the local limits of the ordinary civil jurisdiction of the High Court, in addition to his own duties. This week's gazette announces the appointment, by the Chief Justice, of the same gentleman for the same duty within the local limits of the ordinary original civil jurisdiction of the Court, also "in addition to his own duties." So Mr. Richardson is now an all round recording angel of Parsee matrimony.

BY the way, this gentleman occupies an interesting position. A sub pro tem. Under-Secretary is the ideal "little man dressed in brief authority," &c., who, if not quite an angel himself, is able to distress angels. He is the missing link in Bureaucracy, between the Great Unwashed and Uncovenanted and the recognised Heaven-born.

AT Malaga, on December 7, Francisca Pino, suspecting Soledad Ruiz, a young woman, of being intimate with her husband, waylaid and stabbed her, inflicting with a large knife a deep wound in the neck, which afterwards proved fatal. Such is the green-eyed monster—and as bad in the West as in the East.

OUR OWN NEWS.

THE chief European news since our last is the diabolical attempt in Ireland to intimidate authority. On Saturday the 24th December, it was known at Dublin that the Liberal Government had refused to release Daly, the Fenian. That very night a dynamite explosion occurred outside the Detective office in Dublin, situated directly under the library in the Chief Secretary's office and close to the Castle. Luckily, Mr. John Morley was not in his library. The poor detective on duty was torn to pieces out of life.

An Ameaican named Kevans, who was arrested on the night of the 27th at Nenagh, in Tipperary, is suspected of being connected with the outrage.

FURIOUS fighting has been going on in the French Chamber. On the evening of Friday se'nnight M. M. Floquet and Rouvier were assailed by a violent storm. They both stoutly denied touching the Canal gold. The former had come to know as Premier that immense sums were being lavished on the Press and he intervened to prevent the demoralization of the Republican Press. M. Rouvier gave Warren Hastings' explanation. He had simply saved the Republic by drawing money from private sources for the Secret Service Fund. Arrests are being made and important public men are in alarm.

A letter copying book has been seized in the office of the Panama Canal Company implicating numerous Senators and Deputies as dishonest receivers of large sums.

On Saturday, a vote of confidence in the Government was passed in the Paris Chambers.

Meanwhile, a Boulangist plot seems hatching in France.

THE express speed of our Lieutenant-Governor has somewhat abated. On Tuesday, the Bengal Government made over to the Home Department the Memorial against the Jury Notification adopted at the Town Hall meeting on the previous Tuesday. We hear Sir Charles Elliott is surprised at some of the statements made in the document. He has taken some pains to rebut them. Since the publication of the Notification, Sir Charles had been collecting statistics from various quarters in its justification. Indeed, after the public condemnation from all sides which greeted the Notification, His Honour took seriously to the study of the question. Since the public criticism evoked by his Gazette Extraordinary of the 10th November containing the justificatory official papers, he has devoted his whole acute mind to the subject. Alas! it is all Love's Labour Lost. No investment in Chubb's Patent will recover the purloined horse!

THE Government of India have given their decision on the representation of counsel for the defence in the Ulwar murder case. Only the sentence of death pronounced upon Akhai Singh, the hired assassin, has been commuted to penal servitude for life: but with the sentences passed upon the other prisoners the Government of India decline to interfere. Major Ramchunder will pay for his crime on the gallows. Government scout the plea that the command of a Native Ruler can extenuate an abominable crime.

THEY are all going to Babylon the Great. This time it is Kupperthala's turn. The Lieutenant-Governor of the Panjab has sanctioned the Raja's grand tour through the world, and will probably lend him the services of Colonel C. H. T. Marshall to accompany him, for which His Highness has applied. The party will, we believe, take in America before proceeding to Europe, and will remain abroad for six months. His Highness will doubtless look in at some of the ports in China and Japan. Why should he neglect Australia? As he is not to have another opportunity in his short life, we would recommend South America also, which is likely to come home to Indians of the East better than the noisy bounding life of the energetic Teutonic settlements. In North America not the least interesting would be a visit to Canada, a British dependency, with its French population, its old English, Scotch, and Irish emigrants, its "gentlemen choppers," its class feuds, its chequered and tumultuous history, its extraordinary fertility, its cheap living, and, lastly, its memories of some of our own greatest and best Viceroys.

NO more native Vice-Chancellor of the Calcutta University! The choice of a successor in the Vice-Chancellery to Dr. Justice Gurudas Banerjee has fallen on Mr. Justice J. Q. Pigot, B.A. Indeed, so urgent is the demand for this gentleman that he is first created a fellow and then appointed Vice-Chancellor. A lucky fellow! Some fellows indeed are so lucky! Poor Sir John Phear, who from a Cambridge don proved one of the best Judges of the Bengal High Court, was, after years of activity as an educationist within and without the governing body of the University—to the extent of supporting schools out of his private purse—repeatedly passed over, until it became plain that the Government of India—or rather the miserable clique of officials who have the ear of the Viceroy—would never make him the Vice-Chancellor, when he threw up his barren fellowship in disgust. We trust the Vice-Chancellor elect will justify the extraordinary rage in his favour. He is, we believe, a Trinity Collegeman of Dublin. These Dubliners are all of the right stuff.

THE Hindoo Patriot shews enterprise. This morning it is in a position to publish the confidential letter No. 4675J., dated the 21st December 1891, from Mr. H. J. S. Cotton, Officiating Secretary to the Government of Bengal, to the Secretary to the Government of India, Home Department, referred to in the India letter of the 25th August, 1892, approving of the proposed action of the Bengal Government in the Jury business. From this letter, it appears that Sir Charles Elliott was wroth that the third batch of prisoners in the Shambazar riot case were let off by the Judge on the unanimous verdict of not guilty by the Jury. The Bengal Government had taxed the Judge for not referring the case to the High Court under section 307 of the Criminal Procedure Code. Mr. Rampini had taken time after the verdict of the Jury to consider the course he should take, and decided to set free the prisoners. Mr. Cotton in the letter informs the Supreme Government that in the course of confidential correspondence on that trial, between the Judge and the Bengal Government, the Judge had "explained that he was actuated by the belief that the verdict of the Jury being unanimous, it was useless to hope that the High Court would reverse it." Hence the necessity for the change of the law suggested.

And this sort of confidential communication with the judiciary the Lieutenant-Governor permits himself to indulge in! Matters have come to a sorry pass indeed when executive officers, how high soever, can demand such explanations of Judges and when Judges can submit to such confessional. We wonder whether Lord Lansdowne has anything to say to such an anti-British departure.

MR. Justice Collins fined the High Sheriff of Hampshire, Sir Henry Tichborne, Bart., five hundred guineas for absenting himself at the Winchester Assizes to go on a visit to South Africa, without leave of the Court. The Judge thought that the High Sheriff as a great officer, charged with the administration of the law, should be the last to set an example of disobedience. Mr. Justice Collins, however, did not feel confident that the punishment would be upheld, though he had taken every available advice before awarding it. Even for an English baronet, 500 guineas seems to our mind excessive for a first offence of omission. The fine will, we believe, be reduced if not remitted altogether—after Sir Henry has undergone the expense and trouble of an appeal.

HERE is as singular an instance of judge-made law as we have ever known. At the same Assizes, before the same Judge, Charles Ashby, a fireman in the Royal Navy, and Amy, his first wife, were each charged with bigamy. They had been married in March 1887. It did not turn out a happy union, and they separated—in peace. The husband went abroad, after having, by a deed dated the 1st September 1891, made over the wife to one Willis for the consideration of £30. Having thus successfully and with rare prudence and profit disposed of "my Amy, mine no more," Ashby opened negotiations in other quarters, and finally had another—Fall. He had informed his new mate of his first wife and produced the deed of sale for her satisfaction. His luck in this regard followed him to the very dock of the criminal court. For the Judge too was satisfied, inasmuch as no one was deceived, and ordered the prisoners to enter into recognisances to come up for judgment when required. That is more like a good old Kadi of the olden times than a British Judge.

The main circumstances of the case are not, we are afraid, so uncommon as we are taught to think. In the face of such revelations, it is vain for Englishmen to complain of the belief, so prevalent on the Continent and in America, that the lower orders in Great Britain sell their wives. The myth of the Lord Mayor annually holding an auction of British girls, is no doubt exceedingly foolish and betrays stupendous ignorance of British law and constitution and the state of society in Great Britain within these three centuries. But the absurdity can scarcely be said to be without foundation.

CHARMED with the music of an itinerant guitar thrummer and music-hall singer, the wife of a rich Maltese merchant in Algeria left her home and husband to follow the fortunes of her charmer. For her friends and kinsmen it was a case of mysterious disappearance, and so it remained. Gradually she came to be advertised as "La Belle Zerrada," the danseuse who was eagerly sought after during the last Paris Exhibition. But they never suspected it was she. She has now been miraculously restored to her own. Recently, while walking along the Place de l'Italie, in Paris, the disconsolate husband caught the strains of some Arab music. Led by natural curiosity to trace the familiar sound to its source, he entered the booth of a mountebank, and to his horror found his lost wife dancing on the stage to the music that had attracted him there. He rushed to clasp her in his bosom. A fight between him and her present protectors followed. She fainted. The Police were called in. Both the parties, with the living treasure-trove, were taken to a commissary, who, without British circumlocution, there and then ordered the return of the wife to the husband.

WHO would look for fun in a law periodical? The Deccan Budget has actually found it in the last Indian Jurist—in the following gentle passage-at-arms between the editor and a correspondent:—

"SIR,—In your last you have affixed the letters S. J. to Mr. Joseph's name, meaning no doubt 'Sessions Judge,' but unfortunately you have set them apart as standing for 'Society of Jesus.' Does it not verge on libel to call that learned Judge a 'Jesuit'?"

OUTIS.

Kurnool, 14th November, 1892.

"[We are not afraid that the learned Judge in question will object to being briefly described as 'S. J.,' or 'D. J.,' until he becomes 'C. J.' In many instances the meaning to be attached to an abbreviation depends upon its surroundings. Thus: 'W. C.' stands for 'West Central' when written on an envelope under 'London.' In other places this abbreviation usually stands for something else.—ED. J. J.]"

One of our underlings, to give another case, received some letter for us and signed the receipt, putting after his name the initials, "B. C. S." Asked whether he was a competitionwallah or a statutorywallah he answered that he was neither this wallah nor that wallah, but only a Bill Collecting Sircar. That silenced all objection. The poor man's right to the distinguished letters is as good as that of any heaven-born Hoozoor.

GREAT wits jump together, it is said. So despots, great and small, with or without concert. At any rate, it is a singular coincidence that at the same time both the Autocrat of All the Russias and the Satrap of all the Provinces comprised under the Government of Bengal, were meditating a crushing blow on the popular institution of Trial by Jury in their respective territories. The more impatient of the two took less time to make up his mind. The Bengal ukase appeared on the 26th October, giving the country just five days' notice to bury the Jury system and all its belongings and associations and turn a new leaf. By the 1st of November all was over with the old procedure and the people were expected to enjoy the rare felicity of all offences and crimes being disposed of by an infallible judiciary of foreigners who lived among themselves, isolated from the native inhabitants whose language they do not know. The Czar consumed the greater part of the same month, and it was not till the last week of November that His Majesty's Jury Notification was issued.

THE Maharaja of Mysore has been on a visit to the metropolis since the 20th of this month. The Viceroy is shewing marked attention to His Highness. He is a most intelligent, quiet, and courteous prince and those who have come in contact with him speak highly of his condescending manners. He went to the races on two occasions in the Viceroy's company, and his plain and simple costume and his pleasing behaviour were much admired by the crowds assembled at the Race stand. Among the Native Chiefs of India, the Maharaja stands second in rank, (the first being the Nizam of the Deccan), with an annual income of a crore and half. The Prime Minister, Mr. Sheshadri Iyer, who accompanies his Chief, himself draws a monthly salary of Rs. 5,000.

Mr. Iyer is a B. A. of the Madras University and an officer of great ability. In his administration, under the immediate and active guidance of the Maharaja, the important innovation inaugurated by His Highness of a Council of representatives from various parts of the state assembling at the capital of Mysore yearly to discuss questions of vital interest to all classes of the population, has been nourished and is taking root. In fact, Mysore is now considered the model native state in India, and we congratulate His Highness for having brought the state to that condition. We wish him a happy New Year, and trust that he may fully enjoy his visit to this city of Palaces and return home with pleasant memories of the capital of the Empire.

WITHIN the last few days three Mahomedan gentlemen of high position in the North West, have come down to Calcutta on a short visit. They are Nawabs Sufdar Ali Khan Bahadur, and Hyder Ali Khan Bahadur, (a prominent member of the Rampore Family in Rohilkhand,) and Mirza Mahomed Abbas Bahadur, a Statutory Civilian and Assistant Commissioner of Hurdul in Oudh. Mirza Abbas is the only son of the late Mirza Agha Ali Khan, alias Aghai Sahib, who was for many years the Nazim (Commissioner) of the Chucklah of Sultanpore in the reign of the late Wajed Ali Shah. The father was of great help to the British in establishing their administration in Oudh, after the annexation and the Mutiny, and was in consequence held in great esteem by the authorities up to the time of his death which took place only 3 years ago.

OUR HYDERABAD COLUMN.

December 24.

THERE is great ferment at Hyderabad and everybody is on the tip-toe of expectancy. Some great changes in the administration are surely to take place at no great distant date. Constant consultations are being held in the palace as well as at the minister's residence and very wild and exaggerated rumours are afloat in the city of the coming changes in the personnel of the Hyderabad administration. Rumour says that Nawab Vicar-ul-oomra Bahadur, the Revenue and Military Moin-ul-Maham (Assistant to the Minister) is to be made Naib Dewan, and that the late Peishkar's maternal grandson, Raja Kishan Prasad Bahadur, is to succeed the Vicar-ul-oomra as Revenue and Military assistant to the minister, that the posts of the remaining three Moin-ul-Mahams are to be done away with altogether, or their number is to be reduced to two. They say that Nawab Mohsin-ul-Mulk Bahadur is to be made Chief or General Secretary and that Mokhtadir Jung Bahadur, the Suba of Aurangabad, and Mr. A. J. Dunlop, the Inspector-General of Revenue, are jointly to conduct the duties of the Revenue Secretariat to the Minister. It is known for certain that a European gentleman is to be appointed as Controller-General of the Hyderabad State and that he will in future exercise a strict supervision over the finances of this poor plundered state. They say that Nawab Mohsin-ul-Mulk's appointment as Chief or General Secretary is much dreaded throughout the whole of His Highness's dominions, he being the most lavish and aggressive Secretary this poor State has ever had. I am afraid he is awfully unpopular in the city and throughout the dominions and very much distrusted by the officials of the State. It is also whispered that Nawab Imad-ul-Mulk Bahadur (Syed Hossain Belgrami) will shortly retire on pension. It is in the air that certain outsiders from Bombay or Calcutta will be put in charge of high posts. It is high time that something like this be done, as the protégés of Sir Syed Ahmed Khan have signally failed. The general impression is that it is owing to their administration that outsiders are being pitchforked into places right and left and that they have made the administration of the state three times more expensive than it was under Sir Salar Jung I. It is believed the state is in debt over head and ears, and should Sir Syed Ahmed Khan's protégés continue any longer in power the administration is sure to be taken over by the British Government on account of the embarrassed state of the finances.

THIS year the races have attracted very large crowds at the race stand, and particularly on Monday the 26th instant, when the Viceroy's Cup was run for, there was hardly moving space in the extensive grounds of the stand. From the strange faces seen on that occasion, it was evident that an unusually large number of European ladies and gentlemen have come into Town from the Mofassil, during Christmas week, and also a goodly number from Europe.

The race for the Viceroy's cup was a splendid one. The winner was "Highborn," owned by the Maharajah of Cooch Behar. Showers of congratulations from his numerous friends for his good luck poured upon the Maharaja, who was present at the spot.

THE first general social gathering of the season took place in the Belvedere grounds yesterday in the afternoon. Sir Charles and Lady Elliott played the part of host and hostess with great courtesy and affability. The Viceroy and the Marchioness of Lansdowne honored the garden party with their presence and stopped there for about three quarters of an hour. A very large number of European ladies and gentlemen and native gentlemen were present, and it was evident that they all enjoyed this opportunity of meeting old friends and making new acquaintances. Almost all the prominent members of both the European and Native communities were there. Many distinguished strangers could also be seen, such as the Maharaja of Mysore and Admiral Kennedy.

WE learn from letters from Hyderabad, that one of the chief topics of the day there is the expected examination of the Prime Minister on behalf of the defence in the Pamphlet Scandal case. Sir Asman Jah is trying his best to avoid appearing in Court, but it is not yet known whether the Counsel for the defence will so easily let him off. Our information is, that if the Court will summon him to give his evidence, the Nizam will not stand in the way. It was at the instance of Sir Asman Jah, instigated by Mushtak Hossain, that His Highness was reluctantly induced to give his evidence in the Diamond case. How could he consistently refuse to give his Minister permission to appear in a case in which his evidence might be of vital interest to the defence? If His Excellency is ultimately compelled to give evidence, fearful exposures are likely to be made in the hands of Mr. Norton, which will conclusively prove to the world the rottenness of His Excellency's administration.

"ENGLISH Preparatory Course with Notes," is the title of a neatly got up, handy and small-priced text book in English, just brought out by Babu Saradaprasad Banerjee, well known as a Headmaster of over thirty years' experience, and for some time a Professor of English in the Metropolitan Institution. The selections are both in Prose and Poetry, after the manner of the University Entrance Course, the writers laid under contribution being all classical but modern. The chief aim of the compiler has been to place before the young learners, from standard authors, writings characterised above all by simplicity of style, and one can conceive the pains it must have cost him in carrying out this object. For this is a genuine selection—not a perfunctory collection of random materials. Baboo Saradaprasad is not only a successful schoolmaster—his early success at Narail was phenomenal—but he is, what few schoolmasters are, a ready, correct and forcible writer. Accordingly, in compiling this little book he was entirely in his element. Hence his success. The selections are unexceptionable, and the notes which are just by way of hints are likely to be a help not merely to the boys, but sometimes to their betters. The book is worthy of its author, and we believe it is destined to work its way into popular estimation as it fully deserves.

EVERY one will remember Burke's magnificent éloge on John Howard. That great man, who began life as an apprentice to a grocery, to use the eloquent words of the philosophical statesman,

"went forth through the world, not to survey the sumptuousness of palaces, or the stateliness of temples, not to make accurate admeasurements of the remains of ancient grandeur, not to collect medals or to collate manuscripts, but to dive into the depths of dungeons, to plunge into the infections of hospitals, to survey the mansions of sorrow and pain, to take the gauge and dimensions of human misery, depression, and contempt, to remember the forgotten, to attend to the neglected, to visit the forsaken, and to repress and ameliorate the distresses of all men in all countries. His plan is original, and is as full of genius as of humanity. It was a voyage of discovery, a circumnavigation of charity, and the benefit of it is felt more or less in every country."

A female Howard has arisen in a Miss Marsden, who has undertaken the mission to relieve lepers in the same way that Howard devoted himself to the mission to the victims of pre-Howard prison discipline. And as Howard travelled through Europe to acquaint himself with the condition of the prison population and was not satisfied till he had taken in in his survey the vast and as yet mostly untrodden empire of Russia, so his successor in benevolence has gone in quest of the sufferers from a loathsome disease to the ends of the earth as it were—to far Cathay. While a nurse to the wounded in the last war between Russia and Turkey, she came across two lepers, whose pitiable condition stirred the entire compassion of her nature in behalf of that class of miseries. She read and enquired and finally embarked on the mission of helping these poor waifs of the human family. Having heard at Constantinople of a Siberian herb for the cure of leprosy, she tried to procure it. Not succeeding, she resolved to go herself to fetch it from its habitat. Accordingly, she set out in search of the modern Golden Fleece, performing an arduous journey to the heart of North Asia, in the course of which she travelled in sledge and tarrantass no less than 14,000 miles and 2,000 on horse-back. After all her troubles and sacrifices, however, she was fortunate enough to find her Fleece: Unfortunately for her and the world, it proved silver rather than golden. The herb was not a myth, but it was a disappointment. It was no cure for the horrid disease. Yet its influence is good, relieving the poor sufferers. There, in Siberia, she discovered plenty of these. There is quite a colony of lepers who are pining away their days in misery and want. For sixty-four years they have been crying for help, but the great world of Christendom has not heard them. Miss Marsden has written a book which will be shortly out with a dedication by permission to the Queen. The proceeds will go to the mission. The good lady is trying to raise funds. She meditates for the purpose a lecturing tour in the United States.

HERE is a truly British tableaux vivants which we read in an English paper:—

"Ye Olde Englyshe Feste.—Great success attended the proceeding at the Manchester Hotel, Aldersgate-street, London, in connection with the revival of 'Ye Olde Englyshe Feste' in honor of Lord Mayor's Day. The meeting was largely due to the efforts of Mr. Newell, the courteous manager at the Manchester Hotel, whose happy suggestion it was that the election of Mr. Alderman Renals, as one of the sheriff, should be celebrated by the revival of this time-honoured custom. The company numbered about 250, a very large proportion being of the gentler sex, and the proceedings were of a most enjoyable character. Shortly before half-past six the procession, which was much more imposing than in former years, entered the banqueting room, and marched round the hall in the following order:—Captain of the Guard, Two Beefeaters, Dick Whittington, Sir John Falstaff, Simon the Cellarer, Assistant, the Jester, Chef de Cuisine, Kitchen Apprentices bringing in Tureens, Scullion bringing in Turtle Shell, Varlet bringing in Dish of Spratts, Two Cooks bringing in the Boars' Heads, the Court Chaplain, Baron of Beef and his servitors, Two Beefeaters, Pages, Two Cooks bringing in the Turkeys, Pâtissier with Plum Pudding, Two Apprentices with Gateaux, Varlet with Mince Pies, Baker with Monster Loaf, Page with Fruit. During the progress of the banquet an excellent selection of music appropriate to the occasion was played by the instrumental quartet in attendance. At the conclusion of the feast the procession of beefeaters, &c., was re-formed, the remains of the baron of beef being carried away, amid laughter and cheers, to the accompaniment of the Dead March in 'Saul.'"

Beef all over!—nothing but beef! And what wonder? Nothing like the Roast Beef of Old England—to the khas Englishman! He not simply relishes it but tenderly loves it. He not only lives on it, but he is ready to die for it. He dances in delirious joy at its sight. He smells it near and inhales it in the atmosphere far afar. He touches it, tastes it, cuts it and clips it and slices it, opens it with the knife, and admires its internal beauty, eats it and devours it. He hears of it, and thinks of it and meditates on its manifold perfections. He believes in Beef. He leaves to the Heathen Hindu to worship the fetish of the beef tree (so to say)—the cow, content himself to worship the fruit. In fine, the Briton cannot go beyond his baron—of beef. And here, in the above, is as good a proof as might be needed.

We are willing, as far as possible from our abstemious Hindu coign of advantage, to sympathise with the grotesque fun of this new celebration by the cits of Cockaigne, of the ridiculous old tamasha of the Lord Mayor's Day. We confess the apotheosis of the stomach and exaltation of meat and wine—in the absence of all allusion to the feast of reason and the flow of soul—strikes us as gross and animal. Still it is appropriate to the people at large, above all, as it now appears, to the Philistines of the City.

But the rites of the worship of creature comforts have been carried too far. Nothing can reconcile us to the desecration of the solemn music of the Dead March in Saul. That last act in the drama stamps the whole thing as bacchanalian orgies.

That effort of Cockney genius reminds us in the East of a historical demonstration in Delhi at the height of Mogul Power. When the stern Mahomedan Puritan on the throne, Aurungzebe, issued his fiat against singing and dancing as contrary to the law of Islam, the strolling players and low Bohemians and street Arabs of the capital led a coffin past the balcony of the Palace in procession, howling and crying and beating their breasts to attract the notice of the Emperor, who came out and enquired what the matter was, and was told that Music had been stabbed to death and they were carrying the corpse to give it decent burial. There was true art in that idea. But the poor unlettered mourners did not shock the highest associations connected with the solemn fact of death.

THE TRIALS OF TRIAL BY JURY IN BENGAL.

THE alleged justification for Sir C. Elliott's Jury Notification is that the system of trial by jury favors the escape of criminals. Judges and Juries have always been looked upon with abhorrence by executive Magistrates and others charged with the detection and prevention of crime. It is they who are systematically crying them down, saying that juries are partial and Sessions Judges do not convict on the clearest evidence. Such is the instinct of thief-catchers and criminal-hunters. But they have not unoften been proved false alarmists. Had the rulers at the helm been illiberal or weak, Juries would long since have been abolished. The measure was attacked no sooner it was inaugurated. In one case within a year or so of the introduction of the system in Bengal, we find the High Court writing to the Bengal Government that "the Commissioner for the Suppression of Dacoity should have refrained from imputing improper motives to any of the jury acquitting any of the dacoits committed by him unless he was prepared to substantiate his charges of undue influence in favor of the prisoner acquitted."

Hear now how a Sessions Judge was attacked and vilified for not convicting prisoners sent up by the Magistrate. The Government of Bengal cannot be ignorant how and why the report of a Tipperah Magistrate, the scion of a great Civilian House, on the Police administration of the district, was made the subject of special enquiry and how it ended to the entire discomfiture of the Magistrate. That functionary conceived that there was great increase in the number of murders, and attributed it to the impunity which grave criminals had invariably met with and to the excessive difficulty, even on apparently the clearest evidence, of obtaining a conviction before the Sessions Court. Heinous offenders of every kind, he observed, had escaped punishment during the past two years of his report, either on trial before the Court or as appellants. He had also remarked that there had been a large increase of the more heinous offences against property, which too he attributed to the same cause. The Judge resented this attack upon himself and applied to the High Court for redress. The Magistrate was called upon to justify his remarks. He at first refused to supply the statistics on which he had founded his opinion. He thought he was not bound to make good the remarks made in a privileged communication. Then he replied that his observations did not apply to the year just passed but to two antecedent ones. The Commissioner at last submitted an abstract of cases and appeals for the three years, which shewed that there were altogether 9 cases in the first year and 13 in the second, the two years to which the Magistrate's remarks were said to refer, and 8 cases in the third. There were no other cases which the Magistrate could possibly have based his remarks upon. But among the cases of the first two years there was not one of murder though there was one of dacoity and riot attended with murder, one of culpable homicide, two of causing miscarriage, and one of causing death by mis carriage, while of the more heinous offences against property, there was not a single case. It was found, in the sober official language, that the Magistrate's explanations accounting for the increase of murder, and of the more heinous offences against property, were insufficient, that he had no adequate grounds for imputing to the Judge either excessive leniency or a habit of acquitting in the face of evidence and, in a word, that no good and valid ground whatever existed for his remarks.

In the end the Magistrate was reprimanded and sent to another district. The Judge and the High Court were satisfied.

Whenever a verdict did not meet with the approval of any officer, the poor Jury system was to blame. But the good sense of the authorities had hitherto prevailed against clamour. In the course of the controversy which, from time to time, has been held on the subject, many interesting and even valuable opinions have been delivered. As they seem to have escaped Government, we will try to lay some of them before the public. Here is a remarkable opinion of no less a man than Sir George Campbell :—

"In my opinion trial by jury in criminal cases as an invariable rule of absolute right is incompatible with—first, a despotic administration, that is, a form of Government not politically free; and, second, a society composed of two or more classes or races not socially and politically homologated and amalgamated.

For it is of the nature of trial by jury that the jury exercise a practical power of occasionally overriding the law in a direction which they may consider equitable and expedient in the particular case, of in fact acquitting on the ground of 'served him right,' and when the laws are not made by the same popular class from which the jury is taken, such variations between the law and popular opinion are more frequent, and the equitable power of varying the law is inconsistent with the scheme of Government.

And when unamalgamated classes are living and dealing together, trial by jury is sometimes not trial by peers in the only sense in which trial by peers is proper, that is, when the jurymen are the peers of both parties, of the injured party and of the accused. When class questions arise between the two unamalgamated classes or races to try a man of one class for an offence connected with such a class question by a jury of his own class only is a course which cannot be depended on to lead to a fair result. Hence it may happen that, while the laws of the Governors forbid sutees or sacrifices to Kallee, the feeling of jurymen may be that such acts are not criminal, and they may acquit with or without pretexts, which would not otherwise have influenced them, and when on an Indigo question a native is tried by a jury of natives, or a European by a jury of Europeans, the impartial public may distrust the verdict as possibly more or less influenced by a class bias. Such a difficulty seems to be felt not only in the Nuddea Sessions Court but also in the Consular Courts of China and Japan.

On the other hand I have a strong opinion, which is, I think, fully borne out by the papers now before us, that if provision be made for exceptional cases the use of juries is most valuable, both to improve and popularise the administration of justice, and as a means of socially and politically raising and educating the people. The experience which we have of the system in Bengal seems undoubtedly to show that it has succeeded beyond the most sanguine expectations. Therefore I think that the proper remedy for the very few exceptional cases of wilful miscarriage which have occurred is to provide a special remedy for such cases, not to destroy or suspend the whole system either in all districts or in any district.

I observe that it has been proposed by some of my colleagues to suspend trial by jury in the Nuddea District. Now, so far as one can judge by the reports, that appears to be the very District in which the system has, generally speaking, worked most successfully. The reports and opinion of the intelligent Judge who presides over the Nuddea court were till recently altogether in favour of the system. The proposal for suspending the system in Nuddea appears to be founded on two cases only, in one of which there may possibly have been some pretext for doubt in the minds of the jury, while in the other there could scarcely have been any whatever; both were class cases connected with indigo; in both the jury were no doubt influenced by a class feeling.

Now, it seems to me that, if the whole system of trial by jury in a great district is to be suspended indefinitely on account of the occurrence of one or two cases of miscarriage, such suspension will from time to time occur in one district after another, and the fair working out of the system will be impossible. This remedy for such exceptional cases seems to me cumbrous and inconsistent with the system as a system, nor does it provide the means of meeting future difficulties of the same kind. I think that it is necessary to provide a permanent means of meeting such difficulties without crushing the whole system, and I venture to propose the following, viz., that by legislative enactment the High Court should be authorized, in any case in which it seems proper to do so, to order that the trial of a particular case shall not be by jury, but that the case shall be tried by a special court of three Judges, at least one of whom shall be of not less degree than Civil and Sessions Judge, and none shall be of less degree than Magistrate of a District, or Principal Sudder Ameen (provided that such Magistrate has not been concerned in preparing the case for trial,) that the verdict of such Court of three Judges, if unanimous, shall be final on questions of fact, if by a majority shall be open to appeal on questions of fact.

This rule would, of course, be inconsistent with the English idea of trial by jury as a political safeguard. It is in order to withdraw political cases from juries, and because in this country political cases ought to be withdrawn from juries, that I would give this power to the High Court. The court not being in any degree a political or an executive body, its exercise of this power would be free from the objections which might be made to the exercise of such a power in individual cases by the Government or by any executive authority. It would probably be but seldom necessary to exercise such a power so that the consequent pressure on judicial officers would be but slight, and when required such a tribunal as I propose could be very easily extemporised. The necessity of substituting such a tribunal would prevent the light withdrawal of cases from juries, and also prevent, in those advanced Districts in which trial by jury has been established, a recurrence to that most unsatisfactory tribunal, a Judge with Assessors. I cannot but think that a simple remedy for all difficulties might thus be provided and one of permanent operation. With such a safeguard I think that, after the favourable experience we have had, trial by jury might perhaps be extended to some other Districts and to some other offences. But this would depend on the supply of sufficiently qualified Judges.

With respect to the difficulties of detail in the working of the jury system, it is clear that a wrong conviction can be righted on the representation of the Judge. The danger consists in two cases, first, where an ill-qualified Judge, not doing his duty fairly and temperately, and expressing clearly and lucidly both sides of the case, impose on a subservient jury his own opinions, and thereby obtains, as the verdict of a jury, a conviction which is really his own, and thus shuts out appeal on the facts in the very case in which it is most required. Second, where the jury wrongly acquits. The first danger can be obviated by employing in jury districts only specially qualified and reliable Judges, a course which the Court has lately urged on Government. The second is to a certain extent a necessary evil of the jury system, but if provision be made for withdrawing the few special cases on which a political, religious, or class bias may be apprehended, I do not think that the evil will operate to such an extent as to weigh heavily against the advantages of the system.

I concur in thinking that the numbers of the jury should be reduced to five. The number to which the ancient traditions and customs of the country attach a peculiar judicial sanctity, making the jury in fact a Punchayat, and relieving the people from the too great burden of a public service which in its present shape is new to them. I also think that the radius for describing the jury area should be increased to, say, fifteen miles, and it is quite clear that most stringent measures are required to enforce a careful and accurate preparation of the jury lists."

HYDERABAD.

It must be fresh in the minds of all how, about the time of the Viceroy's advent in Hyderabad, the Nizam had asserted his authority by suddenly ordering the banishment of Mushtak Hosain and the suspension of Mehdi Hassan. Since then, the country has been plunged into the vortex of speculation and alarm. A feverish anxiety has been felt by everybody in the Deccan, as to what the result of all this is likely to be. Two things, however, bid the people hope that nothing but good is to come out of this coup d'état against the Mayor of the Palace. In the first place, it is a decisive proof of capacity and character that the Nizam should have at once realized the extent of his own power and asserted it. He has thus, on his own responsibility, in spite of the earnest and repeated protests of the Prime Minister, rescued the administration of his state from the hands of the two foremost men who had brought it to a condition of the greatest disorganization and disrepute. The next favourable circumstance in the connection was the Viceroy's arrival at Hyderabad at a most opportune moment, and giving His Highness most distinctly to understand what his real position, power and responsibilities are, and offering him every assistance which he may be in need of from the Supreme Government. The people of Hyderabad have, in a mass and in various ways, signified their satisfaction at the disgrace of the tyrants who had brought the administration to the worst possible condition, and they are praying to God Almighty for long life and prosperity to their chief, and for strength to effect such reforms in the Administration as may be beneficial to the country at large, and to the millions of His Highness's subjects. It is to be hoped that their rational anticipation is not doomed to disappointment.

Just now, it is a reign of suspense and uncertainty. There is even a suspension of vital functions, to a great extent. There is nothing or little doing. Sir Asman Jah was too notoriously identified with the disgraced Hassan and Hosain not to suffer from the blow which drove them from power and office. Willy nilly, he must share their fortune and fate. Notwithstanding the politic assurances of the Nizam to the contrary, he feels himself and his administration condemned in their condemnation. The foundation of the Pillar of State having been removed, how can it stand? Deprived of his leader, the blind man is condemned to inaction; he can at best only grope within the most limited area. It remains for the Nizam to end this unsatisfactory state of things. His Highness has unmistakably demonstrated that he is alive and awake, but he is not stirring right, in right earnest. He has just begun the good work but has stopped there. He has smashed the incompetent and unfaithful ministry, but has not yet removed the broken columns and carted away the debris. Still less has he given orders for a new edifice. At most, he has ordered a shanty or shed for temporary convenience.

Disappointing for the moment as is His Highness's attitude, it is not incapable of explanation. The formation of a new ministry is everywhere a difficult and delicate matter. In the Mussulman State of the Deccan, it is one of peculiar embarrassment. Just now a new element of delicacy has been accidentally introduced which may account for the hesitation of the Ruler. It is highly probable that the Nizam has not yet taken any steps for reorganization, pending the final decision in the Pamphlet Scandal case, which has been dragging its slow length along. This case most probably prevents the Prime Minister from resigning his post. In the absence of the only two men in whom he had extraordinary confidence, and who have been publicly disgraced, as well as in the consciousness that the Nizam is highly displeased with him for the disrepute into which he has brought the administration, Sir Asman Jah finds it exceedingly difficult to hold on. Both Master and Minister have good reasons to wait till the trial is over.

Just now, the Nizam must be at a loss to know how to introduce reforms, as he has no confidence either in his responsible ministers or in his personal advisers, including, we are afraid, his very Private Secretary. Having been studiously kept out of administrative details, he cannot possibly be expected to judge, from his own personal knowledge, what measures would be really beneficial to the state and to his subjects, or acceptable to the nobles. From information received from time to time, we find that the only man who has come to the fore in this crisis, is Nawab Surwar Jung, otherwise known as Agha Mirza Beg. He was one of the dozen or more of tutors of His Highness, during his minority. As Agha Mirza was not a creature of the high officials in power in either of the two administrations under Salar Jung II. and Sir Asman Jah, they did not give him an appointment in the administration, but granted him a large pension, after His Highness's pupilage had come to an end, and persistently kept him out of office.

This is the man who is believed at Hyderabad to possess the greatest influence with the Nizam, at the present moment, and whom His Highness has appointed to the post of Secretary in his household affairs. People think that the chief cause of Agha Mirza's rise is the great interest which he has tenaciously taken in the Scandal Pamphlet case, notwithstanding the extraordinary efforts made by the ministry to hush it up.

We are glad at Agha Mirza's coming into power. We do not know him but we remember his family. He comes of a fine stock. From all the accounts we have received, we are led to believe that he is a man of high character and decent ability. From the attitude this gentleman has so long maintained in the evil atmosphere of Hyderabad, there is every ground for hope that he will not abuse the confidence which the Nizam has placed in him. We have, nevertheless, our misgivings, and they arise from two considerations. One is that, having had no experience whatever in administration, Agha Mirza may fall into the hands of old intriguers whose advice he may be compelled to seek and by whom he may be misled into committing serious mistakes. The other is a general consideration that applies to all, more or less, namely, that the great temptations of power and absolute authority may prove irresistible. It is just possible that the exercise of such exalted office may turn his head and ultimately launch him into the same channel in which Mushtak Hosain came to grief.

Let us, however, for the sake of Agha Mirza himself as well as his Master, hope for the best. His birth and character are all in his favour. He is, besides, a man of intelligence and good parts, and if he only consults really good honest and able men and acts according to their advice, and, above all, according to his own pure instincts, there is little fear of his going astray.

He could not have forgotten the couplet in Sadi's Gulistan—Har ki Shah an kunad ki oo goyad, hyfe bāshad ki juz nekoo goyad, i. e., "the man, according to whose advice the sovereign acts, it is a matter of much regret if he says anything to the sovereign that is not good (for the King and his subjects)." If Agha Mirza only keeps the moral of this couplet as his guide, and says nothing to his chief which is not conducive to the good of the latter and his subjects, he is sure to earn a reputation that will raise him in the estimation of the whole world.

There can be no doubt whatever that no reorganization can take place in the administration, until there is a change of ministry, and if Sir Asman Jah has not himself the good sense to resign, after the exposures that have recently taken place, the Nizam ought to give him a broader hint, which he could not affect to miss. And then either of the two prominent noblemen, Sir Khursed Jah and Nawab Fukhrul Moolk, should be appointed Minister. The reorganization could then be made by the new Minister, with the full sanction of His Highness and to the entire satisfaction of the people. It will, in our opinion, be a great mistake, if any material changes in the details of the administration are made, while the present Minister is still in office. As sincere wellwishers of His Highness, we have ventured to offer him the above advice, and we are sure that a bright future awaits His Highness, if only he gives the lie to his enemies who have persistently proclaimed to the world that he is not only incompetent, but lazy and disinclined to work. We sincerely trust that as he has commenced, he will continue, taking a lively interest in ruling his kingdom.

THE JURY DESPATCH.

Government of India, Home Department (Judicial),
No. 32 of 1892, Calcutta, the 21st December 1892.

To the Right Hon'ble the Earl of Kimberley, K.G.,

Her Majesty's Secretary of State for India.

My Lord,—We have the honour to forward for your Lordship's information copies of the papers entered in the annexed Schedule relative to an enquiry which has recently been made into the working of the system of trial by jury before Courts of Session in this country.

2. The jury system prevails in Sessions Courts in India only in a comparatively small number of districts and in respect of particular classes of offences. Section 269 of the Code of Criminal Procedure of 1882, following in this respect the provisions of the Codes of 1861 (section 322) and 1872 (section 233), authorizes the Local Government to direct by order in the official gazette that the trial of all offences or of any particular class of offences shall be by jury in any district, and also to revoke or alter any such order from time to time as may be found necessary. Certain Local Governments have at various times taken action under the powers conferred by this section or the corresponding sections of previous Codes, and the result is that trial by jury now obtains in Sessions Courts in respect of a limited group of offences in the Madras Presidency generally, and in a few selected districts of Bengal, Assam, the North-Western Provinces and Oudh, and the Bombay Presidency. The system has not been introduced at all in the Punjab or the Central Provinces. In Burma it is in force only in the Recorder's Court at Rangoon and in the sea port town of Moulmein; it was introduced in Akyab in 1863, but was withdrawn from that town in 1875. The Province of Burma however was not included in the scope of our recent enquiry.

The enquiry did not extend to the working of the jury system in Presidency towns. All cases committed to the various High Courts are tried by jury under rules special to those Courts; and, so far as we are aware, the system in Presidency towns has worked with fair success. The remarks which follow have reference only to the jury system as carried out in Sessions Courts in the interior.

3. In 1884 the Government of Lord Ripon considered the advisability of urging the Provincial Governments to take more general action under the powers enabling them to extend the system of jury trials in Sessions Courts, but, after a careful review of the results, it was decided that it was not expedient to take any steps in this direction. The correspondence on the subject between the Bengal Government and the High Court, and the other officers in Bengal who were consulted, will be found in the Proceedings Volumes of that Government (Proceedings of the Bengal Government in the Judicial Department, for July 1884, pages 9—14. Proceedings in the Judicial Department, for October 1885, pages 197—210.) Mr. Peacock's letter No. 1924 J., dated the 17th July 1884, contains an interesting review of previous discussions and opinions down to 1872, when the Criminal Procedure Code of that year introduced the safeguards against improper verdicts which have since been continued. It will be seen that in their letter No. 1271, dated the 22nd April 1885, the High Court (three Honourable Judges dissenting) expressed a strong opinion that, for reasons given by them, the time had not arrived for any further extension of the system of trial by jury in the Lower Provinces. Among these reasons were (1) the difficulty of procuring proper persons as jurors, and the distaste for the duty shown by those whose services as jurors are especially desirable; (2) the prevalence of superstition and prejudice, which not unfrequently led to failures of justice; (3) the occasional perversity of jurors, instances of which had come to the notice of the Judges; and (4) the inability of the juries to grasp numerous details in complicated cases.

4. In 1888 our attention was drawn to the opinions expressed in some of the Provincial reports on the administration of the police and criminal justice that there had been a considerable increase of crime in late years, and under our orders an enquiry was made into the state of crime in the larger Provinces, the results of which were reported to your Lordship's predecessor with our Judicial Despatch No. 24, dated the 8th July 1890. It was alleged by several of the authorities consulted that the jury system had favoured the escape of criminals, and the inefficient working of the system was stated to be one of the causes of failure of justice.

We accordingly directed a special enquiry into this matter in our letters Nos. 740—745, dated the 31st May 1890 (enclosures Nos. 1 to 3 to this Despatch). We now forward copies of the replies which we have received from Local Governments (enclosures Nos. 4 to 11), and copies of the letters which, after considering these replies and the opinions of the Judges of the High Courts and local officers, we have addressed to the several Governments summing up our conclusions on the subject (enclosures Nos. 12 to 16).

5. The results of the working of the jury system have to be considered from two points of view:—

First, with reference to the localities and classes of offences to which the system has from time to time been applied by Local Governments; and

Secondly, with reference to the restrictions which have from time to time been imposed on the system by law, and the further restrictions now proposed as safeguards against failures of justice.

6. In the Madras Presidency the jury system was first introduced in 1862-63 in certain selected districts, and cases punishable under the following sections of Chapter XVII. of the Penal Code (offences against property), were declared triable by jury:—sections 379, 380 and 382 (theft), 392 to 395, 397 to 399 and 400 (robbery and dacoity), 411, 412 and 414 (receiving or possessing stolen property), 451 to 459 and 461 (house-trespass in order to commit theft, etc), and attempts to commit and abettments of these offences. The system was considered to work satisfactorily, and by the Madras Government's order No. 811 (Judicial), dated the 20th March 1883, it was extended to all the Sessions divisions of the Presidency except those in the Agency tracts of Ganjam and Godavari. It was at the same time withdrawn from the Vizagapatam Agency, in which it had not been found successful. The classification of the offences declared triable by jury remained the same as before. The subsequent working of the system, as noticed in the annual reports and in the special reports recently under our consideration (enclosure No. 4), has on the whole not been satisfactory, and a general tendency on the part of juries to convict on insufficient evidence has been complained of by many officers. Our conclusions as regards this Presidency are summed up in paragraph 6 of our letter of the 25th August 1892, to the address of the Madras Government (enclosure No. 12). The classes of offences declared triable by jury seem to be on the whole well chosen, and are, indeed, in our opinion capable of some slight extension; but we doubt whether the system is thoroughly suitable to all the areas to which it has been applied, and we are not satisfied that the defects which have been brought to notice are not in some measure due to the premature and wholesale extension of trial by jury to every district throughout the Presidency. We have commended this point to the consideration of the Local Government.

7. In the Bombay Presidency trial by jury was introduced in the Poona District in 1867; in 1884-85 it was extended to the districts of Ahmedabad, Belgaum, Thana and Surat, and to the city of Karachi. It thus obtains in six out of the twenty-three districts which constitute the Presidency. Offences are classified as triable by jury according to the degree of punishment attached to them. In Ahmedabad all offences punishable with death (and such offences only), in Belgaum, Thana, Surat and Karachi all offences punishable with death, transportation for life or imprisonment for ten years, and in Poona all offences so punishable which fall within Chapters VIII (offences against public tranquility), XI (false evidence and offences against public justice), XII (offences relating to coin and Government stamps), XVI (offences against the person), XVII (offences against property), and XVIII (false documents and offences against property marks) of the Penal Code, are triable by jury before the Court of Session. We entirely agree with the Local Government, the High Court and local officers generally (enclosure No. 5) as to the unsuitability of the present classification of offences triable by jury. As expressed in the minute of one of the Honourable Judges, a beginning was made "at the wrong end," the trial of offences punishable with death and of other serious offences having been entrusted to juries at the outset, instead of cases involving simpler issues or less serious consequences such as those which have been declared triable by jury in Madras and the North-Western Provinces and Oudh. In Ahmedabad, Surat, and Belgaum there appear to have been grave and repeated failures of justice in murder cases, owing to the refusal of the jurors to convict even on clear evidence when there is a probability of a capital sentence being passed. A perusal of the reports leaves no doubt in our mind of the propriety of the recommendation made by the Honourable Justices Birdwood, Telang and Farran, that capital cases should be altogether withdrawn from the cognizance of juries in these three districts. We have asked the Local Government to consider the advisability of revising the list of offences declared triable by jury in the Bombay Presidency; but have not as yet received information whether any action has been taken.

8. In Bengal and Assam (which was then a part of the Province of Bengal) the Local Government extended the jury system in 1862 to the Sessions Divisions of the 24 Perganas, Hooghly (including Howrah), Burdwan, Murshidabad, Nuddea, Patna, and Dacca, and to the districts comprised in the Assam Valley Division. The system thus prevails in eight districts (constituting seven Sessions Divisions) out of forty-six in Bengal, and six districts (constituting one Sessions Division) out of eleven in Assam. The offences which were made triable by jury in these areas are those which fall under Chapter VIII (offences against public tranquillity), Chapter XI (false evidence and offences against public justice), Chapter XVI (offences against the person), Chapter XVII (offences against property), and Chapter XVIII (false documents and offences against property-marks) of the Penal Code, and also attempts to commit and abetments of these offences. In the Assam Division all cases committed to the Court of Sessions were declared triable by jury in 1862; but in 1868 the operation of the system was restricted to the offences falling under the five chapters mentioned above. The reports received from the Bengal Government (enclosures Nos. 6 and 7) and the Calcutta High Court (enclosure No. 8) show that the jury system has worked in an extremely unsatisfactory manner in the Lower Provinces, and that flagrant miscarriages of justice are of not uncommon occurrence in important classes of cases. Very recently the Bengal Government, acting under the powers conferred by section 269 of the Criminal Procedure Code, has revised the list of offences triable by jury. It now includes all offences under Chapter XI of the Penal Code (false evidence and offences against public justice), the offences of kidnapping, abduction and rape, sections 363 to 369, 373 and 376 in Chapter XVI (offences against the person), all offences under Chapter XVII (offences against property) and Chapter XX (offences relating to marriage), and also attempts to commit and abetments of any of these offences. These changes have been made with a view to the improvement of the jury system by withdrawing from its application those offences which experience has shown to be unsuitable for trial by jury and the trial of which has brought most discredit on the system in Bengal. In connection with this subject we invite your Lordship's attention to the letter of the Bengal Government, No. 4527, dated the 12th December, and its enclosures (enclosure No. 20 of this Despatch), which exhibit in a tabular form some statistics of the results of jury trial during the past five years in the eight districts where it is in force. It will be seen that in that period 1,489 cases were tried with the assistance of juries, of which 698 came under heads now withdrawn from their cognizance, while 791 remain so triable. Of the former, the Judge differed, or rather was constrained to record his dissent, from the verdict of the jury in 97 cases, or 13·8 per cent.: in 62 cases, or 8·8 per cent., he referred the verdict to the High Court under section 307 of the Criminal Procedure Code, and in 34 cases, or 4·8 per cent., that Court reversed or modified the finding of the jury. Of the latter, the Judge differed in only 7·7 per cent., and referred in only 4·1 per cent., while the High Court interfered with the verdict in only 13 cases, or 1·6 per cent. The second table is still more instructive, showing that in murder cases alone more than 10 per cent. (22 out of 203) were referred to the High Court as having resulted in a distinct failure of justice, and that in 13 cases, or 6·4 per cent., the High Court actually set aside the verdict. In the other cases now withdrawn (495), the Judge differed in 14·1 per cent., but referred only 8·08 per cent., and obtained a modification of the jury's verdict in 4·2 per cent. The fourth table shows that of the 27 cases in which the Judge expressed dissent from the verdict in charges of murder, in 25 he differed from an acquittal and in only two from a conviction. Under the other heads of cases now withdrawn the Judge differed from the jury in 59 cases of acquittal, or 11·9 per cent., and in 11 cases of conviction, or 2·2 per cent.

These statistics appear to us entirely to justify the action taken by the Bengal Government, and conspicuously so as regards murder cases. It is to be remembered that of these cases the great majority are of a simple character, offering little difficulty in their decision: most of the offences which come to trial are committed by low-caste persons in a humble station of life, and there are few or no inducements for the jury to return a perverse verdict. The cases in which such a verdict is returned are usually those in which a person of respectable caste or station is involved, and these necessarily form but a small proportion of the whole. But the scandal caused by the perverse acquittal of a Brahman or other well-to-do person, and the injury to public morals by the lesson thus taught that such persons can commit crime with impunity, are very great. We consider it of the utmost importance that such miscarriages of justice should be prevented, and that no countenance should be given to the idea that the Courts apply one description of justice in dealing with persons of respectable birth or traditional sanctity, and another in dealing with the landless labourer or low-caste aboriginal. Where the latter are concerned, juries, except where religious objections to being the cause of taking life prevail, are not generally unwilling to convict; but these cases, as already noticed, are usually easy of decision, and the assistance afforded by the jury to the Judge is not greater than he would derive from assessors, whom he is able freely to consult on all questions of Native feeling and usage.

It will be observed that the Bengal Government has now for the first time added to the list of offences triable by jury those under Chapter XX of the Penal Code, relating to marriage. The cases left for trial by jury in Bengal, even after the reduction now made, are more numerous than those which have hitherto been so triable in Madras and the North-Western Provinces and Oudh. Although fewer cases will in future be tried by juries in eight districts, the revised arrangements, after they have been sufficiently tested by experience, may render it possible to extend the jury system to areas where it has not yet been introduced. Under the former arrangements it was found impossible to effect any extension of the system since it was first applied as an experiment in 1862.

The Chief Commissioner of Assam has also revised the list of offences triable by jury in that Province so as to assimilate it to the list adopted in the North-Western Provinces and Oudh as described in the next paragraph.

9. In the North-Western Provinces and Oudh the jury system is in force only in Allahabad, Benares and Lucknow (or in 3 out of 49 districts), where it was introduced in 1885. The cases triable by jury are those relating to offences punishable under sections 363 to 369, 372 and 373 (kidnapping and abduction) and 376 (rape) in Chapter XVI of the Penal Code (offences against the person), sections 379 to 382 (theft), 397 to 399 and 401 (robbery and dacoity), 403 and 404 (criminal misappropriation), 411 to 414 (receiving or possessing stolen property), 426 to 432, 434 to 436 and 440 (mischief), 448 and 450 to 462 (house-breaking, burglary, etc.) in Chapter XVII (offences against property); all offences falling under Chapter XX (relating to marriage); and attempts to commit and abetments of these offences. The opinion of the Local Government is that, restricted in this manner, the jury system has, on the whole, worked satisfactorily in the three districts where it prevails.

10. From the summary just given it will be seen that the system of trial by jury before the Court of Session is not an established part of the machinery of justice in this country, but an exceptional procedure which the law empowers the Local Government to introduce in any particular area and in respect of particular classes of cases, and to extend, restrict, or modify from time to time as may be found necessary. It is only in force in a very small proportion of the districts in Bombay, Bengal and the North-Western Provinces and Oudh. In Madras, where it has been more widely introduced, it is confined to certain specified offences against property of which theft is an element. In the North-Western Provinces and Oudh it is limited in a similar manner, but extends also to the offences of kidnapping, abduction, rape, criminal misappropriation and mischief, and to those relating to marriage. In the latter Provinces the system appears to have worked satisfactorily: it has been cautiously introduced, and the offences classified as triable by jury have been carefully selected. In Madras it is reported not to have worked well in recent years, possibly in consequence of its premature extension to the entire area of the Presidency except the Agencies or non-regulation tracts. In Bengal and Bombay, where the classification of the offences declared triable by jury was based on a different principle and includes a wider range of cases, the results are more unfavourable, and the system is reported to have been the source of grave scandals in the administration of justice, notably in cases of murder and culpable homicide. It is unnecessary for us to repeat here what is stated in detail in the reports received from these Provinces. Your Lordship will observe from the papers (enclosures Nos. 4 to 11) that in certain class of cases juries in India have been found to be devoid of a due sense of their responsibility and public duty. If the jury system is to be placed on a proper footing, so as to be capable of assisting, instead of tending to defeat, the due administration of justice, it seems to us essential that cases in which the personal feelings or caste and social prejudices of the jurors interfere with their public duty should, as far as possible, be excluded from trial by jury, as well as cases in which jurors are liable to be influenced by extrinsic reasons (such as a disinclination to put it in the power of the Judge to pass a capital sentence) or by their sympathy with criminals, and cases which present a complication of details requiring an appreciation and discrimination of the evidence beyond the mental capacity of the persons at present available to serve on juries. The list in force in the North-Western Provinces and Oudh seems to us suitably to classify the offences which may under present circumstances be properly entrusted to the cognizance of juries. It is more comprehensive than the Madras list, and at the same time it excludes cases, such as those of murder and culpable homicide, in which the personal feelings and prejudices of the jurors are most liable to lead to failure of justice, and cases such as those relating to riots, which require careful and minute attention to the evidence and an intelligent discrimination of the parts of it bearing against each individual accused. The latter class of cases generally involve the placing of a number of persons on their trial at the same time, and the hearing frequently extends over several days. It is not the practice nor is it possible in this country to lock up the jurors at night, and they cannot be kept away from outside influences.

ARMY REORGANIZATION

With special reference to the Question of

A Reserve for the Indian Army.

By Capt. ANDREW HEARSEY.

Holloway's Ointment and Pills need only a single trial to make known their capabilities. No outside sore or inward inflammation can long withstand the cooling, purifying, and healing influences exerted by these twin Medicaments. Be the mischief recent or chronic, great or slight, painful or simply annoying, it will succumb before the curative virtues of these noble remedies, which can be rightly applied by any person who will attentively read their accompanying directions, which are propounded in the plainest language, void of technical terms, and printed in the most legible characters. To the man of business, confined to his counting-house, and harassed by engagements, these Pills are invaluable; for the man of pleasure, addicted to free living, they are pearls.

ASRUKANA.

(Second Edition with additions)

BY

SRIMATI GIRINDRAMOHINI DAS,

(Author of Kabitahar, Bharat Kusam, Abhds, &c.)

Nicely got up and neatly bound.

Price, paper cover, Re. 1; cloth gilt, 1-4.

ASRUKANA is a collection of poetical pieces of singular pathos and beauty of expression * * * It is a series of mournful songs that the reader is here presented with and they must touch a sympathetic cord in every heart that can feel. There is a singular appropriateness in the title of the work and in its pious dedication to the memory of the husband of the fair writer.—The Indian Nation.

Bengal should be proud of this poem.—The Calcutta Review.
